Mr. SPRINGER. I had a bill upon my desk, which was not quite completed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask leave to offer it now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after the call of States has been completed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. I think I shall have to interrupt the call of States now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that if those gentlemen whose States and Territories have not yet been called will remain here to-day until the business from the Committee for the District of Columbia has been disposed of, the Chair will then resume the call where it now leaves off and proceed with it till it is concluded.

Mr. CONGER. It was agreed by unanimous consent that all the States should be now called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that. But it was also agreed by unanimous consent that the Committee for the District of Columbia should have the right at two o'clock to-day to take the floor for the consideration of its business, with all the rights which that committee has under the rule.

The chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] has given way for half an hour in order to allow the call of States to be carried on. The Chair now proposes that after the business from the District of Columbia Committee shall have been concluded to-day the call of States shall then proceed, so that all members may have an opportunity to present their bills to-day.

Mr. CONGER. There are but three or four States yet to be called, and I presume that we can get through with the call in a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the members of the District of Columbia Committee to determine.

Mr. HUNTON. I would be very glad to yield, and I have yielded for half an hour. If I should yield any further I am afraid that the business of the District Committee would be cut out for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the House do not adjourn to-night until all the States have been called. After all the business of the District Committee is through with (which the Chair is advised will take but little more than an hour) the call of States can be resumed.

Mr. CONGER. If that is so, then the Committee for the District of Columbia will have time enough for its business should the call of States be now concluded.

The SPEAKER. That may be so; but the committee have a right to the floor at this time under the rule.

Mr. BREWER. Would not the later unanimous consent supersede and do away with the former?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has thought of that. The Chair thinks that the right given to the Committee for the District of Columbia to report at two o'clock to-day is a right under the provisions of the rule, which states that it shall be to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. BREWER. That is true; but that right for to-day was given by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that when the House gave unanimous consent for to-day members did not think that the call of States for bills would go beyond two o'clock. At two o'clock the Chair submitted the question to the House, and the House came to an understanding with the Committee for the District of Columbia that half an hour longer time should be granted. That time has been occupied in the introduction of bills; and the business from the Committee for the District of Columbia will now be proceeded with.

Mr. HUNTON. I think I showed a decided spirit of liberality in giving an additional half-hour for the introduction of bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that after the business of the Committee for the District of Columbia is concluded the call of States for the introduction of bills, &c., shall be resumed. He is willing to stay here himself as long as may be necessary to conclude the business, as he did on a former Monday when the introduction of bills occupied more than six hours.

Mr. BREWER. I ask unanimous consent that the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills, &c., may be resumed and concluded to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

There being no objection, the motion of Mr. BREWER was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC NEAR GEORGETOWN.

Mr. HUNTON. I am instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1381) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. As this bill is subject to a point of order, I shall, after the bill has been read, ask that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown in the District of Columbia, at such point as he may select, a substantial iron and masonry bridge, with approaches; and the sum of $140,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of said bridge and approaches, the same to be maintained as a free bridge for travel: Provided, That the said Secretary of War shall construct a bridge upon such plan as shall cost no more than the amount herein appropriated, and which cost shall include the construction of a substantial bridge over the canal, and any and all approaches to the said iron bridge; and no part of this appropriation shall be paid out of the Treasury until contracts shall have been entered into with responsible parties, and with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the construction and completion of said bridge, including the masonry, iron-work, and approaches, at a cost not to exceed $140,000: And provided also, That a draw of sufficient width to permit the free passage of vessels navigating that part of the Potomac River shall be constructed in said bridge, unless said bridge shall be constructed by the side of, or up the river from, the present aqueduct and at the same or greater elevation above the water: And provided also, That the sum which may be expended under this act shall be treated and regarded as a part of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, and the United States shall be credited with the amount which it may pay under this act for the erection of said bridge upon its 50 per cent. of the expenses of the District of Columbia, as provided in the act of June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia:" Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, as soon as may be, fix and determine the location of said bridge, and cause a survey of the river to be made at such place of location, determine the length, width, and height of said bridge, and the length of draw, if one is required, and thereupon advertise for plans and price for the construction of such bridge; such advertisement to be inserted in one or more daily newspapers published in Washington, District of Columbia, New York, and Cleveland, Ohio, for the space of one week.

SEC. 2. That if the Alexandria Canal Railroad and Bridge Company will lease to the United States their bridge over the Potomac River at Georgetown for so long as said bridge shall be maintained upon the terms, conditions, and price as hereinafter specified, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to enter into such lease in behalf of the United States, and refrain from erecting a bridge as in the first section of this act provided. Said lease must contain the following provisions and conditions: The rent as specified at —— thousand dollars per annum, payable quarterly by the United States, less any deductions for not complying with the terms of said lease as therein provided; that said lease shall continue as long as said bridge shall be kept up for use, but the lessee may at its option declare said lease forfeited in case the lessor fails for a period of thirty days after notice to keep said bridge in a safe and proper condition for public travel; that if said bridge at any time becomes unsafe for public travel, on notice from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, the rent under said lease shall cease, and not recommence until said bridge shall be made safe for public travel, and notice thereof given to said commissioners, and the amount from any suspension of rent to be deducted from the rent thereafter to become due; that said bridge company shall not, during the continuance of said lease, use upon said bridge structure any locomotive or steam-propelling power; that during the continuance of said lease the use of said bridge shall be free to the public and the Government.

SEC. 3. That to enable the United States to fulfill such lease, if made, the sum of —— dollars is hereby appropriated yearly, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for paying such of said rent as may become due, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay the same; and the sums thus paid shall be treated and held as a part of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, and the United States shall be credited with the amount which it shall pay under this act upon its 50 per cent. of the expenses of said District of Columbia as provided in the act of June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia."

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 4 strike out section 3.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill just read is subject to a point of order if any gentleman on the floor wishes to raise such a point. I hope, however, that in order to avoid any difficulty on that score it will be the pleasure of the House to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HUNTON. This bill as amended by the committee and now reported is substantially, if not entirely, the bill which was passed by this House in the last Congress without a division. The only objection then arising in this House resulted from a desire on the part of members to get in proper shape two portions of the bill. One was in regard to dividing between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government the expense of erecting this free bridge, so as to bring the expenditure within the operation of the act known as the act creating a permanent government for the District of Columbia. The provision of the present bill on that subject is in these words:

That the sum which may be expended under this act shall be treated and regarded as a part of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, and the United States shall be credited with the amount which it may pay under this act for the erection of said bridge upon its 50 per cent. of the expenses of the District of Columbia, as provided in the act of June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia."

This was the amendment finally agreed upon in the last House, and it was entirely satisfactory to members on both sides.

The other matter in regard to which some difficulty arose was as to obtaining the consent of the State of Virginia to the building of an abutment on the other side of the river, which would be within the territory of that State. The House is aware that the General Government has jurisdiction over the entire river Potomac along the borders of the District of Columbia, and the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia extends only to low-water mark on the other side. But one of the abutments of this bridge would of necessity be upon the soil of Virginia. Consequently, in the bill passed by the House at the last session a provision was inserted that the act should not go into operation until the consent of Virginia had been given to the erection of that abutment on her soil. After the passage of the bill by the House the State of Virginia, whose Legislature was then in session, passed an act giving consent to the erection of this bridge, authorizing the Government of the United States to acquire ten acres of land for the purpose, and giving concurrent jurisdiction to the United States over the land thus acquired. Hence, the provision with reference to obtaining the consent of Virginia has been omitted in this bill because such consent has already been granted.

In regard to the necessity for a bridge across the Potomac at the point contemplated by this bill I desire to state that at or near this point there is now a toll-bridge erected over the aqueduct which conducts the canal across the Potomac. That is the only toll-bridge leading into the District of Columbia. All the bridges leading into the District from the State of Maryland are free, and all the bridges from the State of Virginia are free except the one to which I have just referred. The object of this bill is to afford to the people who now have to use that toll-bridge the same facilities enjoyed by people coming into the District by other bridges. The expense of constructing this bridge, $140,000, is to be divided equally between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia, in accordance with the provision which I have read.

I will add a word in regard to the two sections which the committee have instructed me to move to strike out. It was supposed that possibly it might be best for the Federal Government to lease the present Aqueduct Bridge, paying for its use such sums as the company now receive in tolls; and when this bill was reported to the House and recommitted, two sections looking to that end were embraced in the bill. Upon consideration this morning, the Committee for the District of Columbia, I believe unanimously, instructed me to offer an amendment striking out these two sections, leaving the free-bridge bill pure and simple as this House passed it at the last session of Congress. So, if the amendments of the committee are adopted and the bill is passed, there will be a free bridge erected, under the direction of the Secretary of War, at or near Georgetown, at a price not to exceed $140,000. And the only difference between the bill passed by this House at the last session of Congress and the present one is that this provides for specifications, advertisements, &c.

If there is any objection to the bill it will give me great pleasure if I can to explain it still further to gentlemen.

Mr. WRIGHT. I observe that it appropriates $140,000. Now, why is it necessary, if the District of Columbia is to pay half the cost, that the whole amount should be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HUNTON. That is done in every such case. The Federal Government pays the money and when the settlement takes place between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia under the permanent form of government bill, then the Federal Government is credited with this amount.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am at a loss to understand why it is that the people of the United States should be taxed to build a bridge for the local convenience of the people of Georgetown and its neighborhood. I am at a loss to understand why any reason which could be urged for the passage of such a bill could not as well be used for bridging at the Government expense any other river in any other part of the United States for the benefit of the local community interested in any such bridge.

I am aware, sir, that generally when it is proposed to do anything in the way of expending money in the District of Columbia it is hardly considered in order to raise objections to it. We passed a bill here in June, 1878, for a permanent government of the District, and one, I venture to say, most marvelous in its effect and character in taxing the people of the United States in large degree for local expenses of the people here; and beyond, it seems to me, all necessity. But I do not propose to rediscuss that subject now.

Here we are now asked to build a free bridge across the Potomac River, not within the District of Columbia, but across the river connecting the District of Columbia with the State of Virginia.

Mr. BRAGG. Let me ask the gentleman from Texas whether the Government does not own a bridge now known as the Chain Bridge, about two miles above this?

Mr. REAGAN. I understand there is a free bridge, but I have never investigated it—what is called the Chain Bridge; and that the Government owns another bridge below this at Georgetown. How many bridges there are I do not know. Experience has taught me, Mr. Speaker, the difficulty of preventing the passage of any of these appropriations for purposes in and about the District of Columbia, and I do not hope to succeed in defeating this unnecessary proposition; but I do rise to protest that we have no more right to appropriate this money out of the Federal Treasury to build a free bridge across the Potomac River than we have to build a free bridge across the Delaware, or the Schuylkill, or the James, or any other river. If there is any reason why this local bridge, for the benefit of a neighborhood and local convenience only, should be paid for by the Government of the United States, which would not apply to the rivers I have named, or any other rivers in the United States, I should like to hear it.

Mr. SAMFORD. Mr. Speaker, there is another objection, it seems to me, to this bill which comes in by virtue of the law referred to by the gentleman from Texas, and that is this: in that law it was provided that all matters, not only of this character, but all expenses of the District of Columbia, should be first suggested by the District commissioners, and by them submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him transmitted to Congress, after he had scrutinized the proposition of the District commissioners. I find, in looking at that law passed barely a year ago—not quite a year ago—"that such commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing and the estimated cost thereof; also the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining all bridges authorized by law across the Potomac River within the District of Columbia, and also all streams in said District."

There is a provision in that law which seems to me to be a salutary one, requiring the District commissioners first to make the proposition. They are then to be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury and to come under his scrutiny. It is required by that law first to be submitted by the commissioners, for the reason, I apprehend, that the commissioners know best the state of the revenues and assets of the District and can say whether the finances of the District will or not permit the work to be undertaken. But in the face of that this proposition, without having been suggested by the commissioners of the District and without being submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, asks us to appropriate $140,000 by Congress in the first instance, without ever having a single estimate made in any legal form.

Therefore I think it is contrary to the law as it is now established for the government of this District. The Secretary of the Treasury is required to—

> Carefully consider all estimates submitted to him as above provided, and shall approve, disapprove, or suggest such changes in the same, or any item thereof, as he may think the public interest demands; and after he shall have considered and passed upon such estimates submitted to him he shall cause to be made a statement of the amount approved by him and the fund or purpose to which each item belongs, which statement shall be certified by him and delivered, together with the estimates as orignally submitted, to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall transmit the same to Congress.

Now, my objection to this mainly is that we cannot at this time act advisedly on this subject. I do not desire to be understood as combating the idea of a free bridge for Georgetown. Notwithstanding there is force in the utterances of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] I do not propose to commit myself on that proposition at all. But what I am contending against now is that we should consider a bill that comes here in this shape without having run the gauntlet which is required by law.

At this very time the citizens of Georgetown are beseeching and besieging the District Committee, and through them Congress, in order to have certain taxes remitted. The commissioners themselves are asking for a loan of $25,000 to enable them to complete or perfect the water-works here. And yet without consulting the commissioners at all, Congress, it is proposed, shall require them to assume an additional indebtedness of $70,000 or one-half of the $140,000 to be appropriated for this bridge.

I say that the law which took effect July 1, 1878, was passed for the special purpose of having the commissioners report to Congress what improvements the state of the finances of the District of Columbia would permit to be undertaken. And, in addition, I say that I see no necessity for any undue haste. It is contended that if we put this off it goes over to another year. That is true; it does go over for another year for the estimates to be made by these authorities who are authorized by the law to make them. There is a provision in this very law which says that the taxes of the District shall not be anticipated, and yet we anticipate them by this bill without ever asking the commissioners one single question in reference to it.

These are my objections to this bill as it stands now without any reference to what my position may be when the question comes up of a free bridge in the right way.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 516) to extend the time of special postal service until service can be obtained by advertisement; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

Mr. HUNTON. I do not understand my friend from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] as opposing a free bridge.

Mr. SAMFORD. Not at this time.

Mr. HUNTON. No; you only oppose an appropriation because you maintain the necessary preliminaries have not been gone through.

Mr. SAMFORD. Yes; I do not think the matter is in a proper shape to vote upon at this time.

Mr. HUNTON. But I understood the gentleman to say, and I have understood him heretofore to say, that if these necessary preliminaries, according to his opinion, be complied with, he favors a free bridge as provided for by the bill.

Mr. SAMFORD. Allow me to say that I do not commit myself on that question at all.

Mr. HUNTON. Very well; the gentleman does not commit himself against it.

Now I say my friend from Alabama is entirely mistaken about the necessity of a report from the commissioners of the District of Columbia to the Secretary of the Treasury and of a report from the Secretary of the Treasury to this House. I am aware, sir, that the bill to which he alludes, called a bill providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, does provide that certain matters shall be estimated for by the District commissioners, reported to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him transmitted to the House, and so far as approved by the Appropriations Committee the appropriation shall be made, and not otherwise. But this is not an improvement belonging to that class of matters. The same question was raised when this bridge bill passed the House at the last session, and upon reading the act, as I understood, the gentleman who raised the objection to the bill now raised by the gentleman from Alabama abandoned it. I desire to call the attention of the House to the provision upon that subject, and they will see upon the reading of the law that this is not one of those appropriations that have to pass through the commissioners to the Secretary of the Treasury before they can be granted by this House.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to ask the gentleman whether this is not within the spirit of the law in order that the party who is to pay the tax may know that the amount levied is within the means of payment?

Mr. HUNTON. It is not within either the letter or the spirit of the law.

Mr. BRAGG. May not the effect of this bill be to levy a tax on the people here, who it is said are already taxed more than they are able to bear?

Mr. HUNTON. That is for the people of the District to complain of rather than for the gentleman from Wisconsin. I wish now to call the attention of the House to the language of the law referred to by the gentleman from Alabama to show that it has no reference to this bill:

The said commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing, and the estimated cost thereof; also, the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining all bridges authorized by law across the Potomac River within the District of Columbia, and also all other streams in said District.

Now, this is a provision that the statement shall include the cost of all bridges authorized by law; and the commissioners of the District of Columbia had no more right, no more authority under that provision of law establishing a permanent form of government to estimate the cost of this bridge than they had to estimate the cost of anything else that the wit of man can conceive of.

Mr. SAMFORD. Then I understand this is not a bridge authorized by law?

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly not.

Mr. SAMFORD. Let me ask the gentleman one other question. Then the object of this bill is to authorize it by law and provide for its building in the same bill?

Mr. HUNTON. Unquestionably; and I presume nobody understood it otherwise. This bridge is not now authorized by law; this bill is to authorize its construction. That being the object of this bill the District commissioners could not have estimated its cost. They would not have known, of course, where this bridge was to be located. They could not tell whether this Congress meant to pass a bill authorizing the construction of an expensive or an economical bridge. They did not know the width of the river where the bridge was to be located. And in the name of common sense how could the District commissioners have estimated for its cost?

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] if I understood him correctly as stating that this bill was passed by the House in the last Congress?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, and without a division. The only controversy was in regard to the amendments to which I called the attention of the House a moment ago. Those amendments were made and they satisfied the entire House, so that the bill was passed without an objection.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Does the committee reporting this bill take into calculation the fact that there are already two bridges across the Potomac?

Mr. HUNTON. There are two bridges across the Potomac leading into Virginia. One is known as the Long Bridge, four miles below where it is proposed to build this bridge. The constant passing of railroad trains across the Long Bridge renders it almost useless for the purposes of the farmers who desire to bring their products to the markets in this city. The other bridge is four miles above where it is proposed to locate this one, not two miles as my friend from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] has stated. The people who will use this bridge, if it is constructed, cannot without great inconvenience go to the bridge four miles above. Now, in regard to the very remarkable protest of my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] I desire to say a word.

Mr. MCMILLIN. One other question.

Mr. HUNTON. Very well.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What is the object of providing that the Government shall build this bridge? Why not let the parties interested in it build it?

Mr. HUNTON. Who are the parties interested in it?

Mr. BRAGG. The State of Virginia for one.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I cannot see that the Government is sufficiently interested in this bridge to justify its building it.

Mr. HUNTON. I will endeavor to show that very clearly; and I propose along with that to address myself to the remarkable protest of my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] He says he does not see why the people of the United States should be taxed to make a free bridge for the purpose of ingress into and egress from the city of Washington. It has not been very long since my friend who makes this protest brought into this House a bill making much larger appropriations for his own State, which the people of the United States had to pay. I have that bill before me, and it appropriates about $200,000 for the State of Texas mainly.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me to say that those appropriations relate to the general improvement of the commerce of the United States.

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, and this bridge is for the general good of the people of the District of Columbia. One-half of the property of this District is owned by the United States. Now, sir, if the people of the United States can pay $200,000 for the benefit of the State of Texas, I think my friend ought not to complain when a bill is brought in here to improve the capital of the country, the people of which are called upon to pay $200,000 for the improvement of little rivers and harbors in the State of Texas, some of which I have no doubt are down upon the map. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Read them over.

Mr. HUNTON. I will do so. "For deepening the channel of Sabine Pass at Blue Buck Bar, Texas, $25,000." Now, I have my doubts whether there is any such place in Texas. [Laughter.] "For improving entrance to Galveston Harbor, Texas, $100,000." "For improving Narrows of Sabine River above Orange, Texas, and to deepen the channel at the mouth of the Sabine River, $6,000." "For improving mouth of Trinity River, Texas, $2,500." "For improving mouth of"—some name I cannot pronounce.

Mr. REAGAN. Neches River.

Mr. HUNTON. There is no such river as that in Texas, is there? [Laughter.] For that is appropriated $5,000. "For improving Passo Cavallo Inlet into Matagorda Bay, Texas, $25,000."

Nearly $200,000 was appropriated by the last Congress, upon the report of my friend himself as the chairman of the committee that brought in the bill, for the improvement of these little rivers in Texas. The people of the United States are obliged to pay that sum; yet the very moment that an appropriation is asked to improve the capital of the country my friend raises his voice in earnest protest against it.

Now let me tell you why the bill which he says was the most monstrous which ever passed the House—I take issue with him on that. The point of monstrosity in that bill, in his opinion, was that the Federal Government was to pay one-half of the expenses of the District of Columbia in these six miles square under the exclusive control of the United States Government. Why? Because the evidence before the Congress of the United States was that the Government of the United States owned half the property here, and every dollar spent in the city of Washington was spent one-half for the Government of the United States and one-half for the people of the District.

Mr. BLOUNT. All the streets and avenues are included in that calculation of the property owned by the United States in this District.

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, and the Government owns all the streets and avenues in this District, every square yard of them. I do not think, I never did think, and the majority of both Houses of Congress do not think, that that provision in the bill was a monstrosity. The gentleman asks why the people of the United States should be taxed to help build a bridge across the Potomac for the benefit of the people of the State of Virginia. I will tell you why in my opinion they ought, and why in the opinion of the last House, without a division, it was thought proper. The Federal Government owns half the property in this District and has exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia. More than that, it has exclusive jurisdiction over the Potomac River clear to the Virginia shore; and when the Federal Government undertakes to bridge the Potomac in the direction of the State of Virginia it bridges its own stream and not a stream belonging to the State of Virginia. If Virginia were able and desirous to undertake this work she could not put a single pier in that stream without the consent of the United States.

But, asks the gentleman, why should the Federal Government build this bridge? I ask him, why should the Federal Government have built and made free every bridge leading into the District of Columbia except one? Is there to be one rule adopted for Maryland and another rule for Virginia? I trust not. The same rule which has governed our legislation in regard to bridges leading from the District of Columbia toward the State of Maryland should be administered as to those leading into the State of Virginia.

Mr. CONGER. Is not the bridge across the Eastern Branch, near the navy-yard, entirely within the District of Columbia?

Mr. HUNTON. Possibly it may be. But I was going to call the attention of the House to some expenditures made by the Federal Government in order to provide free bridges for the District of Columbia. The Little-Falls bridge was made free by an act of Congress, March 3, 1853, and $30,000 was appropriated for that purpose. July 20, 1868, $26,000 was appropriated for repairs of that bridge. An act was passed June 30, 1872, appropriating $100,000 to erect an iron bridge upon the piers of the Chain Bridge, so called. An appropriation of $147,000 for the repair of the Navy-Yard Bridge was made June 22, 1874. Every bridge leading into this District, whether from the State of Maryland or the State of Virginia, with the one exception already mentioned, has been erected or made free by appropriations from the Federal Treasury.

I am aware that there are already bridges leading into the State of Virginia. But, as I said awhile ago, one is useless for general purposes on account of the passage of railroad trains, three different companies I believe using that bridge. The other is so far up the river that it does not accommodate the people who would use the bridge provided for in this bill.

I cannot for my life see why, when an appropriation of this sort is asked, my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] should rise in his seat and say that it is impossible to oppose successfully any appropriation proposed for the District of Columbia. My experience is just the reverse. The hardship is that we do not make such appropriations for the District of Columbia as a Government ought to bestow upon its own capital for the convenience of citizens and the embellishment of the seat of government. I think that this bridge is not only important to the Government and to the people, but is demanded by every consideration at the hands of this House.

I desire to state further that the toll-bridge which now accommodates the same class of people who would be accommodated by the free bridge proposed in this bill, is now used by the Government in the transportation of troops and supplies across the river. Several hundred dollars per annum are expended by the Government of the United States in order to transport troops and supplies to Arlington and to Fort Whipple on the other side of the river. More than this, at Arlington, as the House is very well aware, is one of the largest Federal cemeteries in the United States; and annually, on Decoration Day, immense numbers of people repair there from the District of Columbia to decorate the graves in that cemetery. Every person who passes over the Aqueduct Bridge for such purposes has to pay the enormous toll charged by the present bridge company.

For these reasons I think it is imperatively demanded at the hands of Congress that the people who will be accommodated by this free bridge should be placed upon the same footing with other communities who have the use of free bridges and can come into the District of Columbia or go from the District into the adjacent country, without paying toll.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in reply to the observations of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.] He raises an analogy between appropriations made for the improvement of navigation for the benefit of the commerce of the United States and a bridge erected to accommodate a neighborhood, no general commerce being concerned. The gentleman exercises his wit by calling attention to the fact that appropriations have been made out of the public Treasury to make improvements at places in the State of Texas that he knows nothing about; places as to which he does not know whether they are on the map or not. I can only say I am sorry for the meagerness of the gentleman's geographical knowledge. He is anxious to know where Sabine Pass and Blue Buck Bar are. If he had been a very earnest inquirer for information he would have found that Sabine City, where this pass is located, is one of the ports of the Gulf of Mexico, and that Blue Buck Bar lies between that port and the outer waters of the gulf, in tide water. He was also perplexed to know where Neches River is, and he does not know whether that is on the map. I am again sorry for the gentleman's deficiency in geographical information. I can only say that this is a river which has been navigated for two hundred and fifty miles by steamboats for thirty years, and not a dollar was expended by the Federal Government upon it until within a year or two we made an appropriation to improve its mouth in tide water. Every dollar that has ever been appropriated for improving the commercial facilities of that region has been spent in improving its tide water or its coast, except two or three small appropriations for a stream extending from the city of Jefferson to the Red River. With this exception, all the appropriations for that portion of the country have been appropriations to deepen the entrances of sea-port towns and to improve tide-water navigation of rivers which have been navigated far up by steamboats for thirty years.

I do not care to go further into this question. I would not have referred to the subject at all but for the fact that it is very common for the gentleman from Virginia and a few others who have no sympathy with the commercial prosperity of this country to be throwing out insinuations about appropriations for streams upon which there is no commerce. And, Mr. Speaker, I desire here to call attention to a distinction which arises upon the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, who is the constant, inveterate opponent of every bill to improve the commercial facilities of this great country.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. REAGAN. I say that the gentleman has voted against every bill brought in here to improve our rivers and harbors.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I opposed his bill because he moved to pass it, including appropriations for $8,000,000, and including also what I have referred to, under the suspension of the rules, and it was the suspension of the rules to pass an appropriation bill of $8,000,000 which I opposed, because I wanted it discussed, so that if any of these appropriations needed for the benefit of the gentleman's own State were improper they could be stricken out. I wished to have opportunity to debate the bill, and not to have it passed without debate and without amendment under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. REAGAN. Perhaps that is the motive which controlled the gentleman's vote, but in the remark which I made I was influenced by the fact that the gentleman always has voted against bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and always speaks against them.

Mr. HUNTON. I voted against the suspension of the rules.

Mr. REAGAN. Gentlemen who desire the improvement of our commerce manage to vote and speak for these bills. But that is aside from what I wish to say. I wish to call the attention of the House to the gentleman's opposition and vote against these bills for the improvement of the commerce of the country, improvements under the authority of the Constitution and in pursuance of a well-settled policy, and yet, while he votes against those bills which are based upon and propounded by the Constitution, scruples not to advocate the appropriation of money out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of building a bridge for a neighborhood—to appropriate the money of the people of the United States to pay the ferriage or toll of the people of a neighborhood—for a purpose that has no higher and no better virtue, and for a bridge not within the District of Columbia, unless you call the waters of the Potomac River within the District of Columbia. And while this bridge across the Potomac may facilitate people in getting to and from the District of Columbia, upon the very same ground a like appropriation could be advocated for a bridge across the Delaware River, or the Susquehana River, or the Ohio River, or the Mississippi River, as the construction of such bridges would save the people of those neighborhoods the cost of paying like annual tolls. That is what I have to say about that.

Now, I made the distinction about appropriating money for the benefit of a neighborhood—for local benefit, a gift for no consideration, under the authority of no provision of the Constitution, pursuant to a policy which finds its warrant nowhere in the Constitution, and only sustained, if sustained at all, by a very bad set of precedents and appropriations made for the general benefit of the whole people.

I do not propose to exercise any wit about it; I do not propose what does not exist, but I do propose to go to the fact itself; and if the gentleman answers me by saying that I have recommended appropriations for five or six or seven millions of dollars for the improvement of the commercial facilities of this country, deepening the navigable waters, removing obstructions, cheapening freights, reducing insurance, and accommodating nearly thirty billions of the United States for the benefit of the producers and all who consume the products of the country, in pursuance of an enlarged and necessary policy, I am content with having made such a record; but that is no sort of answer upon a proposition to make a large appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States to build a bridge for the benefit of a neighborhood, simply to give a gratuity to a neighborhood, to accommodate May parties and other excursions, as the gentleman has gravely told us that Decoration Day happens once a year, and if this bridge were built the people could go over it to attend the decoration of the graves of the dead. That, of course, is a praiseworthy purpose, proper in itself, but I have never found in the Constitution any provision or any precedent which will warrant for any such purpose an expenditure of $140,000 of the people's money. I have never yet found a principle upon which such a thing could rest. I certainly do not think we have any right to indulge in any such luxuries when two bridges are already established there that may well accommodate the people of the neighborhood. If they want more, they can do like people in the other parts of the country, they can build them and pay the expense themselves.

The gentleman need not have gone to Texas to find appropriations for improvement of navigable rivers, for if he turned his attention to the State of Virginia, his own State, he would find the same appropriation for Aquia Creek, and made on his recommendation, where a canoe would have been wrecked.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Does the gentleman intend to say that Congress has no right to improve a highway in the District of Columbia?

Mr. REAGAN. That is not the question before the House.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Does the gentleman mean to say the whole of this bridge is not built within the limits of the District of Columbia?

Mr. REAGAN. I mean to say it is not called for by the public interest.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. That is a different question.

Mr. REAGAN. It is simply for local benefit. A highway in the sense of a commercial or military highway of the United States is the only sort of a highway we have the authority to appropriate for.

I accept the correction of the gentleman from Virginia that the appropriation I referred to was not made at his instance. I will say, however, several of the appropriations were for waters of nothing like the consequence of the streams appropriated for in Texas; and what I wanted to say was that the gentleman from Virginia need not go to Texas for his illustration. He might have taken Virginia on one side of the District, for his illustration, and Maryland on the other. He could have found there ample appropriations and charged them to those two States if he chose, instead of charging them to the general commerce of the United States.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. I have not been in the House during this debate. Does this bridge run from the shore of the District of Columbia to the Virginia shore?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. Is it proposed that the United States shall pay half and Virginia half?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; the District of Columbia is to pay half.

Mr. COX. And the United States the other half?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. And Virginia pays nothing?

Mr. REAGAN. Nothing.

Mr. COX. Bless my soul! [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. It has been stated here that the Government is owner of one-half the property in this city. It is true that the bill for the permanent government of the District of Columbia was based upon that idea. In order to reach this the whole of the personal property, merchandise, public securities, and everything else in the city was thrown out of the calculation and the real estate only was valued; and the Government was charged with the public grounds of the city and the public buildings of the city and the streets and avenues and alleys of the city, so as to make out that the property owned by the Government was equal to the property owned by the citizens of the District of Columbia.

Why, sir, from the beginning the Government has improved its own property exclusively at its own expense. It did so before that law was passed and it does so since that law passed. But it is to be further charged with the streets and avenues and alleys as its property as contradistinguished from the property of private owners. That was the basis on which that bill was passed; and hence I said it was a monstrous bill. No fair man can say that the portion set apart for the use of the Government is anything like one-half or one-third of the property of the city. Leaving out the public grounds and the streets, the avenues and alleys, the Government's proportion of the property of this city resting upon the realty alone is so small that the arrangement is calculated to make any one feel the astonishment I expressed at the passage of the bill.

But besides that the personal, worth infinitely more than the real property in this city, was all left out to be untaxed so far as this apportionment of indebtedness was concerned in order to make the people of the United States pay the local taxes of the people of the District. That was the reason I had for expressing astonishment. I repeat it again, that my friend may not forget it, that was the reason I had for expressing astonishment. And the reason I had for saying we could only protest and could not hope for success in defeating the bill was that when that monstrous bill was before the House I could not get even the yeas and nays to arrest its passage or to put gentlemen on the record as voting yea or nay.

A MEMBER. Was it not the same with the river and harbor bill?

Mr. REAGAN. In answer to that suggestion, I will say that that bill was to provide facilities for the commerce of the United States under authority of the Constitution and in pursuance of a great public policy, while this is for a purely local benefit—a gift that is to a neighborhood at the expense of the whole United States. And when the country is in the distressed condition it now is, it seems to me we should put our hands lightly into the public Treasury, when the people are unable to pay the taxes, when marshals' sales, sheriffs' sales, tax sales, and trustees' sales are so frequent, and the advertisements of them fill the newspapers all over the land. Half the people are unable to pay their taxes and their debts; and it seems to me we had better hold our hands in making appropriations wherever we can, and especially where they are not warranted by the Constitution or any just or proper public policy.

Mr. HENKLE. This debate has already traveled far beyond its legitimate sphere. In that respect it is in accord with the debates that generally take place in the consideration of District business. On such occasions a great deal of time is consumed in irrelevant argument and illustration. In this debate we have traveled to Texas. We have had the merits of the river and harbor bill discussed and we have had the merits of the bill authorizing the permanent form of government for the District of Columbia discussed. Now, all these matters are irrelevant to the bill at present pending before the House. I propose to make a few practical remarks, and will attempt to confine myself to the precise question before us.

The gentleman from Texas has asked us why should the people of the United States be taxed and why should the people of the District be taxed to build a bridge to accommodate one particular neighborhood? In answer to that question I would state that it is for the very same reason that the United States is taxed equally with the District of Columbia to maintain all the highways and all the bridges and all the thoroughfares of public travel within the limits of this District, and the people of the District are also taxed for the same purpose. The citizens of Georgetown pay taxes for the support of all these other thoroughfares and bridges, and is it fair that they should be compelled to pay taxes to support free highways and bridges that are leading into the city from every other direction while they themselves are compelled to pay toll?

This bill is based upon the principles of equity. The Government has gone thus far in this direction. Every bridge, every avenue leading into the District, no matter whether it is entirely in the District or whether one end be in the District and the other end in Maryland or Virginia, has been paid for entirely by the District government and the General Government conjointly.

The Long Bridge is entirely within the District of Columbia; but the other end of it abuts upon the soil of Virginia. One end of Chain Bridge is in the District of Columbia and the other end in Virginia. Now, there is no more reason why Virginia should be required to pay for constructing this bridge than for constructing either of the others.

I say, then, that this bill is based upon a general principle established for years in the District of Columbia, the broad principle laid down in the bill for the formation of a government for the District of Columbia passed by the last Congress. The principle is that the General Government should pay 50 per cent. of the general expenditures of this District and the people of the District should pay the other 50 per cent.

Now, if the people who will be taxed for the support of this improvement are willing to have it made, I see no good reason why Congress should object to it. In one form or another this subject has been pending before our committee for the last three or four years. Never yet has a single citizen of Washington, or of Georgetown, or of any part of the District of Columbia appeared before our committee and protested against the people of the District being taxed for this bridge, or made any objection of any kind to the establishment of a free bridge at this point.

These embarrassments and these hinderances to public travel are far behind the civilization of the age. The progress of the nineteenth century and the advances that we hope we are making all over the country demand that there shall be no longer such obstruction; demand that we shall have free highways, free bridges, and untrammeled travel, and that the gates of our city shall be thrown open to the people from every direction who may choose to come here.

Besides, the Government has a direct interest in the construction of this bridge. The Government owns property outside of this District. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has ridiculed the illustration made by my friend from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] who referred to Decoration Day. There are extensive property interests over there which belong to the Government and which are resorted to every day by the employés and attaches of the Government. The Government to-day pays $400 or $500 a year toll for travel which would be free across this bridge if it was constructed.

Mr. BLOUNT. Would there be any saving if the Government should pay $150,000 to construct this bridge?

Mr. HENKLE. Of course the interest on $150,000 would exceed that amount. But I say that the General Government has an interest there beyond the general equities of the case. The Government has a material interest in the matter, and every day citizens here are taxed for the toll which is charged for crossing the bridge now there.

These are the general reasons upon which we have based this bill. We think it is fair and equitable; we think it is absolutely necessary, in order to do justice to the citizens of those portions of the District who have contributed by their taxes toward the maintenance of free bridges and highways in other sections of the District, that they should now have the assistance of the Government in affording relief to their portions of the District.

Mr. SPARKS. I understand the argument of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENKLE] to be about this: that because the people of Georgetown pay taxes for improvements in the District of Columbia elsewhere than at Georgetown, therefore a free bridge at or about the neighborhood of the Aqueduct Bridge should be constructed for their benefit. Now, it is a correct principle doubtless that the people of this District should all of them be taxed to pay for improvements made anywhere in the District. But what is this bridge across the Potomac? That bridge if built will certainly be as beneficial to the State of Virginia as it is to the District of Columbia. Then, looking at it as a matter of right and common honesty, the question arises, should this District be called upon to pay for the whole of that improvement, one-half of the benefits of which accrue to the people of Virginia? That is the question, the answer to which must necessarily be in the negative.

Of course, under the law passed in the last Congress and referred to by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] whatever amount is expended for improvements in this District is, under the law, to be shared equally between the tax-payers of the District and the Government of the United States. That objectionable law is strongly condemned by my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] That, however, I understand, is not pertinent to this discussion. It is so fixed, it is "so nominated in the bond" if you please; wrongfully of course, and yet it is done; it is the law. My friend from Texas justly complains that when it was passed he was unable to get a "yea-and-nay" vote on it, so persistent and well fortified were the friends of the measure. I remember that I heartily concurred with my friend in his efforts to arrest its passage; but we were unsuccessful. That the people of this whole country should be paying one-half of the expenses of this city and of this District is, in my judgment, an outrage upon the taxpayers of the country. I have protested against it as well as I could ever since it was broached in this House. But this bill goes further, and demands that we should add to that burden the expense of building a free bridge which will cost $140,000, reaching into Virginia, and in which that State is as much interested as the people of this District; and that we should tax the tax-payers all over the country to pay for one-half of the whole cost of it is, in my judgment, intensifying a great wrong.

I am glad, however, that my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] to use a common expression, "went for" the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] on his weak point; for this bill, bad as I conceive it to be, is no greater outrage than, in fact not a quarter so bad as, the river and harbor bill, which was got up and put through under suspension of the rules, without amendment or the power of amendment, and by which, in my judgment, the tax-payers of this country were absolutely robbed of many millions of dollars. The gentleman from Texas is now, and was then, chairman of the Committee on Commerce that reported that bill, and was its manager in the House when it passed.

I am also glad that my friend from Virginia directed the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the appropriations made in that bill for the "Sabine Pass" and "Blue Buck Bar" and various other useless improvements in Texas; but I am also equally pleased that my friend from Texas comes back at him about the appropriation for "Aquia Creek," in Virginia, which he says contains hardly water enough to "wreck a canoe on." Yet for that kind of so-called improvements a bill is brought in here and put through without opportunity for amendment or discussion. It is that sort of legislation, Mr. Speaker, that is arousing the indignation of the people of this country, and ought to arouse it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman desire to stir up strife between the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON?]

Mr. SPARKS. Yes; a wordy strife, for by that means we expose the wrong of both bills.

Mr. REAGAN. In case of any difficulty, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] may do all the fighting himself.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] will not succeed in "stirring up strife" between the gentleman from Texas and myself.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Virginia mutually attack the bills of each, and are both right in their attacks. The gentleman from Texas, in addition to his just opposition to the bill now before us, also hits the "Aquia Creek" appropriation because it is in Virginia. Of course he is right in that, for there ought to have been no appropriation for that little creek; and if the proposition had been submitted separately to the House whether the people's money should be voted for that improvement, of course it would not have been done. But that and other items of the same kind were put all together in an omnibus bill which could not be amended, and by that system of vicious legislation it was adopted. The gentleman from Virginia was quite right in arraigning the gentleman from Texas for taking money out of the Treasury for the improvement of the "Sabine Pass," "Buck Bar," and other little things of that kind in Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. I have already stated that the Sabine Pass, as well as every river in that locality for the improvement of which we have made appropriations, has been extensively navigated by steamers for years.

Mr. SPARKS. I take it from the argument of the gentleman from Virginia that those appropriations ought not to have been made; that they were extravagant and needless; and I think he is right about it. Mr. Speaker, this whole business is wrong. By this system money is taken out of the Treasury of the United States belonging to the whole people and appropriated for needless improvements which are not national and are never intended to be so. This kind of legislation, so palpably vicious in its character, ought to be stopped; though I do confess that the prospect of arresting it now is by no means flattering, yet it shall receive my earnest efforts to do so.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I have been surprised at the readiness with which it is assumed that this measure ought to pass, and with the tone of complaint that meets the objections made to its passage. We are told that the Government is not expending enough money in the District of Columbia. Now let any man go into any city of the United States where the citizens appropriate directly to the improvement of their city and observe how the streets of such cities are improved, and he will, I think, conclude that this is at least an average city in respect to such improvements. So much have the streets of this city been improved that when the least shower falls, when there is the least dampening of these beautiful streets, you see horses falling as if they trod on ice. Pedestrianism would be vastly more in vogue if the streets were a little more improved in the same way. They have been improved all over the city at an expense of from $1.45 per square yard to $3.50 per square yard. Yet we are told that the march of improvement does not go on with sufficient rapidity. What more? Not content with improving the land of the District, we are proposing to span the waters adjacent to the District. I was struck with the interrogatory of my friend from New York [Mr. COX] when he asked whether the State of Virginia was to get any benefit from this bridge, to which an affirmative answer was given, and when the further inquiry, "Does she propose to contribute anything to the building?" was answered in the negative, he was naturally very much surprised.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of the power of the General Government. Just for argument's sake admit that the Government has power to build as many bridges as it may be disposed to build across the Potomac. The practical question at last is, ought we to build this bridge? With two free bridges within sight of this Capitol, with two means of exit from this capital toward the State of Virginia, is it expedient to go still further and expend $140,000 in the construction of another highway across the Potomac? I say that it is not. One argument used in favor of the proposition is that the Government now expends money directly or indirectly in paying tolls for the transportation of troops and supplies. My friend from Maryland [Mr. HENKLE] has just given us an insight as to how much the Government expends in this manner. He says that we expend $400 or $500 a year in that way. Now, let us see what the Government will have to pay for this bridge. Its first cost to the Government will be $70,000, the other portion of the expense being paid by the District. Six per cent. on this expenditure would be how much? Between $4,000 and $5,000. According to my calculation, we can better afford to go on as we have been doing, and pay tolls for Government transportation, than build this bridge.

It is further insisted that across the Potomac there is a cemetery, to which annually are made those patriotic pilgrimages which are an honor to our people. It is argued that we ought to have a free bridge in order to give greater facilities for crossing the river for such purposes. I happen to remember, Mr. Speaker, that six miles beyond the capital of my own State and across a river there is a national cemetery where many of the dead of the nation sleep. It is proposed to go there and build a bridge which shall be free to the flower-bearers who may visit that cemetery. Why not appropriate for a bridge there as well as here if the cemetery argument is to be conclusive?

I say that in the first place the Government ought not to be required to keep up the various improvements in this city, as it seems to be expected to do; and in the second place if we have shouldered that responsibility we at least ought to show a due regard to the rights of the people. How are the people of the United States concerned in this matter? In what way are the masses of the people interested in this bridge to the extent of $70,000? I admit that the people at the end of the bridge and those within sight of it on the other side would be greatly benefited. If the bridge should be erected, probably an occasional visit from the District that is not now made would be made. But I do insist that there is no public exigency demanding an expenditure from the National Treasury for this bridge. It is not the duty of the Government to build bridges across rivers, although they be within sight of the Capitol. Proximity signifies nothing. The people are interested in the matter. It is their money which is to be expended, and their servants will not be justified, or justifiable, if they make the expenditure demanded here. I do hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. WRIGHT. I remember, Mr. Speaker, when the first bridge, called the Long Bridge, was built over the Potomac, during the time of General Jackson's administration. A member of this House, Philander Stephens, who represented the Susquehanna district, who had been a member of the House, received the contract under the Government to build that bridge. It set the nation crazy, the idea that a member of Congress who had assisted in passing the bill should afterward become the contractor to put up the bridge. And it somewhat alarmed General Jackson, and he was not alarmed at ordinary circumstances. I know it ran along for a year or two before the bridge was built.

But what I wish to inquire about now, and what I regard as very material, is that that bridge, built at the cost of the Government, should now be occupied by railroad companies to the exclusion of ordinary travel and the commerce between both sides of this river. I have heard in debate here that that bridge, the Long Bridge as it is called, could not be occupied in consequence of the railroad tracks which are laid upon it and which exclude ordinary travel. By what authority do railroads occupy a bridge built at the cost of the Government for the accommodation of the people of the city of Washington and the parts adjacent thereto? Are those railroad companies the owners of that bridge? Are they the proprietors? If those railroad companies are the proprietors of that bridge their title has not been obtained by payment of money, has it?

A MEMBER. How has it been obtained?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is the inquiry I make, and I should like to have an answer.

A MEMBER. By act of Congress, of course.

Mr. WRIGHT. But how?

Mr. HUNTON. Congress authorized these railroad companies to build that bridge and required them to build a wagon-way on one side of it.

Mr. WRIGHT. The railroad companies may have made additions to it, but the original bridge was constructed at the time I have stated.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg leave to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the original bridge is not now there. As he has said, it was built at a period so long ago it must have rotted away. The present bridge has been built by the railroad companies, and the wagon-way alongside of it is so interrupted by the passage of trains over the bridge, as it is occupied by three railroad companies, that it is comparatively useless as a highway.

Mr. WRIGHT. If it is true these railroad companies have constructed the bridge upon which they have laid their tracks, and built it in the vicinity of the old bridge built by the Government, then there is no complaint to be made unless it may be that it was an oversight to permit them to get into such close proximity to the highway of ordinary travel.

Mr. HUNTON. You and I were not here.

Mr. WRIGHT. Why, how old are you? [Laughter.] The gentleman says he is thirty years of age. Now I appeal in all sober earnestness to the House to know whether a gentleman of his age is qualified to have such authority as would warrant the passing such legislation as we ask for. [Laughter.]

But to come down to the plain matter of fact. If it be true that these railroad companies have built the bridge they are now occupying that will relieve me from any difficulty I may have had in voting for the bill now pending for the construction of this bridge across the Potomac River.

Now, in regard to the policy of doing this, this is a great city, the capital of a great country, and I think that the people ought to have the means and facilities of reaching it from all quarters. I would not stand in the way of the erection of a bridge over the Potomac, but I would make it a grand affair, for some laboring-men must be employed to do the work, I suppose. [Laughter.] That is one reason which would induce me to vote for it. But it is due to the Government we represent that this city should be provided with proper facilities of communication with all parts of the country. I do not mean that it should be adorned by the erection of large structures simply to be looked at as matters of ornament, but I do maintain the Government should provide facilities of communication at its own cost from and to the city in all directions. Nor am I so narrow-minded in my prejudices as to say because one end of this bridge rests in Virginia, therefore Virginia should be compelled to pay the cost of constructing that part of it, or it ought not to be put up. It is not a matter in which the State of Virginia is interested, but it is a matter in which this Government is interested, as it concerns this capital.

I know it is said we own one-half of the city, and I suppose in process of time we will own the whole of it, so far as regards the assessment of taxes. But take it all in all it is our capital, and it is a city to which we ought to have access—to which the people ought to have access, to come and go freely.

And as regards the State of Virginia, I do not think we ought to levy a contribution on it, as it owes more money now than it is able to pay.

Mr. CONGER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. Has the gentleman become the advocate of capital so soon? He says, "our capital."

Mr. WRIGHT. I mean the capital that is designated by the big dome upon this building, and the Goddess of Liberty upon the top, put there by Jefferson Davis when he was Secretary of War. The device was his, and he did a good day's work when he made that device.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. It has been asserted that the Government owns one-half the property in the city. Will the gentleman state if it is not the fact that the Government is a renter in this city to the amount of many thousands of dollars a year for places to keep its records?

Mr. WRIGHT. As has been suggested, the Government does not own enough of the city. We have got to own more of it. We have got to run the establishment; and it has been the system for the last thirty years to make annual appropriations with this object in view. And we have become used to it like an eel to being skinned, and I suppose we may as well go on with it. [Laughter.] I say it is our capital, although the gentleman from Michigan who addressed the question to me just now seems to doubt whether it is our capital or not. And it is a grand capital and the capital of a grand country, notwithstanding what the gentleman from Michigan may say to the contrary.

Mr. BRAGG. I am opposed to the passage of this bill. There are now three bridges which cross the Potomac in this District, two of which the Government maintains, both of which are free, and one is a toll bridge belonging to a private corporation. One of these Government bridges is used by certain railroad companies. And in that connection I am obliged to say that I suspect the paternity of this bridge originated with a certain other railroad company that desire to use it. My suspicions grow out of this fact that when this bridge bill first saw the light in the last Congress, it had a section in it providing for the use of its piers by a narrow-gauge railroad in order to take its track across the river. Taking a ride in that neighborhood recently I discovered a grade coming down opposite the Three Sisters Islands, where it was originally proposed to locate this bridge. That, I believe, explains the paternity of this bill.

I am opposed to this bill, first, because I do not think it is necessary or requisite for the Government to invest this money in another bridge on this river by reason of any public use that is required of it. The use that is required of that bridge, if it be required at all, is for the people of the District and the people of the State of Virginia; and it is as much for the benefit of the people of the State of Virginia in that locality as it is for the benefit of the people of the District of Columbia; and therefore if the burdens are to be borne by the people who are to be benefited by it the burden should be distributed among those who are to receive the benefit. And if the people of the District of Columbia receive a certain proportion of the benefit and the people of the State of Virginia receive a portion of the benefit, those across the river ought to participate in the expense which is to result in a benefit to them.

I am opposed to the bill also in another point of view, and that is a practical one. We have now the measure of the wants of the people of the District represented through this committee. We have not yet seen the measure of their capacity to pay for their wants. The people of the District already are complaining that they are overburdened with taxation; that it is impossible for them to pay their taxes; that their property is non-productive. They have been assessed for taxes which are yet unpaid, and we have bills before this Congress, there were bills before the last Congress, and there will be bills before every Congress to relieve these people from taxation. Now that is to be considered when we are met with the argument that if the people are willing to tax themselves for this or similar purposes why should we find fault? The people perhaps asked the committee to levy taxes for this object; but the people do not pay their taxes. What becomes of it then? The United States advances the money from the funds of the Government and the contractor is paid. When you charge it upon the property of the people of the District they fail to pay their taxes; so that the loss arising from the deficit of payments falls on the Treasury. It is true that the Treasurer of the United States keeps a debit and credit account with the District. But if we keep on increasing the taxation of the District so that that debit account becomes so large that the people of the District are unable to pay it, then what must be the result? Repudiation. That is what I foresee as the result of this system of voting money to be paid out of the Treasury for every species of improvement that may be sought, or asked, or required by the District Committee. We are assuming first the payment of the debt and then taking the District to be our debtor for one-half of it. Repudiation has not yet come; but in the first place we are asked for legislation to permit the funding of the District debt, and we fund the District debt and issue bonds for the payment of that debt. We have already a law and we are asked to pass another one by which the Government of the United States assumes to pay the interest on the bonds of that debt, charging the District one-half.

Now, it seems to me that that is but a stepping-stone to what is to come; that after we have voted money under the pretense of paying one-half of all the improvements that the District of Columbia asks through this committee, there must be repudiation by the District; and in the end the Government of the United States will have to assume the payment of all this debt and of all these improvements. It is for that reason that I object to going any further in making provision for levying additional taxes upon the people of this District until we know whether their capacity to pay is equal to the taxation we impose. If not, then it is all nonsense to tell us that they are to pay their half.

Mr. FORT. I notice, in line 41 of this bill, that there is a hint of a draw in this bridge. I hardly can see why the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] should suggest a draw. I do not understand that the Potomac is navigable for many feet above this bridge.

Mr. HUNTON. That draw only applies to the bridge if it shall be located below the present Aqueduct Bridge.

Mr. FORT. Even then, I can hardly see why a draw would be necessary.

Mr. HUNTON. Because below the present Aqueduct Bridge the river is navigable.

Mr. FORT. We considered this bill once before in this House; and, if I do not forget, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] consented that some provisions might be placed in it that would suspend its operations until the State of Virginia did certain things. Those provisions are not in this bill.

Mr. HUNTON. I explained that in the commencement of my remarks, if the gentleman had listened to what I said. I said that since that time the Legislature of Virginia has passed an act giving its consent to and authorizing the Government of the United States to acquire ten acres of land on the Virginia shore, and giving it exclusive jurisdiction over that territory.

Mr. FORT. If the gentleman had waited only a moment to hear what I had to say. It seems to be very distasteful to him for any one to make mention of the State of Virginia, and if so, I will pass over that. I suppose that this bridge if built will extend into Virginia to some extent; and if built it will be for the use and benefit of the people of his district especially.

Now if it is necessary to have a free bridge—and I will say that I am in favor of free bridges generally, yet I know at least one very flourishing city in this country, the city of Louisville, which I believe is surrounded by toll-gates so that it is impossible to get out of that city in any direction without paying toll; still the city of Louisville prospers to a greater extent than this city ever would, if it were not for the appropriations made by the General Government for its benefit—now if it is necessary to have a free bridge here, why does not the gentleman propose either to lease the Aqueduct Bridge, or to purchase it, or to condemn it and make it a free bridge? He has stricken out of this bill the only section which really in my judgment ought to be passed. I believe he stated that that bridge was dangerous and unfit for public use. Why is it dangerous?

Mr. McLANE. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. FORT. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. McLANE. Then I move that the House now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was granted, by unanimous consent, as follows:

To Mr. BAKER, for two weeks from the 5th instant, in consequence of the serious illness of his wife;

To Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, for one week, on account of important business; and

To Mr. TALBOTT, until Friday next.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave to withdraw papers was granted as follows:

To Mr. NEWBERRY, the papers in the case of Walter F. Halleck; no adverse report; and

To Mr. AINSLIE, the papers relating to certain land titles in Idaho; no adverse report.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 815, to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, a bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUNTON. If the House shall now adjourn will the bill now under consideration come up to-morrow as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. It will not; it will come up when the class of business to which it belongs is next in order; that is, when business from the Committee for the District of Columbia is next in order, which will be on the third Monday of the month, the 19th instant.

Mr. HUNTON. Then I hope the House will not adjourn until some disposition is made of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to introduce a joint resolution for reference, with the accompanying petition.

Mr. CONGER. If all the States are now to be called which have not yet been called, I do not know that I will object.

The SPEAKER. An arrangement was made to-day by which those States and Territories not yet called shall be called to-morrow morning, immediately after the Journal is read.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. To-morrow, after the call of States is concluded, the Chair will ask that opportunity be given for the introduction of bills by gentlemen who were not in their seats when their States were called.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. McLANE that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 6, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Superintendent of the Census, calling attention to the necessity of an appropriation for the payment of certain claims for services in taking the eighth and ninth censuses of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication and accompanying letter will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest that the communication should go to the Committee to make provision for taking the Tenth Census for examination.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that is right.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As it is a question solely whether the amount claimed is due I hope it may go to that committee, so that they may examine it and report upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee to make provision for taking the Tenth Census if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CARPENTER. I present the petition of Captain Thornton Smith, late a quartermaster in the Army of the Potomac, praying for an increase of pension. It is accompanied by twelve exhibits in the form of affidavits sustaining the allegations of the petition. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS presented a memorial of the mayor and common council of West Point, Virginia, in favor of the passage of a law by Congress detaching that town from the Yorktown collection district and attaching it to the Richmond district; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 554) to prohibit military interference at elections, reported it with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go on the Calendar.

Mr. EATON. Let the bill be reported with the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 554) entitled "A bill to prohibit military interference at elections," report said bill to the Senate and recommend the following amendments thereto, to wit:

Between the word "or" and the words "to enforce," in line 7 in the printed copy, insert "to protect a State against invasion or."

Strike out the words "where such force is to be used," line 10, printed copy, and in lieu thereof insert "when the Legislature cannot be convened."

Thus amended, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. EATON. I desire to give notice to the Senate that at the conclusion of the morning hour to-morrow I shall ask that this bill be taken up and be considered, and that all other business be laid aside so that this bill may receive the attention of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator does not mean to give that notice against appropriation bills.

Mr. EATON. I mean to give just that notice without making any exception whatever, that I shall ask to take up this bill at that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I regret that extremely, if we cannot go on with the appropriation bills; but we shall see.

Mr. EATON. I do not know that there are any appropriation bills here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are some here or hereabouts, as the saying is.

Mr. EATON. This bill is more than hereabouts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should think this was thereabouts.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator from Connecticut state the hour to-morrow at which he proposes to call up the bill?

Mr. EATON. I said immediately after the conclusion of the morning hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Say "after the morning business."

Mr. EATON. Very well; I will say at the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the Clerk read the amendments again.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let the bill be reported as it would read if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not now before the Senate; the bill has gone upon the Calendar.

Mr. WITHERS. Is there anything before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are still in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to know how I can get at the amendments, if they cannot be read at the Clerk's desk?

Mr. CARPENTER. I presume there is no objection to the reading of the bill as it is proposed to be amended. It has not been printed yet as reported from the committee; we are not informed of it. Let it be read as proposed to be amended by the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the bill will be read as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read the bill as proposed to be amended by the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

That it shall not be lawful to bring to or employ at any place where a general or special election is being held in a State any part of the Army or Navy of the United States, unless such force be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to protect a State against invasion, or to enforce section 4, article 4 of the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, upon the application of the Legislature, or the executive of the State when the Legislature cannot be convened; and so much of all laws as is inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana wish this bill printed as proposed to be amended?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be printed with the amendments in the regular way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, in the regular way. That is what is proposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Chair to mean to have it printed in sequence as a new bill. To that I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed in the usual way.

Mr. McDONALD. With the amendments suggested by the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, to report it with divers amendments. I ask that the bill be printed and placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that I shall call the bill up for early consideration, to-morrow or next day.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not know the custom of the Senate. Some Senators are out of their seats whom I should like to see here. Some gentlemen expect to address the Senate on the bill just reported by the Committee on Appropriations. I propose to leave the city the latter part of the week, and I should like to submit some observations on the bill before I go away. If it can be understood that I shall have the floor to-morrow or next day I shall be grateful.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the appropriation bill?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the bill will be taken up to-morrow morning, and then the Senator can address the Senate and we can dispose of the bill.

Mr. BECK. The bill is not yet printed with the amendments, and when it will be ready to be called up I do not know. There will be no time lost, however, in getting it up when it is once printed. There are a number of amendments, and it will have to go to the Printer now.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If there is no objection, then, I shall take the floor to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. BECK. I cannot make that agreement.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I say, "if there is no objection."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall have no objection, and I shall be glad to hear the Senator from Georgia on the appropriation bill when the appropriation bill is regularly taken up, as it ought to be to-morrow morning; and I shall be glad to hear everybody else; I want to be heard myself; but to every other species of dealing with the appropriation bill I do object, as a matter of duty, under existing circumstances.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I understand there has been already notice given that another bill will be called up to-morrow. I was not aware of that. I do not want to interfere with any arrangement.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not want any arrangement made with reference to any bill that will antagonize or interfere with the privileged question that will come up to-day and may occupy to-morrow.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senate can decide when the time comes.

Mr. EATON. Cannot the privileged question come up to-day as well as to-morrow?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir; it comes up to-day.

Mr. EATON. Let us dispose of it to-day, then.

BINDING OF SAILING DIRECTIONS.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) authorizing the Public Printer to bind in cloth two volumes of Sailing Directions for the United States Hydrographic Office, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 556) to authorize the President to appoint Sergeant John Dolan, of the Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, a second lieutenant, and place him on the retired list; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 557) to authorize the payment of prize-money to the captors of the steamboat New Era No. 5, and cargo; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 558) for the relief of the heirs of Henry E. Muhlenberg; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 559) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls, or field-pieces, to William L. Curry Post, No. 18, Grand Army of the Republic, for their place of burial; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOOTH (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 560) for the relief of Eva Vansant, Henry Carleton, and Maud Carleton, children of General James H. Carleton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CARPENTER (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 561) to authorize the payment of a debt of the Osage Nation of Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 562) granting an increase of pension to Thornton Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 563) for the relief of Mary B. Kirby; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 564) to enable the centennial board of finance, incorporated by an act approved June 1, 1872, to close its affairs and to dissolve said corporation; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) to transfer the arsenal property in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, to the trustees of the Holy Communion Church Institute, for the use and accommodation of said school; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BUTLER. As the joint resolution is very short, I ask that it be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to the trustees of the Holy Communion Church Institute the property known as the arsenal, situated in the city of Charleston, State of South Carolina, together with all the buildings, rights, and appurtenances thereto belonging, to be had and held by said trustees for the use and accommodation of said school for such time as said arsenal may not be required by the Government for its own purposes.

2. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such terms and arrangements with said trustees for the care and protection of said property during its occupancy by said school and for the delivery to the Government when thereto required as will best subserve the interests of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the joint resolution, with the accompanying papers I now present, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that it should be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BUTLER. I think not, Mr. President. There are letters here from General Sherman, General Augur, and General Hunt, and a recommendation from the Secretary of War. It is peculiarly under the jurisdiction and charge of the War Department.

Mr. MORRILL. I can only say that it has been the practice of the Senate to refer all such matters to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Committee on Military Affairs find they cannot take jurisdiction of the subject I am sure they will ask to be discharged from its further consideration and have it referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I prefer that it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs if there be no objection.

PRINTING OF REPORTS.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That the report of the subcommittee to the Committee on Military Affairs on bill (S. No. 98) to provide for the settlement of accounts with certain railway companies be printed for the use of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the order ought to be in the shape of a resolution, and if it involves more than $500 expense it must go to the Committee on Printing. There is no number of copies specified in the resolution.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It does not call for any specified number, but it is just to print the report for the use of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be changed to the form of a resolution. Is there objection to agreeing to the resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is adopted.

Mr. BURNSIDE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of the subcommittee to the Committee on Military Affairs on the joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) requiring the assembling of a court of inquiry in the case of Thomas Worthington be printed for the use of the Committee on Military Affairs.

THORNTON SMITH.

Mr. CARPENTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all affidavits, reports, and other papers, and state all proceedings upon and by which a pension certificate was issued to Thornton Smith on the 18th day of April, A. D. 1879.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1343) to provide for certain expenses of the present session of Congress, and for other purposes.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further resolutions, the business before the Senate is the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections authorizing an investigation into the matters alleged in the petition of Henry M. Spofford, praying permission to produce evidence relating to the right of WILLIAM PITT

KELLOGG to a seat in the Senate, the pending question on which is the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to adopt a substitute therefor. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution and the substitute be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections by Mr. SAULSBURY, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the memorial of Henry M. Spofford, praying permission to produce evidence relating to the right of Hon. WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG to the seat in the Senate held by him from the State of Louisiana, and in support of the claim of said petitioner thereto, be, and said committee is hereby, instructed to inquire into the matters alleged in said petition; and for that purpose said committee is authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and do all such other acts as are necessary and proper for a full and fair investigation in the premises. Said committee may in its discretion appoint a sub-committee of its own members to make such investigation in whole or in part, which sub-committee shall have authority to employ a clerk, stenographer, and sergeant-at-arms, and shall have all the powers of the general committee to administer oaths and send for persons and papers, and may make such investigation either in Washington or in the State of Louisiana, and said committee or its sub-committee may sit in vacation.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all of said resolution and insert the following:

Whereas, on the 25th day of October, 1877, the Senate unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the contested cases of WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG and Henry M. Spofford, claiming seats as Senators from the State of Louisiana, and whose credentials have been referred to such committee, be authorized to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, with a view of enabling said committee to determine and report upon the title respectively on the merits of each of said contestants to a seat in the Senate."

And whereas, on the 26th day of November, 1877, said committee reported the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG is, upon the merits of the case, entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1877, and that he be admitted thereto upon taking the proper oath.

"Resolved, That Henry M. Spofford is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States."

And on the 30th day of November, 1877, the Senate adopted said resolutions; and thereafter, on the same day, said KELLOGG was duly admitted to take the oath, and took his seat as a Senator from said State for said term: Therefore,

Resolved, That said proceedings are final and conclusive upon the right of said KELLOGG and the claim of said Spofford to such seat for said term.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, I desire to state that quite a number of Senators who sit on this side of the Chamber are absent this morning and I am informed cannot be here to-day. If it would be agreeable to the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I should like very much (and I speak for the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections) that this whole question be allowed to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Senate has had full notice that this morning this matter would be pressed. On Friday last I waived a vote on the question at that time, distinctly announcing that I would call it up this morning. I see by the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings that the same suggestion was made yesterday that the matter would come up this morning. I am sorry any one is absent; but nevertheless I must insist on a vote to-day on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WITHERS in the chair.) The question is on the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, when the resolution was up the other day I stated that the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections understand this resolution to open the whole case. It was stated by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] and I think by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] the chairman of the committee, that it was not the intention of the majority of the committee to commit any member of this body to any particular question involved in the case. One question involved is whether this Kellogg-Spofford case was finally settled by the Senate in November, 1877, when a resolution was adopted by the Senate declaring that Mr. KELLOGG was entitled to a seat in this body upon the merits of his case, and that Mr. Spofford was not entitled to a seat as a Senator. I think the chairman of the committee and those who constitute the majority of the committee will concede that this resolution does dispose of the question of res adjudicata at least. I suppose the chairman of the committee never in his experience as a lawyer knew a court to order testimony to be taken in a case for the purpose of determining whether the case was res adjudicata or not. That I understand is what is proposed in this case.

Now, I will very briefly go over the history of this case and make a brief statement of the action the Senate has taken upon it. Mr. KELLOGG, as we all know, was elected Senator for the term of six years, to commence on the 4th day of March, 1877, by what was called the Packard legislature. He was elected in the month of January, 1877. He appeared here at the executive session called in March of that year, and was ready to take the oath of office. Objection was made, however, to his being sworn at that time; he stood aside, and his credentials, which were regular in form, were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. No action was taken upon his credentials during that session. In April, 1877, Mr. Spofford was elected by the so-called Nicholls legislature. He appeared here at the extra session called by the President to meet on the 15th day of October, 1877; his credentials were presented and were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Thus the whole case, the claim of Spofford and the claim of KELLOGG, was before the committee. The committee at once proceeded to the hearing of the case. Mr. Spofford appeared before the committee and conducted his case in person; Mr. KELLOGG appeared before the committee by his counsel, Mr. Shellabarger. Each was heard before the committee at great length. Before they had been heard the Senate adopted a resolution, which may be found in the Journal of the Senate—I thought I had the Journal here, but I find I have not—which resolution, in substance, directed the committee to proceed to examine the subject, and to ascertain upon the merits of the case which was entitled to the seat, and the Senate particularly and specially directed the committee to inquire which of the two legislatures that I have mentioned was the Legislature of the State, or whether either of them was. The resolution also authorized the committee to take testimony, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, &c. Under this resolution the committee again proceeded with the consideration and examination of the case. The committee appointed a sub-committee, consisting of the then chairman of the committee, the Senator from New Hampshire, (Mr. Wadleigh,) and Mr. Merrimon, then a member of the committee and a Senator from the State of North Carolina, for the purpose of having an interview with the two claimants, and ascertaining what facts, if any, the claimants would agree upon. This sub-committee had a meeting with the claimants, and they did agree upon certain facts. Each claimant filed with the committee a paper, in the nature of a pleading in an action at law, in which were stated the facts relating to his election. It was further agreed by the claimants, and it was also agreed by the committee, that all the testimony pertinent to the case contained in the evidence taken before the so-called Sherman committee, the Howe committee, the Morrison committee, and the Field committee of the House, might be referred to as evidence in the case; that, in fact, so far as any testimony taken before any one of those committees was pertinent to the issues in this case, the same was made evidence. It was also agreed that the public acts of the State of Louisiana, also the journals of the two houses of both legislatures, might be referred to as evidence, and should, so far as the same had any relation to this case, be considered as evidence.

I hold in my hand the journal of the proceedings of the committee. Each of the claimants in the paper which he filed before the committee claimed that it was not necessary to take any evidence in the case; that the proceedings of the Legislature and the facts of which the Senate would take notice historically were all that were necessary in order to establish his claim to his seat. Mr. Spofford was specially emphatic in claiming that it was not necessary to take any evidence outside of the proceedings of the Legislature and those historical facts which the Senate would take, as it were, judicial notice of.

These papers in the nature of pleadings were laid before the committee. Each of the claimants was heard, Mr. Spofford in person and Mr. KELLOGG by counsel, and the hearing was continued from some time in October until the latter part of November; during a considerable portion of the time the committee met daily, held daily sessions, for the purpose of considering the case. Finally, on the 21st of November, the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] who was then as he is now a member of the committee,—

Moved that the evidence in the case of Messrs. Spofford and KELLOGG be now closed. Upon this motion Mr. HILL said that he assented to it—with the understanding that Mr. Spofford should be permitted to bring to the attention of the committee in the morning some further points upon which he desired to take testimony; to which suggestion the committee assented, and the motion was then agreed to.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. What page is that?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Page 78. On the next morning, that is the morning of the 22d of November, Mr. Spofford appeared before the committee and desired to take testimony upon five points which he submitted in writing. Those five points may be found in the report of the minority of the committee on page 9. I will read those five points:

1. That the facts relative to the election of Tremoulet, Cressy, and Rolle, from the seventh representative district of New Orleans, were substantially as set forth in the statement read by H. M. Spofford in his argument before this committee on the 24th October, 1877.

2. That the composition, votes for Senator, and political proclivities of the Legislature on the 24th of April, 1877, when H. M. Spofford was elected Senator, were substantially as set forth in the aforesaid argument.

3. That by the actual returns or statements as made in duplicate by the supervisors of registration, (and assistant supervisors,) with their appointees, the commissioners of election, and sent, one set to the clerk of the district court of each parish in the county and to the secretary of state in the city, and the other set to the returning board, (so called,) showed a majority of votes actually cast throughout the State of about eight thousand votes for Nicholls and Wiltz over Packard and Antoine for the offices of governor and lieutenant-governor in the election that took place in Louisiana November 7, 1876.

4. Besides these specific violations of the constitution and of the law under which they pretended to act, I charge that the conduct of the returning officers in suppressing polls and changing the result of the constitutional returns was clandestine, collusive, tyrannical, and unjust; that the real work of conducting an election under pretext of compiling votes was proceeded with in a secret chamber by a corps of partisan clerks, while the occasional open sessions of the board were side-shows, devised to screen what was going on within; that arbitrary rules of evidence were established for pretended contests, and changed so often and abruptly that no fair trial could be had or was had before the board; that illegal complaints were constantly received and illegal evidence admitted for the purpose of setting aside polls that were in the way of such candidates as the board desired to elect; and that Mr.

KELLOGG himself, then governor, joined in making illegal complaints and inducing the board to consider them.

5. I am informed and so charge that the returns from Vernon Parish, after they came into possession of the returning officers, and while they were under their control, were fraudulently altered by a change of figures, tantamount to a forgery of a public record; that the board knew what the figures upon those returns were before their alteration, and yet after the alteration promulgated the results of said forgery as the true returns; that by such fraudulent alteration E. E. Smart, candidate for representative in the State Assembly, who had in fact and according to the returns as they first came to the board defeated his competitor, Brown, was left behind, and Brown, the defeated candidate, falsely declared elected; and that said Brown took his seat in the Packard house, and figures on the journal as present on the 2d of January, 1877, when there was a pretended count of votes for governor and lieutenant-governor in joint assembly, and perhaps on one or two other occasions, but that he afterward abandoned that body and went home, acknowledging that he never had been elected.

After these points were presented to the committee on the 22d of November, 1877, it was moved by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] that the committee proceed to the consideration of these points in their order. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] moved as an amendment—

That it is the sense of the committee that the matters proposed by Judge Spofford, so far as material, have been fully already considered by them in their previous action, and are fully covered either by the admissions of Mr. KELLOGG or the evidence already before the committee.

It will be seen from what I have read from the journal of the committee what the action of the committee was. Mr. Spofford presented these five points, and desired to sustain each of the points by testimony. A majority of the committee were of the opinion that the evidence had already been presented upon each of those points. It will be recollected that all the testimony pertinent to this contested-election case contained in the five reports which I have named was made evidence by the agreement of the contestants, the committee concurring in that agreement. It was further agreed by the contestants themselves, as appears from the papers which they filed with the committee in the nature of pleadings, that they agreed upon certain facts. Then a majority of the committee were of the opinion that sufficient testimony had already been received by the committee under these several points, and for that reason the committee voted that the testimony then be closed.

The committee reported a resolution to the Senate stating in substance that Mr. KELLOGG upon the merits of the case was entitled to his seat in the Senate and that Mr. Spofford was not entitled to a seat in the Senate. That resolution, as all will remember who were present at that time, was discussed at great length and finally was adopted by the Senate. Thereupon the oath of office was administered to Mr. KELLOGG, and he has since occupied a seat in this body.

Mr. Spofford does not seem to be satisfied with the action of the committee. During the present session the Senator from Louisiana who sits on the opposite side of the Chamber [Mr. JONAS] presented a memorial, an unverified memorial signed by Mr. Spofford, in which he alleges certain reasons why the case should again be opened and why he should be permitted again to present evidence to sustain his claim to a seat in this body.

A minority of the committee as now constituted is of the opinion that the case was finally closed and determined when the Senate in November, 1877, adopted the affirmative resolution asserting that Mr. KELLOGG upon the merits of his case was entitled to a seat in this body, and the negative resolution that Mr. Spofford was not entitled to a seat in this body. Upon these facts a minority of the present Committee on Privileges and Elections are of opinion that the case is res adjudicata, and that it is not competent for the Senate now to open the case for a new trial. This view of the case is sustained by the ablest writers on the law of legislative assemblies. I refer to Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, side-page 133:

There are certain matters which each house determines for itself, and in respect to which its decision is conclusive. It chooses its own officers except where, by constitution or statute, other provision is made; it determines its own rules of proceeding; it decides upon the election and qualification of its own members. These powers it is obviously proper should rest with the body immediately interested, as essential to enable it to enter upon and proceed with its legislative functions, without liability to interruption and confusion. In determining questions—

And it is to this that I particularly desire to call the attention of the Senate—

In determining questions concerning contested seats, the house will exercise judicial power, but generally in accordance with a course of practice which has sprung from precedents in similar cases, and no other authority is at liberty to interfere.

In this case I claim that when the Senate adopted the resolution seating Mr. KELLOGG and excluding Mr. Spofford from a seat in this body, it did exercise judicial power, and having exercised that power it is not competent for the Senate at this time to open it and set aside the judgment then made or in any way whatever to interfere with it. The same doctrine is laid down by Cushing in his work on the Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, section 642; in Professor Farrar's Manual of the Constitution, section 143; in 1 Kent's Commentaries, page 235. Many other authorities might be quoted, especially a case in 13 Michigan Reports—The People vs. Mahaney, page 481. It was held in that case by the supreme court of Michigan "that when the house determines and decides a contested-election case it acts judicially, not merely in its legislative capacity but in its judicial capacity." And here the Senate having acted in its judicial capacity, the case is I submit res adjudicata; and it is not proper, it is not competent for the Senate at a subsequent session to disturb the judgment then made by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WITHERS.) The Chair calls attention to the fact that the morning hour has expired. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. SAULSBURY. This is a privileged question, and I suppose will continue.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I suppose it is in the power of the majority of the Senate to lay aside the pending business and take up this resolution. I do not suppose it would be probably according to the inclination of any member of the minority to oppose that proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the Chair understands to be the proposition of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator said it was a privileged question, and would therefore go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understood the Senator from Delaware that as it was a privileged question he proposed that the consideration of it should continue; and unless there shall be objection made the Chair will so rule.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the Vice-President in this very case ruled that it having come up in the morning hour it was not privileged as against the ordinary business of the Senate, and that yesterday the President pro tempore of the Senate announced that he should feel himself constrained in regard to this case to follow the precedents of the Senate and make the same ruling. Now I desire to inquire if, for the mere sake of accomplising an object which can be so easily accomplished by a vote, it is desirable to overturn the established practice of the Senate because the President pro tempore happens to be out of the chair for ten minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts misunderstood the Chair. The Chair stated that the Chair would decide unless there was objection that the motion made by the Senator from Delaware would prevail.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the motion made by the Senator from Delaware?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To continue the consideration of the question now before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not hear any such motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I will read a very few lines showing the decision of the Vice-President on the very point before the Senate——

Mr. HOAR. I do not object to the Senator's proceeding except that I desire to know what is the question before the Senate, in order that we may understand what is the question before the Senate in order that we may know to what he is addressing himself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is the decision on the point made by the Senator from Massachusetts upon which the Senator from Alabama proposes to read the decision referred to by the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Chair has there been any motion made, and if so may it be stated from the Chair or the Clerk's desk?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I did not put it in the form of a motion, but I suggested that we go on with this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has stated that he understood the Senator from Delaware to submit a proposition to the Senate to continue the consideration of the subject now before the Senate. The Chair announced that such would be his ruling unless objection were made. The Chair understood that the Senator from Massachusetts did object, and stated the reason for his objection. The Senator from Alabama then proposed to read the decision referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts in support of the objection raised; and the Chair rules that the Senator from Alabama is entitled to the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair be kind enough to state the question? I do not now understand what is the pending question. There must be some question pending before the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am on the floor to a point of order, and I propose not to be interrupted.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the point of order?

Mr. HOUSTON. The point of order is that this is a privileged question and takes its own course without any motion on the part of the chairman of the committee; and I propose now to read the decision of the Vice-President sustaining that view most amply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. HOUSTON. This occurred on the 29th of November, 1877:

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. We have gone on now for several mornings without any call for morning business, considering these resolutions, first as to the Butler case, and next as to the case of Kellogg. I wish to inquire whether the Kellogg resolution is in order until the conclusion of the morning business?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It certainly is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a question of privilege, which can be dispensed with only by unanimous consent.

That was the decision of the Vice-President, and this question now depends upon no motion——

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. The Senator from Alabama insists that he is proceeding upon a point of order. I demand the reading of Rule 40. I think we had better preserve some show of system in our proceedings here.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am very thankful to the gentleman for seeking or seeming to seek to preserve some show of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the rule referred to by the Senator from New York.

The Secretary read as follows:

40. A question of order may be raised at any state of the business, except when the Senate is dividing, and, when raised, shall be decided by the presiding officer, without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate; or he may submit any question of order for the decision of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Now my point of order is that the Chair having submitted no question of order to the Senate, and there having been no ruling from which an appeal has been taken, the Senator from Alabama is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules against the point of order raised by the Senator from New York.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President——

Mr. CARPENTER. I appeal from that ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An appeal is taken.

Mr. HOUSTON. The point of order I make is my own, and I present it.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have appealed from the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. Now will the Chair state his decision?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now before the Senate is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the sense of the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. May we hear the decision of the Chair stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The decision of the Chair was that the point of order made by the Senator from New York was not sustained by the Chair, which was that in view of the provisions of the fortieth rule of the Senate the Senator from Alabama was not entitled to proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the decision of the Chair, from which there is an appeal taken. Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the sense of the Senate?

Mr. CARPENTER. Now, Mr. President, in support of that appeal, I wish to say a very few words.

The rule that has just been read is clear, positive, and conclusive on this subject. A point of order in this Chamber can not be debated until, first, the Chair has decided it and an appeal been taken; or, second, the Chair has submitted the question to the Senate. Neither of those things has been done, and the debate of the Senator on the left is clearly out of order, because there was no appeal pending and no question of order submitted to the Senate upon which he was at liberty to speak. If the Chair had first decided upon the point of order in case one had been made—and I think it would puzzle a lawyer to tell what was the point of order made; I could not hear it or understand it—an appeal might have been taken which would be debatable. A Senator, my colleague, was on the floor discussing a resolution. The Senator from Massachusetts interrupted and asked a question in regard to the proceeding being in order. Thereupon it was said on the other side of the Chamber that this being a privileged question would go on of its own force, and nothing could stop it. Then, without anything further being said, without the Chair making any ruling that I could understand or hear, the Senator on the left jumps up and proposes to debate a point of order which had not been raised and which no man had heard, and while the Senator from Wisconsin was still on the floor. If the point of order that the Senator says he is discussing is a good one, the Senator from Wisconsin has a right to complain of all of us that we are wasting his time. He has the floor; no point of order has been stated; none has been made with any such degree of definiteness or certainty that it could be ruled upon by the Chair. The Chair would not sit there and allow a discussion to run on without some ruling upon it if there had been a point of order that could be ruled upon. There was none; no ruling was made, and no debate was in order upon it.

The first point of order that has been raised here and stated so that anybody could understand it, so that the Chair could understand it, because that is the only one the Chair has ruled upon, was the point of order made by the Senator from New York, that a point of order was not debatable, especially if it had not been made as the Senator should have added as it had not been in this case. Now the Chair rules that the point of order here is debatable. If that be so, this democratic majority never will pass another bill while we live,—never. It is impossible to stop points of order under that ruling. The ruling of the Chair is that it is impossible to stop debate.

Mr. EATON. Call in the Army. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARPENTER. We should need the Army, for we should never see our homes again. [Laughter.]

Seriously the Chair will, I think, on reflection, see that the ruling under that rule is incorrect; and if the Chair himself does not recall it I hope the Senate will make a correct decision upon that question of order, for it is an important one. We shall never end this session; we shall never pass these democratic measures which are to relieve the country and give such satisfaction to all mankind if this ruling is to stand. So, in the interest of the majority here, I ask that the ruling of the Chair shall not be sustained by the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, the mistake that was made by the Senator from New York was by interfering with my statement of a point of order. I made the point of order, or was making it, and all these speeches have been made on the hypothesis that I was arguing a point of order made by some one else. I was making the point of order, which I now present to the Chair, that this is a privileged question, and that it forces itself upon the consideration of the Senate without respect to the wishes of a majority; and it does not require a motion of the Senator from Delaware to have a vote upon it that it may have consideration.

I make that point of order, that it is a privileged question, and it is in order and goes along unless unanimous consent is obtained to set it aside. That is the point I present.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the appeal from what has been called the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I think we ought to understand the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been called for by the Senator from New York. Is the call sustained?

The yeas and nays were ordered..

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I say I think the Senate ought to understand the question upon which we are about to vote before we vote. It seems to me it is difficult to understand it. The Senator from Alabama, as I understood the facts, raised a point of order, which he was stating, not debating; he was simply, as I understood him, stating his point of order, so that the Chair could understand it. The Senator from New York, as I understand, regarded the Senator from Alabama as debating a point of order.

Mr. CONKLING. May I make an inquiry of the Senator? Shall I understand him to say that he understood that the Senator from Alabama himself originated a point of order?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I did understand the Senator to say so.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I suggest to the Senator that his ears must have been averted, because the Senator from Massachusetts had made a statement, and then the Senator from Alabama declaring that he rose to reply to him proceeded to read an authority, to which I did not object. But when, at the conclusion of that reading he proceeded to debate, knowing as I did if the matter were in order at all the floor belonged to the Senator from Wisconsin who had been interrupted, I then called for the reading of the fortieth rule, to the effect that debate on a point of order was not proper.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is all very true, with some little misunderstanding between Senators. In the first place, it was understood that the Senator from Delaware proposed that this debate should go on as a privileged question, and he made a motion to that effect—not only a motion, but a proposition. That is where it started. Very well; the Senator from Massachusetts was arguing that question, making an inquiry in relation to the proposition of the Senator from Delaware——

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Georgia thinks that one point of order being pending, the Senator from Alabama rose and ingrafted another point of order and proceeded to state that.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I think no such thing. If the Senator will be quiet he will understand me. I did not understand that the Senator from Massachusetts was making a point of order. Whether he was or not I do not know.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to get clear of this difficulty. If the Senator from Massachusetts made a point of order, I for the present withdraw mine until his is disposed of. I did not understand him as making a point of order.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is the way I understood.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is quite unnecessary, for another point of order has superseded it and an appeal been taken from the decision of the Chair upon it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order, and I will state it distinctly.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us all raise a question of order.

Mr. CARPENTER. I appealed from the ruling of the Chair. That is debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor on the point of order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to the point that he is out of order under Rule 41.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri makes a point of order.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am simply getting at what we are voting upon. That is all.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it in order to inquire how many Senators are now recognized by the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please take their seats.

Mr. CONKLING. I only want to know how many others are entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor, and no one else can be entitled to it while he is.

Mr. CONKLING. I congratulate the Senator from Georgia. I supposed it was being divided all around.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A point of order has been made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] under the forty-first rule, which is as follows:

When an appeal is taken from the decision of the Chair, any subsequent questions of order which may arise before that appeal shall be determined, likewise any appeal therefrom, shall be decided without debate. All appeals taken when a proposition not debatable is pending shall also be decided without debate; and any appeal may be laid on the table without prejudice to the pending proposition, and thereupon shall be held as affirming the decision of the Chair.

The point, therefore, made by the Senator from Missouri is that this is a discussion upon an appeal on a question of order arising before the determination of the original appeal. But the opinion of the Chair would be that the point of order being debated now by the Senator from Georgia and others is not a point arising subsequently to the appeal, but upon the appeal itself.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CARPENTER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have not given way for such a motion. I have the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope there will be no difficulty among Senators on that side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. I very much regret to see any want of unity on that side.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am simply trying to get the facts right. I will state the case again. On the expiration of the morning hour, the Chair stated that the morning hour had expired and asked what would the Senate do. The Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] then having the floor and being in the midst of a speech, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] suggested that this was a question of privilege, and that the debate go on.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, No; I will not allow anybody to interrupt me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. CARPENTER. He does?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER. All right.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am so grateful to my friend for being anxious to take care of the democratic party that I am very much tempted to give way to him, but I prefer not to do so just now.

The Senator from Massachusetts was replying to that proposition of the Senator from Delaware. The Senator from Alabama then rose to a point of order that it did not require the motion made by the Senator from Delaware to go on with the debate; that this being a question of privilege it went on of its own force without a motion; and he was stating that that had been already once decided. He was simply stating the point of order, and reading the decision made by the Vice-President accordingly, as he understood it. At that point the Senator from New York, understanding a statement of the point of order by the Senator from Alabama to be a debate of the point of order, made the question that the point of order was not debatable. The Chair ruled that that point was not correctly taken. The Chair has not given its reason for that decision. I really do not profess to know much about rules myself; I only want to get the facts right. I want it distinctly understood that I am not giving a judgment on rules——

Mr. CONKLING. You are not speaking to the law.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, I am speaking to the facts now. The Chair overruled the point of order made by the Senator from New York, I think, correctly, because the point of order made by the Senator from New York was upon the assumption that the Senator from Alabama was debating a point of order, when the Senator from Alabama, by his own statement, was only stating a point of order. I do not see any ruin to the democratic party in that. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] takes an appeal, as I understand, from that decision of the Chair, and the yeas and nays are ordered, and we are required to vote upon that question. What question? Whether the point of order made by the Senator from New York is a good point of order. That is what? Whether a gentleman in stating a point of order is debating a point of order? That is the question. If the Senate believes that the Senator from Alabama was simply stating a point of order and not debating a point of order, the Senator from New York was out of order. That is all. And I submit to my friend from Wisconsin, therefore, that there is no peril to the democratic party in this matter at all.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not know that anything can hurt them. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now I propose to settle this question by moving to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved to lay the appeal of the Senator from Wisconsin on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Let the question be stated before the roll is called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to state the question. As many as favor the motion to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair will, as their names are called, vote "yea;" those opposed will vote "nay."

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask what the decision of the Chair is? I have just come in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The decision of the Chair was that the point of order made by the Senator from New York under Rule 40 was not well taken. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not a debatable proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask a parliamentary question of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg to ask the Chair, with great respect, if the Chair will state, as I have just come in, what the point is which is to be decided. The Chair stated what the technical point was, but I do not understand the substance of it. If the Chair will gratify me that far, I shall feel under obligations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama being in possession of the floor was proceeding to read a decision made by the Vice-President and which had been quoted by the Senator from Massachusetts as authority in the question pending before the Senate as to the further consideration of the privileged question arising under the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Upon that the Senator from New York raised a point of order, claiming that the remarks of the Senator from Alabama were in violation of Rule 40. The Chair ruled that the point of order was not well taken. From that ruling the Senator from Wisconsin appealed, and the Senator from Georgia moves to lay that appeal upon the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll upon the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] not now in the Chamber asked me this morning to pair on all political questions. Though this may not be one, I decline to vote.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] desired me to pair with his colleague, [Mr. COKE,] who is temporarily absent from the Chamber, which I agreed to do upon political questions. If he so considers this, I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. MAXEY. It appears very much indeed to take a political turn.

Mr. INGALLS. On that statement I shall withhold my vote. I should otherwise vote "nay."

Mr. VOORHEES, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] who is necessarily absent. Were he here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] on all political questions, and as the Senate seems to divide politically on this matter I decline to vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My colleague [Mr. HEREFORD] is absent, paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.] They have gone to attend the funeral ceremonies of a member of the House, and are necessarily absent.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Is this a political question—a question of order?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. My colleague [Mr. GORDON] is paired with a Senator from Rhode Island, I believe.

Mr. BURNSIDE. He is not paired with me.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. He left his pair with somebody.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] is not paired with me. He was paired with me some time ago, but he has returned and voted since.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Then I can only state that my colleague left a statement of his pair with me. I thought it was with a Senator from Rhode Island, but I have really forgotten the correct person.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator was paired with me some time ago, but he has returned since and voted.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I remember now that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] came to me to ask for a pair, and I declined because I was already paired, and then he paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Ah, I beg pardon; he is paired with the Senator from Nebraska.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 22, as follows:

So the appeal was laid on the table.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I now insist that the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections be continued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves——

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his question.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to inquire what has become of the point of order which the Senate has ruled that the Senator from Alabama was in order in debating?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The effect of the vote which has just been taken, to lay the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the table, sustains the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. But, if the Chair will pardon me, the ruling of the Chair was that under the fortieth rule, it was not out of order for the Senator from Alabama to proceed on this point of order to which the Senator from Massachusetts had spoken. Now the way is clear for the Senator from Alabama to debate the point of order, and I inquire of the Chair what has become of that original point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Alabama had claimed the floor to proceed he would have been recognized.

Mr. CONKLING. But whether claiming the floor or not, what becomes of the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order was withdrawn by the Senator from Alabama when he was last on the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Alabama did not make the point of order, and therefore could not withdraw it. The Senator from Massachusetts made the point of order that this was not a privileged motion which overrode everything else at the expiration of the morning hour, and I inquire what has become of that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Massachusetts as making a point of order, and has not so ruled.

Mr. CONKLING. The Chair then suggested that he would rule, if there was no objection, upon a point of order which had not been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is mistaken; the Chair made no such suggestion.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator greatly misapprehended the Chair if he did not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Senator did misapprehend the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator understood the Chair to remark that unless objection was made he would hold that this matter in its nature did transcend other matters. Thereupon the Senator from Massachusetts did make objection, and I inquire what becomes of the issue thus joined by the Senator from Massachusetts by that objection, which was a point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has stated previously that the Senator from Massachusetts misapprehended him in supposing that the Chair ruled that it was a privileged question; but the ruling of the Chair was that the Senator from Delaware having made the motion to proceed with the consideration of this question, the Chair would regard that as the sense of the Senate unless objection was made. Objection was made thereupon by the Senator from Massachusetts, and that prevented the unanimous assent of the Senate, under which the motion would have been accepted. Therefore it is now a question of motion, upon which the sense of the Senate will have to be taken, as to whether they will proceed or not with the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. If I may be allowed then to understand one step further, the point of order which the Chair holds now was originated by the Senator from Alabama must have been a point aimed at the right of the Senator from Delaware to make that motion. Is that it? The Chair says the Senator from Delaware had submitted a motion. That being before the Senate, the point of order made by the Senator from Alabama must have been that that motion was out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order made originally by the Senator from Alabama was that it did not require a motion, it being a privileged question.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He subsequently withdrew that point of order, however, which leaves no question of order before the Senate. The question now before the Senate is, upon the motion of the Senator from Delaware, whether it will proceed with the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I submit to the Senate that no motion is necessary at all to proceed with the consideration of this question——

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator will permit me to say that I did not put it in the form of a motion, but I said I insisted that we proceed with it as a privileged question.

Mr. WHYTE. It is not necessary to insist upon it as a privileged question. It comes up as the regular order. At the expiration of the morning hour the Chair announced that the morning hour had expired. That, of course, suspended the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin, and the inquiry then was whether there was any unfinished business or whether there was any special order. There is neither special order nor unfinished business to proceed with. The consequence is that under Rule 13 the Senate proceeds with the general orders, and this is the first business on the Calendar of general orders.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the motion to take it up is out of order.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Maryland will permit me to set myself right. That is precisely the view which I take of it. I entirely concur with the Senator from Maryland. My objection was directed simply at having it established that a case in regard to a title to a seat pending in the morning hour went on as a privileged matter when the morning hour expired, that being in violation not only of a ruling made by the Vice-President last year but of the statement of the President pro tempore of the Senate made yesterday as to how he would be constrained to rule if the question arose. I entirely concur with the honorable Senator.

Mr. WHYTE. I agree entirely with the Senator from Massachusetts; it did not continue as a privileged question; it goes on now simply because it is at the head of the Calendar of general orders.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As there is nothing to displace it.

Mr. WHYTE. Nothing to displace it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor to go on.

Mr. WHYTE. Clearly, beyond all question. I want to make it clearer by merely reading the rule:

> 13. At the expiration of the morning hour, if there shall be neither unfinished business nor special order, the Senate shall proceed with the Calendar of general orders, unless it shall otherwise determine.

Consequently we go on precisely with this resolution as the first of the general orders, and the Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should like to add to what has been said by the Senator from Maryland, with whom I perfectly agree, that it has always been the practice of the Senate in the thirteen years that I have been here, where there was no unfinished business or special order and any matter was taken up in the morning hour, to go straight on with it, and as he says no motion or anything else is necessary; it is before the Senate and continues to be before the Senate although one o'clock arrives, when there is no unfinished business or a special order to displace it. Consequently the matter is before the Senate and the Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair fully concurs in the statement made by the two Senators.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to state now that I do not agree entirely with what has been said by the Senator from Maryland and other Senators who take the view he has taken of this matter. I insist that this being a privileged question and coming up in the morning hour and being before the Senate, it cannot be displaced by the expiration of the morning hour, it being a question of high privilege. I put this upon the broad ground that it is a privileged question, and being before the Senate it does not lose its place at the expiration of the morning hour, but continues before the Senate as a privileged question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator from Delaware will change his opinion if he will look into the constant practice and judgment of the Senate as establishing the law in such respects, not merely the decision of a session or two ago but for many, many years; and I think if he will attend to the distinction between a privileged question and a question of privilege also, he will get some practical light that will fortify him in what I think will be his change of view if he will look into the history of the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As it seems to be the general opinion of the Senate that the Senate do proceed now in order with the consideration of this subject, although they arrive at that conclusion by different processes of reasoning, the Chair will so rule and assign the floor to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] upon the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to yield to me to make a remark as I have had something to do with questions of order, they being questions which I am not partial to. The point I endeavored to enforce originally, and which I wish to insist upon now, is that the only right after one o'clock which this resolution had grew out of the absence of a special order and the absence of unfinished business; but what is more essential to my purpose is this, that in any view in which this resolution could maintain its place and continue to be considered, no Senator whatever was entitled to the floor save only the Senator from Wisconsin who was interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour. To him and to him alone pertained the right at that moment to debate this matter if in truth it could be regularly before the Senate, which of necessity it could be only as the Senator from Maryland has suggested because the absence of unfinished business and the absence of a special order left it to proceed.

Mr. FERRY. I would call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that under the rule read by the Senator from Maryland the Senate should then proceed, in the absence of a special order, to the general orders, and that brings up the question upon which the Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If this point of order has been disposed of—I do not know whether it is settled or not, in fact I do not know whether anything is settled or not—but it having been got out of the way I will proceed and conclude the little I have to say upon this resolution.

When the hour of one o'clock arrived I had stated briefly the history of the Kellogg-Spofford case before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and before the Senate. I had also referred to some authorities for the purpose of showing that when the Senate adopted a resolution seating Mr. KELLOGG upon the merits of the case it acted judicially, and having acted judicially it thereby entered a judgment in favor of the right of Mr. KELLOGG to a seat as a Senator from the State of Louisiana. I was claiming that the case was disposed of, that it is res adjudicata. The parties to the contest at that time were Mr. Spofford and Mr. KELLOGG. The parties to this contest at this time are Mr. Spofford and Mr. KELLOGG, the same parties. The contest was made before the Senate, a tribunal having authority to hear and dispose of the case, and the only tribunal having such authority. The case was heard upon its merits, as is recited in the resolution to which I have referred, and was fully heard, as the history of the case shows.

I say, then, that the case is res adjudicata, because the parties to the contest are the same; it was made before a tribunal having authority; it was made and decided upon the merits.

Now, Mr. President, I will refer briefly to some legislative precedents to show how this body has regarded judgments similar to the judgment which has been entered in this case. The first case to which I shall refer is the celebrated Fitch and Bright case. All are familiar with the facts in regard to that case. Fitch and Bright were elected Senators from the State of Indiana. When their credentials were presented, at the same time a memorial was presented from a minority of the Legislature alleging irregularities, alleging in fact that they were not elected, and protesting against their admission. They were admitted, however, upon the prima facie case made by their credentials. The remonstrance was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was examined very fully by that committee, and a report was made, which may be found in Bartlett's Contested Election Cases, on page 629. On a subsequent contest, the Senate adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright, Senators returned and admitted from the State of Indiana, are entitled to the seats which they now hold in the Senate, as such Senators aforesaid, the former until the 4th of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th of March, 1863, according to the tenor of their respective credentials.

The report proceeds:

This resolution and the accompanying documents were on the same day ordered to be printed.

The resolution was under consideration in the Senate, and fully debated at several subsequent times, and was finally, after the rejection of several proposed amendments, passed by the Senate without amendment or alteration.

A subsequent Legislature of the State of Indiana, that is a Legislature subsequent to the Legislature which elected Fitch and Bright, treated their election as void and elected Mr. Lane and Mr. McCarty as Senators for the same terms. Lane and McCarty at the succeeding session of the Senate presented their credentials, and at the same time presented a paper setting forth the grounds upon which they claimed that they were legally elected Senators and were entitled to seats. Their credentials and the memorial to which I have referred were sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. I now read from the report made by the committee thereon:

In the opinion of the committee this resolution (no motion having been made to reconsider it) finally disposed of all questions presented to the Senate involving the respective rights of Hon. Graham N. Fitch and Hon. Jesse D. Bright to their seats in the Senate as Senators from the State of Indiana for the terms stated in the resolution. It appears by the memorial that the Legislature of Indiana, at its recent session in December last, assumed the power of revising the final decision thus made by the Senate of the United States, under its unquestioned and undoubted constitutional authority to "be the judge of the qualifications of its own members." Under this assumption, it also appears by the journals of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Indiana, the Legislature of Indiana, treating the seats of the Senators from that State as vacant, proceeded subsequently, by a concurrent vote of the senate and house of representatives of the State, to elect Hon. Henry S. Lane as a Senator of the United States for the State of Indiana, to serve as such until the 4th of March, 1863, and Hon. William Monroe McCarty as a Senator for the same State, to serve as such until the 4th of March, A. D. 1861. Under this action of the Legislature of Indiana those gentlemen now claim their seats in the Senate of the United States.

It may be conceded that the election would have been valid, and the claimants entitled to their seats, had the Legislature of Indiana possessed the authority to revise the decision of the Senate of the United States that Messrs. Fitch and Bright had been duly elected Senators from Indiana, the former until the 4th of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th of March, 1863.

In the opinion of the committee, however, no such authority existed in the Legislature of Indiana. There was no vacancy in the representation of that State in the Senate; and the decision of the Senate, made on the 12th of June, 1858, established finally and (in the absence of a motion to reconsider) irreversibly the right of Hon. Graham N. Fitch as a Senator of the State of Indiana until the 4th of March, 1861, and the right of Hon. Jesse D. Bright as a Senator from the same State until the 4th of March, A. D. 1863.

The decision was made by an authority having exclusive jurisdiction of the subject; was judicial in its nature; and, being made on a contest in which all the facts and questions of law involving the validity of the election of Messrs. Fitch and Bright, and their respective rights to their seats, were as fully known and presented to the Senate as they are now in the memorial of the Legislature of Indiana, the judgment of the Senate then rendered is final, and precludes further inquiry into the subject to which it relates.

It will be observed that the Senate there distinctly held that having once determined that Bright and Fitch were elected upon the merits of the case, the Senate at a subsequent session had no right to reopen the case, had no right to determine whether the case had been properly decided at the prior session of the Senate or not, that it was finally determined by the Senate in 1858, and that two years after the Senate could not set aside the judgment which the Senate had rendered in 1858.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend pardon me one moment?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. Is that the decision, or is it that a subsequent Legislature of Indiana could not undertake to interfere with the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. They decided that also, but they decided distinctly the point that I have stated.

Mr. CONKLING. Perhaps the Senator had better read the decision on that point again.

Mr. EATON. The whole thing must be taken together and read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Certainly, the whole thing must be taken together:

The decision was made by an authority having exclusive jurisdiction of the subject; was judicial in its nature; and, being made on a contest in which all the facts and questions of law involving the validity of the election of Messrs. Fitch and Bright, and their respective rights to their seats, were as fully known and presented to the Senate as they are now in the memorial of the Legislature of Indiana, the judgment of the Senate then rendered is final, and precludes further inquiry into the subject to which it relates.

What subject did it relate to? It related to the right of Bright and Fitch to their seats upon this floor.

Mr. EATON. Connected with the action of the previous contestants, that is all; not of a future Legislature. That is not this case at all. The case here is, has the Senate decided accurately with regard to the action of a given Legislature, the Legislature of 1875, if you please, not the Legislature of 1876, a year after. I submit to my honorable friend from Wisconsin that this must be taken into consideration, that nobody could come here with the action of a subsequent Legislature. That was the judgment of the Senate in the case he refers to. That is not the case here; and I desire to say, and I ought to say very frankly, that in whatever vote I may give I by no means mean it to be understood that I shall unseat one man and seat another. That is another matter entirely.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me before he sits down, with the leave of the Senator from Wisconsin, to ask him if by the phrase which he just used, "Has the Senate decided accurately?" he means to imply that the Senate has any different power to-day, whether it decided accurately or inaccurately on this question last year, than it had then?

Mr. EATON. I mean to say this, not that it will have the slightest application to the case before us, but simply as an illustration, that if it should turn out that my friend from Massachusetts or my friend from New York, or rather than to have any feeling with either of those gentlemen I will say myself—if it should turn out that evidence could be introduced that my election four years ago was obtained in an improper and fraudulent manner, I apprehend that the Senate would have the right to look into that.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there any fear of that?

Mr. EATON. No. There would be some fear, perhaps, with regard to the other gentlemen of whom I spoke, but none in regard to myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, the question in the Bright and Fitch case was this: were Bright and Fitch legally elected Senators in 1858? The question so far as Mr. KELLOGG is concerned in this case is, was Mr. KELLOGG legally elected Senator in January, 1877? It is true that the Senate in the Bright and Fitch case decided that a subsequent Legislature could not undo what a previous Legislature had done, although if Senators will look at the memorial presented by Mr. Spofford in this case they will see that he claims as one of the grounds on which this case should be opened and retried that a subsequent Legislature in Louisiana protested against the seating of KELLOGG and against his exclusion from a seat in this body. So that in his memorial he makes the very point which the Senator from Connecticut says there is nothing to, because a subsequent Legislature cannot in any way affect the action of a preceding Legislature.

Mr. CONKLING. Would it incommode the Senator to state the names of the members of the committee by whom that report was made in the Bright case?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think the names are given here.

Mr. CONKLING. I supposed they were before the Senator.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The chairman of the committee was Mr. Bayard, of Delaware. Mr. Pugh, of Ohio, was on the committee. Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, was a member of it. Those three at least were on the committee. The names of the others do not appear to be in the report which I have before me.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If it will not interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Nothing will interrupt me, because I am not making a set speech.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask him if it was not stated in that report that all the facts were as distinctly known at the time Fitch and Bright were elected as they were at the time the contest was made? I understand that to be the statement of the report, and I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact, as he refers to the memorial of Mr. Spofford in this connection, that Mr. Spofford specifically alleges that he was denied the privilege of presenting before the committee the facts which he now desires to have investigated and that is one of the strong points which he makes in his memorial. So his case is distinguished from that case by the fact that in the one case all the facts were before the Senate, and in the other case it is alleged by the memorial that the party contestant was denied the privilege of bringing those facts before the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I submit, Mr. President, even if that were so, which I do not admit to be so, it would not in any way affect the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say, if the Senator will allow me, that I do not express any opinion on the truth of the allegation. I simply call his attention to the allegation. I do not desire as a member of the committee to prejudge the case or express any opinion upon anything contained in the memorial.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. If he will, I wish to suggest that so far from affecting the question of jurisdiction so as to impair the conclusiveness of the prior judgment, it would overthrow, as I conceive, the only ground on which that jurisdiction could be assailed, namely, the ground of newly discovered evidence. If Mr. Spofford came with a memorial saying that neither the committee nor he nor anybody else was then aware of influential facts discovered since, possibly we should have an exceptional case, possibly a case which would break the force of the argument made and the precedents cited by the Senator from Wisconsin now on the floor. But when he comes with a memorial confessing and alleging that, at the time when this adjudication was made, at the time when the committee examined, at the time when he made profert before the committee of the case on which he stood, he was aware of the fact which he now alleges, and then in the customary way of defeated parties criticises the court by saying that the court did not hear sufficiently or the court did not apprehend sufficiently or the court did not give weight sufficiently to facts then presented, I humbly submit that he brings himself most fully, most conclusively, within the rule relating to previous adjudications, whether we liken this to a proceeding in a court of law or whether we consider it as it is, one held here in a legislative forum and on a day when according to the Constitution the members of that forum were judges, when in the language of the Constitution they proceeded to judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of their members. I say, then, whether we consider it as we would a case pending in a judicial tribunal, or as one pending in this tribunal at the moment sitting judicially, in either event Mr. Spofford makes an allegation fatal to the only ground on which he could successfully attempt to wrest this case from the general rule and plant it on exceptional ground. Newly discovered evidence is a potent lever with which to unsettle and upset previous adjudications. Without newly discovered evidence, with evidence merely cumulative, more especially with evidence all known at the time, nothing I humbly conceive can be more inadmissible, nothing more futile than an attempt to overthrow a conclusive prior adjudication.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me, I desire to say now what I have heretofore stated, that I do not intend to express any opinion at the present stage of the case upon the question which is raised by the Senator from Wisconsin that this is a question of res adjudicata. I do not mean to express any opinion as to whether that plea is a proper plea in a case pending in the Senate at all; but I desire now to say that one of the very grounds admitted by the Senator from New York to be a good ground of opening a question of this kind, or one at least that might have some weight, namely, that there was newly-discovered testimony, is alleged, according to my understanding, in the petition of Mr. Spofford. I do not intend on any of these questions to express any opinion. All we desire to ask is the authority to investigate the whole question and lay the facts before the Senate, so that the Senate, with the full knowledge of the facts that are brought out in the investigation, may be able to judge and pass upon the question.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. We say that the whole question was once laid before the Senate, and the Senate decided upon the case after the whole question was laid before it.

The next case I will refer to is the Spencer-Sykes case. In that case the question that was presented was whether the Legislature by which Mr. Spencer claimed to have been elected was the Legislature of the State of Alabama or whether the Legislature by which Mr. Sykes claimed to have been elected was the Legislature of the State. It appeared that some of the members of the so-called Spencer legislature did not have the regular certificates of election; that certain members of the Sykes legislature, so called, did have regular certificates of election; but the two legislatures afterward compromised and came together, and it was agreed, as I understand the facts, that, although certain members of the Spencer legislature did not have regular certificates of election, they were in truth and in fact legally elected; and although certain members of the Sykes legislature did have regular certificates of election, they were not in truth and in fact elected.

The Senate ascertaining that these facts had been agreed upon by the respective legislatures, if I may so call them, of the State of Alabama, recognized the agreement; and that is as far as the Senate went at that time. Recognizing that agreement, it appeared that Mr. Spencer was duly and legally elected Senator, and he was thereupon seated. Subsequently, a memorial was presented to the Senate, asking that the case be again opened, not only upon the question as to which was the Legislature but also upon the question as to whether Mr. Spencer or his friends used corrupt means to secure the election of Mr. Spencer. In the former contest, as I have stated, the only question which was passed upon by the Senate was which of the two legislatures was the Legislature of the State. The Senate distinctly and definitely passed upon that question. No other question was presented to it; it passed upon no other question. When the memorial was presented some years afterward, asking that the case be again opened, not only upon the question as to which was the true Legislature but upon the other question to which I have referred, the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which the then Senator from Indiana, Mr. Morton, was chairman, made a report, in which this language is used:

> The question whether Mr. Spencer was elected by the lawful Legislature of Alabama, raised in the memorial referred to, and in the specifications filed before the committee by the counsel, Mr. MORGAN, who represented the State of Alabama, was considered by a majority of the committee to have been fully settled in the contest for the seat occupied by Mr. Spencer, before made, in the Senate, by Mr. Sykes.
> The question in that contest was whether what was known as the court-house legislature, by which Mr. Spencer was elected, or the capitol legislature, by which Mr. Sykes was elected, was the lawful Legislature of Alabama. After full consideration and argument of counsel, it was determined by the committee and afterward by the Senate that the court-house legislature was the lawful one, and that Mr. Spencer and not Mr. Sykes was entitled to the seat.
> The question having been definitely settled it was considered by the committee that it was not competent for the committee or the Senate to reopen it, and that it must be treated as res adjudicata.

In this case, too, this question having been distinctly passed upon by the Senate, the Senate at a subsequent session, when it was asked to reopen the case, decided that that question having been determined by the Senate it was not competent for the Senate to open it.

I will also call the attention of the Senate to the Butler-Corbin case. The Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the committee, united in the minority report; in fact, I believe he drew it. The minority of the committee held in that case that the question as to who was the Senator from the State of South Carolina, whether Mr. BUTLER or Mr. Corbin, had been passed upon, finally and conclusively passed upon, by the Senate when it adopted a resolution seating Mr. BUTLER. In that instance, Mr. Corbin's case, as I claim, never was before the Senate. His credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Mr. BUTLER'S credentials were presented to the Senate and referred to that committee. Subsequently a motion was made to discharge the committee from the further consideration of Mr. BUTLER'S credentials. Upon that motion a discussion sprang up in the Senate which lasted for several days, Mr. Corbin's credentials remaining during all that time in the hands of the committee, never having been before the Senate at all; and yet the minority of the committee were of the opinion that the case had been finally and conclusively passed upon, and consequently that it was not competent for the Senate again to consider it. The Senate agreed with the minority of the committee, because, when a motion was made to take up the case of Mr. Corbin, a decided majority of the Senate voted in the negative, and it was never taken up, and his credentials remain in the hands of the committee to this day.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Wisconsin, I am sure, does not desire to misrepresent the view of the minority in that case. He will remember that in the minority view it is expressly stated that the reason on which they said the case of Mr. BUTLER had been finally settled was that all the questions of law and of fact had been before the Senate, and that there was no dispute about any question either of law or fact; there was perfect agreement between the contestants themselves. The minority distinctly stated in their report that if the facts were not all agreed upon or known, or if the facts were not present before the committee and before the Senate, that would make a very different case than that which was presented in the case of Mr. BUTLER and Mr. Corbin when Mr. BUTLER was seated. That was the statement in the report of the minority. I desire to remind the Senator from Wisconsin that, whatever might have been the view of the minority, there were some twenty-five members of the Senate on the other side of the Chamber who did not consider the case of Mr. BUTLER and Mr. Corbin settled at all by the previous action of the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was one of those who did not think it was settled by the previous action of the Senate; and the reason why I did not think it was settled was that Mr. Corbin's case never was before the Senate. The facts in relation to his case never were before the Senate, because his credentials remained in the hands of the committee and never were under consideration by the Senate at all. It is true that they were talked about, but they were talked about upon a motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the credentials of Mr. BUTLER; they were talked about as outside matters, not as matters then before the Senate. That is the reason.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator will remember that the briefs, both of Mr. BUTLER and Mr. Corbin, were on the tables of Senators themselves, and all the facts relating to the question. There was no dispute between the parties as to any question of fact. The whole matter was before the Senate, and the briefs of the parties were upon the tables of Senators.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The credentials of Mr. Corbin were in the hands of the committee and not before the Senate. Then I submit that while the credentials of Mr. Corbin were in the hands of the committee and not before the Senate the Senate had no jurisdiction to either consider or pass upon his case. Suppose a bill is introduced here and referred to a committee, and without any further action upon the bill I move to take it up in the Senate for consideration? The Senator from Delaware, who is tenacious about questions of order, would get up at once and claim that, the bill being in the hands of the committee and not before the Senate, the Senate had no jurisdiction, and that my motion was out of order; which would be correct. Just so with the Corbin case. His case never was before the Senate, but notwithstanding the fact that the case never was before the Senate, a majority of the Senate uniting with the minority of the committee at that time decided that it was finally determined by the Senate, that it was res adjudicata, and consequently could not be further considered.

I refer to that case not because I agreed with the minority of the committee, not because I agreed with the final action of the Senate upon it, but because the Senate by a decided majority did decide that the case was res adjudicata.

The Senator from Delaware claims that all the facts of the present case were not before the committee and were not before the Senate when this question was passed upon by the Senate in 1877. I have already stated that the committee determined at a certain time to close the testimony in the case, that it was agreed to by the minority of the committee, with the exception that Mr. Spofford, the contestant, might afterward call to the attention of the committee certain points on which he desired to take testimony. Subsequently he did present five points to the committee and asked that he might be permitted to take testimony upon those points. The committee came to the conclusion that those points were fully covered by the testimony then already before the committee. I do not hesitate to express the opinion that all the facts in this case were at that time before the committee and before the Senate.

It is now claimed by the contestant, Mr. Spofford, that Mr. KELLOGG, the sitting member, used corrupt means, without defining distinctly what those corrupt means were, for the purpose of securing his election to the Senate. That same charge was made before the committee by Mr. Spofford in 1877. It is not a new charge at all. It appears that soon after Mr. KELLOGG was elected, a distinguished citizen of Louisiana, in a democratic meeting or caucus, a public meeting I think it was, declared that Mr. KELLOGG had secured his election by corrupt practices; that a certain member of the house of representatives of the State, naming him, was the head of a ring in the Legislature of the State, and that this certain member had paid each member of the Legislature who voted for Mr. KELLOGG the sum of $250 for his vote. When the matter was brought to the attention of the member implicated he at once declared the charge false and slanderous, and called upon the Legislature, the Packard legislature, for an investigation. Thereupon Mr. McMillen, at that time a member of the Legislature, now the postmaster at New Orleans, (a gentleman with whom I have the honor of a personal acquaintance and who is recognized by all the citizens of the State as a man of ability and character,) on the 16th day of January, 1877, introduced a resolution providing that a committee of five members of the house of representatives of the State should be appointed for the purpose of investigating the charges of corruption against Mr. KELLOGG and his friends. That resolution was adopted, and under it a committee of five was appointed. On the 27th day of January, 1877, that committee reported to the house of representatives of the State and declared that there was no foundation whatever for the charge. The committee reported the testimony that they had taken. My recollection is that the committee reported that they had examined, and the record of the testimony shows that the committee had examined every member of the Packard legislature, and that every one thus examined by the committee pronounced the charge false. Then the very Legislature by which Mr. KELLOGG was elected has investigated the distinct charge which is now made against him in the petition of Mr. Spofford, the charge of bribery and corruption.

How has the Senate heretofore treated the investigations made by State Legislatures? Mr. Bogy, of Missouri, was elected a Senator in 1873. I am informed that the contest preceding his election was a very spirited one, that it was perhaps an acrimonious one. After he was elected the minority at once raised the cry that he had secured his election by bribery and corruption. A committee of the Legislature was appointed for the purpose of investigating the charge. That committee made an examination and reported to the Legislature that the charge was unfounded. Mr. Bogy came on here and was admitted upon the prima facie case made by his credentials; but the minority of the Legislature caused a memorial to be presented to the Senate in which they recapitulated the charges which had been made against Mr. Bogy before the Legislature of Missouri. That memorial was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body. The report upon the case was made by Mr. Morton on the 25th of March, 1873. It is very brief; I will read it:

> The memorial sets forth that the recent examination by a committee appointed by the house of representatives of the Legislature of Missouri touching the corrupt use of money in the election of Mr. Bogy was imperfect; that it was not full and fair, and in the opinion of the memorialists, if the investigation had been conducted with more vigor and with a purpose of revealing the real facts of the case other and more important evidence would have been produced showing that there was corruption in Mr. Bogy's election.
> The memorial, however, does not state what additional facts can be proven, nor indicate with any certainty the character of the new evidence that may be produced.

The same criticism might properly be made upon Mr. Spofford's petition. It does not state very distinctly what additional facts can be proven, nor does it indicate with any certainty what was "the character of the new evidence that may be produced." The report proceeds:

> The committee understand that the only duty which they have upon this reference is to report to the Senate whether the memorial presents such facts as would justify the Senate in instituting an examination in regard to the election of Mr. Bogy, and are of the opinion that it does not. Such a proceeding is of a grave character, and should not be set on foot without such a statement of the evidence that could probably be produced as would appear to make it the duty of the Senate to proceed to an investigation.
> The evidence taken by the committee of the Legislature of Missouri also accompanies the memorial, and has been examined by the committee. It is not the province of the committee, upon this reference, to inquire whether the judgment pronounced by the house of representatives of the Missouri Legislature upon this evidence was correct; but they express the opinion that the evidence is not of a character to require of the Senate an investigation.
> The committee, therefore, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial and the evidence touching the election of Lewis V. Bogy to the Senate of the United States.

Here it is put upon the ground that the same charges of bribery and corruption which were contained in the memorial presented to the Senate of the United States in regard to the election of Mr. Bogy had been investigated by the Legislature of his own State, and that the Legislature had acquitted him of the charges. In Mr. KELLOGG's case these same charges of bribery and corruption were made to the Legislature of Louisiana, a committee of five was appointed to investigate them; the committee did investigate them and fully acquitted Mr. KELLOGG.

There is another case upon this point to which I will call the attention of the Senate—the Cameron case from Pennsylvania. Mr. Cameron was elected Senator from Pennsylvania in 1857. It was alleged that he secured his election by improper means. He came on with his credentials. A minority of the Legislature caused a memorial to be presented to the Senate setting forth that he had obtained his election by improper means. That memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, from which Mr. Benjamin, of Louisiana, made a report. The prayer of the memorial was that the case might be investigated by the Senate. The report proceeds to say:

> The committee cannot recommend that this prayer be granted. The allegation is entirely too vague and indefinite to justify such a recommendation. Not a single fact or circumstance is detailed as a basis for the general charge. Neither the nature of the means alleged to be corrupt and unlawful, nor the time, place, or manner of using them, is set forth, nor is it even alleged that the sitting member participated in the use of such corrupt means, or, indeed, had any knowledge of their existence. Under no state of facts could your committee deem it consistent with propriety, or with the dignity of this body, to send out a roving commission in search of proofs of fraud in order to deprive one of its members of a seat to which he is prima facie entitled; still less can they recommend such a course when the parties alleging the fraud and corruption are themselves armed with ample powers for investigation. If it be, indeed, true that members of the house of representatives of Pennsylvania have been influenced by corrupt considerations or unlawful appliances, the means of investigation and redress are in the power of the very parties who seek the aid of the Senate of the United States. Let their complaint be made to the house of which they are members, and which is the tribunal peculiarly appropriate for conducting the desired investigation. That their complaint will meet the respectful consideration of that house your committee are not permitted to doubt. If upon such investigation the facts charged are proven, and if they, in any manner, involve the character of the recently elected member of this body from the State of Pennsylvania, the Constitution of the United States has not left the Senate without ample means for protecting itself against the presence of unworthy members in its midst.

It appears from the report of the committee in that case that the committee were of the opinion that the Legislature of Pennsylvania ought to have investigated those charges, and if they had investigated the charges and had found that they were sustained, the implication in the report is that the Senate of the United States would consider that finding perhaps conclusive in the case.

These charges of corruption against Mr. KELLOGG and his friends were not only investigated by the Packard legislature by which he was elected, but a committee was appointed for the purpose of investigating them by the Nicholls legislature some time afterward. Colonel Zacharie was a member of that committee. The committee consisted, I believe, of three members, two democrats and one republican. The committee, as I am informed, has never reported.

Thus it is clear that the charges of corruption now made in the petition of Mr. Spofford against Mr. KELLOGG were investigated by the Packard legislature, the Legislature by which Mr. KELLOGG was elected, and it will not do to say that the Packard legislature was not the lawful Legislature of the State, because this body has passed upon that question already, and it is not now open for discussion. The Packard legislature having authority in this matter appointed a committee; the committee made a full investigation of the charges and pronounced them not sustained. The Nicholls legislature subsequently appointed a committee for the purpose of investigating the same charges. Whether the committee made any investigation or not I am not advised; but it is certain that it has never reported. In the Bogy case the Legislature of Missouri having acquitted Mr. Bogy of the charges the Senate of the United States considered that acquittal sufficient and refused to order an investigation. In the Cameron case the Senate of the United States said to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, "If the members of the Legislature of Pennsylvania have been guilty of the charges that you make against them, you have the means in your own hands for investigating them; appoint a committee of your own Legislature and investigate them."

I submit, then, that when the Senate of the United States adopted a resolution declaring that Mr. KELLOGG was entitled to his seat as a Senator in this body from the 4th of March, 1877, for six years thereafter, the Senate passed judicially upon the question. I submit further that the charge of corruption now made against Mr. KELLOGG has been fully investigated by the Legislature of Louisiana, and he has been acquitted of the charge. I submit that the Senate in the Bogy case decided that when the Legislature of a State had investigated a charge similar to the one now made against Mr. KELLOGG, the Senate would not order a re-examination.

If the resolution offered by the Senator from Delaware be adopted it opens the whole case. It authorizes the committee to take testimony upon every possible phase of the case. It will not do to say that it is not the intention of the committee to commit any member of the Senate upon any question that may arise in this case, because the very first question which presents itself is, has the case been finally disposed of by the Senate? It certainly commits every Senator who votes for the resolution upon that question. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] remarked the other day that in his opinion it was necessary to take testimony in order that the Senate might intelligently come to a conclusion whether the case was res adjudicata or not. That is a very singular position for a lawyer to take. I think he never knew, as I have already remarked, a court to order testimony to be taken in a case for the purpose of determining the question of res adjudicata.

Mr. CONKLING. For the purpose of examining whether they had a right to take testimony or not.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes, for the purpose of determining whether they had a right to take testimony or not.

I submit that in any view of the case this resolution ought not to pass. The minority of the committee insist that the whole question has been disposed of. The case is res adjudicata. The charges made against Mr. KELLOGG have been fully examined by the Legislature of Louisiana, he has been acquitted of those charges, and in similar cases where a State Legislature has investigated charges similar to these the Senate has held that it would not order a re-examination.

One of the points made by the contestant is that he was not permitted to introduce testimony upon the five points that he presented to the committee. The arguments made during the present session before the committee have been printed and laid upon the desks of all the Senators. Senators will find that this question has been fully discussed by Mr. Shellabarger, the counsel for Mr. KELLOGG, and I think he shows conclusively that all the five points are fully covered by the testimony which was before the committee when the case was under investigation in 1877. I have verified the citations made by Mr. Shellabarger in his argument, and I find that they are sustained by a reference to the reports referred to. There is, then, I think, really no ground whatever upon which this case can properly be opened for a re-examination and a retrial and another judgment.

Mr. CARPENTER, (at two o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) This is a very important question, and several Senators who are not in their seats desire to be heard upon it. I presume there will be no objection to an adjournment, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope that it will not be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) There seems to be a political question involved in this motion, and I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when Mr. WINDOM's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. WINDOM] is absent from the Senate and is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] on this question. My colleague would vote "yea" and the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MAXEY. My colleague [Mr. COKE] is compelled by an important engagement to be absent to-day, and is paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 30; as follows:

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Delaware in his purpose is to force a vote on this question to-day. There are several Senators who desire to speak upon it and who regard it as an extremely important question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I do not desire to be discourteous to any member of the Senate——

Mr. HOAR. I am sure of that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire, however, to reach a vote upon this resolution at as early an hour as possible. I have no desire to act oppressively toward those with whom I differ upon the adoption of the resolution, but I at the same time desire that we shall continue the discussion, if discussion is desired upon the question, until a reasonable hour this evening; and I give notice that I shall press for a vote upon it to-morrow, if we do not obtain a vote to day.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter into an argument of this question to-day. The difficulty arises from the very simplicity and clearness of the proposition. No gentleman upon the other side of the Chamber seems disposed to risk a vindication of the principle which is involved in the resolution. No gentleman upon the other side of the Chamber seems, from present appearances, prepared to put into words a statement of the grounds upon which he bases the support of this resolution. The principle affirmed, and to which it seems to me it is sought to commit the Senate, is this: that whenever upon full debate, upon full consideration by a committee, upon careful and anxious examination in the Senate, the Senate has affirmed the title of a Senator to a seat upon the merits, and the party majority changes, it is competent to review and reverse that judgment, and unseat the Senator so declared seated. That is a doctrine which, in my judgment, will surprise and will alarm the American people, and it should surprise and alarm the American people.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Do I understand the Senator to intimate that that is the issue? Do I understand him to say that anybody on this side believes that this case ever did receive full consideration? Does not the Senator know that the facts of this case never received any consideration at all?

Mr. HOAR. It is easy to state a pretext for anything.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The gentleman may call it a pretext, but I have the RECORD here showing that it was stated at the time that there was no consideration of the facts in the case, and gentlemen on that side themselves admitted that there would be no legal obstruction to a consideration of this case in the future upon the allegations now made, and which are before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. It is easy to state a pretext for anything.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, and the Senator is about as familiar with that as any man I ever knew.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator is departing from the due order of the Senate as much as he is departing from the sound constitutional principle which is involved in the discussion. Of course it is easy to cast a veil over this transaction, but it seems to me it is impossible upon consideration to escape the conclusion that the doctrine affirmed and asserted by the majority of the committee is the doctrine that I have stated, and nothing else, to-wit: that whenever a party majority changes, the solemn judgments of the Senate upon the merits of the title to their seats of the members of this body may be reversed at will. What was the authority? I obtained leave from the Committee on Privileges and Elections to read to the Senate the vote which authorized the chairman to present this resolution, and it is as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the committee be instructed to apply to the Senate for authority to take testimony in the matter of the petition of Henry M. Spofford, praying to be permitted to produce evidence relating to the right of WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG to the seat in the Senate held by him from the State of Louisiana, and in support of his own claim thereto, and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, appoint sub-committees, and do whatever else is necessary and usual in such cases.

The resolution offered by the chairman of the committee and pending in the Senate is:

That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the memorial of Henry M. Spofford, praying permission to produce evidence relating to the right of Hon. WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG to the seat in the Senate held by him from the State of Louisiana and in support of the claim of said petitioner thereto, be, and said committee is hereby, instructed to inquire into the matters alleged in said petition; and for that purpose said committee is authorized and empowered, &c.

Therefore the passage of this resolution is and must be an affirmance of the right of the Senate at this time to inquire into the title of Mr. KELLOGG to the seat which he now occupies and the claim of the petitioner, Mr. Spofford, thereto; and everything else is in aid of that inquiry.

Now, Mr. President, what has happened? Two years ago, or thereabouts, the Senate referred the credentials of Mr. KELLOGG to a committee, and the Senate thereafter passed a resolution directing the committee to whom had been referred those credentials to proceed to inquire into the merits of the title to the seat. Mr. Spofford presented a memorial in which he alleged, first, that Mr. KELLOGG had not been duly elected; second, that the body electing him was not the rightful and authorized Legislature; and third, that Mr. KELLOGG had been guilty of bribery or other improper practices in obtaining the seat. Mr. Spofford filed specifications, and there were introduced on one side and the other more than ten thousand pages of evidence relating to those very transactions. The matter was before the committee for weeks, and then the committee reported a resolution to the effect that Mr. KELLOGG was entitled to this seat on the merits. Thereupon it was claimed that the committee had erred in rejecting certain evidence tending to show the impropriety of Mr. KELLOGG'S dealing in the matter, and in not giving time and authorizing the claimant, the contestant Spofford, to produce other evidence, and the Senator from Georgia, I think, moved that the case be sent back to the committee with instructions to proceed to examine into these additional matters.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It was the Senator from Delaware, I believe, who made the motion.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Delaware, then, made that motion, and on debate the Senate overruled the motion and proceeded to vote, first, that WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG was on the merits entitled to the seat, and that Mr. Spofford, the contestant, was not entitled to the seat. This petitioner now simply comes in and says that the Senate erred because certain testimony which he proposed to add to the ten thousand pages already before the committee was at that time rejected. That is the whole substance of this allegation.

Is there any doubt that the final judgment of a court affirms? If it is a final judgment, it finally affirms the propriety of every ruling in regard to the rejection of evidence, in regard to the admission of evidence, in regard to the materiality, competency, or propriety of other evidence proposed, not adduced but alleged to be in the power of one party or the other. Are not those points as much settled by a final judgment as is the ultimate question in a case?

Mr. KELLOGG'S title is the strongest title to his seat which exists in regard to a single member of the Senate of the United States to-day. Most of us were admitted to a seat upon the certificate of the governor or other State officer of the States which we represent. One of us, the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] was admitted to his seat after an examination from a committee, but without any express affirmance by the Senate that the judgment was upon the merits, the claim of his contestant being still pending and undisposed of before the committee. But this gentleman, Mr. KELLOGG, stands with the solemn judgment of the Senate, after examination, after discussion, after a debate lasting till the morning sun shone into this Chamber, that he is entitled upon the merits of the case, and that the gentleman who now seeks to contest the seat has no claim whatever, and is not entitled to it.

I say again that almost any act which men seek to bring themselves to do may have pretexts or veils of plausible sophistry spread over; but the veil I desire to strip from this proposition, and it is nothing less than a declaration that no Senator's seat is safe, that no judgment of the Senate is final, that no constitutional right is sacred against the will or the demands of a partisan majority. For Senators to say that they express no opinion upon the question whether this matter has been adjudged and at the same time proceed to declare that it is proper to send abroad into the country and to examine witnesses upon the merits of the case, is a proposition which it is difficult for me to reconcile with the existing facts of the case. Suppose that proposition were to be put into words and made a preamble to this resolution:

Whereas the Senate of the United States declared that Mr. KELLOGG had full title to his seat upon the merits, for the term of six years, and further declared that Henry M. Spofford is not entitled to a seat:

Be it resolved, That the committee be authorized to send for persons and papers and permit Mr. Spofford to prove that he is entitled to the seat, and that Mr. KELLOGG is not.

If the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Georgia have not determined whether that solemn judgment of the Senate settles the title of Mr. KELLOGG to the seat and ends the claim of Mr. Spofford, now is the time for them to make up their minds, it would seem to me.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I did not desire to interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts in the course of his remarks. If I understood his remarks a few moments ago, he meant to convey the idea that the majority of the committee in asking for the passage of this resolution were governed entirely by partisan feelings and motives.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say so.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator undertook at least to make the impression that the motive in this case was a matter which was determined upon because there was a democratic majority at present in the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say so.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to his own vote so late as the 25th of February last in reference to another question. I find that he was one of the number of twenty-five Senators who voted upon a solemn resolution in reference to the seating of Mr. BUTLER who has been seated here, declaring:

That David T. Corbin was on the 12th day of December, A. D. 1876, duly elected by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina a Senator from that State in the Congress of the United States for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1877, and that as such he is entitled to have the oath of office administered to him.

I do not say that the Senator was governed by partisan motives, because I have long since learned that those who are most ready to impute such motives to others are those generally who are apt to be governed by them. But in defense of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, as I have disclaimed the statement which the Senator makes——

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator's language, if he will examine it, will convey that impression.

Mr. HOAR. I have the floor, I believe. As I have disclaimed the statement which the honorable Senator takes for his text, I do not think I ought to be compelled to yield further to the sermon.

Mr. SAULSBURY. With the indulgence of the Senator, I should like to say to him that his declining reminds me a good deal of a little——

Mr. HOAR. I do not yield, Mr. President, for such a purpose, but I will repeat what I said. I say that the principle which this resolution establishes, if it is adopted, is that every Senator's seat, however solemn or formal may be the judgment of the Senate as to his title to it upon the merits, shall be held hereafter at the will of a partisan majority. Possibly the honorable Senator from Delaware may think it proper to hear my restatement of what I said. He seems to have misunderstood me. I say again that the principle, if adopted, which this resolution will establish, is that however solemn the judgment of the Senate upon the title of a Senator to his seat upon the merits, it will be hereafter held at the discretion of a partisan majority. I enter into no gentleman's mind to impute motives to him. I do not know how far Senators may or may not deceive themselves in regard to the motives on which they act. I certainly should accept from no man more fully than from the honorable Senator from Delaware his own statement of what he conceives and believes to be the governing motives for his own conduct; but the country is interested, the people who have established this Constitution with so much care and thought, and at so much cost, are interested, not in the question of the self-deception of individual gentlemen, not in the question of the motives which may govern individual conduct, not in the question of the personal worth even of gentlemen who may go wrong, but in the act which is sought to be done. If it be true that there are certain cases in which newly discovered evidence might warrant a new inquiry into a matter once adjudged, which I deny as a matter of sound political principle, the committee have not planted themselves upon that ground; they have not limited their resolution to newly discovered evidence. It is not pretended that there is any newly discovered evidence tending to establish the title of Mr. Spofford to this seat; and yet the committee come in and demand of the Senate authority to send for persons and papers and to go into evidence as to the question of the title of Mr. Spofford to the seat.

Mr. CARPENTER. Upon the ground, as I understand it, that the Senate before excluded it!

Mr. HOAR. Upon the ground that the Senate once excluded it on debate and on full discussion. It may be true—though I am disposed to deny that after the precedents of the Bogy case and the Cameron case—that even where a Senator has been solemnly adjudged entitled to his seat on the merits, an inquiry into personal and individual misconduct, as bribery or corruption, might be, in the high discretion of the Senate, permitted in some cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With a view to expulsion.

Mr. HOAR. With a view to expulsion; but is such an inquiry given over to a contestant? The resolution of the committee has not sought to recognize or to establish itself upon that distinction. The committee would at least in such a case require, and the Senate with a view to its own dignity and in tenderness to the reputation of its own members, would at least require specifications, names of witnesses, affidavits, indications of fact tending to show reasonable ground of truth or importance in the charge; but this resolution is based upon a petition for a seat, and nothing else, without specification, without affidavit, without suggestion for the purpose of discipline or punishment, and asks the Senate to enter upon an inquiry into the two broad questions of the right of the sitting member and the claim of the contestant.

As I said when I got up, I did not rise to argue or debate this question at length. It may possibly be desirable to do that hereafter. I rose to state the question and to charge not any motive whatever upon the gentlemen who have introduced this resolution, but to charge upon the act, upon the proposition, upon the principle involved in this resolution, that it is one of the most dangerous, the most absolutely unprecedented, the most utterly unheard-of, either in the action of the Senate or in anything ever asked by way of action of the Senate in the past, of any proposition which could be made; and if it shall be adopted, for the first time after eighty years of angry party strife, when the judgments of the best men in election cases, unconsciously to themselves, have been colored and warped and biased, it is proposed to place the most valuable political right and the highest political dignity upon the face of the earth, the right and title to a seat in the Senate of the United States as representing the sovereignties which make up this nation, to the temptation and the passion and the anger and the sophistry and the prejudice of changing partisan majorities.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question, which I do in the utmost good faith. I did not care to interrupt him in the course of his remarks. He is a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and he has examined all the pleadings and all the proceedings that have been had in this case. I wish to have his opinion whether, under the issues formed in this case, there might not legitimately be a verdict of expulsion of the sitting member without giving the seat to the contestant, Mr. Spofford?

Mr. HOAR. I will answer that question very frankly, no. It would be the most flagrant injustice to any member of this Senate to report a resolution of expulsion against him upon a petition which does not make investigation into his conduct as a matter of personal conduct its principal end, but merely as an incidental result to the trial of the title to the seat. It is a different question altogether. The party has put in issue the title to the seat, the title to a thing, not the liability of this Senator to punishment for personal misconduct; and if Mr. KELLOGG should be of opinion, when this investigation is opened, that nothing in the facts offered to be proved tends to affect his title to the seat by reason of the previous judgment of the Senate, he would be utterly justified in disregarding and never seeking to meet or encounter before the committee these personal matters in regard to his conduct. He could say very properly, "I will meet them when a proper issue is made up by the direction of the Senate in regard to them."

The Senator from Arkansas, who is so candid and so able a lawyer, I think will see how unjust it would be to put him or me upon trial for expulsion on an issue which was made up for the purpose of trying our title to the seat as an original question. The Senate in such a case would examine very carefully the charge. Suppose a charge of personal misconduct were brought in against any Senator, against myself, or against the honorable Senator who occupies the chair, [Mr. EATON in the chair,] if that could be possible, which every man knows it is not, or suppose the plaintiff failed in ejectment because he had forged a deed, as is suggested, it would be rather strange if he could not be sent to the penitentiary for forgery on the evidence in that trial. But suppose it were sought to compass the expulsion of a Senator for personal misconduct, the Senate before even sending such a question to a committee, the Senator in demanding an investigation himself, would first see whether the charge were supported by affidavit. They would next see whether the specification of time, place, and circumstance was such as was fitting in the case of a charge like that. They would then see whether the transaction occurred at a time, was of a kind, whether there was a probability in the statement which warranted an investigation; and all those questions would be put in issue here before even a committee was raised. The question would not go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections according to the ordinary practice of the Senate, but would go to a special committee, as happened in the case of the honorable Senator from Ohio, Mr. Matthews, at the last Congress, as the Senate well recollects.

Now, is the Senate to establish the practice of mixing up these two things and of allowing any hostile party in the country to put any member of this body on his trial at the close of one of our heated political State campaigns for personal misconduct under guise of a claim to put in issue the title to the seat? I submit that this is a question in which the dignity and honor and safety of every member of this body, no matter how exalted may be the position which he occupies in the respect of his constituents and the whole people, is at stake in the view of it which is suggested by the honorable Senator from Arkansas.

I ought perhaps before I sat down to have adverted to the suggestion which was put to me by the honorable Senator from Delaware in regard to my own vote in the Butler case. The Butler case differed from this case in this, that Mr. BUTLER'S credentials only were referred to the committee; the committee made no report, but were discharged, and the Senate passed a vote permitting Mr. BUTLER to take the oath without declaring in terms, as the Kellogg vote did, whether the vote was upon the merits, and Mr. Corbin's credentials were left in the possession of the committee. But that case, as my friend from Wisconsin very well knows, with all those peculiar differences, led me to hesitate very much before giving my assent to the report, which was the report of a bare majority of the committee, and the case went over from one session to the next session in the committee in consequence of my refusal to give my assent, and I finally joined in the report in order that there might be a majority, so that the matter might come before the Senate, reserving expressly with my associates my right to exercise my individual judgment upon the merits of the case after debate. So that, so far as the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware is an argumentum ad hominem to me, it becomes unimportant.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me——

Mr. HOAR. My friend from Wisconsin knows very well the fact which I state.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to this: the Senate has never held that the swearing in of a Senator upon his credentials merely, upon the prima facie case made by his credentials, prevented an investigation into his title. The view that the majority of the committee took of Mr. BUTLER'S case was that he was merely sworn in upon the prima facie case made by his credentials; and having been sworn in upon his prima facie case, it was perfectly competent for the Senate, in accordance with all the precedents, to enter into an investigation of his right to the seat; but, as has been stated, in the Kellogg case the case was, as we claim, fully investigated, the Senate decided that it was fully investigated, and he was admitted after such investigation, the resolution declaring that he was admitted upon the merits of the case, not merely upon the prima facie case made by his credentials.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I did not ask the question I propounded to the Senator from Massachusetts with any view of engaging him in an argument on his view of this case, nor in fact with any positive conviction in my own mind as to what answer should be given. I have had a sort of rough idea in my head about this matter, that there are three parties possibly to the contest, two persons claiming the seat, and the third party the State of Louisiana, which has a right to be properly and legally represented. In reading the proceedings before the committee, as far as they have been printed, I find that Mr. Spofford makes certain charges against Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. KELLOGG makes certain charges against Mr. Spofford; and if in the course of this investigation the committee shall find that really—and when I say really I mean legally—neither one of these gentlemen was elected, they might possibly introduce a resolution declaring the seat vacant, and then let the State of Louisiana elect a Senator. This idea I gathered from the proceedings; and therefore I asked the Senator with perfect good faith the question whether in his judgment, according to the pleadings and the issue made here, there could be under any state of the case a judgment rendered that the seat was vacant; and when I used the word "expulsion" toward Mr. KELLOGG I did not mean it in any improper or harsh sense.

From the little debate we have had here, this resolution presents some very interesting questions. In all the contested cases that have come before the Senate and the House of which I have had any knowledge there is none that presents more delicate questions than this, and for one I believe the committee and the gentlemen on this side wish to deal with it fairly and legally. I propose, then, to offer as a proviso, after the word "vacation," in the original resolution, if the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is not adopted, something to this effect:

Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed as determining in any way the question whether KELLOGG'S right to such seat is adjudicated.

The question of adjudication, of former judgment, is generally settled by the record. There is a difference of opinion here in the Senate as to what this record says. It may be necessary, and the committee have so said, to take testimony as to the issues in this cause, but in taking this testimony the committee do not commit themselves nor the Senate to the fact that the right of KELLOGG to this seat is an open question. At the proper time, if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is not adopted, I will offer such an amendment as I have indicated or one substantially like it, and give my reasons for it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, when the honorable Senator from Arkansas comes to offer his amendment, he will remind me then, as he does now, of a man who should sue another by summons and complaint with a view that if he could not recover on the money counts or for goods, he might have him hung for murder as an incident of the proceeding! The fatal difficulty with all attempts of that kind in this case, will, I think, turn out to be that this is not in its nature an indictment, a public prosecution, or an allegation against a Senator; it is, to preserve the analogies with which the Senator from Arkansas is so familiar, a civil action, an action started in behalf of one man against another to recover from him something, to wit, the title to a seat in this body. All attempts to wink that out of sight, to cover it up, to put off upon the public another idea, to strive to make the country believe that, in place of an effort by one party to possess itself of a seat in this Chamber which beyond all question belongs to a man of another party, it is a conscientious, open, meritorious proceeding to ascertain whether WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG did not at some time during his natural or official life do something offensive either to the Constitution of the United States or the code of democratic morals,—all attempts to turn it into that will, I think, fail for the same reason that an attempt is said long, long ago to have failed to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. GARLAND. The analogy that the Senator from New York uses throws the question back to the very one that I propounded to the Senator from Massachusetts, and in propounding it I did so without any examination of the precedents or authorities of law on this particular subject. Now, I wish to ask the Senator from New York a question. The Senator from Massachusetts admits that the section of the Constitution which says that each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members is an ever-recurring power; in other words, it is never absent from either House. Now, if it be true that neither of these gentlemen is entitled to this seat, let me ask the Senator from New York who can bring a petition to make that issue before the Senate? Must the attorney-general of the State of Louisiana, must the governor, or can any citizen of the State bring it? If any citizen can bring it, will it grow out naturally of the application that is made here if it is discovered in the proof that neither of these gentlemen is entitled to the seat? That is the question I wish the Senator to answer; and I shall leave it with this further remark, that he must excuse me from accepting his idea that I am winking at the one thing or the other. I do not wink; I do not know how to wink. I will meet this question fairly and squarely; and when I put an inquiry in the utmost good faith, one that I consider a strong one, I do not want it winked out in that way.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, whatever doubt is left on my mind by the question of the Senator from Arkansas, I am convinced of one thing past misunderstanding, and that is that the honorable Senator puts it wholly for his own information. Undoubtedly that honorable Senator needs my aid when he attempts to ascertain how the Senate could be moved, by what agency it could effectually find out if some man were sitting here as an interloper or if some other man were sitting here who had defiled himself by breaches of the Senate's privilege; and convinced, as I have already said I am, that the Senator asks that question merely for information I will try to answer it.

There is somewhere hidden away in the folds of the Constitution a provision, in substance like this, that each House of Congress may make rules of order, may enforce rules of order, and then the clause culminates in these words "and with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a member." Under that provision of the Constitution, should the Senate come to know in any of the innumerable ways in which information comes to parliamentary bodies that the Senator from Arkansas (if he will take no umbrage at my making illustration of him) had by the employment of force, of fraud, of wrong, of forbidden means, achieved the seat which he adorns, no matter whether from the attorney-general of Louisiana or of Arkansas or whether from some nameless man elsewhere, whether by a newspaper paragraph or an intangible public rumor, the Senate had first been led to suspect the existence of these facts, on inquiry and ascertainment the Senate might proceed to execute the words of the Constitution, to avail itself of the permission of the Constitution when the Constitution says "and with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a member."

Now I think I have answered the question of the Senator as I understand it. What is this proceeding? Mr. Spofford comes here with a memorial. Who is Mr. Spofford? A citizen of Louisiana. Who else? A some time claimant of a seat in the Senate. When? When WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG presented his credentials, and the claim of Mr. Spofford and the credentials of Mr. KELLOGG were sent to a committee by the instruction of the Senate. That committee, proceeding in the modes of the Senate, heard all the testimony which it thought it should hear. It excluded no testimony save that which it thought it should not hear; and having so done, the product of this examination came into the Senate and, on the merits and on all of them, the Senate decided, and in the language of lawyers the verdict cured all defects—all such defects as an attempt is made now to allege. If the committee excluded evidence which Spofford thought ought to have been admitted, those exceptions were obliterated, annihilated for all practical future effect when the Senate adjudged, not one or some, but all of the questions and all of the possibilities of issue to be found in the contest which it adjudged.

Now comes this same claimant with these same allegations—good, bad, and indifferent—with those which the committee thought it was worth while to listen to, and also with those which the committee thought it was not worth while to spend a moment upon, being immaterial, as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] suggests, or being trivial, being inconsequential, being what you please, being in the judgment of the committee impertinent, unnecessary, ineffectual. The honorable Senator from Arkansas encourages and relieves the Senate by the prospect that some time or other in the future he will offer as a neat and appropriate ornament of this discourse a few additional words, to the effect that the Senate does not intend now to intimate any impression whatever on the point whether, after the Senate has decided such questions as this, anybody is bound to respect the decision. Oh no, not the least intimation of that sort! A cause has been tried; a final judgment has been rendered; everybody is bound by it and estopped; but some one comes in and proposes that the court shall send for the witnesses again and for other witnesses, and retry it; and the court sends out its mandate and summons the witnesses, not with a view to intimate that it is going to retry the cause at all; but it is going to send out and have the witnesses in and take testimony to find out whether it will retry it or not!

Mr. President, this is the Senate of the United States. Does it proceed by such stultifying and insincere steps in a matter like this? I respectfully submit it would attract attention were a justice of the peace to assume such an attitude. What is the testimony to be taken for? For something or nothing. When does the question of jurisdiction arise? What is the time in law, in logic, and in sense when a tribunal appealed to to do an act is to decide whether it has a right to do it or not? Before it does it, or afterwards? To ask the question is to answer it. And yet we are gravely told here by ceremoniously proposed amendments, by a disclaimer intended to be ingenious made by the Senator from Georgia, and by all sorts of devices to amuse and divert the listeners, that this means nothing; a majority is only to vote for a resolution not merely asserting the power but directing the exertion of the power to re-examine this question, and yet there is not the smallest intimation that anybody proposes to re-examine or insist that there is a right to re-examine!

Mr. President, I did not intend, certainly at this time, to say anything about this case, and yet I should be untruthful if I denied, wanting in frankness if I failed to admit, that I feel moved to say a number of things about it. Some days ago a draft was made upon my credulity—it was I think a fortnight since—it was made by two persons coming separately, each one of whom asked me to believe that the majority now existing in this Chamber intended to do this thing. I said to these friends, disposed to be obliging, willing as I was to believe all I could at the instance of a friend, that they must excuse me, that the statement was one which required the verification of experience in order to be accepted. I confess in humility how utterly untaught I was both in the possibilities of this occasion and in the exigencies of party politics.

Here sits a Senator whose claim to his seat has been put under the microscope of the most searching examination; every test has been applied to it known to the methods of the Senate; it has been adjudged and adjudged conclusively, if any claim to any seat can ever be finally established; and now instantly when the scepter of power passes from this side of the Chamber to that, instantly when by main force, by force of numbers, the power without reference to the right resides in the hands of an opposed majority, steps are taken, hidden away for the time but which have come now into the broad glare of the public eye, to clutch that seat, because it is a need and not only a need but in a probably not distant contingency a necessity, because it is the pivot, plainly speaking, on which at no distant day the power of the democratic party in this Chamber may turn. That is the honest truth about it. Whoever will take the trouble to count carefully the members of the Senate, assigning each his party position, and who along with it will consider what may be safely forecast of the attitude of States in the next election to occur, will see that the seat of the Senator from Louisiana may be, and is likely to be, the hinge on which the power in this Chamber will turn. Without saying more, I venture to declare that it is at least an unfortunate coincidence that a retention of power in the hands of the present majority of this body may depend and is likely to depend upon the success of this experiment. It would be ugly enough without that. Putting the two things together, I say the coincidence is unfortunate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EATON in the chair.) The Chair will ask the Senator from New York to give way that a message may be received from the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONKLING. I must give way to that.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1343) to provide for certain expenses of the present session of Congress, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EATON.) The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. I suppose, Mr. President, this matter still retains its place for the moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does. The Senator from New York has the floor on the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CONKLING. After the discussion which I heard this morning of matters of privilege, I did not know but that a great measure like that such as I heard the present occupant of the chair denominate only yesterday as "just," might possibly sweep all before it; in which event I should consent, of course, to vanish with the rest.

I did not intend, nor do I intend now, to be led into a general discussion of this resolution. I wish, however, to signify, if I can, that it does not, nor can any Senator who is its champion, mislead or blindfold me for one moment in respect of its purpose. It is a method resorted to in order to vacate a seat in the Senate, to vacate a seat the title of which has been conclusively and with particularity overmuch settled and adjudged, so that that seat may be transferred from where it is by the Constitution, by truth, and by right, to where it is not by either, but where it is required for partisan interest. I mean to say that fully, and I mean to say it offering no offense and meaning no harm to anybody within or without this Chamber who was the inventor of this scheme. I do not know, nor do I care, who was its author, who is its promoter; I speak of it and I denounce it as a violation of the rights and the privileges of this body and of the constituency behind the members of this body.

To say that such a resolution as this can be adopted, committing no one upon the question of the Senate's right to do this thing, is to affirm that a Senator may vote to order this inquiry and then without stultifying himself vote afterwards that, no matter what it results in, no matter what report may be made, it will still be true that the whole proceeding is ultra vires, and that an adjudication already made was the be-all and end-all of the whole affair. That is not true, Mr. President. I venture to say that is as unsound in common sense as it is in law. When any one shall come here with an allegation that Mr. KELLOGG or any other member of the Senate has been guilty of personal corruption, that he has attainted himself either in the act which made him a Senator or since, there will be footing for an inquiry whether he should be dealt with as the Senate has power to deal with its members; but when a claimant comes asking to get his seat away from him on a state of case existing when the Senate decided and which was passed upon by the Senate and by the committee excluding portions of the evidence and admitting the rest, whoever votes for it in the fountain cannot logically struggle against it in the stream. The objection to it is jurisdictional; it is that the cause has been tried and decided and the judgment is final, and the Senate has no right to reopen and retry it, and no more right because the force of numbers has in the mean time changed from one side of the Chamber to the other.

Mr. THURMAN, (Mr. BURNSIDE in the chair.) Mr. President, to say to a gentleman, "you are a villain," and in the same breath to say to him "I mean no offense," is a contradiction in terms, and it is not the mode in which I think a gentleman should be addressed. The Senator from New York, if I understood him aright, charges that this resolution reported by one of your committees is an attempt to turn a Senator out of his seat for the purpose of preserving a party majority in this body. If I understood him correctly, that is his allegation; and if it is, I for one must say that if I had united in reporting this resolution I should consider the allegation as personally offensive to me. I know of no right that the Senator from New York or any other Senator has to impugn the motives of his fellow-Senators by any such allegation as that. I might retort on the Senator, I might say that Mr. KELLOGG was seated in order to preserve a party majority; but I do not say so now, I did not say so when he was seated.

It is very true that there was then pending a motion to admit the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to his seat. It is very true that that motion was supplanted by a very extraordinary and hasty proceeding. It is very true that there were before the then Committee on Privileges and Elections three cases, or had been, of contested seats, one from the State of Louisiana, that of Mr. Eustis, which had been here for twenty-one months; another, the seat from South Carolina, and the third and the youngest of them all, the claim of the Senator from Louisiana, who now sits on the right of the Chamber. And, sir, strangely enough, it did so happen that it was only by a vote of the Senate discharging the committee from the consideration of the South Carolina case that it got before the Senate at all; and strangely enough, that other Louisiana case, which had been here for twenty-one months, was allowed to sleep until the next session of Congress, if my memory is correct, before that man was sworn in; and strangely enough, this case of Mr. KELLOGG was suddenly decided by refusing to hear the testimony offered by the contestant in the case, and bringing in a report suddenly and which no one expected, and which supplanted and took precedence over the discussion of the right of the Senator from South Carolina to his seat.

And, sir, it will be recollected that the Senate was so equally divided that there was tie vote after tie vote, which had to be decided by the casting vote of the Vice-President; it will be recollected that the Senate was so equally divided that there was but one or at most two majority in favor of seating the Senator from South Carolina and about the same majority in favor of seating the Senator from Louisiana.

If I were disposed to indulge in imputations of the motives of Senators, I might say that the sudden decision in KELLOGG'S case, which could only be made by refusing to investigate it, by refusing to hear the testimony that was offered, by cutting off all examination whatsoever, and bringing it hurriedly into this Senate to supplant or having the effect to supplant the matter which was before the Senate, the right of the Senator from South Carolina to his seat, was to preserve a party majority in this body. I repeat I do not say any such thing, and I did not say any such thing even in the debate which was extremely heated and went on steadily here for nearly one week and the greater part of the time night as well as day, when one of our sessions lasted, if I am not mistaken, for more than two days. I may be mistaken as to that, but it was a long time I know, a very long time, the longest perhaps of any continuous session that ever took place in this body. In all that heat I made no such accusation against my political opponents, and I do not rest easy under such accusations made against my political friends.

Mr. President, I wish to consider this question in the coolest possible temper of mind. I am not going this afternoon to make a speech upon the merits of the question at all. If I ever do make any such speech, it will be after the report of your committee upon the subject. But I will say while I am up that I am a little surprised at the offering of this substitute and asking the Senate, without any investigation on the part of the committee, without any inquiry by them of the matters referred to them, without any inquiry whether there is not newly discovered testimony that could not be obtained before by the use of reasonable diligence and which ought to affect our judgments, without any inquiry whatever as to the grounds on which the decision of the former committee was arrived at, to say "the record here presents an insuperable technical bar of res adjudicata." I did not suppose that any one in the Senate would undertake to sustain a legal proposition of that sort.

Sir, it is certain, and very certain, that the Senate would disgrace itself, it is very certain that the Senate would do manifest injustice, were it to hastily, or without the most plain, the most manifest reason, reverse a decision that had been made seating a Senator on this floor. The case must be extremely strong that would justify such a proceeding as that. All that I am free to admit; but to say that the technical rule of res adjudicata that applies in courts of justice applies in this Chamber on a question of this kind, is to confound all distinctions and to disregard all the laws of this body.

Is there anything more fundamental than that, in deciding a question as to the right of a Senator to a seat on this floor, the Senate is a law to itself? Is there a single book, a single authority that anywhere asserts that this Senate would be bound by a decision even of the Supreme Court of the United States upon a question of this kind? Not one, but they all state the reverse. The Senate would not be bound in deciding this, of which it is the sole judge, by even the views of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the Constitution of the United States. This is well-known law. I could cite a case from my own State in which the supreme court of the State had construed the constitution, and in which upon the question of seating a member of the senate the senate of the State took a different view of the constitution and decided according to their view and not the view of the supreme court of the State. This necessarily results from the fact that we are the sole judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of the members of this body, and, therefore, we have our own course of proceeding, we have our own judgment, and no judgment that we can make can be reversed. All this was very fully admitted by my friend whom I see sitting before me [Mr. CARPENTER] in the very notable case of Abbott; but although he and I differed very much indeed as to what the Senate ought to do in that case, upon this fundamental principle we went arm in arm. That, then, is the first proposition.

Now, how does the rule of res adjudicata as administered in the courts of common law apply to a case of this kind? Is it not fundamental in respect to the plea of res adjudicata that not only must the same question have been in issue before, but it must have been between the same parties in the same character. So strict is that rule that if A sue B and a question is decided in a suit between A as executor of an estate against B a previous decision made between A as an individual in his own right against B cannot be pleaded as res adjudicata against the suit brought by him in his representative capacity.

The parties must be the same; the question must be the same. How can you apply that to a case of a contest of the right of a Senator to a seat on this floor? Mr. KELLOGG presented his credentials; Mr. Spofford presented his credentials. It was not a case of litigation between A and B; it was a case of two persons claiming the same seat; but if they could be considered as litigant parties the one against the other, if you were to apply the rule of res adjudicata to this case, any citizen of Louisiana, not Mr. Spofford but any citizen of Louisiana, might come here and petition that Mr. KELLOGG be ousted from his seat, and upon the doctrine of res adjudicata, the parties then being different, the decision of the Senate would go for nothing at all. Is that the law of this body? No, sir; it is not the law of this body at all.

On the contrary, would we not say "if the right of a Senator to a seat in this body has been fully investigated and has been decided upon on a full investigation on the merits, we will never open that investigation, no matter who asks it?" You could not say that in a court of law; it would be sufficient that there were different parties before the court and that the case arose between different parties; but in this body would we not say it? In this body if the case has been fully and thoroughly investigated so that no good purpose of justice either to the State or to individuals could result from another investigation, would we turn to the doctrine of res adjudicata and say because some third person has come in here, of whom we never heard before, and has invoked our action in this case, therefore we will consider it as res nova and try it over and over again without reference to the decision we formerly made? No, sir, we would not listen for a moment to such an argument as that; and why not? Because the doctrine of res adjudicata does not apply. That is the reason.

Now, Mr. President, that being the case there are one or two other things on which I wish to observe——

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will he not, while on his feet, point out why the rule of res adjudicata does not apply?

Mr. THURMAN. I thought I was doing all that. I thought I was doing it to the entire satisfaction of my friend from Wisconsin, he looked so well pleased.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator has not yet satisfied me on that point.

Mr. THURMAN. I thought I had already shown that the doctrine of res adjudicata could not apply. The Senator certainly would not pretend that the doctrine that it must be between the same parties applies here, and that if this was like a contest in court, and Mr. Spofford and Mr. KELLOGG were to be considered the parties, the whole thing could be opened up whenever John Jones or Peter Smith came in and filed a petition. He would not do that, even if the whole Legislature of Louisiana were to ask an investigation; he would not say that the doctrine of res adjudicata must be applied to this case, and inasmuch as here are new parties who are contesting the right of the Senator, therefore the whole subject is open.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him if he understands that in court, even supposing that were to be taken as an analogy, questions of public right are governed by the law that he suggests? Is it not true that, as to questions of public right, where once a party has put the question in issue before the courts, the issue having been presented fairly, the judgment is regarded as final, and cannot be opened by other parties?

Mr. THURMAN. I have been arguing to very little purpose, it seems to me, to the apprehension of Senators if what I have said does not show that there are cases in which the doctrine of res adjudicata does not apply.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I understood him to say that the doctrine of res adjudicata, as applied in courts of justice, was not applicable here, for if it were, whenever a new party came in the case might be heard anew. Now, my question to the Senator is, whether in cases of public right the doctrine of res adjudicata as applied and enforced in courts of justice is not that whenever any one person interested in a question has put it in issue and it has been decided, the decision cannot be reopened again on the application of any other person in interest, so that the doctrine of res adjudicata as applied in courts would cover this case?

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will look into the cases to which he refers, he will find that they are all cases of this sort, or cases which stand upon the same principle: either cases in which there is a statute which provides for the proceedings, or cases in which the proceedings are according to the common law of England upon the relation of the attorney-general or at the instance of the Crown, as, for instance, where a man is inducted into an office and his election is to be contested, and when a statute provides the mode of contesting that election, that any citizen of the county may contest it, and prescribes the mode of contest by quo warranto, or the like. There, of course, that being the only proceeding authorized by the statute, that decision is final; the power is exhausted by the exercise of it. And so, too, when the attorney-general of England files an information to oust any man from an office, or a corporation from the exercise of its franchise, that, of course, is a conclusive decision, and that is an end of it.

But, Mr. President, it is not necessary for me to go into that. I do not propose to go into this argument. I say that this is a question which belongs to the Senate, and the Senate has it now brought up for the first time. I do not say this is the first time that it has been proposed to oust a Senator from the seat that he occupied here. And that leads me to remark that the mere swearing in of a Senator is not a res adjudicata that concludes all the world as to his right to a seat. Albert Gallatin was sworn into the Senate and sat for a good while, and was finally ousted. James Shields was sworn in as Senator from Illinois and sat for some time, but was finally ousted. John P. Stockton is another case. He was sworn in; and, if I were disposed to talk about motives, if I were disposed to talk about a necessity that then existed to turn Stockton out and put a republican in his place in order to get two-thirds of this Senate to override the vetoes of Andrew Johnson, I might impute motives to Senators too.

Now, Mr. President, I say here is a question that arises, I rather think for the first time, and the question is whether or not a case can be made upon which it would be the duty of the Senate to oust a Senator from his seat who had been seated. I am very frank to confess that my first impression is that we cannot do it by saying that the Senators who admitted him committed some error in law. I hardly think we sit as a court of errors coram nobis to decide whether the Senate did or did not commit some error in law. But that does not determine this thing at all. The question here is, may there not be facts which were not before the Senate then, may there not be facts brought to light which are newly discovered and which the use of due diligence could not have discovered then, which would make it our duty to retry this case? That is the question.

Is it to be said that while in every other tribunal a new trial may be had upon newly discovered testimony, in the Senate of the United States alone there can be no such new trial? If we are so to decide, let it be so; but it is certainly worthy of consideration. We ought to reflect upon it before we so decide, and so perhaps we ought to reflect upon another thing; we ought to reflect upon the question what is our power to reconsider a question of law. It may be that our first decision is final and not reversible at all, and if it is so let it be understood. I want to study that question, I want the benefit of the report of this committee upon it, I want to give it a fair and honest judgment.

Mr. CARPENTER. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Does the Senator think he will get any aid on a question of law by an examination of witnesses costing the Government an immense sum of money?

Mr. THURMAN. Not upon that question; and yet it may be, too. No, I will not say that. I take that answer back, for it may be that the testimony which will be given will show that in point of law, if the whole facts had been before the Senate, the decision would have been otherwise. That may be; but I am not going to prejudge anything about this case; I am willing to go slowly and carefully, and I want to go slowly and carefully; but I do say that the Senate has a right to have all the facts upon which we are invoked to render a decision, and that there is no such thing as a conclusive, arbitrary estoppel by matter of record, as the substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts supposes. That the Senate should hesitate a long time before it would oust a Senator from his seat who had been seated, even if the Senate thought that the previous decision was wrong, is certainly true; but that the Senate should say that under no conceivable circumstances whatever such a decision could be reversed is what I am not prepared to say; and upon that I want the aid of the able committee that sits upon this case. I want the aid of the investigations which they may make; I want the aid of the arguments that may be made upon both sides. I am not going to forestall the decision now or commit myself one way or another, and I certainly am not going to say that there is here by the mere record of this case that kind of conclusive, arbitrary estoppel that admits of nothing to be said on the other side.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to go on this evening?

Mr. CARPENTER. No, sir; I would rather adjourn if the Senate will.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, then, that the Senate——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire the session to go on to a later hour. There are measures to be before the Senate to-morrow that it will be insisted ought to be passed upon. I desire, therefore, that the discussion of this question may go on until we reach a vote to-night, if we can without sitting too late.

Mr. MORRILL. It is now half past four, or nearly that. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BURNSIDE in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Delaware will allow this motion to prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

A division was called for.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate adjourn. We may as well take the vote on that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 26, noes 26.

Mr. ALLISON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the question is put on the motion to adjourn, the Chair will lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections was read the first time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair laid before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives which was read by its title. As I infer from the title, the bill is of too great importance to the liberties of the people to be read more than once a day, I think it had better go over until to-morrow to be read again.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Does the Senator object to the reference of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to the second reading. It is a bill too pregnant with the liberties of the people to be read more than once a day.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We did not understand on this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objected to the second reading of the bill, and it cannot be referred without a second reading.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that the Senator does object, but we on this side of the Chamber did not understand what the Senator was saying.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my honorable friend understands it now.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand it very well now, but I hope my honorable friend the next time will talk a little louder so that we may understand him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, I wish to remind the Senate, and especially the Senator from Vermont, that although he did object to the second reading, he did not object, as he might have done, to the bill being laid before the Senate to-day at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is too late.

Mr. CONKLING. Under the rule it would have gone over to be laid before the Senate in the morning hour to-morrow, not in the dying hour of to-day's session.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn, upon which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOOTH, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] but a pair having been arranged between him and the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. Through an inadvertence I voted upon this question. I desire to state that I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] Therefore I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. ALLISON. I voted on this question, which seems to be political. I agreed to pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] on political questions. I therefore withdraw my vote. I desire also to state that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] My colleague [Mr. HEREFORD] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.]

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 26; as follows:

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, if my memory serves me, from the time the Committee on Privileges and Elections was raised in this body until the expiration of my term in the Senate I was a member of that committee. During those years we had many exciting contests before the committee and some warm scenes in the Senate, but so far as I recollect the minority of that committee never pressed to a hearing any measure reported by them so as to inconvenience any Senator who wished to discuss it. We always regarded the questions submitted to that committee as questions of law rather than of politics and considered them questions to be settled coolly and deliberately in accordance with fixed principles of law, and not according to the interests of party, and we never allowed the haste or heat of a campaign to precipitate our action. I hope we are not to infer from the present proceedings that questions touching the right of a Senator to his seat are no longer to be considered as legal questions.

During the last few days we have heard a good deal about the revolutionary character of certain proceedings determined upon by the majority of this body. I am not easily frightened and always enjoy a row; and during the late discussion upon the bill which the President vetoed I did not become at all alarmed because the majority proposed to ingraft general legislation upon an appropriation bill. I did not rend my garments nor allow my emotions to become at all excited, for I thought I knew enough of the democratic party to know that when it had played its game, made its boast, tried its endeavor, and should find that a veto had set it back upon its haunches, it had not only enough of good taste but of political prudence and policy to retire in good order and to go before the people saying that they had done what they could and had been overcome by the power of a republican President.

When it was first suggested to me that the majority were determined to besiege the seat of the Senator from Louisiana I laughed at the proposition. I was requested by some friends to examine the question and be ready to discuss it when the committee should make their report, but I could not believe that the democratic party as represented in this body would undertake a thing so utterly revolutionary and so entirely unparalleled in the history of partisan atrocity. I, therefore, determined to waste no time in preparing to discuss it, and have not devoted a minute to the subject, but to my astonishment this morning I heard my friend the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, declare the fact to be that the democrats were in earnest about this matter and this proposition would be pressed to a vote.

Well, we shall have a vote upon it and we shall see what we shall see. We shall see what the Senate will say to a proposition which outrages, as I shall attempt to show, every well-settled principle of law, of justice, of reason, and of parliamentary proceedings, and if it shall be done or if this body shall commit itself to the doing of it we shall then see what the people of this country think about a proposition which goes the length of declaring that every republican Senator in this Chamber holds his seat subject to the will of the democratic majority.

It is said that this resolution is a perfectly innocent experiment which may not do any good; but it can do no harm. "Let us pass it," they say, "and by voting for it we do not commit ourselves to the revolutionary doctrine that the Senate can enter upon the re-examination of a case finally decided on its merits in regard to the seat of a Senator."

I congratulate my democratic friends that now that this proceeding is beginning to look serious, when it really looks as though the democratic party did mean to pass this resolution, their eminent leader, my esteemed friend, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] has come to their rescue and has hedged for them as well as a great man can.

But let us see whether voting for this resolution does not commit us to the proposition that the Senate can reinvestigate and redecide this case. Suppose a resolution had been introduced here calling upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections to take testimony and to send for persons and papers to examine whether Governor McClellan was legally elected governor of New Jersey? I think our strict-construction democratic friends would be likely to suggest that we had no jurisdiction to inquire into the case and that it would be absurd to take testimony in a case that we had no jurisdiction to determine. And suppose some republican had said by way of soothing their fears, as my friend from Arkansas said yesterday, "Let us pass it with an amendment declaring that the resolution does not commit us to the proposition that we have any right either to pass the resolution or to decide the case:" would not such a proceeding have been laughed at by every Senator of this body? And yet what is the difference between that and the resolution before the Senate provided the former adjudication of the Senate in regard to the right of the Senator from Louisiana to his seat is a final and conclusive determination upon that question?

If the doctrine of res adjudicata applies here then the resolution directing the committee to take testimony upon the merits of the case is as absurd as it would be to direct the committee to take testimony touching the title of Governor McClellan to his office. If the Senate has the power to take this testimony and expend the public money for that purpose it must be because it has the jurisdiction to act upon it after it shall be taken and render the appropriate judgment upon the case as shown. Therefore I maintain that every Senator who today votes for this resolution commits himself to this monstrous doctrine,—and supported by the authorities of the law for three hundred years I do not hesitate to declare that it is monstrous and subversive of every legal principle, destructive of private right and revolutionary to an extent never before attempted in this Senate.

The Constitution declares that the Senate shall be the exclusive judge of the elections, qvalifications, and returns of its own members The word "judge" as we find in the Constitution, placed there hy those who framed that instrument in careful and well-guarded language, suggests that when the Senate is acting upon the title of a Senator to his seat it is acting as a court, acting judicially. And the doctrine of this resolution is that the Senate of the United States which is by the Constitution the sole judge of this question, the only tribunal that can determine it, can never settle it so as to put it at rest. Suppose this resolution shall pass, and suppose your committee shall take three thousand pages of testimony and report it to the Senate, and the Senate thereafter enters upon a careful examination of the testimony and that it should determine, as it did before, that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] was entitled to his seat and attempt to declare that determination in a form to be absolutely final and conclusive, I ask what language could it employ for that purpose, stronger than the language we find in the resolution which the Senate did pass after a full discussion of this case? The Senate then declared that Mr. KELLOGG was entitled to his seat upon the merits of the case and that Mr. Spofford was not entitled to a seat in this body. That resolution gave Mr. KELLOGG his seat not on a prima facie case, not because he came certified by the authorities of the State, but because the Senate had examined all the testimony touching the case, or all that it deemed material and pertinent to the question, and upon that testimony had determined that Mr. KELLOGG had the title to the seat and Mr. Spofford had no title thereto. And I understand that every charge now made by Mr. Spofford against Mr. KELLOGG with the single exception of the charge that he obtained his office by menace and bribery was made, considered and determined by the Senate and decided by passing the resolution declaring that Kellogg was entitled to his seat. And I submit that if that resolution does not settle and finally determine that question it is not in the power of this Senate ever to settle it finally and conclusively.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I simply wish to say that if he has information that the charge made by Mr. Spofford now was made then, it is exceedingly incorrect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the respects in which the charge is new?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The wording of the memorial specifically states that Mr. Spofford has not only discovered new testimony, but upon new points which were never presented.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does he state what the new testimony is?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, sir; but he states what he will prove by it. He states distinctly the charge never made before, that Mr. KELLOGG procured his election by bribery.

Mr. HOAR. That was before the committee on the original hearing.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That was before the committee.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I beg pardon; the only question before the committee formerly was the one which the then Senator from New Hampshire met with a great deal of adroitness and a great deal of force, as to which was the legal Legislature in Louisiana, whether the Packard legislature or the Nicholls legislature was the legal Legislature; and as one element to prove that the Packard legislature was not the legal Legislature, Spofford charged that certain members got their certificates fraudulently. That was the particular charge upon Mr. KELLOGG in the first case; but this charge, assuming the Packard legislature to be a Legislature, that KELLOGG got his election by bribery of the members, makes a proper point of proof that is not in the original charge.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will my colleague allow me a moment?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I did not intend to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin, but I simply state that he is putting the case upon incorrect information.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The charge that Mr. KELLOGG obtained his election by fraud and bribery was distinctly made by Spofford before the committee, and testimony is included in the various reports which were in evidence, upon that point. Just what Mr. KELLOGG did before the returning board was in evidence before the committee; but, in addition to that, perhaps my colleague has not observed that Spofford charges that KELLOGG obtained the office of governor by fraud and that he obtained it for the purpose of enabling him to have a General Assembly elected which would favor the election of him, KELLOGG, to the Senate. He goes back to that.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that the charge of the bribery by KELLOGG of the members of the Packard legislature was made in the former trial?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do distinctly say that.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I say you cannot show it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I say I can show it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I make that issue right now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin give way that I may make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CARPENTER. I cannot refuse anything to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER. I make that motion if the Senator will permit me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 21.

Mr. SAULSBURY. We had better have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate refuses to adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call has been renewed on the other side. Is there a second?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin who has the floor, that if we agree to fix some reasonable hour for taking the vote to-morrow I shall not insist on going on longer now. We shall have to end the controversy about a question of this kind at some time and I am willing to fix a reasonable hour to-morrow to take a vote, without requiring the Senator from Wisconsin to go on now.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am willing to travel along steadily toward that hour. I am good for a while yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All this debate is out of order pending a motion to adjourn, but if Senators wish to come to some understanding the colloquy can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to make a very short speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to make some observations. ["Go on."] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to the honorable Senator from Delaware as he himself I believe has stated, that this is a question of real importance, a question that ought not to divide us upon party lines, and a question important not merely for to-day but for all the future, in respect of the organization of this body. Therefore I submit to him with all earnestness whether it is right to force on a disposition of this matter to-day, or even to demand that a particular hour to-morrow shall be fixed for taking the vote. The Senator can see that nobody is talking against time, but it is only for the purpose of fair discussion in order to convince each other of whatever may be the ultimate truth about the matter. I suggest to him, therefore, to allow the Senator from Wisconsin to have until to-morrow to condense his remarks, as I suppose he will, and we shall come to a vote very early to-morrow unquestionably, and not to fix a definite hour to take the vote to-morrow. No Senator is talking against time, and I appeal to his good sense, considering that this is a matter of so great importance, whether that is not the fair thing to do.

My speech is done, Mr. President, with thanks.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I certainly do not desire to force the Senator from Wisconsin to speak at a late hour of the day, but I am informed that the Senator himself has said that he would as lief go on this evening as any other time. I certainly would not be discourteous to any member of the Senate who had the floor, but I am informed that the Senator from Wisconsin expressed himself as ready to proceed this evening as at any other time. He had the floor and was in the midst of his speech when he was interrupted by the Senator from Michigan with a motion to adjourn. If the desire to adjourn had come from the Senator from Wisconsin I should have yielded to his wish at once.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the Senator will yield a moment, I put that desire right at him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Very well; I will consent to an adjournment, but I would rather that we should fix an hour to-morrow at which the vote shall be taken. I certainly do not want the question whether the committee shall have the privilege of taking testimony to consume so much of the valuable time of the Senate, and I think we ought to-morrow at any rate at an early hour to reach a vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agree to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the demand for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that the demand will be withdrawn by general consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question recurs on the adoption of the substitute moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this resolution in order at the present time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the resolution had better be printed so as to give members an opportunity to see what is proposed.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to that course. I move that the resolution be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment and with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the presence of troops at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and the traditions of our people, and tends to destroy the freedom of elections: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful to bring to, or employ at, any place where a general or special election is being held in a State any part of the Army or Navy of the United States, unless such force be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to enforce section 4, article 4 of the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof upon the application of the Legislature or the executive of the State where such force is to be used; and so much of all laws as is inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed.

Mr. KNOTT. I have been informed by gentlemen representing the minority of the committee that it is desired to offer a substitute for the bill just reported. When that substitute has been offered, I propose that the previous question be immediately ordered upon the bill and substitute.

Mr. ROBESON. I offer, as a substitute, what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to further protect the freedom of elections.

Whereas the unnecessary presence of troops at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and the traditions of our people and would tend to destroy the freedom of elections; and

Whereas the presence of troops at the polls has heretofore been and may hereafter be necessary and proper for the suppression of illegal and powerful combinations of armed men in military array engaged in obstructing by force the due execution of the laws of the United States and in destroying the freedom and peace of elections; and

Whereas experience has shown that the existence of the Republic, the supremacy of its laws, and the liberties of its people can only be maintained against the military and other powerful combinations of their enemies by the exertion of the military power of the Government in subordination to the civil power in the support of the laws; and

Whereas the injunction of the Constitution that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed" is equally binding in respect to the laws relating to elections, the course of justice, and all other laws of the United States without distinction of days, places, or occasions: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful to bring to, or employ at, any place where a general or special election is being held in a State, any part of the Army or Navy of the United States, unless such employment be necessary to carry out the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, or to overcome forcible obstruction to the execution of laws made in pursuance thereof.

SEC. 2. Every person who violates the provisions of this act shall be subject to the penalties named in section 5528 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. KNOTT. I demand the previous question on the bill and the substitute.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to offer an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. KNOTT. That is contrary to the understanding. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will allow one other amendment which would be in order under the rules.

Mr. KNOTT. I have fulfilled the agreement.

Mr. CONGER. I know of no agreement by which members of the House are deprived of the right to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. Whether amendments shall be cut off depends upon the House. The gentleman having charge of the bill has merely the right, which the Chair recognizes, to demand the previous question. It is for the House to decide whether by ordering the previous question amendments shall be cut off. The Chair must be governed by the action of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Chair whether an amendment to the original bill would be in order under the rules.

The SPEAKER. It would be if the gentleman having charge of the bill had not demanded the previous question; and such an amendment will be in order if the House should vote down that demand.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. KNOTT.] I mentioned to him—he will perhaps remember it—that possibly it would be desired on this side to offer one amendment to the bill in addition to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The substitute is in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. LAPHAM. But it is desired to offer one amendment to the bill itself.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will allow this single amendment. I do not think there will be further amendment. Both would be in order under the rules, but further amendment would not be in order. It is in the proper degree and no more, and I hope the gentleman will allow that to be offered before he demands the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman refuse to permit this amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the previous question on the bill and substitute.

Mr. GARFIELD. But let the amendment be read for information.

Mr. CONGER. I shall resort to such means as we may to prevent it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with that. [Cries of "Order!"] The Chair must obey the rules.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 113, noes 65.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. ROBESON. The main question is on the bill and substitute?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question first recurred on Mr. ROBESON'S substitute.

Mr. ROBESON. To save time I will now ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 93, nays 120, not voting 72; as follows:

Mr. URNER. I am paired with my colleague from Maryland, Mr. TALBOTT. If he were present, I should vote "ay" and he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the passage of the bill, on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] demands the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Does the ordering of the previous question affect the vote on the passage of the bill? I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. It does not; but the gentleman from Kentucky renews the demand for the previous question on the passage of the bill, and is entitled to be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. CONGER. I had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan had not the floor. The gentleman from Kentucky demands the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I call for a division on that. I have the floor now for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan always gets the floor when he is entitled to it and in order.

The question being put on seconding the previous question, there were ayes 103, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the vote be taken by tellers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers and appoints the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] and the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 121, no 1.

Mr. CONGER, (one of the tellers.) No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to say that he desired to move to amend. His amendment would not now be in order.

Mr. CONGER. That is a question we can determine hereafter.

The SPEAKER. Should the Chair recognize the gentleman at this time to move an amendment it would not be in order at this stage of the proceedings upon the pending bill. The bill has been ordered to be engrossed and has been read the third time. After that no amendment is in order, and is admissible only by another proceeding under the rule.

Mr. CONGER. It is not our fault that gentlemen have placed themselves in this uncomfortable position.

Mr. COX. There is nobody uncomfortable on this side of the House.

Mr. KNOTT. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aldrich, N. W.	Crowley,	Jorgensen,	Phelps,
Atherton,	Davis, Joseph J.	Ketcham,	Price,
Bailey,	Dick,	Lapham,	Russell, Daniel L.
Baker,	Dwight,	Lay,	Sapp,
Ballou,	Einstein,	Loring,	Simonton,
Barber,	Errett,	McMahon,	Starin,
Barlow,	Finley,	Miles,	Talbott,
Beale,	Garfield,	Miller,	Thomas,
Belford,	Hammond, John	Money,	Townsend, Amos
Bland,	Hatch,	Morse,	Tucker,
Cabell,	Hazelton,	Muller,	Tyler,
Camp,	Henderson,	Nicholls,	Willits,
Clardy,	Hiscock,	O'Brien,	Wilson,
Clark, Alvah A.	Hull,	Osmer,	Wood, Walter A.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and thirty members have answered to their names; there is a quorum present.

Mr. KNOTT. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places, and the question will be again taken upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 122, noes none; no quorum voting.

Mr. McLANE. I move that the House now adjourn. There is no use in our remaining here to amuse gentlemen on the other side. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the following instructions——

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not in order to move to recommit this bill pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that Rule 124 covers this case.

Mr. COX. And besides, no quorum voted on the last vote.

The SPEAKER. Rule 124 will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After commitment and report thereof to the House, or at any time before its passage, a bill may be recommitted, but not after the main question is ordered to be put. Nor according to the practice even pending the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. There is now pending a demand for the previous question; and the motion to recommit is therefore not in order.

Mr. CONGER. That which has been read by direction of the Chair is in the Digest, and forms a note to Rule 124.

The SPEAKER. It is a decision which governs the Chair.

Mr. KNOTT. I move a call of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I will refer to Rule 124 now and read it:

After commitment and report thereof to the House, or at any time before its passage, a bill may be recommitted; and should such recommitment take place after its engrossment, and an amendment be reported and agreed to by the House, the question shall be again put on the engrossment of the bill.

Then there is a note to the rule which says:

According to the practice if the previous question on its passage be pending or ordered—

The previous question is not now pending, nor is it ordered. I therefore demand the right to make the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the demand of the gentleman. The note which is appended to the rule is a statement of the past action of the House which governs the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair state that the previous question is pending or ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] demands the previous question. That is pending, and it has been voted on.

Mr. CONGER. The demand is pending, but the previous question is not pending.

The SPEAKER. What is the distinction?

Mr. CONGER. The previous question has not been ordered, and it is not pending.

The SPEAKER. The House is now in process of dividing on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KNOTT. I renew my motion for a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was called; and the following-named members failed to answer:

Acklen,	Dick,	Ketcham,	Robertson,
Atherton,	Dwight,	Lapham,	Russell, Daniel L.
Bailey,	Einstein,	Lay,	Sapp,
Baker,	Errett,	Loring,	Simonton,
Ballou,	Finley,	McMahon,	Starin,
Barber,	Forsythe,	Miles,	Talbott,
Barlow,	Frost,	Miller,	Thomas,
Beale,	Hammond, John	Money,	Townsend, Amos
Bingham,	Hatch,	Morse,	Tucker,
Bland,	Hazelton,	Morton,	Washburn,
Butterworth,	Henderson,	Muller,	White,
Camp,	Hiscock,	Nicholls,	Willits,
Clardy,	Horr,	O'Brien,	Wilson.
Clark, Alvah A.	Hull,	Osmer,
Crowley,	James,	Phelps,
Davis, Joseph J.	Jorgensen,	Price,

The SPEAKER. By the roll-call it appears that 228 members—more than a quorum—are present.

Mr. KNOTT. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Michigan will resume their places as tellers.

Mr. CONGER. When I made my point of order that there was no quorum, I did so in order that I might get an opportunity to offer an amendment which I had hoped would be admitted. But that seems to be refused continuously by the other side; and so far as I am concerned, having shown strongly enough my desire to offer the amendment, and the opportunity having been refused, I leave the responsibility with gentlemen on the other side, and withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order that a quorum did not vote has been withdrawn, and the previous question will be regarded as seconded.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I ask permission to have my amendment printed in the RECORD.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to know who objects.

Mr. BRAGG. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. CONGER. Which gentleman from Wisconsin?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman standing in the aisle, Mr. BRAGG.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to identify that gentleman as distinctly as it is possible to do.

Mr. BRAGG. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not; but the Chair is always permissive in these cases.

Mr. BRAGG. To the gentleman from Michigan. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the passage of the bill.

Mr. McKENZIE and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 125, nays 90, not voting 70; as follows:

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 1343) to provide for certain expenses of the present session of Congress, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a joint resolution of the following title:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) authorizing the Public Printer to bind in cloth two volumes of Sailing Directions for the United States Hydrographic Office.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business coming over is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures with amendments.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire at this time to call up a privileged question which was laid over some time ago, subject to my call. I have delayed from time to time, to accommodate other gentlemen, and I desire now to call up the question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to reserve whatever points of order were reserved before.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CHALMERS. I hope that the gentleman from Tennessee will not insist on that motion.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not make the motion to adjourn from any disrespect to my friend from Mississippi; but I will say that I am opposed to that investigation, for I do not think there is anything to investigate.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to hear my statement first.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is bound to recognize the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not insist on the motion, as I do not wish the gentleman from Mississippi to consider that I am discourteous to him. But as I have said, so far as I am concerned I am opposed to the investigation. I do not think the gentleman needs to have the investigation. I do not think his reputation is dependent on it at all. I do not think it will do any good either to him or the country.

Mr. GIBSON. I concur entirely with the gentleman from Tennessee; and I reserve all points of order.

Mr. WHITE. I am heartily opposed to this investigation, and will feel it my duty to resist it to the utmost as establishing a dangerous precedent. I think the House should now adjourn, and as the gentleman from Tennessee has withdrawn the motion to adjourn I renew it.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF EIGHTH AND NINTH CENSUSES.

Pending the announcement of the vote,

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, asking an appropriation to defray certain expenses of the eighth and ninth censuses; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HENRY, for eight days, on account of important business;

To Mr. PIERCE, for ten days, on account of important business;

To Mr. VAN AERNAM, to and including Thursday of next week; and

To Mr. BRAGG, for two weeks, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Abraham Alstead; there being no adverse report thereon.

PRINTING OF REPORT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] asks unanimous consent to have printed for the use of the House report of Committee of Claims, Forty-fifth Congress, accompanying House bill No. 5078, relating to the claim of the States of Virginia and Maryland for money advanced for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the seat of Government.

Mr. WHITE. I object.

LAWS OF MONTANA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House laws, resolutions, and memorials of the Territory of Montana passed at the eleventh regular session of the Legislative Assembly held at Helena, the seat of government of the said Territory, commencing January 13, A. D. 1879, and ending February 21, A. D. 1879, to which are prefixed the sections of the Revised Statutes and subsequent acts of Congress relating to government in the Territory of Montana. They will be laid upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. I think they should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. They are sent here in obedience to the law organizing the Territory. They come into possession of the House, go upon the table, and then into the House Library.

Mr. CONGER. Those laws, by the law of the United States, are subject to be revised by Congress, and I think should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no objection to that. They will be so referred.

J. C. JENKS.

Mr. McCOOK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1837) for the relief of J. C. Jenks, of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

MANUFACTURE OF STILLS.

Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1838) to amend section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to the manufacture of stills; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was then announced; and accordingly (at three o'clock and seventeen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By the SPEAKER: Memorial of the centennial board of finance, for the passage of an act closing its affairs and dissolving said corporation—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 7, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to hear that part of the Journal read again relating to the point of order raised yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WITHERS in the chair) announced that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. HOUSTON raised a question of order that, as the resolution was a privileged question, it must be proceeded with without motion and to the exclusion of other business.

Mr. HOUSTON having proceeded to read a decision of the Vice-President made November 29, 1877,

Mr. CONKLING raised a question of order that the Chair having submitted no question of order to the Senate and there having been no ruling from which an appeal had been taken, under the fortieth rule Mr. HOUSTON was not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WITHERS in the chair) overruled the question of order raised by Mr. CONKLING, and decided that Mr. HOUSTON was proceeding in order.

From the decision of the Chair Mr. CARPENTER appealed to the Senate, and on the question, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

On motion, by Mr. HILL, of Georgia,

That the appeal lie upon the table,

It was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. HOUSTON. How did we proceed then? What was the next point?

The Chief Clerk continued to read from the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, as follows:

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 23.

* * * * * * *

So the appeal was laid on the table.

Mr. HOUSTON withdrew his point of order; and

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WITHERS in the chair) announced that there being neither unfinished business nor special order on the Calendar, under the thirteenth rule the Senate would proceed with the consideration of the resolution.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of Squire Moon, first lieutenant Company G, Second Regiment United States Dragoons, praying for the passage of a law granting him a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

UNITED STATES SHIP ALARM.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 67) providing for a new propeller for the United States ship Alarm, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. There is urgent necessity for the immediate passage of this bill. The ship Alarm was built at an expense of a quarter of a million of dollars, and is entirely useless on account of the inefficiency of the propeller. The season has arrived now for experiments, and if the bill is not passed presently the season will go by and we shall lose a year. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can you not wait until to-morrow?

Mr. ANTHONY. I may not be able to get it up then.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $20,000 to enable the Secretary of the Navy to fit a new propeller to the United States torpedo-boat Alarm and to conduct experiments as to the best mode of propelling and steering the vessel.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am authorized by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 286) to amend sections 1417, 1418, 1419, 1420, and 1624 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the Navy, to report it without amendment. The effect of it is to enable the Secretary of the Navy to increase the number of apprentices in the naval service annually. The bill has passed the House without objection, and I think every Senator who is acquainted with the subject will say that it is a very meritorious and necessary measure. It has been recommended highly by the Secretary of the Navy, and I am authorized to state that it will not involve any additional expenditure of public money. It authorizes an annual enlistment of seven hundred and fifty boys. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WITHERS. I would rather the bill should go over. I dislike to object to it, but it is a long bill, involving many changes in existing laws, and I should like to know more about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being objected to will go on the Calendar.

ASSISTANTS IN THE LIBRARY.

Mr. VOORHEES. At a meeting of the joint committee of the two Houses of Congress on the Library, this morning, I was unanimously instructed to report a bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three additional assistants in the Library of Congress was read the first time by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be reported for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read the second time in full.

The bill was read the second time, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Librarian of Congress be authorized to employ three additional assistants at a yearly compensation of $1,200 each; and the sum necessary is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not object to the bill, but I should like to know the necessity for it. It proposes to increase the force of the Senate, as I understand it. I dislike to have that done.

Mr. WALLACE. It increases the force in the Library.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Well, it is the same thing. It comes under the expenses of the Senate, as I understand.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will explain to my friend.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not yet before the Senate. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. For the present I will not object, but I should like to hear an explanation of it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will state to the Senator from West Virginia, with the permission of the Senate, that at a meeting this morning of both Committees on the Library a statement was made to the joint committee by the Librarian, Mr. Spofford, of such a character relating to the condition and the inadequacy of his force that the committee unanimously instructed me to report this bill and ask for its present consideration. Surely the Senator from West Virginia will be satisfied when I inform him that the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is a member of that committee, consented to its consideration at this time. I would state that so strong was the case made by the Librarian that it called, as we thought, for immediate action.

Of course, the Senator from West Virginia does not expect me to go into the details that were laid before us in such a strong manner by the Librarian. I am not prepared to do so; but upon his statement, made to us in writing, we thought it proper and right for the preservation of the property of the Government that he should have this increased force under him and at once without delay. I trust that will be satisfactory.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will then be considered as before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senate a few days ago instructed a committee to examine and report generally on the employés engaged on the part of the Senate, and the subject is under investigation by that committee. I thought when I heard the bill read that it was hardly necessary and hardly proper to increase the force by three or four persons in a particular division without some very special cause for it. The committee that has had the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill under consideration has heard nothing of an increased force being desired in the Library, and I thought it strange that when a bill now pending before the Senate which provides for that force and all other forces of the kind nothing whatever had been said about the necessity of an increased force in the Library. The Joint Committee on the Library, I understand from my friend from Indiana, has acted upon this measure and thinks there is an immediate necessity for it.

I, of course, shall not object to the passage of the bill; but I believe now as I have previously thought that it would be better to wait and go slowly before we increase the force about the Capitol. It has been said recently and for years back that the force was annually being increased. I think I am justified in stating that there is double the force now engaged about the Capitol than there was in 1860, and perhaps one-third more than there was in 1870. I think we should go slowly, very slowly indeed, in making changes, especially where they propose an increase of the force by three or four persons in a single room in the building.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, these are not Senate employés. They are employed by the authority of Congress, both branches of Congress participating in their authorization. I agree with the Senator from West Virginia that we ought to go slowly about increasing the expenses of the Government; but it is due that I should say that the present Librarian of Congress has managed the largest library in the United States with a force not more than one-fourth as large as is employed in other libraries in the United States of a less number of volumes. His economy has been extraordinary. He has managed this Library of nearly four hundred thousand volumes with only eighteen men—with only fifteen up to a short time ago—whereas in the case of the Boston and other libraries of magnitude, but not of equal magnitude to the Congressional Library, there has been a force of from seventy-five to one hundred men in their management. Instead of there being any danger of extravagance under our present Librarian, if I were disposed to chide him at all, (which I am not, for he is a most competent and excellent officer in every respect,) it would be for too much economy, and for not having asked for a sufficient force, not merely to keep the Library in proper shape, but to relieve those who are there employed from overwork. I am satisfied that this bill is in the interest of real genuine economy and of the public service, and I hope that it may be passed at once.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Indiana, though I did not happen to be present at the exact moment when he asked for the present consideration of the bill, which I think as a rule is a very bad plan. But on looking into the law a little further, I will suggest to the Senator from Indiana that I think perhaps it may be well to let the bill lie over until to-morrow so that we can make a little comparison with the provisions of this bill and those that are already incorporated by the House in the legislative bill. It might possibly produce a little confusion; and I think if he is willing that we can take it up to-morrow and dispose of it; there is time enough.

Mr. VOORHEES. In accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont I shall take that course, and let the bill lie over until to-morrow and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, printed, and go over until to-morrow.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I rise to a privileged question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York rises to a privileged question which he will please state.

Mr. CONKLING. My purpose is to call attention to an inaccuracy in the Journal. I do it because of the custom of Senators to read from the Journal in past times and treat entries in the Journals as precedents to govern the body accordingly or somewhat accordingly. The Journal, I observe, recites that—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WITHERS in the chair) announced that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. HOUSTON raised a question of order that, as the resolution was a privileged question, it must be proceeded with without motion and to the exclusion of other business.

Mr. HOUSTON having proceeded to read a decision of the Vice-President made November 29, 1877,

Mr. CONKLING raised a question of order that the Chair having submitted no question of order to the Senate, and there having been no ruling from which an appeal had been taken, under the fortieth rule Mr. HOUSTON was not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WITHERS in the chair) overruled the question of order raised by Mr. CONKLING, and decided that Mr. HOUSTON was proceeding in order.

From the decision of the Chair Mr. CARPENTER appealed to the Senate, and on the question, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate,

On motion by Mr. HILL, of Georgia,

That the appeal lie upon the table,

It was determined in the affirmative—

Giving the vote by which that determination was made.

I read from the RECORD to test, as far as the RECORD does test, the accuracy of that narrative:

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WITHERS.) The Chair calls attention to the fact that the morning hour has expired. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. SAULSBURY. This is a privileged question, and I suppose will continue.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I suppose it is in the power of the majority of the Senate to lay aside the pending business and take up this resolution. I do not suppose it would be probably according to the inclination of any member of the minority to oppose that proposition—

That is, a motion to take it up or continue it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the Chair understands to be the proposition of the chairman of the committee.

Passing on a little further:

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the Vice President in this very case ruled that it having come up in the morning hour it was not privileged as against the ordinary business of the Senate, and that yesterday the President pro tempore of the Senate announced that he should feel himself constrained in regard to this case to follow the precedents of the Senate and make the same ruling.

Passing on a little further:

Mr. HOUSTON—

And this is the first time that the Senator from Alabama appears from this record to have addressed the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I will read a very few lines showing the decision of the Vice-President on the very point before the Senate.

* * * * * * *

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is the decision on the point made by the Senator from Massachusetts upon which the Senator from Alabama proposes to read the decision referred to by the Senator.

The Presiding Officer again says:

The Chair understood that the Senator from Massachusetts did object, and stated the reason for his objection. The Senator from Alabama then proposed to read the decision referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts in support of the objection raised; and the Chair rules that the Senator from Alabama is entitled to the floor for that purpose.

That is, to argue the point of order which had been raised by the Senator from Massachusetts. Thereupon the Senator from Alabama proceeded to read and concluded his reading, and having concluded it, was entering upon an argument of his own upon the validity of this point of order, whereupon this record says:

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. The Senator from Alabama insists that he is proceeding upon a point of order. I demand the reading of Rule 40. I think we had better preserve some show of system in our proceedings here.

Thereupon Rule 40 was read, which declares that a point of order shall be decided without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Now my point of order is that the Chair having submitted no question of order to the Senate, and there having been no ruling from which an appeal has been taken, the Senator from Alabama is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules against the point of order raised by the Senator from New York.

My purpose is, Mr. President, fully appreciating the entire want of value practically now in what occurred yesterday so far as regards the pending proceedings, to make on the record an entry which will prevent the future students of the precedents of the Senate from supposing that any such proceeding took place as is here set down in the Journal.

I made no point of order that the Senator from Alabama had not a right to state any point of order which he chose to advance. I did not object to his reading (although I might have done so) a ruling made by a former occupant of the chair. On the contrary, the whole point of my objection was that the Senator from Alabama, in the absence of an appeal, no question being submitted to the Senate, had no right to argue a pending point of order which had been submitted by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

I suppose that I sufficiently accomplish my purpose, which is to guard as far as I may guard, against the misreading of this precedent in the future, without making any formal motion to correct the Journal; and unless some other Senator deems it important I will not submit that motion, but will content myself with such caveat as I have been able to file in the RECORD against the verity of the entry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WHYTE. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 125) to appoint Spruille Braden an ensign in the United States Navy, to report it favorably. There is no written report accompanying the bill, but the committee, having reported it at the last session of Congress with a written report, rely upon the report as made by the Committee on Naval Affairs at the last session of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MCMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 566) to restore to certain scouts and soldiers of the United States Army of the Sioux Nation of Indians the money and annuities belonging to them, confiscated and forfeited to the United States under an act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of depredation and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians, approved February 16, 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ROLLINS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 567) for the relief of William S. Mackay; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 568) to provide for the purchase of two hundred acres of land in the State of Florida and to establish thereon an experimental farm for the cultivation and improvement of plants adapted to the climate of that part of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 569) to provide for the purchase of suitable sites and the erection thereon of public buildings and the improvement and repairs of the buildings now belonging to the United States in the cities of Jacksonville, Pensacola, and Key West, in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 570) to repeal a portion of sections 5 and 6 of an act in relation to pensions, approved March 9, 1878; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That the papers filed with the application of Charles W. Rogers for relief be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the Deposits Savings Association of Mobile, Alabama, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

OCCUPATION OF THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for the present consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with public interest, to report to the Senate what information he has in reference to an alleged occupation of a portion of the Indian Territory by white settlers, and what action has been taken to prevent the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution. The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest that the word "report," where it occurs in the application to the President, should be changed to "communicate" which is the usual phrase and is a little more in style.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified if there be no objection.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

ADMENDMENTS TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask leave to submit an amendment which I shall at the proper time propose to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that perhaps his amendment ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations. There is a rule which requires that course to be taken.

Mr. PENDLETON. The bill has been already reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not make any difference under the rule, which says all amendments are to be referred. I merely make the suggestion in a friendly spirit.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly, and in that spirit I accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States; which was referred to the select committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE AT ELECTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no more "concurrent or other resolutions" the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. EATON. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections be taken up for its second reading. The bill was received yesterday from the House and read the first time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Senator from Connecticut moves to postpone that resolution for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 1382.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will suggest, with great respect to the Chair, that inasmuch as it is not yet one o'clock the unfinished business is not yet before the Senate, except as we usually treat it to be one o'clock for the purpose of convenience when Senators are ready to go on. Therefore I think the honorable Senator from Connecticut is entitled to make the motion that he does make, without displacing the unfinished business before one o'clock, to take the House bill that he refers to from the table for its second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question, then, in that way, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill without displacing anything. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill will be read the second time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question is, shall it be read the second time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the bill will be considered as read the second time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in full. The second reading of the bill.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has become of that most important part of the bill, the preamble? I want to hear that. Has not the bill a preamble? We ought to have the preamble by all means.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The preamble will be read.

The Secretary read the preamble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read twice is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which I believe is familiar with that subject.

Mr. EATON. If the Senator from Vermont will withdraw the motion, as I was about to make one, having taken charge of the bill, I should be obliged to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not understand the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EATON. I say that as I called the bill up and was about to make another motion regarding its disposition, I should be obliged to the Senator from Vermont if he would withdraw the motion for reference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly inform me what his motion is?

Mr. EATON. I will. I propose that the bill lie on the table; that is all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it ought to be referred, Mr. President.

Mr. EATON. Very well; I object to its reference. Let us have a vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is the Senate ready for the question? [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the noes have it.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the ayes on the yea-and-nay list.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARPENTER, (when his name was called.) On this bill and to-day I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] who is detained at his rooms by sickness. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. EDMUNDS. How would he vote?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not know how he would vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD,] both being absent; that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR;] and that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] and myself are paired.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FARLEY. I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] upon political questions, which I suppose will prevent my voting on the matter now under consideration. If he were here, I should vote "nay." As he is not here, I decline to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,
Anthony,	Chandler,	Hoar,	Platt,
Bell,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

So the motion to refer was not agreed to.

Mr. EATON. I move that the bill lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no other morning business the morning hour is at an end, and the unfinished business is the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections relative to the seat of the Senator from Louisiana, upon which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Before the Senator from Wisconsin proceeds I should like, by his permission, to get a fact right which was in issue yesterday between myself and other Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It is important to the Senator's argument that it should be set right. Yesterday the following occurred:

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that the charge of the bribery by Kellogg of the members of the Packard legislature was made in the former trial?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do distinctly say that.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I say you cannot show it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I say I can show it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I make that issue right now.

Mr. President, I have examined the proceedings before the committee and the Senate as far as I could and certainly all the charges, and I have been able to find no such charge as the charge of bribery by Mr. KELLOGG of the members of the Packard legislature in the former trial; and while it is not necessary to take upon myself the proof of a negative as there is no such charge in the proceedings, I will now furnish the proof of a negative. When this case was before the committee at this session, the other day, Mr. Spofford, in his statement before the committee, used the following language:

Where in the whole course of the former discussion, in the whole course of the former hearing, was any charge made at all approaching to that made in this petition, that only by reason of bought votes, bought by the personal interposition of the sitting member himself, did he get any pretended election at all to the Senate? Where was that ever passed upon anywhere? Where was it ever alleged before I filed this petition here the other day, or rather before the petition was offered in the Senate by Mr. JONAS, Senator from Louisiana, and referred by the Senate to this committee? The petition alleges votes enough bought by his personal interposition to give him the seat, but for which he would not have the seat to-day. Is that barred by the plea of res adjudicata because I contested his seat upon the ground that my legislature was the legal legislature, and his pretended legislature was not the legal legislature? The onus of proof is upon him, according to the authority I have just read, to show that every precise point in dispute made by this petition has been weighed, considered, passed upon, and adjudged by the Senate of the United States heretofore. And he answers my motion for authority to take testimony by this plea of res adjudicata to such a petition as that!

Again Mr. Spofford said in the presence of the committee:

Still this petition is made by me, not only in my character as a member-elect holding credentials to a seat in the Senate, but it is made in my separate character as a citizen of Louisiana; and one citizen of Louisiana has as much power as all the citizens of Louisiana, or as the Legislature of Louisiana itself, to come in before the Senate and say, "here is a man representing my State sitting in your body who has no right to sit there; because, without having bought the number of votes he did buy, the unbought votes would not have seated him; therefore he does not sit here supported by a legal quorum of uninfluenced, free votes which he must have in order to sit." It is a question that has never been raised before in any proceeding whatever; but I have raised it here.

Now I state distinctly that the charge of bribery by Kellogg of the members of the Packard legislature was never raised at all, either before the committee or before this body, and was never passed upon by either until the present petition was filed before the committee.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. Does the Senator concede that it might have been raised by Mr. Spofford at that time?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not think it would have been proper or ought to have been raised, because the issue was different; and I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin why.

Mr. CARPENTER. Do I understand the Senator to say that it would not have been competent, when the very question was whether Mr. KELLOGG should be seated or not, to show that he had obtained his election by bribery?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will state why the question could not have been raised. Ordinarily it could; but in that case, when the credentials had been referred, the only contest between Kellogg and Spofford was as to which was the Legislature of Louisiana. They each claimed an election by a different body of men, each body claiming to be the true Legislature. It was out of place for Mr. Spofford to charge that Mr. KELLOGG had bribed the members of a body which he said was not the Legislature. You could not bribe a man who was not a member. Now, however, you have assumed by your previous decision that this was the Legislature; and "Now, if you insist that it was the Legislature," he says, "then I charge that being the Legislature it was bribed." That is the difference; that is why the point was not made before, and I say I do not think that therefore it is concluded, because it cannot be said, in the ordinary legal sense of the rule to which I know the Senator refers, that it could have been properly made in the then state of the proceedings. It would have been irrelevant.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, when this matter came up yesterday afternoon my recollection was that there was a good deal said before the committee two years ago in regard to this charge of bribery and corruption. I found that the Senator from Minnesota who sits on my left [Mr. MCMILLAN] had the same recollection in regard to what was said and done before the committee at that time. Since yesterday I have not had access to the journal of the committee. I will examine it, and if I find that the Senator from Georgia is correct, I will take early occasion to state that to the Senate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to another statement. Here is what Mr. KELLOGG said himself after he had heard the statement of Mr. Spofford to which I have referred. Mr. KELLOGG, before the committee, said:

So far as that is concerned, the case was closed; it was disposed of. All these points, as I insist, were covered by the evidence. Now he comes up and asks upon cumulative evidence or for other reasons, as he has alleged, that the case be re-opened—for what purpose? To take evidence upon the point (assuming mine to have been a legal Legislature) that I was guilty of bribery—another question entirely.

He admits that it is another question. "Now," he says, "you come up and, having settled that mine was the legal Legislature, charge that I was guilty of bribery of my Legislature; that is another point entirely." That is conclusive that this point never was before the Senate, never was before the committee, never was charged or considered, no evidence was ever taken upon it, and we say that it must be considered.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I will state that I said that was another point entirely differing from the five points made by Mr. Spofford in his memorial. I was dwelling upon the five points and had asserted that those five points were covered by the evidence, point by point, amply and fully, as I say now, and as the record will show. Then I say, assuming this to be true, he comes here upon still another point. And upon that point I ought to say, in support of the statement of my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] that there was evidence full and complete regarding the question of bribery in the journals of the Packard legislature, which, by express stipulation between Mr. Spofford and myself, were made a part of the record and evidence in the case and were before the committee and considered by them.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Of course there was evidence before the committee before, as assumed by them, upon all the points made in the record of the former hearing, which we deny; but all the points made on the record then went to the validity of the Packard legislature. Now, as the gentleman correctly says—in that we concur—assuming that Legislature to be the legitimate Legislature, a new and entirely different point is made that he bribed that Legislature. That is the point, and all I have to say is that it is a new point and the record shows it is a new point. I say here to the Senator from Wisconsin that there is not one particle of evidence or charge in the former proceedings anywhere that Mr. KELLOGG bribed the Packard legislature upon the assumption that it was a Legislature.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I endeavored yesterday to show that the passage of this resolution would commit the Senate to the doctrine that it could reinvestigate and redetermine the right of Mr. KELLOGG to his seat, because no Senator could vote an investigation to be conducted at the expense of the Treasury of the United States concerning a matter over which the Senate had no jurisdiction. Therefore if it can be shown that the Senate has no power to retry this case, then this resolution should be defeated. I also maintained that if the Senate could now unseat Mr. KELLOGG it was impossible for it to make a decision which should be final and conclusive upon the subject; that if you should retry the case and come to the same conclusion as before and express your determination in the most apt and appropriate language, it would still be in the power of the Senate the next week or session or five years afterward to reopen the case and enter upon another trial, or if upon such examination you should come to the conclusion that Kellogg was not entitled to his seat, he might come back the next day and ask you to reconsider the question and it would still be in your power to do so. In other words this absurd result follows: the Senate which under the Constitution has the right to settle this question never could settle it. It requires no argument to show, because it is apparent, that such a doctrine would Mexicanize this Senate at once. There is not a seat held here that could not be taken away upon such a principle, and I undertake to say that Mr. KELLOGG has a clearer and a stronger title to his seat to-day than any one in this body. The Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and myself were seated here upon a mere prima facie showing of our right, without question, without examination, without determination, beyond what is involved in the acquiescence of the Senate in our being sworn in as Senators. I do not propose to discuss here and now whether or not the Senate after the expiration and adjournment of the session at which we were admitted to seats on a prima facie case could enter into an investigation and unseat us. My impression is that it could not. But it is unnecessary to consider this question now, because the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] was not so seated but was seated after a full hearing and a determination of his title upon the merits of his case.

It is my purpose to-day, regarding this as a mere legal question, to make my remarks as little of a speech and as much of an argument as possible. Upon this question we ought not to invoke partisan feeling or prejudice. This is a question outside of mere party politics and should be determined without regard to the interests of any party. The question is, whether, when the Senate of the United States has examined a case and passed its judgment, sitting under the Constitution as a court for that purpose and exercising judicial authority, that settles the question, or whether a subsequent Senate composed of different members and with a changed political majority can re-enter upon the examination of that case and decide it anew. It would hardly be claimed, I presume, that if the Senate sitting as a court to try an impeachment had either acquitted or convicted the respondent it could at a subsequent session retry the case and either reverse or affirm its judgment. And yet the Senate to-day, touching this question, is exercising judicial power as completely as it would be in the trial of a case of an impeachment.

What are the facts in this case? I do not care to descend into the details of facts about which there is some disagreement among Senators. I do not care who is right in that dispute. The controlling facts of this case, however, are apparent and conceded. Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. Spofford were both claiming a seat in this body from the State of Louisiana. The Senate referred their credentials to a committee for the purpose of having an examination and report upon the facts of the case to aid the Senate in determining the question in dispute between these rival claimants. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] claims that nothing was involved in that determination by the Senate except the question which was the rightful Legislature of the State, because, he says, that was the great question in dispute between the claimants. But it is manifest that such proceedings in this body cannot be conducted like an ordinary action as to matters of practice. It is not possible to make up an issue and try it outside the merits of the case as you can in an action of law, make an issue of fact upon a plea of abatement which might be tried by a jury and after that the case might come to issue and trial upon the merits. I submit to that learned Senator that no such proceeding is known to the Senate in determining the right of a claimant to a seat, and in the nature of things no such practice could be indulged in.

We have no rules authorizing special pleading in such cases nor contemplating the singling out of one issue to be tried and disposed of by the Senate before a final determination of the case. If such had been the understanding the committee, instead of reporting that Kellogg was entitled to his seat, would simply have reported which was in their opinion the rightful Legislature of the State, after which the Senate would simply have approved or rejected their report, leaving the case otherwise undisposed of. But the committee according to all the precedents passed upon the whole case and reported that Kellogg was entitled to his seat on the merits of the case.

The only question before the Senate from the first day when these rival claimants presented their claims to the Senate to the day of its final determination was, whether Kellogg or Spofford was entitled to the seat. It was admitted that if Kellogg was not elected and entitled to the seat then Spofford was, so that the question first to be considered was whether or not Kellogg had been duly elected. If he had been then there was no vacancy at the time Spofford was elected and his election was void. In considering the question whether Kellogg was entitled to his seat or not every fact or circumstance tending to show that he was not duly elected was a material and pertinent fact in that inquiry.

Does any one suppose that if a Senator had risen in his place during the debate on that subject and stated that he had testimony showing that Mr. KELLOGG had been guilty of bribery or other unlawful or corrupt means to obtain his election any republican Senator would have declared that that was an immaterial or irrelevant fact? Suppose the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] while this debate was progressing and when the question before the Senate was whether Kellogg was entitled to his seat, had risen and stated that he had evidence to prove that Kellogg had obtained his election by bribery, does any one suppose that it would have been claimed that such evidence was irrelevant and immaterial and must be made the subject of a subsequent issue to be tried independent of the question then before the Senate? I submit to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] that to claim any such thing is trifling with this question. The question then was whether Kellogg was entitled to his seat and beyond all doubt or question any fact or circumstance tending to show that he had obtained his election by bribery or corruption was a material and pertinent circumstance in the case then under consideration. And if any such testimony existed, if any such fact existed, that was the time to present it and I shall endeavor to show that if Mr. Spofford then omitted to establish such material and pertinent fact and allowed the Senate to make a final decision upon the merits of the case seating Mr. KELLOGG, he waived all right to prove it and the judgment of the Senate is as conclusive as though the testimony upon that point had been considered and passed upon by the Senate in the determination of that case.

There is in the memorial now before the Senate but one statement or fact not urged against Mr. KELLOGG in the former trial, that is that he obtained his election by menace and bribery. But if I am right in supposing that that question might have been submitted to the Senate in the former trial and that it was material and pertinent to the question before the Senate, then the Senate's decision is as conclusive upon this point as upon any question actually examined and considered by the Senate. Now what are the facts? I understand that the parties, Kellogg and Spofford, before the committee in the former trial, stipulated that the journals of the Nicholls legislature and the newspaper reports of the journals of the Packard legislature might be read as evidence before the committee. The journal of the Packard legislature shows that the charge of bribery was made against Kellogg in that legislature and that on the 16th of January, 1877, a committee was raised to investigate the matter, which made its report exonorating Kellogg on the 27th of January, 1877.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I should like to inquire of the Senator where does he get evidence that such a charge was made and investigation had?

Mr. CARPENTER. I will state frankly to the Senator that I get that at second-hand. My colleague tells me that is the fact. Mr. KELLOGG says it is the fact. I have not examined that journal, but I understand the fact to be as I have stated.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have the journal here.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have never seen the journal; I do not know what is in it; but I never heard of such a statement until it was made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] at the last meeting of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It never was referred to before.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have in my hand the stipulation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have the journal.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I understand this Packard legislature never did anything in the world but elect Kellogg to the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my colleague read the journal and have that question of fact settled?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask the Senator what journal he reads from—whether he does not read from a newspaper?

Mr. CARPENTER. I have the stipulation here that that may be done.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I read from the New Orleans Republican. The contestants agreed that this paper was the journal of the Packard legislature.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Who agreed to that?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The contestants and the committee.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I want to see that agreement. I never heard of such an agreement.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have the agreement here. Let me read it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think the law had been changed so that a separate journal was not required at that time to be kept.

Mr. KELLOGG. The New Orleans Republican was the official journal by the then existing law of the State and on page 61 of the committee's record will be found the agreement signed by Mr. Spofford that this journal should be considered as evidence.

Mr. CARPENTER. I read from the stipulation:

> Of course the journals and acts of assembly of the Nicholls legislature, as printed in volumes, by authority, can be referred to; and the undersigned, in return, agrees that the newspaper reports of journals of the Packard legislature may be referred to by either party.

This is signed "H. M. Spofford."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Simply "can be referred to," not agreed that they were correct. I will state this, that the truth as we understood it was that the Packard legislature had no journal; it had no official record; it had no existence except to elect Kellogg, it had published no laws, it had no published journals. We simply agreed that they should refer to the newspapers as the only evidence in the world that such a thing had ever existed.

Mr. CARPENTER. I want to ask the learned Senator from Georgia what benefit it was to us to refer to these newspaper reports if they were not to be used as evidence? Did the contestant mean for our personal satisfaction or did he mean that it was evidence in the case?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator will allow me. If the Senator will examine the proceedings had before the committee and the discussion there, he will see that the same language was used in reference to the Morrison, the Field, the Howe, and the Sherman reports, and it was agreed that they should be considered in the same category and regarded as evidence. The question arose in the discussion, shall they be considered as evidence, and I think the Senator from Georgia said "it is so understood."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say to the Senator the difference is just this, that in regard to the Morrison, the Field, the Sherman, and the Howe reports the agreement was that they should be referred to and considered as evidence as far as pertinent. There the condition is that they shall be considered as evidence as far as pertinent to avoid the necessity of taking the testimony over again, but you cannot find any agreement ever made by that committee or before that committee, according to my recollection, to which we ever assented that a newspaper report of a legislative journal was correct. You might refer to it for any legal purpose you could imagine it was said; and as my friend from Wisconsin says for satisfaction, if there is any satisfaction in it.

Mr. CONKLING. Merely to amuse and divert the committee?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. There was a good deal of amusement and diversion before the committee, and there is a good deal of amusement and diversion here. But I say that I never heard of that examination before the Packard legislature until a few days ago. It never was referred to before us; and, of course, as there was no evidence that the Packard legislature had an existence except that it was in the newspaper, we agreed you might refer to it; but I do not think we ever agreed that that which was in the newspaper was true, was correct. If so, I should like to have that evidence.

Mr. KELLOGG. In this same stipulation that I read from, signed by Mr. Spofford, he said:

> It would not be proper to limit quotations to the testimony taken by the "Howe committee," but that the testimony taken by the "Morrison committee" of the House should, in common fairness to the other side, be allowed consideration.
> Of course the journals and acts of assembly of the Nicholls legislature, as printed in volumes, by authority, can be referred to.

This is the point.

> And the undersigned, in return, agrees that the newspaper reports of journals of the Packard legislature may be referred to by either party.

At that time there was no journal of either legislature, either of the so-called Nicholls legislature or assemblage or the Packard legislature; because by the then existing law the New Orleans Republican was the official journal of the State, and it was necessary that all the journals and all laws and all legal proceedings should be published in that official journal—laws or acts after approval by the governor, and journals after being ratified and approved by the two houses respectively. If the Senator will turn to the consideration of this matter before the committee he will see that that was discussed, certainly to some extent; and it was inquired, "Now, is it understood that the Morrison committee's report shall be considered in connection with the Sherman report?" "Yes," was the answer; and it was expressly stipulated that the journal of both houses should be received, for the reason that it was the journal that I depended upon to show that I had a majority of all the members of both houses present and a quorum under the law of 1866. It was necessary to the election of Mr. Spofford that there should be proof forthcoming, (and he admitted that,) shown in the journals referred to published in the New Orleans Republican, as well as the journals of the Nicholls house published in the Picayune and other papers not official, showing what the vote was as claimed by the democrats for Nicholls, and what the vote was as claimed by the republicans predicated upon the return of the returning board for Packard. So it is impossible that the case should have been considered precluding those two journals. It was the basis of one of the principal specifications made by Mr. Spofford, met by me, controverted by us distinctively and individually, and finally agreed to after the issue was made. This was the evidence.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now, one moment further. We agreed that the testimony taken before other committees under oath should be evidence as far as pertinent. That is in the agreement; that is in the record; and the gentleman now makes an argument to show that by inference, because we agreed that he might refer to editorials or communications or statements in a paper for his own purposes, as he chose, I do not know what, we thereby agreed that that statement in the paper was the real journal, and that it was a true journal, and that what there was stated to have occurred did occur. I have no recollection of any such thing as that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How about the reference to the Nicholls journal which is in the same way?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, the acts of the Nicholls legislature were proven by transcripts from the journal itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But you are talking about a stipulation. I never heard of a transcript proving itself.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. You have, I reckon, with the proper certificates to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is another thing.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. When a lawyer speaks of a transcript being introduced he means with evidence that the true transcript is there required by law. A certificate was there that the journal of the Nicholls legislature was regular and legitimate. There was no evidence of a journal of the Packard legislature.

Mr. KELLOGG. The journal of the Nicholls legislature was not even under the great seal of the State; the journal of the Packard legislature was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PENDLETON in the chair.) The Senator from Wisconsin is on the floor, and can be interrupted only by his consent.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am inclined to think that the jury are getting more of this case than the court. [Laughter.] The Senators are discussing facts, and I wish to discuss the law. If my colleague will read the journal I will yield for that purpose—the newspaper report of the journal under this stipulation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The New Orleans Republican is headed "Official journal of the State of Louisiana," dated January 16, 1877:

> Mr. Souer rose to a privileged question. He perceived from the newspapers that Mr. Pinchback had made a speech in the democratic caucus at Odd Fellows' Hall, in which, among other mendacious statements, he made use of the following language:
> "I charge that in the Saint Louis Hotel a ring exists, presided over by Louis J. Souer, who distributed to the members of that Legislature the sum of $250 each for their votes for WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG for United States Senator for the long term."

Mr. Souer proceeds to denounce that statement as false, and asks that a committee be appointed to investigate it.

> Mr. McMillen offered a resolution citing the points made by Mr. Souer and the remarks of Mr. Pinchback, and calling for a committee of five.
> Mr. McMillen said he offered the resolution, as he thought the house should at once proceed to investigate the subject, because the remarks, coming from the source they did at Odd-Fellows' Hall, affect the character of every member. If the resolution was not broad enough, he would accept the suggestion of every member, but he did not wish to be on the committee, not having time to attend to it.
> The resolution was unanimously received and adopted.

The same day—

> Messrs. Lane, Dinkgrave, Snaer, Moore, and Magloire were appointed a committee to investigate the changes of bribery under the resolution of Mr. McMillen.

In the same paper, on the 27th:

> Mr. Lane, chairman of the special committee appointed to investigate charges publicly made that members of the house had been bribed to vote for Hon. WILLIAM

PITT KELLOGG as United States Senator for the full term, submitted the following report; which was read, and adopted under a suspension of the rules:

NEW ORLEANS, January 23, 1877.

To the honorable Speaker and members of the House of Representatives:

The undersigned, members of the special committee appointed under the following resolution—

Then the resolution is recited which I have just read—respectfully report that they have examined, under oath, every member of the house of representatives who recognized and responded to their subpœnas. Every member so examined—sixty-two in number—testified distinctly and unequivocally that he had not received the sum of $250, or any other sum, from Hon. L. J. Souer for his vote in favor of Hon. WILLIAM P. KELLOGG for the United States Senate. And each and every witness swore that he had no knowledge of any offer of money or patronage on the part of L. J. Souer, or any one else, to bribe or induce by unlawful or corrupt means the vote of any member for W. P. KELLOGG as United States Senator.

P. B. S. Pinchback refused to appear before the committee.

The testimony taken, which has been reduced to writing, and is at the disposal of the House, disclosed that some efforts had been made by improper means to influence the action of members in their vote for United States Senator, but that these efforts were not made by Hon. L. J. Souer, and were not made in the interest of Hon. W. P. KELLOGG. Your committee therefore report that the statement made by P. B. S. Pinchback referred to in the foregoing resolution was erroneous in every particular.

W. G. LANE, Chairman.
W. H. DINKGRAVE.
W. J. MOORE.
L. A. SNAER.
PIERRE MAGLOIRE.

We have also submitted the evidence taken by said committee, which was ordered to be printed and referred to the committee on judiciary when appointed.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now, Mr. President, let me read the language of this stipulation again:

Of course the journals and acts of assembly of the Nicholls legislature, as printed in volumes, by authority, can be referred to; and the undersigned, in return, agrees that the newspaper reports of journals of the Packard legislature may be referred to by either party.

That is signed by Spofford. If I had been trying a case before a jury in a court of law and had a stipulation in regard to the testimony which authorized me to refer to a printed copy or a newspaper print of any document of public importance in connection with the trial of the case, and when I did so and referred to it or read it, the counsel who had signed the stipulation should then make the objection that although in the arrangement made he having secured certain things on his part as evidence and in return for that agreed that certain newspaper documents should be referred to, but that he could still insist they were not evidence, I should have been profoundly astonished. But in this case, after a bold assault is made upon the solemnly recorded judgment of the Senate, it seems a very small matter to try to fritter away a stipulation. This stipulation is signed by Mr. Spofford, but it lacks the authentieity and the sanction of the records of the Senate; and if they can be overcome, why not the stipulation? So I will make no further comment upon that.

But proceeding, upon this stipulation it was agreed—because that is the substance of it and the meaning of it and the purpose of it; it was made between these parties for the purpose of settling between themselves what might be used as evidence before the committee, and it authorized these newspaper journals of the Legislature to be referred to,—referring to those, as has already been done by my colleague, the Senate will observe that the charge of bribery had been distinctly made and was disposed of by a committee of that Legislature on the 27th of January, 1877. That was long before the hearing in the Senate here in regard to the seat of Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Spofford was in New Orleans when all these proceedings took place in the Legislature. He must be presumed to have had notice of them, and they were facts which might have been shown before the committee or in the Senate during debate on the trial of this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He must certainly have had notice of the papers that he stipulated might be referred to and is bound by a knowledge of what they contained.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes. My colleague has quoted from the proceedings of the Committee on Privileges and Elections dated October 17, 1877. On page 27 I find the following:

Mr. SPOFFORD. From the journal of the sixth General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, found in the New Orleans Republican. There is no dispute about the holding-over senators.

Showing that in that very hearing before that committee Mr. Spofford himself referred to the Republican newspaper as evidence of the proceedings of that Legislature. It is idle to talk any more about that.

Mr. President, what do we mean when we say certain questions are res adjudicata? The doctrine of res adjudicata is not exactly the same as the doctrine of estoppel. A party may by false representations, or by a certain line of conduct, induce another to act so that it would be unjust toward that other to permit the party to prove the truth. He is therefore forbidden or estopped to prove the truth. The doctrine of res adjudicata rests not upon this ground, but upon the presumption that the judgment of a court or tribunal having jurisdiction to hear and determine any litigated question, is the truth, and therefore it stands as conclusive evidence of the fact adjudged.

This doctrine is not founded upon a statute. It is one of the jewels of the common law, one of the maxims that have resulted from centuries of experience in the administration of justice, in the ascertainment of truth and the protection of private rights by the best judges and jurists of England and America for centuries, all experts in the art. There must be an end of strife; otherwise society could not exist; and hence it has been found necessary to hold that when any question litigated between parties has been heard and considered by the tribunal empowered to decide it and its decision has been solemnly rendered that ends the dispute, or as lawyers say it is res adjudicata. True that judgment may sometimes be erroneous, but it is better that it should stand than that the doctrine should be recognized and proclaimed that it is impossible to end a controversy. In other words it is better that a particular decision should be settled erroneously than that there should be no power to end disputes. The interests of the public require this, society could not exist without a power lodged somewhere finally to determine and settle every controversy that may arise among its members, and out of that necessity this maxim has arisen.

Now I ask what distinction is there between the decision rendered by a court of law in regard to the title of Mr. KELLOGG'S farm and a decision rendered by this Senate in regard to his title to his seat, which should render one final and conclusive and leave the other open to everlasting doubt? Does public policy require that the title of a Senator's seat shall never be settled? Would not the inconvenience to the public from such a doctrine be far greater than in case of a mere private right? The Constitution declares that the Senate shall be the exclusive tribunal for trying the title of a Senator to his seat, and after it has entered upon an examination of the case and fully considered it, receiving certain evidence and excluding certain other which was deemed immaterial or irrelevant, and pronounced its final judgment upon the merits of the case, what reason can be given for holding such judgment not conclusive that does not apply with equal force to every judgment rendered by a court of law? The burden of showing why a distinction should be drawn between a judgment of the Senate and a judgment of any judicial tribunal passing ultimately upon the question of right, rests upon those who deny such an effect to the judgment of the Senate. No Senator has given any reason for such a distinction and none can be given.

Assuming, therefore, that the doctrine of res adjudicata, as it has grown up in the judicial courts, applies with equal force to decisions made by the Senate in regard to the right of a Senator to his seat, let me proceed to show a little more fully than has been shown what that doctrine is, and I propose to show that when a case has been heard and decided, it is the judgment itself that is res adjudicata, and that not only the points and facts urged against it on the trial but also those which might have been but were not presented are equally precluded. It is not permitted to a party to present a part of his proof in support of a claim and try the experiment of a judgment upon it, and if unsuccessful sue again, and present more proof, and if again unsuccessful present yet more and so on forever. Every party is entitled to his day in court, and when he has had that if he has not presented his full case it is his fault, and he must abide the consequences. Therefore if the fact that Mr. KELLOGG had obtained his election by force or fraud could have been shown it was material and pertinent on the former trial of his case in the Senate, and whether it was presented or not it is as completely foreclosed as any of the questions which were in fact urged against the judgment that was rendered. It is fair to presume that Mr. Spofford did not urge this question of menace and bribery in that hearing because he knew that it could not be sustained. He knew that the charge had been made, investigated and rejected by a committee in the Legislature of that State, and he had no reason to suppose that he could establish the charge if made, and we are bound to suppose that that was the reason he did not make it. A repetition of that charge would have appeared malicious after the investigation in Louisiana and probably would not have helped Mr. Spofford's chances for a favorable determination of his claim.

But whatever may have been the reason why he omitted that charge which he now makes the law says to him, "You have had your day in court, you have presented your case as you saw fit, it has been decided against you on the merits as you presented them and the decision is binding and conclusive upon you."

There was no question, as I understand, in regard to the validity of Spofford's election except that Kellogg had been duly elected before. Therefore if Spofford could have shown that Kellogg's election was not legal, that it was obtained by force, fraud or corruption, the decision would have been in Spofford's favor. In other words he has had his day in court upon that question, because he then had an opportunity to present the matter in that hearing.

I shall refer to the legal authorities upon this question because, as I said before I am anxious not to make a speech, but an argument, and I wish it to be a sound one. This is not putting on the air of virtue for this particular case. I have always regarded myself when such a question was before the Senate as acting judicially and that my conscience was as much bound to an impartial decision as it would be if I was passing judgment from the bench of a court of law. Therefore a few days since when the case of Mr. BELL was before the Senate after I had examined it as a matter of law, I voted against the great body of my own party and against seating Mr. BELL who was of my party because I thought as a matter of law he was not entitled to his seat. I voted upon my convictions then and I shall do so now, and I wish to show to Senators who will listen to me that the ground upon which I justify my vote at present is solid in the law.

I will read an extract from the opinion of the court in Bridge Company vs. Sergeant, 27 Ohio State Reports, page 237:

When the facts which constitute the cause of action or defense have been, between the same parties, submitted to the consideration of the court, and passed upon by the court, they cannot again be the proper subjects for an action or defense, unless the finding and judgment of the court is opened up or set aside by proper authority. This principle of law extends still further in quieting litigation. A party cannot relitigate matters which he might have interposed, but failed to do in a prior action between the same parties or their privies, in reference to the same subject-matter. And if one of the parties failed to introduce matters for the consideration of the court that he might have done, he will be presumed to have waived his right to do so. (30 Iowa, 433; 13 Ohio St., 283; 1 Johns. Cas., 436; 25 Cal., 266.)

If a party fails to plead a fact he might have plead, or makes a mistake in the progress of an action, or fails to prove a fact he might have proven, the law can afford him no relief. When a party passes by his opportunity the law will not aid him. In Ewing vs. McNairy & Claflin, 20 Ohio St., 322, the judge says: "By refusing to relieve parties against the consequences of their own neglect it seeks to make them vigilant and careful. On any other principle there would be no end to an action, and there would be an end to all vigilance and care in its preparation and trial." The same principle is well settled in numerous authorities. (See 3 Comst., 511; 9 Wis., 23; 5 Sanf., 135.)

Then the opinion proceeds two pages further to consider the same subject and cite some other cases. But perhaps the strongest and the highest authority on this subject is the case of Beloit vs. Morgan, in 7 Wallace, page 621. That was an action brought upon certain town bonds. A former action had been brought upon the coupons of the same issue of bonds; and in the former action the town made default because the amount was small, and did not employ a lawyer to defend the case. When they were sued, however, for a larger amount they did employ counsel and put in a full defense; but the court held that having had their day in court upon the question of the validity of those bonds, as they did have when the first suit was commenced against them, and which they allowed to go by default, they were precluded from putting in their defense in this action, that the whole matter of the validity of the bonds was res adjudicata, because the party had had his day in court and had his opportunity to prove their invalidity if they were invalid.

This doctrine is also sustained by the case of Cromwell vs. The County of Sac, 4 Otto, 351, a recent decision and a very able opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Field, reviewing all the authorities and showing that the doctrine of res adjudicata extends not only to the things actually litigated, that is, upon which pleadings were framed or proof taken, but to every point that might have been insisted upon in that litigation.

Therefore I say that unless it can be shown that when this case was first before the Senate for seating Mr. KELLOGG, and in which the Senate decided that he was entitled to his seat, the fact of bribery in obtaining his election was an irrelevant and immaterial fact, it is now precluded, and the fact that it was not presented by Mr. Spofford makes no difference whatever. He has had his opportunity to present it, and it is fair to presume that if he did not do so it was because he thought he could not. At all events the law precludes any further discussion upon that subject.

This doctrine of res adjudicata is not confined at all to the judicial courts or confined to their judgments; it is a universal principle resting upon the necessities of the public that when a question has been once settled by competent authority it shall remain settled, and that determination shall be regarded as conclusive.

In the case of Van Wormer vs. the Mayor of Albany, 15 Wendell, 262, the principle was applied to a determination of a board of health declaring certain premises to be a nuisance, and the court in the decision say that that board having authority to make provision for the removal of any nuisance had authority to determine whether a nuisance existed in the particular case and that their decision was final and conclusive; the matter was res adjudicata.

In Abbott vs. Bahr, 3 Chandler, 210, the doctrine was applied to the decision of land officers of the United States in regard to conflicting claims to land.

A great case upon this subject is the famous one of Martin vs. Mott, 12th Wheaton, 19, where the Supreme Court of the United States held that inasmuch as the President was authorized in case invasion was imminent to call out the militia, he was authorized to determine whether invasion was imminent or not, and when he had called out the militia that was his decision that it was imminent, and his decision was conclusive upon everybody, that no court, no tribunal could examine into the correctness of his decision, it was conclusive, the matter was res adjudicata.

In the case of Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard, page 1, growing out of the Rhode Island trouble, the mere decision of the President that a certain government was the legitimate government of the State and would be supported by the Federal authority if necessary, was held by the Supreme Court of the United States to preclude them from inquiring into the subject, because under the law which authorized the President to exercise the power of the Government in suppressing insurrection and disturbance in that State, the President had the power to decide which was the lawful government, and when he had decided it that was conclusive upon everybody.

So it has been held that the Secretary of the Treasury under the ninth section of the Spanish treaty of 1819 in regard to the allowance of certain claims, was the ultimate and conclusive tribunal or officer for settling that question; and that when he decided that a claim ought not to be allowed, that precluded it forever, and had the same binding effect upon the claim that the judgment of a court would have.

The Supreme Court of the United States has over and again decided that the decisions of registers and receivers of the land offices in the West in regard to the rival claims of pre-emptors are absolutely conclusive and as binding as the decision of a court.

And so generally, without going further into detail or specification, it may be safely laid down as a principle of law that where any officer or any tribunal is clothed with the authority of determining a certain question and does examine it and make its determination, that is the end of that question. It makes no difference that the party might have proved more than he did. Every party relies upon such proof as he chooses to put in. If he could at one term put in part of his proof and try the experiment of succeeding and if he failed sue again and put in some more proof and if he failed a second time sue a third time and put in more proof still, there would be no end to any litigation. That is the reason why this thing cannot be done.

But the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said yesterday that the Senate was a law unto itself. Understood in a proper sense, I assent to the proposition, that is, that no tribunal can review its decisions. Be they right or be they wrong they cannot be reviewed by any other tribunal. But if it be maintained that the Senate is a law unto itself in any other sense than the Supreme Court is a law unto itself, that the Senate can do what it pleases, that it can seat or unseat members from choice, or in the interests of party without regard to the legal right of a Senator or the one claiming a seat, then I totally dissent from the proposition. The duty imposed upon us by the Constitution is judicial in its character, and when we are exercising it we are acting as a court. And we can no more make new law for particular cases because it may suit our convenience to do so or to gratify some partisan wish or ambition than the Supreme Court can depart from the law to decide a case for a favorite or against one who is under the frown of the court. In a proper sense the Supreme Court is a law unto itself. Its decisions, whether right or wrong, are irreversible. If it decides a case wrongly that is the law forever touching that subject between those parties. No other tribunal can correct it nor can the court itself correct it after the end of the term at which the judgment was pronounced.

In the case of the Washington Bridge Company vs. Stewart, 3 Howard, will be found a very clear discussion of this subject. There an appeal had been taken in an equity case from a mere interlocutory order. It came up to the Supreme Court and that fact was not noticed, and the court decided the question at issue between the parties, so far as it was involved in the order appealed from, by affirming the decision by an equally divided court. The case went back to the court below, and it was then for the first time ascertained that the decree which had been appealed from was not a final decree, and that the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction whatever when it pronounced its decision. After further proceedings a second appeal was taken, and the Supreme Court were asked to review the decision which had been made upon the former appeal, because the court had no jurisdiction of the appeal at that time. In the unanimous opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Wayne, page 434, 3 Howard Reports, the Supreme Court held that they could not review their own determination on a former appeal, that there was no power in the Supreme Court after the expiration of the term at which one of its judgments had been rendered to review or set aside such judgment upon any ground whatever. The court said:

The Supreme Court certainly has only appellate jurisdiction, where the judgment or decree of the inferior court is final. But it does not follow, when it renders a decree, upon an interlocutory and not a final decree, that it can, or ought, on an appeal from a decree in the same cause, which is final, examine into its jurisdiction upon the former occasion. The cause is not brought here in such a case for any such purpose. It was an exception, of which advantage might have been taken by motion on the first appeal. The appeal would then have been dismissed for the want of jurisdiction, and the cause would have been sent back to the circuit court for further proceedings. But the exception not having been then made of the alleged want of jurisdiction, the cause was argued upon its merits, and the decree appealed from was affirmed by this court. Its having been affirmed by a divided court, can make no difference as to the conclusiveness of the affirmance upon the rights of the parties. It is settled, that when this court is equally divided upon a writ of error or appeal, the judgment of the court below stands affirmed. Etting vs. Bank of the United States, 11 Wheat., 59; the case of the Antelope, 10 Wheat., 66. Having passed upon the merits of the decree this court has now nothing before it but the proceedings subsequent to its mandate. So this court said in Himely and Rose, and in the case of the Santa Maria, 5 Cranch, 314, 10 Wheat., 431. Its decree became a matter of record in the highest court in which the cause could be finally tried. To permit afterward, upon an appeal from proceedings upon its mandate, a suggestion of the want of jurisdiction in this court, upon the first appeal, as a sufficient cause for re-examining the judgment then given, would certainly be a novelty in the practice of a court of equity. The want of jurisdiction is a matter of abatement, and that is not capable of being shown for error to reverse a decree upon a bill of review. Shall the appellant be allowed to do more now than would be permitted on a bill of review, if this court had the power to grant him such a remedy? If he was, we should then have a mode for the review of the decrees of this court, which have become matters of record, which could not be allowed as an assignment of error for a bill of review, in any of those courts of the United States in which that proceeding is the ordinary and appropriate remedy.

The application has been treated in this way, to show how much at variance it is with the established practice of courts of equity. It might, however, have been dismissed, upon the authority of a case in this court, directly in point, Skillern's executors vs. May's executors, 6 Cranch, 267, and upon the footing that there is no mode pointed out by law, in which an erroneous judgment by this court can be reviewed in this or any other court. In Skillern's case, the question certified by the court below to this court, for its decision, was, whether the cause could be dismissed from the circuit court, for want of jurisdiction, after the cause had been removed to the Supreme Court, and this court had acted upon and remanded the cause to the circuit court, for further proceedings. This court said: "It appearing that the merits of the cause had been finally decided in this court, and that its mandate required only the execution of its decree, it is the opinion of this court that the circuit court is bound to carry that decree into execution, although the jurisdiction of that court is not alleged in the pleadings." The jurisdiction of this court, in that case, was as defective as it is said to have been in this. When that cause was before this court, though the judgment of the court below on it would have been reversed, upon motion, for the want of jurisdiction on the face of the record, the defect having escaped the notice of the court and of counsel, and the court having acted upon its merits, it determined that its decree should be executed. The reason for its judgment no doubt was, that the motion to dismiss the case, in the court below, for the want of jurisdiction, after it had been before the Supreme Court by writ of error, and had been acted upon, would have been equivalent, had it been allowed, to a decision that the judgment of this court might be reviewed, when the law points out no mode in which that can be done, either by this or any other court. The want of power in this court to review its judgments or decrees, has been so frequently determined by it, that it is not now an open question. Such is the result of what the court said in Himely and Rose, 5 Cranch, 314.

The court says, in Martin vs. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 304, in reply to the allegation that its judgment had been rendered when it had not jurisdiction, "To this argument several answers may be given. In the first place, it is not admitted that upon this writ of error the former record is before us. In the next place, in ordinary cases, a second writ of error has never been supposed to draw in question the propriety of the first judgment, and it is difficult to perceive how such a proceeding could be sustained on principle. A final judgment of this court is supposed to be conclusive upon the rights it decides, and no statute has provided any process by which this court can reverse its judgment. In several cases formerly adjudged in this court, the same point was argued, and expressly overruled. It was solemnly held, that a final judgment of this court was conclusive upon the parties, and could not be re-examined." In Browder vs. McArthur, 7 Wheat., 58, counsel applied for a rehearing; the court refused it, saying a subsequent appeal brought up only the proceedings subsequent to the mandate, and did not authorize an inquiry into the merits of the original decree. The same is said with equal positiveness in the case of the Santa Maria, 10 Wheat., 442. To these cases we add an extract from the opinion of the court, given by the late Mr. Justice Baldwin, in Ex parte Sibbald, 12 Peters, 492. That case called for the most careful consideration of the court. "Before we proceed to consider the matter presented by these petitions, we think it proper to state our settled opinion of the course which is prescribed by the law for this court to take, after the final action upon a case, brought within its appellate jurisdiction, as well as that which the court, whose final decree or judgment has been thus verified, ought to take. Appellate power is exercised over the proceedings of inferior courts, not on those of the appellate court. The Supreme Court has no power to review its decisions, whether in a case at law or in equity. A final decree in chancery is as conclusive as a judgment at law. 1 Wheat., 355; 6 Wheat., 113, 116. Both are conclusive of the rights of the parties thereby adjudicated."

A stronger case than this can hardly be imagined. A decision had been rendered by the Supreme Court without jurisdiction, had been made by an equal division of the judges, and yet the court held that it was precluded from an investigation into the merits of the case so far as they were disposed of in the former decision of the court. If it be said that the Senate after it has rendered a decision ought, at a subsequent session, if satisfied that it was erroneous, to reverse such decision because there is no appeal or writ of error to any revising tribunal, the case last read answers the suggestion fully. Mr. President, assuming the decision last quoted to be a correct exposition of the law applicable to the Supreme Court it would seem to follow by analogy that the power of the Senate to reconsider any of its determinations would be confined to the session. I think no one will question that its power of reconsidering legislative measures ends with the session. We have a rule which limits motions to reconsider to a certain number of days in the session, but without such rule and upon general principles no one would claim that the Senate could reconsider an act passed at a former session. It may be said that the reason for this is that after a bill has been signed by the President, it has passed beyond the control of the Senate, but suppose the case of a bill vetoed by the President and passed over his veto by two-thirds of both Houses, could the Senate on such a bill reconsider its vote at a subsequent session if we had no rule upon the subject? I take it no one will claim such a thing. In the absence of a rule no doubt the Senate could reconsider any vote or decision during the session at which it was made. It is well settled by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court that the circuit and district courts of the United States have no control whatever over their records to change or alter a determination or judgment after the term of the court has adjourned.

But it is said that "fraud vitiates everything, the judgment of a court as well as a contract between parties." Upon this subject this is the law. The fraud which will vitiate a judgment must be a fraud upon the court which rendered the judgment or upon the party which prevented him from having his case fully considered by the court. If it could be shown that Mr. KELLOGG had obtained the decision in his favor by some fraud practiced by him upon the Senate or by some fraudulent conduct of his which prevented Spofford from presenting his case and having his opportunity and day in court, then the motion to retry the case would fall within the principle upon which courts of equity grant relief against fradulent judgments, and perhaps would justify the Senate in expelling Mr. KELLOGG. But no such thing is pretended. It is not claimed that Mr. KELLOGG did or said anything to mislead the Senate in its judgment nor that he did anything to prevent Mr. Spofford from making a full presentation of his case to the Senate. The complaint is against the Senate itself. It is said that the Senate rejected testimony, or its committee did, which ought to have been received. But this will not do. To repeat what I have already said, the fraud which will induce a court to set aside a former judgment must be a fraud upon the court which rendered the judgment or a fraud which prevented the opposite party from presenting his case. A judgment could not be set aside upon the ground that the judge who rendered it was bribed by the successful party. And for the reason that if a former judgment could be set aside because the judge who rendered it had been bribed, a subsequent suit might be brought to set aside the second judgment and reaffirm the first on the ground that the second judge was bribed and there never could be an end to the litigation. Therefore this proceeding cannot be sustained upon the ground that the Senate did not do its full duty when it was considering and deciding the case.

One court will never listen to the charge that another court has acted corruptly and the Senate cannot reverse the adjudication of the Senate at a former session upon the ground that such former Senate was negligent or corrupt.

In Fletcher vs. Peek, 6 Cranch, 37, in an opinion delivered by Chief-Justice Marshall it was held that no judicial tribunal could inquire into the motives which induced a Legislature to pass a particular law. So it was a well-settled principle that no judgment can be set aside or decree reversed in a subsequent suit for any misconduct ot the court.

A very important and a conclusive authority upon this subject is a decision recently rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States and not yet reported; I have the opinion from the clerk of the court as it has been printed and filed in the court. Let me state the case. This is the case of the United States, appellant, vs. Throckmorton, Howard, Goold, and Haggin. The case, in short, was this. A bill in chancery was filed to set aside a decision of the United States court affirming a certain Mexican land grant, and the facts shown in the case were these: The claimant fearing that he could not make out his case before the court, went to Mexico and found a former governor of the Territory of California and induced him to issue a new grant antedating it at a time when he was governor, so that the paper upon which the decree was obtained was a flat forgery; and that fact was not known until after that case was decided, and the title confirmed upon the forged grant. Discovering the fact subsequently, however, that that judgment had been obtained upon a forged grant, the United States brought its bill to set aside the title of this claimant and his assigns under that grant; and the court disposed of the case, Mr. Justice Miller delivering one of his vigorous and conclusive opinions. I will read two or three extracts from it. The court say—and this is the unanimous opinion of the court as I understand—

> There is no question of the general doctrine that fraud vitiates the most solemn contracts, documents, and even judgments. There is also no question that many rights originally founded in fraud become—by lapse of time, by the difficulty of proving the fraud, and by the protection which the law throws around rights once established by formal judicial proceedings in tribunals established by law, according to the methods of the law—no longer open to inquiry in the usual and ordinary methods. Of this class are judgments and decrees of a court deciding between parties before the court and subject to its jurisdiction, in a trial which has presented the claims of the parties, and where they have received the consideration of the court.

And after considering the instances of fraud which will vitiate a judgment—that is, fraud upon the court or unsuccessful party—the court say:

> On the other hand, the doctrine is equally well settled that the court will not set aside a judgment because it was founded on a fraudulent instrument, or perjured evidence, or for any matter which was actually presented and considered in the judgment assailed. Mr. Wells, in his very useful work on Res Adjudicata, says, section 499: "Fraud vitiates everything, and a judgment equally with a contract; that is, a judgment obtained directly by fraud, and not merely a judgment founded on a fraudulent instrument, for in general the court will not go again into the merits of an action for the purpose of detecting and annulling the fraud. * * * Likewise, there are few exceptions to the rule that equity will not go behind the judgment to interpose in the cause itself, but only when there was some hinderance besides the negligence of the defendant in presenting the defense in the legal action. There is an old case in South Carolina to the effect that fraud in obtaining a bill of sale would justify equitable interference as to the judgment obtained thereon. But I judge it stands almost or quite alone, and has no weight as a precedent." The case he refers to is Crauford vs. Crauford, 4 Desausure Eq. R., 176. See also Bigelow on Fraud, 170-2.
> The principle and the distinction here taken was laid down as long ago as the year 1702 by the lord keeper in the high court of chancery, in the case of Tovey vs. Young. (Precedents in Chancery, page 193.)
> This was a bill in chancery brought by an unsuccessful party to a suit at law, for a new trial, which was at that time a very common mode of obtaining a new trial. One of the grounds of the bill was that complainant had discovered since the trial was had that the principal witness against him was a partner in interest with the other side. The lord keeper said: "New matter may in some cases be ground for relief; but it must not be what was tried before: nor when it consists in swearing only, will I ever grant a new trial, unless it appears by deeds, or writing, or that a witness, on whose testimony the verdict was given, was convicted of perjury, or the jury attainted." The case seems to have been well considered, for the decree was a confirmation of one made by the master of the rolls.
> The case of Smith vs. Lowry, 1 Johnson Chy., 321, was also a bill for a new trial on the ground that the witness on whose testimony the amount of damages was fixed was suborned by the plaintiff, and that complainant had learned since the trial that a fictitious sale of salt had been made for the purpose of enabling this witness to testify to the market price. Chancellor Kent said that complainant must have known, or he was bound to know, that the price of salt at the place of delivery would be a matter of inquiry at the trial, and he dismissed the bill for want of equity, citing the case of Tovey vs. Young with approval. And he cites a number of cases to show that chancery will not interfere though new evidence has been discovered since the trial, which, if the party could have introduced it, would have changed the result.
> In Bateman vs. Willoe, 1 Schoales & Lefroy, Lord Redesdale said: "I do not know that equity ever does interfere to grant a trial of a matter which has already been discussed in a court of law, a matter capable of being discussed there, and over which the court of law had full jurisdiction." The rule must apply with equal force to a bill to set aside a decree in equity after it has become final, where the object is to retry a matter which was in issue in the first case and was matter of actual contest.
> The same doctrine is asserted in Dixon vs. Graham, 16 Iowa R., 310; Cottle vs. Cole, 20 Iowa R., 484; Borland vs. Thornton, 12 California R., 440; Riddle vs. Barker, 13 California R., 295; Railroad Company vs. Neal, 1 Wood. R., 353.

But perhaps the best discussion of the whole subject is to be found in 2 Gray, 361, by Chief-Justice Shaw, in the case of Greene vs. Greene. That was a bill filed by a woman against her husband for a divorce. The husband had five years before obtained a decree of divorce against the wife, and in her bill she now alleges that the former decree was obtained by fraud and collusion and false testimony, and she prays that this may be inquired into and that decree set aside. The court was of opinion that this allegation meant that the husband colluded or combined with other persons than complainant to obtain false testimony or otherwise to aid him in fraudulently obtaining the decree. The chief-justice says that the court thinks the point settled against the complainant by authority, not specifically in regard to divorce, but generally as to the conclusiveness of judgments and decrees between the same parties. He then examines the authorities, English and American, and adds: "The maxim that fraud vitiates every proceeding must be taken, like other general maxims, to apply to cases where proof of fraud is admissible. But where the same matter has been actually tried, or so in issue that it might have been tried, it is not again admissible; the party is estopped to set up such fraud because the judgment is the highest evidence and cannot be contradicted." We think these decisions establish the doctrine on which we decide the present case, namely, that the acts for which a court of equity will on account of fraud set aside or annul a judgment or decree, between the same parties, rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, have relation to frauds, intrinsic or collateral, to the matter tried by the first court, and not to a fraud in the matter on which the decree was rendered.

The case before us comes within this principle. The genuineness and validity of the concession from Micheltorena produced by complainant was the single question pending before the board of commissioners and the district court for four years. It was the thing and the only thing that was controverted, and it was essential to the decree. To overrule the demurrer to this bill would be to retry twenty years after the decision of these tribunals the very matter which they tried, on the ground of fraud in the document on which the decree was made. If we can do this now, some other court may be called on twenty years hence to retry the same matter on another allegation of fraudulent combination in this suit to defeat the ends of justice, and so the number of suits would be without limit and the litigation endless about the single question of the validity of this document.

This decision is the highest authority that could be quoted because applicable to and entirely conclusive of the ground I am trying to maintain, unless a distinction can be established in reason and on principle between the decisions of this body when sitting as a court and the decisions of any other tribunal charged with the determination of any particular question. And if the doctrine laid down here, and in the other cases to which I have referred, is to be adopted or at all respected, it is certain that this Senate has no jurisdiction to inquire into, examine, affirm or reverse one of its decisions made at a former session in regard to the right of Mr. KELLOGG to his seat. Mr. KELLOGG had a case pending here. He claimed a seat and was opposed by Mr. Spofford, who claimed the same seat. The Senate was compelled to decide between them. The Constitution compels it to make that decision. It took up the case, examined it through the instrumentality of one of its committees and then in the Senate itself the whole matter was considered, and the Senate after days of debate determined and placed upon its record its judgment that Mr. KELLOGG, upon the merits of the case—regardless of all technicalities, but upon the merit—was entitled to his seat and that Mr. Spofford was not so entitled. But Mr. Spofford, not satisfied with the decision, applies again, asking to have the same question decided over again. If we are to dispose of the present application like lawyers and judges, regardless of political influence and party advantage, then the adjudications I have read declare our duty and point out the path we should follow. I trust this course will be pursued. I trust that the democratic party are not so maddened by their recent and I trust accidental success as to pursue a line of conduct condemned by all sound authority, repugnant to every principle of justice, and revolutionary in the highest degree.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is argued before the Senate that it will be impossible to vote for this resolution without committing ourselves to the doctrine that there is no stability and no permanency in the judgment of the Senate on the right of a person claiming to be a member, and the Senate has been appealed to as a body of judges for the purpose of giving an answer to the question whether they will set aside a solemn adjudication heretofore made by the Senate for the purpose of instituting a new inquiry on the same subject-matter that was once discussed, adjudicated, and settled. This appeal has been urged in various views. Some of the Senators who have spoken against the adoption of this resolution have seemed to be impressed with the idea that the Senate or a portion of it might be driven from the consideration of this question by having presented to its view some political consequences which might result from its proposed action. Others, however, and particularly the Senator who has just taken his seat, have argued the question as a pure question of law in a very fair, and very candid, and a very dispassionate way. I must express my admiration of the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat for the excellent manner in which he has presented this question, and for the good taste which he exhibited when bringing to the attention of the Senate a great question that touches its own powers of jurisdiction over a subject of this character; for I think that I may flatter myself that I have still enough independence of thought and of action to be able to follow my own convictions against what might be supposed to be the advantages of the party to which I belong upon a subject so solemn and so interesting as this if those convictions should lead me against the conclusions that my party seemed willing to adopt and to advance before the Senate.

Now, what is the precise case presented here? It is that at an early day of this session Mr. Spofford presented to the Senate of the United States a memorial, and in that memorial he set forth certain reasons, first, why Mr. KELLOGG was not entitled to the seat he holds in the Senate; and, second, certain reasons why he himself had the better right to that seat. The Senate of the United States, under its rule of course, heard a brief statement of what the memorial was, and very well understood the proposition that this memorial related to a subject which had in some sort been under consideration in the Senate at its last session and had in some way been decided by the Senate. The Senate referred the memorial to a committee.

If there ever was a period of time when the question of res adjudicata or the question of estoppel—for it is nothing else—could properly have been urged, it would have been upon the reference of the memorial, for it does not follow that because a man has the right under the Constitution to petition the Houses of Congress, it is the duty of either House to refer to one of its committees that petition for its consideration, when it appears on the face of the petition in connection with the records of this body that we have no jurisdiction of the subject, that we are estopped and debarred from all consideration of it whatsoever. But the objection was not made. On the contrary, the petition was referred, and this able, leading committee of the Senate have had it under consideration now for weeks, and have made a written report of their proceedings in that matter. It appears that no objection has been made to the consideration of that petition even before that committee, and the parties have gone on for the purpose of ascertaining what they should consult in the nature of evidence for the purpose of determining the merits of that petition, and what report should be made thereon. The committee have arrived at the conclusion, after a long debate on both sides and after a full investigation of all that has occurred in this case heretofore, that it is their duty to come back to the Senate and ask the passage of a resolution which will enable them to take evidence, that evidence having for its purpose first the ascertainment, as they aver, of the point of fact whether or not there has been such an adjudication by the Senate of the question presented in this memorial as will hereafter forever bar its further investigation; secondly, if there is no such adjudication, whether evidence may be taken, and to what extent, to prove the averments set forth in the memorial of the claimant from Louisiana, Mr. Spofford.

Senators who stand upon nice, sharp, keen, shrewd technicalities for the purpose of estopping an inquiry of a character like this and who feel that the welfare of the country and the honor and dignity of the Senate depend upon its abstaining from the exercise of a doubtful power, ought to have been ready, and doubtless were ready always, to have made the objection in limine and to have interposed at the time of the reference of this memorial that objection which now stands out so boldly and so prominently in their imaginations, if not in fact, against all inquiry into every subject touching in any respect whatsoever the credentials of Mr. KELLOGG and his right to a seat on the floor of the Senate. Then would have been the time to have made the objection; then would have been the time to have arrested this improper exercise of power which the Senate, it seems, was then exerting, according to their view of the subject, in the reference of the memorial to the committee. But the very absurd position which Senators would have been compelled to take on that occasion I dare say deterred them from making that objection. They were not willing that there should be a door closed to inquiry in this case until the cause had progressed to that extent that the keeping the door open or closing it might have connected with it some possible political advantage. Then it was that it became, I suppose in the estimate of Senators, their duty to charge upon us that it was our purpose in the Senate, not to do justice, not to have honesty and truth prevail in the adjudications of the Senate, but that it was our purpose to provide against some future contingency when we might need a Senator's vote in order to retain a majority in this body.

Mr. President, this question has been argued so far entirely by analogies. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States that I know of, certainly nothing that has been as yet quoted or referred to, which will prevent the Senate from instituting an inquiry into the title of its membership upon this floor at any time. I do not know of any constitutional rule that prohibits this high tribunal from investigating at any time the merits of the claim of any person to a seat on this floor; and in the absence of any constitutional requirement or direction on this subject Senators have been compelled to resort to cases that they conceive to be analogous to the one that is now presented before the attention of the country and the Senate, and that analogy is drawn from the conduct of courts of justice, and in some instances we are referred to the conduct of appellate courts, and in others we are referred to the conduct of original jurisdiction.

It is true the Constitution says that the Senate is the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members. The Constitution does not say that these judges, when they are deciding upon a question of this kind, constitute a court; the Constitution does not say that they are either a court of original or of appellate jurisdiction; the Constitution does not provide in this instance, as it does in the case of impeachments, for the manner of the organization of the court; neither does it provide that these judges shall take a separate oath of office which devolves upon them or imposes upon them a new duty contradistinguished from that duty under which they are engaged daily in legislation. The same oath of office under which we judge in reference to the right of our membership to seats on this floor is the oath of office under which we continually exercise the legislative powers which belong to us under the Constitution. So, then, if we are a court and if such was the meaning of the framers of the Constitution when they gave to us these powers, I think the framers of that instrument were somewhat derelict in duty in not having provided some means for the organization of this body as a court, in not having provided also that we should take upon ourselves an oath to render judgment according to justice and impartiality, as we have to do in cases of impeachment.

I think the analogy rather fails. It is a very good thing, indeed, to argue from; it is a handsome thing for illustration, but when you come to sift it down to its elementary qualities and undertake to ascertain from the Constitution of the United States that the Senate, though judges of elections, sit here as a court, I think you will find the argument is out before the subject is exhausted. It is mere analogy, and no more.

The Senate being the judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of membership, I should rather think that their judgment stood upon a higher plane even than that of a court under ordinary circumstances, because there is nobody to correct it, there is no appeal that lies from it, there is nobody to reverse it except the Senate itself; and when an error creeps in or a wrong is done or a fraud has been perpetrated, the Senate is left without any power of having its own errors corrected by any different tribunal, and must naturally and necessarily resort to its own original powers for the purpose of doing that which is right. If the Senate of the United States can bind itself by a fault or by a neglect or by an accidental omission of duty or by a corrupt connivance at a wrong, so that it cannot afterward undo that wrong and that injustice, it is the only tribunal I know of in the United States which is thus hampered and thus handcuffed by law or by construction.

Inasmuch, therefore, as it is not a court having some superior power to control it, inasmuch as there is no appeal to be taken from the Senate except to the Senate in a case of this kind, we must either deny that there are any circumstances under which an appeal will lie at all, or we must admit that the Senate under some circumstances has authority to hear it. I cannot admit the proposition that under no state of circumstances will an appeal lie from a judgment of the Senate at the last session to the further judgment of the Senate at this session. I cannot think that this great body of lawyers and law-makers and judges, Senators, whatever you please to term them, are so meager in their authority, so constrained in the powers which are conferred upon them, as that when once they plant their feet they must stand there forever and there can be no revocation.

I admit the high policy, and the policy becomes higher and grander when you come to consider the purposes and the organization of this great body, the proper influence in adhering to our opinions upon any given question which has been heard and tried before the Senate until there has come up some substantial and overwhelming and overpowering reason why it should be departed from. But when these overwhelming and overpowering reasons do come, and when the whole conscience of the country as well as the conscience of the Senate demands that the truth shall have a hearing at the bar of the Senate, then I think that I discover no want of power on the part of the Senate by any action of its own to estop itself from hearing that complaint and adjusting that wrong, that outrage.

Senators who quote the doctrine of the courts as being conclusive by way of illustration upon us here, quote nothing else but the doctrine of estoppel. There is nothing at all in what is termed res adjudicata but the doctrine of estoppel. The doctrine of estoppel is a very good doctrine to stop men from quarreling with each other, to keep down strife between citizens, because it is founded upon a maxim which says that there ought to be an end of litigation, an end of strife and controversy between men; and that is the whole of it; but it is the doctrine of estoppel and nothing else. What is the doctrine of estoppel? Plainly and simply only this, that the truth shall not be heard because it is better that it should not be. That is all of it. But coupled with this doctrine of estoppel, in its origin and throughout all of its existence in this country and in England, there is a qualification. In England that qualification is expressed in this way, that no estoppel runs against the King. Here we very often have heard it decided that no estoppel runs against the Government of the United States, that an officer of the Government of the United States, acting ultra vires, though he may be clothed with authority to represent the Government, cannot estop the Government from inquiring into the truth; and many is the poor fellow who has been compelled to bow his neck to the yoke under the application of that very doctrine on the part of the Government of the United States. The statute of limitations does not run against the Government; estoppel does not run against the Government. What, then, does? Nothing.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER. The last decision I read in the case of the United States vs. Throckmorton et al. was a case where the Supreme Court enforced that doctrine against the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. The doctrine of estoppel?

Mr. CARPENTER. No. There is a difference between the doctrine of estoppel and the principle of res adjudicata which I have not the strength now to discuss; but the Supreme Court certainly held the United States bound and precluded as res adjudicata in that case.

Mr. MORGAN. Because the opinion in the case said the case had been fully considered?

Mr. CARPENTER. Because the matter had once been disposed of.

Mr. MORGAN. Not because the matter was offered as evidence, but because the same precise question had arisen between the same parties and been decided. The Senator from Wisconsin touched but very lightly, indeed, as I thought was becoming in him, on the question whether or not the adjournment of the Senate would have the same effect on our adjudications that an adjournment of a court would have. I am not prepared to answer that. I think the doctrine ought to be that the adjournment of the Senate ought to have the same effect upon our adjudications as the adjournment of a court, precisely, with this reservation, that the Senate must be a court considered as being always open, and as long as a man holds his seat in this body the subject is sub judice, it is in fieri in reference to him.

I take, for the purpose of illustrating that proposition, the question of the qualifications of a Senator. What are the qualifications of a Senator? He shall be a man of a certain age and reside in the State for which he is elected. Is that all? Suppose it is disclosed that a Senator here to-day has been guilty before he came into the Senate of some crime which was unknown when he was sworn in, which his election to the Senate has never condoned, and which proves that he is an unworthy man to hold a place here. Is not that a qualification to be judged of by the Senate? Suppose a man in the obtaining of his election, as is charged in this case, bribes and corrupts members of the Legislature, and that subject is hid away and not known? When you come to consider the question of that man's right to a seat here, what question do you take into consideration? Not merely whether he has bribed somebody, for he might have given a mere pittance; indeed, the man might not have accepted the bribe; he might merely have offered the bribe to obtain his seat and failed in the obtaining of the man's vote. Under these circumstances he might not have gained anything in the way of votes toward his election. But when you prove the fact upon that man that he offered a bribe corruptly to a member of the Legislature to get a seat here, you then say that he is disqualified to hold a seat on this floor, and that is a subject for the Senate to consider. Must some citizen come forward and present that as an issue? Must he come forward with a controversy and claim the seat before the Senate can consider a disqualification of that kind? We are the judges of the elections, first; then of the qualifications of Senators, as well as of the returns by which the elections are certified here.

If the proposition which Mr. Spofford has put in his memorial, which I will now read, is true, then it follows that the question of the disqualification of Mr. KELLOGG, which has never been passed upon, must be passed upon by the Senate, or else we must say that we will willingly sit here and turn the cover down over a man to conceal his frauds and hide them from the world because he gets up and says, "you are estopped and cannot go into the investigation." The memorialist says:

> Petitioner further represents that since the contest aforesaid and very recently he has discovered new and material evidence to prove that the election of said Kellogg was null and void, by reason of improper, illegal, and corrupt influences exerted by him in person to bring about his own election as Senator; to prove that he obtained and held the title of governor by corrupt bargain, not by election, and then used the power, patronage, and resources of the governor's office to procure the return and organization of a General Assembly for the purpose of electing him Senator, and afterward employed both menace and bribery among those whom he had assisted to have returned as members to induce them to vote for him as Senator; and that but for such illegal and corrupt interference personally exerted by the said Kellogg, he would not have secured the nominal election under which he claims his seat.

If that be true of the Senator from Louisiana who now sits in this body, it cannot be said that he ever possessed the qualifications of a Senator within the meaning and spirit of the Constitution of the United States, for a man who obtains his place in this body by bribery and corruption cannot be said, either in the English or American idea of the subject, to have those qualifications which entitle him to a seat in this body. The election is null because it is applied to a man who is unfit for a Senator. You might as well have elected an eighteen-year-old boy and sent him here.

This subject is in fieri always, always sub judice, at least until the very particular issue made has been called up and decided. I submit to the Senate whether or not this matter has been decided; whether the Senate, when it considered the question of the legality of the two governments in Louisiana, or, if you please, as connected with that, some other questions which were incidentally related to or connected with it, in making a decision of that sort, passed upon the question of the qualifications of a man from that State who is charged by a respectable and honorable citizen with having obtained his election by fraud and corruption personally exercised upon particular individuals? That is one view of the case that is not res adjudicata. That is one view of the case that will not be res adjudicata until the Senate has authorized an investigation to be had for the purpose of going into that matter and bringing the evidence to the attention of the Senate and of the country.

I regret very much that this accusation has been brought here; but it is either true or it is false. The Senate has so far affirmed its verity, or its faith in its verity, as to have referred this matter to the committee, and the committee have been for some time investigating it. They come back now for authority to look deeper into it. It does not follow at all if Mr. KELLOGG is found to be disqualified under this view of the subject and upon the evidence that may be taken in support of it, that Mr. Spofford would be entitled to the seat. That by no means follows. That is not a question for the Senate to settle now, and perhaps it is a question that the Senate should not undertake to forecast at this moment; but it does follow that if these allegations are sustained by proof which the Senate believes to be true, then Mr. KELLOGG has no right to a seat in this body because he is disqualified.

Mr. President, there is a great deal to be said also upon the proposition of law which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] so ably argued before the Senate. I take issue with the Senator from Wisconsin in reference to one proposition which he advanced before the Senate to-day, and that is that when a case comes up in the form in which this case is presented, (not in the form of pleadings between the parties but in reference to the effect of evidence which has been taken on a former investigation,) then the doctrine applies which he has quoted here to-day, that a party having had an opportunity of proving a fact or of disproving a fact in an issue between him and some other party on a former trial, it must be held that the court passed on the whole subject, and that everybody is estopped from bringing it forward again. Just in that case there are distinctions taken in the law, and in the very authorities which the honorable Senator read, which he omitted to quote, I dare say because his mind was so bent upon a particular view of this case that he found himself incapable for the moment of taking any other view of it. Now I read from the decision in Cromwell vs. County of Sac, which the honorable Senator quoted. First I will state the question presented to the Supreme Court:

The questions presented for our determination relate to the operation of this judgment as an estoppel against the prosecution of the present action, and the admissibility of the evidence to connect the present plaintiff with the former action as a real party in interest.

In considering the operation of this judgment, it should be borne in mind, as stated by counsel, that there is a difference between the effect of a judgment as a bar or estoppel against the prosecution of a second action upon the same claim or demand, and its effect as an estoppel in another action between the same parties upon a different claim or cause of action. In the former case, the judgment, if rendered upon the merits, constitutes an absolute bar to a subsequent action. It is a finality as to the claim or demand in controversy, concluding parties and those in privity with them, not only as to every matter which was offered and received to sustain or defeat the claim or demand, but as to any other admissible matter which might have been offered for that purpose. Thus, for example, a judgment rendered upon a promissory note is conclusive as to the validity of the instrument and the amount due upon it, although it be subsequently alleged that perfect defenses actually existed, of which no proof was offered, such as forgery, want of consideration, or payment. If such defenses were not presented in the action, and established by competent evidence, the subsequent allegation of their existence is of no legal consequence. The judgment is as conclusive, so far as future proceedings at law are concerned, as though the defenses never existed. The language, therefore, which is so often used, that a judgment estops not only as to every ground of recovery or defense actually presented in the action, but also as to every ground which might have been presented, is strictly accurate, when applied to the demand or claim in controversy. Such demand or claim, having passed into judgment, cannot again be brought into litigation between the parties in proceedings at law upon any ground whatever.

But where the second action between the same parties is upon a different claim or demand the judgment in the prior action operates as an estoppel only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered. In all cases, therefore, where it is sought to apply the estoppel of a judgment rendered upon one cause of action to matters arising in a suit upon a different cause of action the inquiry must always be as to the point or question actually litigated and determined in the original action, not what might have been thus litigated and determined. Only upon such matters is the judgment conclusive in another action. (4 Otto, Supreme Court Reports, 352, 353.)

Where the record shows in both cases that the same matter was litigated and determined between the same parties, then the record itself makes up the complete evidence of the identity and of the estoppel; but where a trial has occurred between two parties in reference to a subject-matter of the same general nature, or in reference to a subject-matter where the matter of subsequent litigation might have been introduced, and you offer the record of the judgment obtained in the first trial as evidence in the second trial, then you have got to go on, as I shall show by another authority, and by parol proof or by some proof establish the absolute identity of the two causes of action, and failing in that you fail in your proposition. Now I read from a case in 24 Howard, the case of the Washington, Alexandria and Georgetown Packet Company vs. Frederick E. Sickles and Trueman Cook. This was also the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court delivered by Mr. Justice Campbell, than whom I believe there is not now nor has there heretofore been an abler judge upon that bench, unless it might be Chief-Justice Marshall.

The circuit court adopted these conclusions of the plaintiffs, and excluded the testimony offered by the defendants to prove those facts.

I will not cite the facts. I will not detain the Senate for the purpose of presenting the whole case before the court.

The authority of the res adjudicata, with the limitations under which it is admitted, is derived by us from the Roman law and the canonists.

* * * * * * *

The essential conditions under which the exception of the res adjudicata becomes applicable are the identity of the thing demanded, the identity of the cause of the demand, and of the parties in the character in which they are litigants. This court described the rule, in Apsden vs. Nixon, (4 How. S. C. R., 467,) in such cases to be, that a judgment or decree set up as a bar by plea, or relied on as evidence by way of estoppel, must have been made by a court of competent jurisdiction upon the same subject-matter, between the same parties for the same purpose.

The court then proceed with quite an extended review of the authorities upon which the doctrines that I have already quoted are stated, and further statements are made:

In the case before the court the verdict was rendered upon two special counts, and the general counts in assumpsit, but the verdict in the subsequent stage of the proceedings was applied by the court only to the first count. The record produced by the plaintiffs showed that the first suit was brought apparently upon the same contract as the second, and that the existence and validity of that contract might have been litigated. But the verdict might have been rendered upon the entire declaration, and without special reference to the first count. It was competent to the defendants to show the state of facts that existed at the trial, with a view to ascertain what was the matter decided upon by the verdict of the jury. It may have been that there was no contest in reference to the fairness of the experiment, or to its sufficiency to ascertain the premium to be paid for the use of the machine at the first trial, or it may have been that the plaintiffs abandoned their special counts and recovered their verdict upon the general counts. The judgment rendered in that suit, while it remains in force, and for the purpose of maintaining its validity, is conclusive of all the facts properly pleaded by the plaintiffs. But when it is presented as testimony in another suit, the inquiry is competent whether the same issue has been tried and settled by it. (Merriam vs. Whittemore, 5 Gray, 316; Hughes vs. Alexander, 5 Duer R., 488.) The defendants in error contend the jury, by their verdict, necessarily found the statements of fact in all the counts of the declaration to be true; and the effect of a verdict and judgment on the whole declaration and a verdict and judgment on the first count is precisely the same, in producing an estoppel, as respects the matters contained in that special count. But this is not true. If the verdict had been rendered on the special count in exclusion of the others, the record itself would have shown that the existence and validity of the contract were in question. There would have been no ground for the inquiry whether any other issue was represented to the jury. But where a number of issues are presented, the finding on any one of which will warrant the verdict and judgment, it is competent to show that the finding was upon one rather than on another of these different issues.

It is the opinion of the court that the circuit court erred in holding that the plaintiffs in error were estopped by the proceedings in the former suit, for any inquiry in respect to the matters in issue, and actually tried in that cause; and its judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings, in conformity with this opinion.—Supreme Court Reports, 24 Howard, 341-346.

I dare say that this committee had a case of that kind, if not the very case, in mind when they came before the Senate with the resolution asking to be permitted to take testimony for the purpose of identifying the issues that were before tried and the issues that are now presented, as well as to go further and take evidence upon those issues. So now, if we were in a court of justice and bound by all the narrow rules of practice which are found necessary in order to keep the judgments of the court in harmony with each other and to protect all the rights of citizens and to prevent unnecessary and frequently repeated litigations, we should find in the very particular case which is presented here ample authority in the decisions which I have read why this committee, acting as a court, if you please, ought to have the power to make inquiry, to take evidence, for the purpose of determining the very question whether or not there is a perfect identity in the issue presented now and presented then. Here is authority for it in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I need argue no further. These authorities are ample. They draw the distinctions which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin omitted to state. They show that we have the right now, even if we were trammeled by the proceedings of a court of justice, to enter upon an inquiry as to what was the particular question that was tried before, and whether or not the judgment of the Senate has ever been taken upon the issue now presented.

Mr. President, looking at the record alone made by the Senate heretofore in the resolution adopted in reference to Mr. KELLOGG, it must be confessed that there is something in it which is a little peculiar. That resolution declares that the judgment of the Senate taken upon the adoption of the resolution was that the case was decided upon the merits. You will look in vain in the proceedings of the Senate before that time, and also, I think, of the committee, to ascertain precisely by that record what "the merits" were. "The merits" is a broad, comprehensive, and universal sort of term. It looks now as if the word "merits" was put in there simply for a purpose, as a sort of omnium gatherum, as a word that would cover every possible future defect, as a word that would stop the mouths of all men thereafter from asserting the truth against that finding or against that report.

I will not go back into what the committee did. I was here listening in the Senate of the United States to the controversies of members of the committee which amounted almost to a wrangle in reference to their action in the committee-room, how far they did investigate and how far they refused to investigate; and the impression left upon my mind, as the records of the Senate will now show, was that one party was accusing the other very assiduously of having taken a snap judgment upon it. Thereupon it became my duty to rise in the Senate and bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that at some future time, when the Senate would be better prepared to listen, and when the subject could be brought fully to its attention, there would be a demand for an investigation upon this subject. I entered a motion for a reconsideration or a new trial then and there, and that has been pending ever since. Neither the Senator from Louisiana nor any other Senator on that side of the Chamber who has taken occasion to read the records of the Senate at that time can say that he has had no notice and that this matter is sprung fresh upon him. They have had notice of this whole business; they have known from that day to this that whenever the democratic party had the power they would run a probe into this fraud, if it be a fraud, and they would open it to the core. They have known that we would always deny, as we denied then by way of precaution, that there was any doctrine of res adjudicata, any estoppel, any cloak or any cover that should hide the investigation of these wrongs and these frauds from the attention of the people of the United States. All the "if-anys" and all the aliundes were considered and discussed at that time. It was perfectly understood by all concerned that we at that time reserved the right, and gave notice of it to the world, to challenge that judgment which, professing to be upon the merits, never undertook to state one particle of what the merits were. The merits might have been anything. The leading question of the merits was whether the Packard or the Nicholls government was the true government of Louisiana. That was the greatest part of the merits of the controversy; because if it turned out that the Packard government was the true government in Louisiana then it followed as a matter of necessary consequence that Mr. Spofford had no standing in this tribunal, no right to a seat here, because he was elected by a body that was not the Legislature. I would submit it to any man of fair common sense in the world if in searching around through this covered and hidden expression attached to the words "the merits" for the true thing which ought to have controlled the Senate in giving a judgment upon that resolution, he would not find that the main question in the whole case was whether the Packard government or the Nicholls government was the true government of Louisiana; did the Packard legislature have the right to elect or did the Nicholls legislature have the right to elect? That was "the merits," and it was the point in "the merits" that you could not pass beyond. Mr. Spofford could not get the Senate beyond that point, nor could anybody else get the Senate beyond that point; because if the Packard legislature and Governor Kellogg were the true government of the State of Louisiana, Mr. KELLOGG came here with credentials regular upon their face from that government, under the seal of that State, attested by the governor and the secretary of state, and he had a right to his seat here until somebody showed that he had obtained it by fraud, and that therefore he was disqualified for that reason.

These were "the merits," and this was understood by the people of the United States at the time as being "the merits" that were settled by the Senate on that resolution. The people understood perfectly well that the question of fraud, especially in reference to the bribery of members of the Legislature, was not the question that the Senate settled.

Now it is said that we are in court. What sort of a court is this? It is a court of original jurisdiction. Is it a court of law or a court of equity? Is it one or the other, or is it both? Suppose it be both, and I dare say that whosoever claims for this court the powers and jurisdiction of any court of the United States would be obliged to concede that it had equity powers as well as law powers. How often have we witnessed judgments in courts of law obtained according to the strictest rules of legal procedure, enjoined, reversed, annulled, and set aside when a bill was filed on the equity side of the same court! How often have we seen a question settled in favor of the plaintiff in his action at law and in the same court for fraud in the procurement of the judgment, fraud in the issue of it, perjury in its procurement, or because the judgment was obtained in favor of the wrong man or obtained by one who was a pretender to the title and had no lawful right to it, when you turn to the other docket and get on the equity side of the court, the court enjoin, reverse, annul, and destroy the former judgment? If this be a court, how much less power has it got than any other or every other court, I should like to know. If we are to be trammeled here by the rules of law which belong to courts, let us have the power at least of all the rules by which courts administer justice, because if there be any one thing above another that a court is ordained to establish and to administer, it is justice. A court that has no power to do anything but injustice, no power to do anything but wrong, no power to protect anything but fraud, is a court that ought never to exist. I must therefore claim for the Senate, if it is a court, that it has got some of the powers of a court.

There was a case decided in 1833, the case of Sampeyreac and Stewart vs. The United States, which I desire to call to the attention of the Senate. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Thompson, and enough appears in the opinion of the court to show the application of it and the principle decided there to the matter in hand:

This case comes up on appeal from the superior court in the Territory of Arkansas.

The decree of the court was founded upon proceedings instituted under an act of Congress entitled "An act for further extending the powers of the judges of the superior court of the Territory of Arkansas, under the act of the 26th of May, 1824, and for other purposes," passed the 8th of May, 1830.

I will here observe that this suit, which was permitted by this act of Congress, was pending at the time of the passage of this law, and that the law was passed for the express purpose of giving the superior court of Arkansas an opportunity, by conferring upon it a jurisdiction which it had not before possessed, of doing justice between parties in the reversal of one of its own judgments rendered on the law side of that same court. Congress came in and passed a law to increase the jurisdiction of that court, which law had reference back by relation to a period anterior to its enactment. It was retroactive in its character. Congress was so anxious that justice should be done that it passed a law expressly retroactive in its character in order that by conferring the jurisdiction here prescribed upon the court it might enable that court to do justice. There is a broad and fair example of what Congress may do to reach justice. The truth is that the hands of Congress are very little trammeled when we are reaching for justice. It takes plain provisions and strong provisions to restrain the power of Congress to administer justice not only between man and man but between State and State, the whole country and the Senate itself. The act declares certain provisions which I will read:

Upon the proceedings on the bill of review instituted under this act, the court pronounced the following decree: "It is therefore adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the former decree of this court, in favor of the defendant Bernardo Sampeyreac against the United States, for four hundred acres of land, pronounced and recorded at the December term of this court in the year 1827, be, and the same is hereby, reversed, annulled, and held for naught." From this decree the present appeal was taken.

To a right understanding of the questions which have been made at the bar, it will be necessary briefly to state the proceedings which took place under the original bill.

There was an original bill filed in that same court.

That bill or petition was filed on the 21st of November, 1827, under the provisions of the act of the 26th of May, 1824, (7 Laws United States, 300,) setting forth that the complainant, Bernardo Sampeyreac, on the 6th of October, 1789, he then being an inhabitant of Louisiana, presented a petition to the then governor of the province asking a grant for a tract of land in full property, containing ten arpents in front, by the usual depth, on Strawberry River, &c. That afterward, on the 11th of October, 1789, the governor granted the petition. That at the time the grant was so made an order of survey was issued to the surveyor-general of the province. That by virtue of such grant and order of survey the petitioner acquired a claim to the land, which claim is secured to him by the treaty between the United States and the French republic of the 30th of April, 1803. The district attorney put in an answer, denying the several facts and allegations in the bill, and alleging that grants could only be made, legally, to persons in existence and actually residing in Louisiana.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what the answer was of the district attorney of the United States to that bill filed in that court. The action was brought in that court for the purpose of having the confirmation of this grant, and also of having the possession of this land delivered into the hands of the plaintiff in the action. He alleged first, you see, that "grants could only be made, legally, to persons in existence and actually residing in Louisiana."

That Sampeyreac, in whose name the bill is filed, is a fictitious person, never having had any actual existence; or if such person ever had any existence he was a foreigner, or is now dead, and made no transfer or assignment of the claim in his life-time. That he has no legal representative in existence; nor is there any one now living who is authorized to file this bill or prosecute this suit, and prayed that the bill might be dismissed.

There the district attorney of the United States for the Territory of Arkansas distinctly in his answer announced the fact as an issue in the cause that this man Bernardo Sampeyreac had no existence; that he was a mere fictitious person.

A witness by the name of John Heberard was examined and sworn to all the material facts necessary to establish the claim; and the court thereupon ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Bernardo Sampeyreac recover of the United States the said four hundred arpents of land.

After that decree had been rendered, after the court had adjourned, after their adjudication had become final in every possible respect, several years after, Congress passed a law authorizing that court to take jurisdiction of a case in the nature of a bill of review for the purpose of deciding any case, no matter when it occurred, or reviewing any judgment, it made no difference how long it had been rendered before that time, where there might be fraud or where injustice might have been done.

The bill of review is founded upon the allegation that the original decree was obtained by fraud and surprise; that the original petition and order of survey exhibited in the case are forged; that Heberard and the other witnesses in the cause committed the crime of perjury; that the order of survey was never signed by Mero, governor of Louisiana, as the same purports to have been; and that this fact has come to the knowledge of the district attorney since the decree was entered.

There was the condition; there was the point in the matter. When this false swearing and this fraud came to the knowledge of those who desired to protect the Government against the wrong, says the bill of review in this case, since the decree was rendered; says the memorial of Mr. Spofford, since the judgment was rendered in this case by the Senate of the United States upon the merits—

And the bill further charges that the said Sampeyreac is a fictitious person.

That is precisely the same allegation that was in the answer of the district attorney filed in the original suit. In both instances the plea was distinctly made that he was a fictitious person.

At the October term, 1830, this bill was taken, pro confesso, against Sampeyreac; at which term the appellant, Joseph Stewart, appeared in court and prayed to be made a defendant, and have leave to file an answer to the bill.

He was admitted, and then he went on to set up that he was an innocent purchaser without notice of this fraud or this wrong, committed by a man by the name of Bowie, who got up the fictitious name of Bernardo Sampeyreac and presented the bill in that court.

The answer of Stewart denies the frauds and forgeries alleged in the bill, but avers that if there was any fraud, corruption, or forgery, he is ignorant of it; and that he was a bona fide purchaser of the claim for a valuable consideration from one John J. Bowie, who conveyed to him the claim of the said Bernardo Sampeyreac, by deed bearing date about the 22d of October, 1828. Upon the final hearing the court reversed the original decree, as has been already stated.

The court then go on with an extensive argument. It is not necessary to detain the Senate by reading the argument of the court, but I shall simply announce the judgment which the court passed in the case, which was that—

The decree of the court below is accordingly affirmed, with costs. (7 Peters, Supreme Court Reports, 235-242.)

What was that decree? The decree was that the bill of review should be sustained, that the judgment which had been obtained in the name of Sampeyreac before that time in that same court should be reversed and held for naught; and that because it appeared, and it only appeared inferentially really in the case, but it appeared sufficiently to satisfy the court, that the witness who had been sworn committed perjury, and that Sampeyreac was a fictitious person.

If a court of justice can do that in the exercise of its high powers of equity for the purpose of getting back to the real truth of the matter, for the purpose of doing justice between the Government of the United States and the claimants of this property, can any just reason be asserted why the Senate of the United States that has under its care and under its consideration at all times the qualifications of its membership should not indulge a citizen, who is respectable and who is honest and who comes by constitutional petition, in having the subject investigated in which we are all so deeply concerned as to whether fraud was committed, as to whether bribery was perpetrated in obtaining the seat now held by the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. President, I have said this much, more than I would have said, indeed I should not have uttered a word on this subject but for the strong and earnest challenge which came from the other side, and which addressed itself not simply to the judgment but to the conscience of Senators, that if we should not vote for this resolution to carry on this inquiry and to bring these facts to the attention of the Senate we should thereby commit ourselves to a doctrine that the judgments of the Senate were mere wisps of straw, mere breaths from the nostrils of men, to be reversed and set aside and dispensed with at our will and pleasure. It is very true that I do not know of any power that can prevent the Senate of the United States from doing its will in reference to its membership. I know of no outside or constraining power that can hold it to its duty. I understand that the Senate of the United States is the judge of its own duty in matters of this kind. If the body shall ever become so weak or so corrupt that it has not sufficient strength or moral force or virtue to make honest and correct decisions, then it will cease to represent the people of the United States and ought to be dispensed with. But, sir, we have trusted the Senate for nearly a hundred years now, and I trust that we may be willing to confide to it for many centuries to come, that it will, in the execution of its own high powers of jurisdiction in deciding upon the qualifications of its own membership and the right of claimants to seats here, be influenced always by wisdom and by good conscience.

We cannot lay precedents down for ourselves which will bind even ourselves, or at all events our successors. The laws that we pass here are repealable. We cannot by the concurrence of the other House of Congress and the President fix upon the statute-book's a law that cannot be repealed. Our judgment rendered to-day may be set aside to-morrow, or during the next session of Congress; and so we can set aside the judgment of those who preceded us. No man has a right to ask a question on that subject except to his own heart, Have I acted honestly, have I acted faithfully, in my judgment?

I submit, Mr. President, that it is not only the right but it is the duty of every Senator to decide for himself all these questions without reference to what any man may say to him in regard to the effect of the precedent which he establishes. Do justice and do right now. Do justice and right while the subject is in hand. Satisfy our consciences by inquiry and by sound judgment, if we possess it, that what we do is right, and then the country will applaud what we do; but if we should do right even from a mean spirit, the country would have a right to scout us.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not intend to go into any discussion of this resolution, but I deem it proper that the question should be presented fairly before the Senate and before the country.

The resolution is a very simple one. It comes from a committee of which I have the honor to be a member. As I have before stated, that committee has been charged with the investigation and examination of a memorial presented by Mr. Spofford, in which he claims that he is entitled to the seat now held by WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG, and in which he also claims that if he is not entitled to the seat there are facts connected with the election of Mr. KELLOGG which disqualify him from holding the position of a Senator on this floor.

The committee gave the memorial referred to them careful consideration, and they believed that there was matter contained in the memorial which demanded an investigation. Not being able to make that investigation without the special authority of the Senate, they instructed the chairman of the committee to bring in a resolution asking the authority of the Senate to make the investigation, in order that they might ascertain the truth of the allegations contained in the memorial. That resolution was presented, as I once before remarked, not with a view of expressing the opinion of any member of the committee upon any matter which might be involved in the controversy nor with the design of committing any member of the Senate upon any question that might be embraced in the main question involved in the resolution. Our task was a simple, plain one in the discharge of the duty which had been devolved upon us by the Senate. But when we come here with that resolution we are antagonized and opposed by a proposition that this whole question has been already closed, and that further action on the part of the committee and the Senate is very improper. The committee have been charged in fact with coming here with a pretense, to use the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] We have been charged with coming here with a scheme, to use the language of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] We have been charged with coming here in the spirit of revolution, to use the language of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] I cannot suffer these allegations against a committee with which I am connected to be made without at least repelling all such charges and all such insinuations. We have come here to further no scheme; we have come here with no pretense; we have come here in no spirit of revolution, but simply to ask the Senate for authority to discharge a duty incumbent upon us by the action of the Senate itself, to obtain the facts that we might lay them before the Senate, so that it might dispassionately and intelligently judge whether the charges and allegations contained in this memorial are true or are not true.

I shall not enter into any discussion of the questions which have been raised. I listened attentively this morning to the rule of res adjudicata as presented by the Senator from Wisconsin. The argument was made this morning fairly and dispassionately, and I have no fault to find with the law which the Senator from Wisconsin presented. It may have been a very proper argument to present, as I have no doubt it has been presented, from the very brief that was read here, in the Supreme Court of the United States, and it may have had the effect there to determine the judgment of that court in the case pending before it, if I am correct in my supposition, that it was an argument presented to the Supreme Court; but I submit that it has no application whatever to this body. I shall not enter into that discussion, which has been so ably presented by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

But I only rose to say to you, sir, and to the Senate, that we simply desire the authority which we have asked that we may eliminate the truth, and that we may present this question fairly and candidly to the Senate that they may determine this whole controversy intelligently and fairly between the claimant and the party holding the seat, between the people of Louisiana and the people of the country and the Senator from Louisiana now holding the seat.

If I felt disposed to retort upon gentlemen who have made charges against the action of the committee and against the action of the party to which I belong, I might remind them of some things in the past, but I will not do it. I ask what is the aspect of the whole question presented to-day to the Senate by this case? One party is seeking to ascertain the truth; the other party is interposing technicalities to prevent the elimination of the truth so that the Senate may judge properly in the whole matter. When gentlemen undertake to charge schemes and pretenses and revolution against the committee of which I am a member, and against the party of which I am a member, I feel disposed to give them a Roland for their Oliver, for that committee and the democratic party can give as well as receive blows. But I remember the high place in which I am, and I will not enter into the impugning of the motives of gentlemen as honorable as the men who charge them. I wish to place the matter fairly and squarely before the Senate. We simply ask authority. We do not ask any member of the Senate to commit himself to any question whatever involved in the investigation. If the facts elicited shall show that the party holding the seat ought not to hold it, that will be a question for the Senate to determine at the proper time, after it is in possession of the facts. If the facts shall show that he is properly entitled to this seat and ought to retain it, that will be a matter which the Senate at the proper time can and will determine. What I desire to say is that we have entered upon no scheme, that we are not here under any pretense, but we are here to ascertain the truth so that the Senate may have the truth before them when they come to the final determination of this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PENDLETON in the chair.) The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the vote is taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, which is to strike out the whole of the resolution and insert a different proposition, I wish to offer an amendment to the text of the resolution, which I believe is in order under the rule, by adding after the word "petition," in line 6 of the printed resolution, these words:

So far only as relates to any charge in said petition of personal misconduct on the part of said Kellogg, which may render him liable to expulsion or censure.

So that the instruction part of the resolution shall read:

And said committee is hereby instructed to inquire into the matters alleged in said petition so far only as relates to any charge in said petition of personal misconduct on the part of said Kellogg which may render him liable to expulsion or censure, &c.

The object of my moving that amendment is to confine the inquiry to the personal misconduct, if any such there shall turn out to be, to charges of misconduct on the part of the present Senator from Louisiana. It does appear to me that the Senate did decide and decide understandingly—I do not mean by that that it decided right; there is a difference of opinion about that, but that it decided the question—which was the lawful Legislature of the State of Louisiana on the occasion of the election of a Senator, and that that lawful Legislature in the methods and by the ways provided by law and in conformity with it had elected this gentleman, Mr. KELLOGG, to that place. So I understand it. I know there is a difference of opinion about that; but from looking into the case, it appears so to me, with great deference to gentlemen who think otherwise. There was by reference, before the committee, and so on their report, with all the papers before the Senate, the evidence that there had been and was complaint as to the conduct of Mr. KELLOGG in securing his election, assuming the Legislature to have been the Legislature of Louisiana; but that was incidental to the main question. It is true the committee had jurisdiction of it. The charge was known if they looked at the papers. The petitioner by referring to the papers knew that there was an imputation of that kind, and that would have been the time properly perhaps to have made that inquiry also. But in substance the case proceeded upon the fundamental question of whether the body which elected Mr. KELLOGG was the body that had authority to do it, and whether that body did it in the forms and at the times prescribed by law. All that plainly was directly in issue, and it was decided.

Mr. President, I do not deny the power (and I use the word "power" reflectively) of this body to reverse that decision. I do not deny the power of this body by a resolution offered to-day and passed to-morrow to say that the State of Vermont has not elected me; and having said so I do not deny the power of the Senate on the next day, if you could change the majority, to adopt another resolution which should say that the Legislature of Vermont had elected me, and put me back into my seat again, and so on, to-day a member of the Senate and to-morrow not a member of the Senate. It has the power to do it because the Constitution has confided to this body, without any other restraint than that which is imposed upon us—there is no tribunal that can review our action—the power of doing as we like, just as the Constitution of the United States has reposed in the Supreme Court certain original jurisdiction, and when you have created the Supreme Court, which cannot create itself it is true, that original jurisdiction attaches. When a case of original jurisdiction comes before it, it may to-day decide for the plaintiff; it may to-morrow, in spite of any power that the Constitution can bring to bear upon it to restrain it, reverse that decision and decide for the other party. In an ejectment case, for instance, if you can imagine that a matter of original jurisdiction; in a boundary case between two States which plainly is one of original jurisdiction, the Supreme Court may decide to-day that the boundary of Rhode Island (because that is a case that once occurred) was in a certain place between that State and Massachusetts, and that that embraced people who had before yielded their allegiance to the State of Massachusetts; the day after it may reverse that decision and turn over that people again to the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, and so on. The Supreme Court has the power to do it, but we all agree that it would be a monstrous and flagrant violation of its duty to exercise the power in that way. So it appears to me to be here. When the Senate has once decided upon such a question, the rules of the Senate, the principles of justice, everything that enters into the orderly administration of government, by which alone freedom is secure at last, must come to the test, and having a decision once made it must stand, unless, as is provided by the rules of the Senate, a reconsideration of the question is moved within the time and in the way that the rules provide.

The resolution which declared that Mr. KELLOGG was entitled to a seat from the State of Louisiana upon the merits of the controversy that had been presented, might that day or the next day after, under the rules of the Senate, on a motion made by a Senator who voted in the majority, have been reconsidered; but the rules of the Senate, which embrace that question as well as every other, say that if the Senate means to retry a question that it has once decided, it must do it within a certain statute of limitations, using the word "statute" of course in a sense which here is merely another way of saying the law, which is the law of this body. It is a law founded, as I say, upon the principles of the orderly administration of government, and any body of men, as it appears to me (for this ought not to be a party question and I speak to myself and my associates as much as to others) which violates that fundamental theory of having the decisions of this Senate upon a question presented to them reversed and changed otherwise than by the fixed and preordained laws that the body itself has made for its own government, is taking a step most dangerous to justice, to liberty, to good government. You may gain a temporary advantage, we may gain it, I will say, supposing we were all convinced now that we had committed an error, by rectifying a temporary and occasional wrong; but upon what principle do we do it? We do it upon the principle that there is no decision of the Senate that the changing opinions of gentlemen may not reverse from day to day, from year to year, from Congress to Congress. When you have stood upon a principle of that kind, this body, the most conservative, the most dignified, the most regular, it may be, of any in the world, has committed itself to the principle that the changing opinions of its members, as its majorities do change from day to day upon various questions, (independent of the broad ones of political management and administration that divide us usually,) may allow it to declare that every member of this body, applying it to this case merely, holds his seat at the pleasure of the majority of his fellow-members who happen to be present on that day or the next.

Sir, it does appear to me that when you look to the long future, when you look over the long past that has gone over the Senate without any experiment of this kind having been tried so far as it affects the point that was decided by the Senate of the regularity of this election, be the point decided right or wrong—that is not the question I am now talking about at all,—you are taking a step that many of you and many of us will live to be sorry for, if we establish such a precedent. But when you come to the other question which affects the personal conduct of a Senator, and which it is said was not then fairly understood or drawn into question but only appeared as a distant incident, and which if it had been proved would not have upset the election, as to the regularity of it, or the title of this gentleman to his seat, unless the bribery went so far as to show that it would have changed the majority, then it may be that it is a different question. Theoretically everybody can see that it is.

Therefore, inasmuch as there appears to be a misunderstanding as to whether the question of the personal conduct of the sitting Senator was drawn into question and was decided, as every other question confessedly was, I wish to limit this inquiry to that point and to that point alone, because it is impossible, in my view, to say that we open the whole of this inquiry now without having decided that the inquiry is proper, and that if the facts turn out to be that we made a mistake in deciding that one Legislature was regular rather than another, that mistake is to be reversed. Every court of justice, when it is applied to to grant a new trial, not only requires that the application for a new trial shall be supported by evidence showing exactly the point upon which it is to proceed, but it never grants an application for a new trial or takes any step toward it except to hear the application, as we are now hearing this, until it can clearly see that if what is alleged is made out in proof, it will change the result.

I feel, then, that if I vote for this resolution as it now stands I am voting for a declaration that if it shall appear on a rehearing and a retrial of this question that the so-called Packard legislature was not the true one of that State, and that the so-called Nicholls legislature was, then I am bound, if I have reopened this case for a new trial, to decide upon the case as it is presented anew, upon the new evidence, and so to reverse the judgment, override it, or set it aside.

Although it is a small matter when applied to any one man or one State, I think in the long run it is a step that for the ultimate safety of this Union every Senator ought to refuse to take. It is far better that you should bear the incumbrance and the grievance and the wrong of having a State misrepresented for six years, than it is to say that party heats, party animosities, private combinations in parties as well as between them, on both sides of the Chamber, (because I am not speaking of parties here in the political sense at all,) will lead you to be retrying questions in close times when the Senate is evenly balanced and sometimes when it is not, because our terms are so long, that when there may be, as hitherto, a republican majority heavy in this body, we shall be strongly tempted to reject and to turn out some Senator who does not agree with us in opinion, not because it would not make any difference then, but in three or four or six or ten years, when the thing comes around again, it may make a great difference. The temptation is too great, sir. I therefore think that public safety, public justice, right, prudence, policy, and the true theory of the Constitution require us to resist all temptations to try over again, except in the time of it and under the rule for a reconsideration, any question of this kind that we have once decided.

So I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment which I have offered to the text may be agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, as a member of the committee consenting to the reporting of this resolution, I wish to say that I voted for it in committee, and shall vote for it here, feeling and intending that I do not commit myself in the slightest degree to the decision which I shall give or try to give when the case comes before the Senate after the proposed inquiry shall have been made. I had no idea then, and have none now, that by authorizing this committee to take proof, where it is asked on a case like this, I am in the slightest degree committing myself not to give full force, when the evidence is produced, to the rule that has been discussed in reference to res adjudicata. I do not commit myself at all. I have never thought of the question, the committee has never consulted about it, for it was said there, as I say here, that we do this not intending to be committed ourselves, not expecting any one else to be committed, on the question, but in order to take the proof and then having whatever proof is competent and proper before us to report upon it and ask for a decision.

That is the reason why members of the committee felt that they ought not to, and would not at this stage of the proceedings enter at all into the debate on the subject of what would fall within the rule of res adjudicata and what would not. When the case comes up, I certainly shall vote for a rule that I shall expect, so far as we can make a precedent, will be for all parties, majorities and minorities, and I will vote for no rule that would unsettle what had been settled on an issue joined and tried.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I suppose it is hardly necessary to remind the Senate that the effect, if not the purpose, of the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Vermont is simply to limit the effect which the Senate shall give to the testimony, in advance of the testimony being taken. Inasmuch as the Senate cannot undertake to say what the testimony will be, what will be the effect of the testimony, or what vote will be required of the Senate in relation to the seat occupied by the Senator from Louisiana, whether to vacate that seat, whether to expel the member, or whether to censure him, all of which is to be left to be determined by the testimony when taken, and which cannot be determined in advance, I hope the Senate will have no trouble in voting down the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Georgia is partly right. The amendment that I have offered does limit, in respect of the effect of the testimony, the inquiry and the action of the Senate to two points, and those are all the points that the Constitution allows us to exert our powers upon as it respects a Senator of this body. The Senate has already decided that this gentleman is a Senator of this body. Therefore, if you do not limit the testimony, but say that you will retry this case, the very act of retrial, notwithstanding individual disclaimers asserts the jurisdiction to decide it according to the evidence that may be produced on the new trial. You grant a new trial by this resolution as it now stands, not upon the question merely of the conduct of this man, but upon the question that the Senate confessedly did decide, that there was a lawful Legislature which by lawful methods so far as conformity to the statute as to time and place and mode of procedure went, did elect this gentleman a Senator. There is therefore nothing left undecided in any point of view, except the question of the conduct of a member of this body. The Constitution points out to us what we may do and only what we may do in respect of the conduct of a member of this body, and that is that we may expel him, and included in that power, as it has been settled by precedent and practice, as a less and smaller mitigated exertion of that power, you may censure him instead of expelling him; that is, you may subject him to discipline. That is one thing.

Therefore, in reply to my honorable friend from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] who I felt assured would agree with me in respect of the principles I laid down, I submit to his consideration that no matter if every single Senator in this body should rise, as he has done, and say "I am not committed," the act of passing this resolution is reopening for trial upon its merits the very question that we have decided. When you have got the evidence you may say, to be sure, "we have taken a misstep; this evidence all goes for nothing; it proves, to be sure, that the Nicholls legislature was the true legislature; but we do not feel at liberty so to hold now." When we grant the order to take the testimony to prove it we must grant it for some purpose. The Senate does not mean to stultify itself, to send a committee merely wool-gathering. We have made a mistake. Senators cannot then say "we will correct that mistake by making another, an illogical other; but in the direction of justice we will not do anything about it." Of course it is in our power to right one wrong by doing another wrong. The other wrong would be only a wrong in a technical sense in that case; but there is implied necessarily in the very act, as it appears to me, and with all deference to my honorable friend, without regard to the opinions of persons, Senators or Representatives,—there is implied in the very act of saying that we will reopen this case for testimony, the exertion of the power, the rightful exertion of the power, to determine the very question that has been decided.

There is the difficulty that troubles me, and no amount of disclaimer as I say, if it were absolutely unanimous, can affect the consequence that lives in, and resides in, and springs up from this resolution that we are undertaking to reconsider and retry by proceeding to inquire into the regularity of that Legislature, because this committee is our committee; it is our retrial. If it were right here present now and the testimony were to be taken by the Senate, and if this resolution depended only, as for this purpose I will treat it as doing now, upon the question of a definite proposition to retry the case as to the lawfulness of the Legislature that elected Mr. KELLOGG, what would the Senator do? Would my honorable friend from New York say, "I will proceed to retry this question; I will take all the evidence, public and private, and from witnesses, &c., which bears upon the question of those two Legislatures, and will reserve to myself the right after I have taken this evidence of deciding that I have no jurisdiction to determine the case according to the evidence as it actually appears?"

It is an assertion and a necessary and an inseparable assertion of jurisdiction to retry, by the very fact that you proceed to retry; and the act of the committee is the act of the Senate. It is precisely the same as if we did it right here and did it now. So I say to the Senator, leaving entirely aside all this question of corruption, bribery, &c., which is another thing, take his case or mine, where it has not been said, New York being very strongly democratic when he was appointed and Vermont rather strongly republican when I was, and so there was no temptation to bribery because everybody would know that he and I would get all the votes of our party of course; and it is proposed to try whether the Legislature of the State of New York that elected my friend was a regular Legislature, and it appeared that the Senate had once solemnly considered and decided that question. Now the Senator says, "to be sure we have done that but when I exercise this jurisdiction of going into a new trial I reserve to myself the right to say in the end that I have not got any right to go into a new trial." Would it not be more consonant to the principles of justice and procedure to decide on the application for a new trial, whether it is right to grant one or not, before allowing the party to proceed? Most certainly it would, it appears to me. Therefore in respect of this branch of the question that I am now speaking of, in taking this step we cannot escape from the responsibility of claiming by our votes the rightful power of asserting the jurisdiction to retry this case upon that branch of it that I am now speaking of; and asserting that jurisdiction to retry, then, if we are logical, we must follow the conseqences and upon the new evidence and the old evidence all brought together, redecide the case de novo.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter into the argument again, but I do not think it ought to close without the attention of the Senate and of the country being called to the very remarkable statement of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] Some uneasiness was manifested when some Senators of the minority claimed that the real purpose was to retry and get a different decision of the question decided by the Senate at the time this Senator was admitted to his seat, and it was claimed that such a suggestion was not only unfounded, but was almost an imputation on the personal good faith of members of the Senate. And yet the Senator from Alabama informs the Senate to-day that we ought to have known what was coming, for that, when certain evidence having been rejected, or a proposition to take further evidence on certain points submitted by Mr. Spofford not having been acceded to by the committee, it was brought into the Senate and the Senate determined that no further evidence upon those questions was proper to be taken, and having decided that question and then the main question, he rose and gave notice, to use the language which he just uttered, if I understood him, that the democratic party thereafter would put its probe into this matter, and that this matter should thereafter, when the majority in the Senate changed—I do not mean that he used those words about the change of the majority, but that the matter should thereafter be tried and investigated and decided by the democratic party.

Now, what gentleman has a right to manifest uneasiness, what gentleman has a right to be indignant, when a suggestion of that kind is made on this side of the Chamber, when a gentleman so high in the consideration of his own party informs us not only that that is the purpose so far as he understands it and has a right to utter it, but that we ought not to be surprised at it from the fact that we have had due notice for two years?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not a very exact remembrance of the language I used on the occasion, but I have no doubt that the Senator from Massachusetts has a perfect photograph of it.

Mr. HOAR. I spoke of the language the Senator just used in the Senate to-day in which he referred to the notice he had given two years ago.

Mr. MORGAN. I gave the notice (it is here in the RECORD) to which I referred. I did not give that notice in the name of the democratic party. I gave it in the name of those Senators who believed, as I believed, that the device of the Senator from Massachusetts to prevent an investigation and examination of the truth by a report which he made upon the merits could not prevail against the truth whenever we had a chance to bring it out.

The Senator from Massachusetts was on that committee and was a party to that device. He made a report "on the merits," what he chose at that time to impute to those words, without disclosing at the time what was the real meaning of them. I attempted at that time by an amendment which I offered to the resolution to reserve to the Senate the right thereafter to investigate these points in a fit substitute offered by the Senator from Delaware, and after some debate between the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and myself, in which I understood that it was conceded that the Senate would have as much right afterward as it had then to limit and control the subject, I withdrew my amendment, giving notice at the same time that in the withdrawal of my amendment I did not concede the position of the Senator from New York. It was with that view that I said that the Senate had notice from that time forward that there were Senators, or at least one, who would always insist that this subject was not res adjudicata, that the words "the merits" did not cover the whole field of inquiry which was open to the Senate and to the world, and that thereafter we should contend that the attempt which had been made had failed to shut off and blockade inquiry into the truth by the introduction into the resolution of those technical words, "the merits," which might mean more or less just as they might be thereafter interpreted.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, whether the Senator gave his notice in the name of the democratic party I do not undertake to say. I understood him himself to say this morning in his speech that he gave notice what the democratic party would do, which comes pretty near being the same thing.

Now, in regard to the introduction in the resolution under which Mr. KELLOGG was admitted to take the oath of the words "on the merits," declaring him entitled to the seat on the merits, which the honorable Senator characterizes as a device, he has probably forgotten or does not know that that resolution follows precisely in that particular the language of the resolution referring the case to the committee, which came, if I am not mistaken, from a Senator on the other side of the Chamber. Mr. KELLOGG presented himself to take the oath on his certificate with the rest of the Senators at the session which began on the 4th of March, 1877, and several republican Senators uniting with nearly or quite all the democratic Senators on the floor, Mr. KELLOGG'S certificate was sent, without admitting him to the oath, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The committee, however, having under that resolution nothing referred to them but his certificate, it was supplemented shortly after by the resolution that the committee proceed to inquire and determine into the right of Mr. KELLOGG to a seat "on the merits," and when the committee came to make a report they followed the language of the order under which they were acting, and reported that WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG was entitled to the seat on the merits, and their reasons were stated at length. Now, it is that transaction which the Senator from Alabama speaks of as a device!

Mr. MORGAN. I was not aware at all who coined the expression "the merits," or where it originated. I have no doubt at all of the power of the Senator to cover his position at any time on that point.

Mr. HOAR. I am informed—I do not myself vouch for this of my own recollection, but it is suggested to me by a Senator near me—that the author of that resolve was the honorable Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Merrimon, a democratic member of the committee. As I said, I cannot answer for that of my own recollection.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. In the committee I heard no reason why the word "merits" should be inserted in the resolution by any gentleman who favored it.

Mr. HOAR. I said of my own knowledge, of my own examination, that the Senate resolution sending the case to the committee after the prima facie case had been settled directed the committee to consider and report in regard to the title "on the merits." That is where the phrase came from. My recollection is that it was a democratic motion. I am told, but of which I have no recollection, that the motion came from the then Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Merrimon, and that was the motion of reference. When the committee made their report they made their report of the execution of the authority in the language of the authority.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am not talking about those facts. I say when the resolution was reported to this body and was drafted and presented to the committee and adopted by the majority, I could see no reason for inserting the word "merits" in it, because, as I stated at the time and as appears on record, we had not considered the case on the merits; we had not examined it; we had not taken the testimony; on the contrary, we had refused to take the testimony, and I could not see any reason why the word "merits" should be inserted in the resolution unless it was because there was no merit in the case.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me one moment? I have now the record of the committee, the printed proceedings of the committee, from which it appears that this resolution was offered by Mr. Merrimon:

Resolved, That the committee proceed to examine and ascertain the substantial merits of the respective claims of Hon. W. P. KELLOGG and Hon. H. M. Spofford to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Louisiana, and to this end to inquire particularly which, or whether either, of the two rival bodies claiming to be the Legislature of said State, in January and April last, was the true and lawful Legislature of said State.

This resolution was agreed to unanimously; so that not only the previous order of the Senate but the resolution of the committee to proceed to take up that case used this phrase.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But they did never do anything but take it up. They never did consider it.

Mr. MORGAN. It is very clear that if this was a democratic baby it was nursed to death by the republican nurses on that committee. The "merits" have been very little considered. I then offered a proviso to the resolution reported by the committee, as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall be so construed as to preclude the Senate from its right to demand an investigation of the charges presented in the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware and upon which a vote of the Senate has just been taken, as affecting the right of WILLIAM P. KELLOGG to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. We cannot hear the Senator on this side.

Mr. TELLER. We cannot hear a word.

Mr. CONKLING. The rest make too much noise and the Senator himself too little.

Mr. MORGAN. This was my amendment:

Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall be so construed as to preclude the Senate from its right to demand an investigation of the charges presented in the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware and upon which a vote of the Senate has just been taken, as affecting the right of WILLIAM P. KELLOGG to a seat in the Senate.

That was the amendment I offered, and upon that the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and myself had some debate. I then concluded the remarks, to which I referred to-day, as follows:

What the rights of myself or any other Senator may hereafter be must be judged by the Senate when the question is presented. Of course they must be judged under the law and according to the Constitution; but I must say that it is my duty now to inform the Senate that upon some proper occasion, if this resolution shall pass, an opportunity will be demanded to bring the subject of the fraud of Kellogg in obtaining his credentials to the attention of the Senate and the country.

That was the notice to which I referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am not able to see, and I ask Senators on all sides of the Chamber to consider whether they can see, that it makes any difference to the present question whether the Senator from Georgia, then a member of that committee, thought that the case had been duly examined or not, because that implies the very thing that gentlemen are so much hesitating to say that they wish to imply, a right to retry the case. You may say when we have decided this question to-day, that Senators did not sufficiently attend to the reasons that were given, which enter into the merits of every controversy. There are not only facts, but there are reasons, and facts are of no consequence unless they are rightly applied to the solution of the question in hand. Therefore the argument of the Senator from Georgia when he says that the case was not sufficiently considered, that one part of the committee, the majority, were blind to what was obvious to him, and I suppose the other part of the committee thought he was blind to what was obvious to them, and then when it came to the Senate one part of the Senate did not sufficiently consider the facts and reasons that would follow from them and their application, and, therefore a mistake was made,—all that comes back to the original proposition of undertaking to reopen and redispose of a question respecting the right of a member of this body to his seat upon the very question, the fundamental question, involved in the whole affair, upon the ground, which can always be found whether the vote of the Senate was unanimous or only by a majority, that Senators had not sufficiently considered and learned the facts, or had not sufficiently considered the application of those facts to the point which those facts were destined to control in one way or another, or the principles of law which should guide their application. It comes right back to the fundamental proposition, and that fundamental proposition, as far as I can see it, this Senate is deciding in respect of its rightful exercise of a power which I admit it has. It has the power to dismiss you to-day, except on an objection of one day's notice, and if you were to rule that it required a day's notice of a resolution to turn you out at this moment, all the majority would have to do would be to appeal and overrule you, and out you would have to go; and so would I or anybody else. Of course I only address the Chair as the conspicuous person whom we all address.

That is the thing we are now called upon to say we have the rightful jurisdiction to do, independent of the question of our power to turn anybody out or bring anybody in, which undoubtedly resides with us, but it would be such an abuse of power as would really disorganize the Government. We should be, as the Senator from Wisconsin has said, worse than Mexicanized; we should be hanging and playing with the titles of Senators and the rights of States to have their Senators here upon the plausible and sufficient ground to our own conscience in each particular case "we will say this is right; our fellow ought to have got in; if he did not get votes enough it was because there was some trouble at the primaries, or he did not have a fair chance in respect to the election of the representatives who composed the Legislature." And so you make this the mere football not merely of party politics but of everything evil that enters into the composition of society. Can we afford to do it? Can we afford to do it for the sake of doing a personal and temporary act of justice even, speaking to it from the point of view of my honorable friend from Alabama and others who think this case was decided wrong? That is what I wish to put in all seriousness to my honorable friends who did not think as I did about this case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] perfecting the matter which is sought to be stricken out by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. CONKLING. May we hear it read, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6, after the word "petition," it is proposed to insert:

So far only as relates to any charge in said petition of personal misconduct on the part of said Kellogg which may render him liable to expulsion or censure.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment. I hope it will not be adopted.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WHYTE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) I desire to state that I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If he were present, it is likely he would vote "yea;" I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when Mr. BAYARD'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. BAYARD] is paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.] My colleague, if he were here, would vote "nay."

Mr. EATON, (when Mr. CARPENTER'S name was called.) On this question the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] is paired with me. Were he here, I suppose he would vote for the amendment; I should vote against it.

Mr. CHANDLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] temporarily.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] If the Senator from Pennsylvania were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD;] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey,

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 27; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to offer an amendment to perfect the text of the resolution. I move to amend by adding at the conclusion of the resolution these words:

Provided, That the inquiry hereby authorized shall be confined to the matters alleged in the memorial of Mr. Spofford to be new and different from those covered by the previous inquiry.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope that amendment will not prevail, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I second the demand.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays by all means.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to make one remark. I do not believe, I will not profess to believe that there is any sound distinction in law or in reason between a question which was, and a question which might have been, inquired into before, when this contest was pending. Discovering, however, that there are members of the Senate who see or think they see a difference between the points at which actual inquiry was aimed and points at which no inquiry was actually aimed although inquiry was competent, I offer this amendment to accommodate them and to distinguish in favor of what for brevity I will call newly discovered evidence, so that Mr. Spofford may be allowed now to allege not only what he did not in truth allege, but to allege what he might have alleged and did not; in other words that he may avail himself of all the knowledge which came to him afterward, and shall be concluded only in respect of those things which were settled and which he himself says were settled by the committee and by the Senate. I seek by this amendment to segregate newly discovered matter and all of it from that confessedly embraced not only in law but in fact within the prior adjudication.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The amendment of the Senator from New York carries with it an implication that the committee may investigate, may take jurisdiction of that which they are not entitled by the memorial to take jurisdiction of. As a member of that committee I desire to say that that committee fully understands the authority which is conferred upon it, and will not trespass beyond or take jurisdiction of that which is not committed to it; and I am not, as a member of that committee, willing to rest under the implied imputation embraced in the amendment of the Senator from New York that the committee with which I have the honor to be connected will transcend its authority and make inquiry upon subjects that it is not authorized by the Senate to inquire into. The amendment of the Senator is a distrust, a manifest distrust, of the discretion of the committee, and as a member of the committee I can do nothing else than protest against any such imputation upon a committee to which I have the honor to belong. The amendment of the Senator is wholly unnecessary. That committee will have charge of the matters conferred upon it by the Senate, and will not trangress and transcend the authority given to it. There is, therefore, no necessity for the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it was a quaint remark of a celebrated judge, "the court is not hungry after jurisdiction." Had I supposed that "as the hart panteth after the water brooks" so the Committee on Privileges and Elections was panting for jurisdiction and for large opportunities, I should have been able to understand that there was some offense, some disagreeable check in the amendment I offered; but without the declaration of the Senator from Delaware, I could never have conceived that a committee of the Senate about to be instructed by the Senate to perform a certain duty would take offense because the Senate did not lay upon it more of duty and confer upon it more of power and prerogative than might be proposed.

This amendment of mine is not a criticism of the committee. Far from it; it is like an order which the court of chancery sends to a master assigning duties to him, pointing out, particularizing inquiry to be made; and the same reason which invokes the action of the Senate, the same power on which that action rests should the original resolution prevail, explains, excuses, and renders inoffensive any limitation or curtailment of that power which a majority of the Senate shall affix. If the Senate orders the Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire at large without any denoted discrimination between one domain of inquiry and another, then that committee is irksomely burdened with the duty of making general and indiscriminate inquiry, and is so burdened so far as regards the commission of the Senate under which it proceeds to act. On the contrary, if the Senate in laying duties upon the committee distinguishes between what it would deem an unreasonable and unnecessary exaction of the committee and that which it deems necessary, surely a committee so well conducted as the Committee on Privileges and Elections could never be carried off into the wild fancy that disrespect or want of consideration was involved in the direction which the Senator has indicated.

So far from intending any unkindness to that committee, my regard for it is such that I would not see it overworked by exploring that ground in respect of which more than ten thousand octavo pages, we are told, of testimony have already been taken. Who capable of admiring, as it deserves to be admired, the Committee on Privileges and Elections, would have the heart to require that committee to retraverse all that ground or to do anything which the committee could providently be spared. No, Mr. President, that will not do. This is the Senate acting now. The Senate is marking the boundaries of jurisdiction; the Senate is to say whether it will hold that in a case adjudicated and certificated as far as any case can be, it will proceed to unsettle and retry all and all manner of questions, or whether if it insist upon proceeding at all, it will proceed only so far as somebody has been found with courage enough to allege that the matter was new or newly discovered. That is the Senate's act, and it can never escape upon any question of etiquette or consideration for a committee because the chairman of a committee rises and affects to take umbrage at the idea of putting a bridle or check upon the power of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BLAINE, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea." I desire further to state that my colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired on this question with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.] If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. CHANDLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) On all questions connected with this matter I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when Mr. PADDOCK's name was called.) I see that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] is not here. The Senator from Nebraska is paired with my colleague, [Mr. GORDON.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] If he were here, I should vote "nay," and I believe he would vote "yea."

The Secretary concluded the roll-call.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] on this question. The Senator from Pennsylvania, if here, would vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Platt,
Bell,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Booth,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Saunders,
Bruce,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Teller,

Johnston,	McPherson,	Thurman,
Jones of Nevada,	Paddock,	Wallace,
Kellogg,	Plumb,	Whyte,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the original resolution by adding thereto the following:

And said committee are further instructed to inquire and report whether bribery or other corrupt or unlawful means were resorted to to secure the alleged election of the memorialist.

Mr. SAULSBURY. We will accept that amendment.

Several SENATORS. Let it be reported again.

The Secretary read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] just read.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am instructed by the committee to say they will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as a substitute for the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the text of the resolution by inserting after the word "that" in the first line where it occurs after the word "resolved," the words:

Recognizing the validity and finality of the previous action of the Senate in the premises.

So as to read:

Resolved, That, recognizing the validity and finality of the previous action of the Senate in the premises, the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the memorial of Henry M. Spofford, &c.

Mr. President, the amendment I have now had the honor to offer is in order to save any committal of the Senate (which I think is clearly involved in the resolution as it stands) to the doctrine that we are to reopen and retry what has once been opened and tried and decided. To save that, I propose this amendment, and on it I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] Otherwise, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THURMAN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

The Secretary concluded the roll-call.

Mr. BURNSIDE. On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] My colleague, if he were here, would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Platt,

Carpenter,	Groome,	McPherson,
Chandler,	Grover,	Paddock,
Cockrell,	Hamlin,	Plumb,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the resolution, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it:

Provided, That such questions in said case as were fully considered and adjudged in the former investigation shall not be reopened under this resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHANDLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired as before stated.

Mr. THURMAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all questions connected with this resolution with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am paired as already stated.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BURNSIDE. On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 28; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as a substitute for the resolution upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Let that be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Mr. HOAR'S amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of the resolution and insert the following:

Whereas on the 25th day of October, 1877, the Senate unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the contested cases of WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG and Henry M. Spofford, claiming seats as Senators from the State of Louisiana, and whose credentials have been referred to such committee, be authorized to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, with a view of enabling said committee to determine and report upon the title respectively on the merits of each of said contestants to a seat in the Senate."

And whereas on the 26th day of November, 1877, said committee reported the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG is, upon the merits of the case, entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1877, and that he be admitted thereto upon taking the proper oath.

"Resolved, That Henry M. Spofford is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States;"

And on the 30th day of November, 1877, the Senate adopted said resolutions; and thereafter, on the same day, said KELLOGG was duly admitted to take the oath, and took his seat as a Senator from said State for said term: Therefore,

Resolved, That said proceedings are final and conclusive upon the right of said KELLOGG and the claim of said Spofford to such seat for said term.

Mr. LOGAN. I presume the desire is to get fully the facts in reference to this election on those points which have not been examined; and, therefore, I offer this amendment to perfect the text of the original resolution:

Provided, That said committee be further empowered and directed to make inquiry and take testimony upon the matter as to whether any unlawful or corrupt means were employed to disorganize the body by which WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG claims to have been elected to the Senate, or to organize that by which the memorialist claims to have been elected or to secure the alleged election of the memorialist.

Mr. CONKLING. No objection to that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope that amendment will be voted down. It has no connection whatever with the subject.

Mr. CONKLING. Why should that be voted down?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Because it seeks for the truth, as they stated a little while before.

Mr. CONKLING. It seems to me there must be some misapprehension about this. This, if I understand it, is a direction to the committee to inquire whether this memorialist and others employed bribery and corrupt means to disorganize the Legislature which chose Kellogg and to assemble and influence the Legislature which chose Spofford. Is the majority going to refuse to let us know how that is?

Mr. VOORHEES. Might not that reach the President of the United States?

Mr. CONKLING. Possibly it might reach the Senator from Indiana or me.

Mr. VOORHEES. No; not possibly the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will omit the Senator from Indiana and suppose it might possibly reach me. But, Mr. President, the law does not respect persons. The truth is not sought as a matter of favoritism. No matter who may be seated in the saddles or on the cushions of power, the truth all the same, I submit to the Senator from Indiana, ought to appear. Knowing how clannish he is and appreciating, as I do, that sectional pride and partiality which led him no doubt to put the question he did to me, nevertheless I say to him nobody, be he in the East or in the West, ought to be favored at the expense of the truth; and I am sorry that the honorable Senator from Indiana, who has so often flashed his cimeter of late in behalf of truth and justice, should shrink from allowing an inquiry to be addressed to a fact for fear that that fact might be unpleasant to any statesman of the West, however distinguished or eminent.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, in voting upon this question I am not voting upon the merits as they will appear to me at a later period. I disclaim any intention whatever of concluding this case, so far as my vote is concerned. At the same time I undertake to say that the Committee on Privileges and Elections will do justice without the coercive measures that are proposed by these amendments. Consequently, while these amendments, many of them, in the main are right and such as I would vote for under different circumstances, I vote against them because I believe that the Committee on Privileges and Elections will carry out their scope and purpose without these instructions. I say further that I vote against them because I have never yet known the majority of a legislative body, charged with the responsibility of legislation, to allow the minority to instruct its committees, as if they were not to be trusted to do what was fair and right.

I undertake to say that the Committee on Privileges and Elections will investigate these questions, and if there has been fraud perpetrated by the claimant to this seat, I hope it will be sifted to the bottom; but I do not intend to vote a want of confidence in a committee belonging to my own side of this Chamber at the dictation of those on the other side.

That is all I have to say in explanation of the course I pursue on this question.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am sure in offering this amendment I had no desire in the world except that we should develop the facts in reference to corrupt means that may have been employed. The assertion had been made of a desire on the part of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to ascertain certain facts, namely, whether or not the sitting member had employed corrupt means to secure his election. It has also been charged that a different Legislature, made up partly of those that elected him and partly of other persons that elected another person claiming this seat, was made up by means of improper influences. Inasmuch as the gentlemen who have the honor and welfare of this nation now in their hands have expressed a desire to preserve the purity of this country, and wish, at least seemingly, so to demonstrate their honesty and honest intentions to the people of this great country of ours, I thought I would merely make a suggestion to them that probably they had left out of the resolution a part of this case that perhaps the caucus had not considered, to wit, what action had been taken on the part of some gentlemen to disintegrate the Legislature that had elected Mr. KELLOGG, the Senator now sitting in the Senate, for the purpose of electing by another body a gentleman differing with him in political sentiment. I thought inasmuch as they had forgotten this, I would bring it to their notice, for certainly it was overlooked on their part. Of course they had no design in the world to cover up any fraud that may have been perpetrated by any of their friends. I should not accuse them of that for a moment. But inasmuch as I presumed they had forgotten this matter, I thought I would make the suggestion to them so that we might have the examination complete, and ascertain whether or not bribery and corruption had been used on the part of any of their friends to break up the Legislature that elected the sitting member for the purpose of electing one of their own friends by another Legislature.

If that is a fact, it does seem to me that the just, proper, and honest examination of this question for the purpose of showing fairness all around would require that this proposition of mine be entertained and agreed to. The honorable Senator from Indiana seemed to be alarmed when this was introduced for fear it might touch the President of the United States; he allowed that unguarded remark here before the Senate to go out to the country. I know it was an unguarded remark; I am sure he intended no such thing because there is nothing pointing in that direction in this amendment. The only direction given to it is in reference to the memorialist and the sitting member and their conduct in regard to their own elections.

It does seem to me when Senators are determined to have everything proceed in an orderly and proper manner before committees and before the Senate and that every man sitting here shall obtain his seat honestly, that it would be equally as just and certainly as fair, apparently so at least to the country, if they would at the same time be willing to develop the dishonest acts on the part of the person who claims the seat provided there were dishonest acts on his part. I do not say that there were, but this accusation has been made, it has been publicly presented in the public prints; it has been charged that a certain amount of money was used for the purpose of breaking up the Packard legislature and to reorganize the other for the purpose of electing this memorialist to the United States Senate. It has been publicly charged before the country, and on that basis I offered this amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Secretary read the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and unanimously adopted a few moments ago?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment referred to will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

> And said committee are further instructed to inquire and report whether bribery or other corrupt or unlawful means were resorted to to secure the alleged election of the memorialist.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is all the answer I have to make.

Mr. BLAINE. But that does not cover the point.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. VOORHEES. What point does it not cover?

Mr. BLAINE. I have not had the pleasure of hearing this debate, but it seems to me incomprehensible that the Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber who desire a fair investigation of this case should vote down the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Maine tell me what point it does not cover?

Mr. BLAINE. I will tell the Senator in a moment what point it does not cover. This is an investigation set on foot to throw a doubt upon the title of WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG and to establish the title of Henry M. Spofford. Every child understands that.

The regularity of the Louisiana Legislature that counted in a governor is not directly assailed there; probably it may not be; probably they will bring in some question of bribery here upon Mr. KELLOGG, or try to do it. They do not bring in a question of bribery upon Mr. Spofford as to his election because if there had been bribery it antedated that. The bribery in his case was in breaking up the Legislature. I am not accusing Mr. Spofford of bribery; I do not understand that the honorable Senator from Illinois accuses Mr. Spofford of bribery; but he accused somebody of having used corrupt means to break up one Legislature and produce another Legislature that elected Mr. Spofford. That goes to the very root of the matter. Here Mr. KELLOGG says before the committee:

> It is a matter talked of on the streets, and is not denied, that money was used to disintegrate the Packard legislature and secure votes for Mr. Spofford. He is not on trial, but when I am called upon, if ever, to sustain this statement, I will endeavor to prove it.

This was said before the Committee on Privileges and Elections by the actual sitting member, who was put in here on his prima facie case and afterward upon an investigation going to the whole root of the matter. The honorable Senator from Indiana says that is irrelevant. Why, sir, it is the only thing relevant here. If you open the question at all, it is the only relevant point to be urged. All the rest is trampling under foot the precedents of the Senate for seventy-five years. There is no other point before the Senate worthy of investigation; and if you shirk that, you shirk the whole case.

Mr. EATON. We do not shirk it; we vote it down. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Of course my friend from Connecticut always has a mode of shirking cases that way; but he will not convince the country that voting it down and refusing an investigation and sitting simply with a numerical majority on a bare proposition of that kind is not shirking it; and according to the prospect of this investigation now with the majority of the Senate voting as they seem disposed to do, there never will be an opportunity to investigate that question in regard to Mr. Spofford and the Legislature that elected him. Why you take one side of this question and not the other side, is what the country wants to know. Why does my fair-minded friend from Indiana desire to have this side of the question investigated while the other and the larger and the more portentous side shall be shuffled aside and shirked by the vote of the honorable Senator from Connecticut as well as others—"shirked" is the word.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now, Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two to the Senator from Maine. He says "'shirked' is the word."

Mr. BLAINE. Precisely.

Mr. VOORHEES. I say to the Senator from Maine that he has a set of pet phrases, and among them are those words that imply cowardice and a sense of fleeing away from his presence or something that is terrible on that side of the Chamber. Let him dismiss that now, once for all and forever. There is nobody on this side of the Chamber who will shirk any sooner than the Senator from Maine will; and I say that in no spirit of menace at all, but as trying to correct those "plantation manners" that obtain up among the dark pines of Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. The plantations of Maine!

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes; the plantations of Maine, where it seems it is allowable for a man to use terms that imply inferiority, want of courage, want of manliness, and which imply a boastfulness of superiority on the other side. I say to the Senator from Maine, with an abiding personal regard for him of long years, that the sooner he dismisses those phrases from his vocabulary the sooner we shall get along in quiet and harmony in this body.

Now, further, Mr. President, on the question of the lecture which the Senator from Maine has delivered to us as to what we ought to do with the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, I am in favor of the most thorough investigation, if investigation takes place at all. I did not intend to be drawn into this debate; I did not desire to be. I had some trouble in my own mind as to what was the proper course to be taken on this question, and I have that sort of courage which enables me to say that. I believe, however, and I think I can demonstrate to the Senate, that we have adopted an amendment which goes as far as that which the Senator from Illinois has offered, and I speak of the Senator from Illinois and his amendment with entire respect. The Senator from Maine, with that high, dashing spirit of his, comes in here with little knowledge on this point and arraigns this side of the Chamber because we are opposing what we think has already been enacted by our votes. I read now what was adopted, and not merely adopted but accepted on this side of the Chamber, accepted by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. Let us see how broad or how narrow it is; let us see whether it needs emendation and enlargement, as the Senator from Maine insists; let us see whether it does not demonstrate that the Senator from Maine did not know what the Senate had already done when he arraigned this side of the Chamber as shirking from an investigation of all that belongs to this case. We have already said by a unanimous vote of this body:

And said committee are further instructed to inquire and report whether bribery or other corrupt or unlawful means were resorted to to secure the alleged election of the memorialist.

Can you tell me what that does not embrace—whether bribery or other corrupt means or other unlawful means (all those words used) were resorted to to secure the election of the memorialist. Does that not embrace the disintegration of the Louisiana Legislature if such a thing took place? Does it not embrace the wide and open secret of whether your President of the United States connived at the disbandment of the Louisiana Legislature? Is there anything left unsaid, unasserted, in the way of improper practices when we say here by the unanimous vote of the Senate that this committee shall inquire whether bribery or other corrupt or unlawful means were practiced to secure the election of this memorialist. What else is there? Not by Spofford alone, but by anybody and by everybody; by him and by everybody else; by the sitting member, by the claimant, and by everybody else. Will the Senator from Maine rise and tell me what is left unasserted?

Mr. BLAINE. I will right now.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will yield to you to do so.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will send me that amendment I will show him exactly what is left out. I do it on the Senator's invitation, but I was not ignorant of this, for I sat in my seat and heard the Senator offer it and would have voted on it had I not been paired:

And said committee are further instructed to inquire and report whether bribery or other corrupt or unlawful means were resorted to to secure the alleged election of the memorialist.

This, now, is what is left out: "or to disintegrate the Legislature that elected the sitting member."

Mr. VOORHEES. Is that a part of it?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir, it is not a part of it. It does not reflect on Mr. Spofford whether he bribed or not; there may have been corrupt means used in the constitution of the Legislature which do not go to corruption by a man elected by them. God forbid that should be so. Many of the most honorable men who have ever sat in this body may have been sent here by legislatures that were corruptly organized. The question is not whether Mr. Spofford bribed or whether the members were bribed by him; the question is whether unlawful means were used to constitute that Legislature. If it means the same thing, why does not the honorable Senator from Indiana consent to put it in? If it means a different thing, there may be a reason for keeping it out.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the question of disintegrating and disorganizing the Louisiana Legislature has any bearing on the question before the Senate as to who shall sit in this body, then it is covered by the amendment already adopted. I repeat the whole question before this body is who shall sit here. If the question of disorganizing and disbanding the Legislature does not bear upon this question, it is not a proper subject of inquiry; but if it does, it is embraced in that amendment which instructs the committee on this point of who is to sit here, to inquire whether bribery or corrupt or other unlawful means were employed; and if touching the seat here the disbandment or disorganization of the Legislature is involved, then that amendment which we have adopted reaches the case and instructs this committee to inquire into that as well as into every other species of corruption or unlawful practice or bribery. There is not a Senator on this floor who does not comprehend that; and with perfect respect for the Senator from Maine, I say to him that his point is pure pettifogging, because if the question of disbanding the Louisiana Legislature bears upon the question who shall have a seat here, the amendment instructs this committee to inquire into the disbandment of the Louisiana Legislature as well as into every other feature of this case.

I did not intend to be drawn into this debate at this time, but I hold that the ground that is under my feet on this question is sound and solid and cannot be shaken by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. After the lecture which my friend from Indiana delivered to me upon my use of words and upon the impetuous manner which I sometimes have in contrast with his mild and placid way of speech, he wound up by telling me that my case was mere pettifogging. Now, down in Maine, in the way we speak the English language, "shirk" means "to depart from; to quit; to shift off." That is what Noah Webster and Worcester say it is. I do not know whether "pettifogging" is considered a mode of showing your respect for a man out in Indiana, the way the tongue is spoken there.

Mr. VOORHEES. "Pettifogging"—and I only mean it in that sense, for I am utterly incapable of meaning personal offense to the Senator from Maine—"pettifogging" means taking up a small point in a case, that does not govern the whole case, and insisting that it has an importance which it has not.

Mr. BLAINE. And "shirk" means to avoid a large point.

Mr. VOORHEES. "Shirk" in the western sense means to run away and skulk and hide like a coward.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no. The Senator's criticism, I know, was in good part and I take it so; but he has a large vocabulary and I have a small one, and I must be permitted to use mine and select mine. I do not know that any Senator on this floor speaks with less intention of giving offense than myself; but at the same time I refer him to the solid meat of this question, and I say that the real point of the whole matter is whether there was a lawful Legislature lawfully constituted to elect Mr. Spofford. You do not propose to investigate that at all. You propose to go by that. How shall I characterize that in such manner as shall be agreeable to the ears of my friend from Indiana?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Call it "pettifogging."

Mr. BLAINE. Will it be permissible to say that it is perhaps a pettifogging point?

Mr. VOORHEES. Say it in any way.

Mr. BLAINE. In any sense you intend to get rid of it. You do not intend that an investigation of the central fact of the whole thing shall be brought within the scope of this committee; and I intend to charge that in plain Anglo-Saxon, not intending personal offense to any one, but intending to speak here so that it shall be understood precisely what I mean, and the votes will show whether I am right or not.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not think I shall get very much excited on this question. I do not know whether the honorable Senator from Indiana will apply the word "pettifogging" where a gentleman takes a different view of this question from himself or not.

Mr. VOORHEES. By no means.

Mr. LOGAN. But I will try at least to show the distinction between the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts and the one that I have offered. The resolution of the committee that is now before the Senate goes to what? It goes to investigating the right of the Senator from Louisiana to his seat in the Senate, and no further. The resolution reported by the committee goes, I say, to the question of the right of the Senator from Louisiana to his seat, and no further; in other words, the question of bribery, for that is the only one that has not been examined. The question, then, that is brought before the Senate by the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is that if the memorialist who claims the seat shall be held entitled to that seat by reason of the judgment of the Senate that he was lawfully elected, the committee may investigate the fact whether the memorialist was elected by bribery or corruption. Thus far that amendment and the resolution go, and no further.

Then what is the amendment that I have offered? The amendment that I have offered goes much further than this. When you investigate the question as to the right of a member to hold his seat in the Senate on account of bribery, it applies to the use corruptly of money or other means to obtain votes for the purpose of electing him to that office. My amendment goes to the point whether any unlawful or corrupt means were employed to do what? To disorganize the Legislature that elected the present sitting member first; that is one proposition; second, whether corrupt means were employed to organize another Legislature, the one that elected the memorialist. There are two propositions in this amendment of mine, the first going to the question of the disintegration or disorganization of the first Legislature, and the second to the organization of the second Legislature. These are the two propositions, entirely separate and distinct propositions from the question as to whether the member was elected by bribery, for that applies to the election and not to the organization of the Legislature. There is the distinction.

Now, I say to the Senate, and I say it with all due deference to the opinions of other Senators, that in my judgment there has not been since this Government was organized such an attempt made to disorganize a body or to take from a man the right to occupy a seat in the Senate as the attempt that is made in reference to the sitting member from the State of Louisiana. It violates every precedent, every principle of law, parliamentary or otherwise; and after violating every principle and every precedent for the purpose of grasping a seat in this body in order to give it to another, you claim that you desire to do it because corrupt means were employed, and then when we ask you to go further and investigate the corruptions of your own side, you say to that amendment "the committee of course is honest; the committee of course will do this." "Of course they will do this," says the Senator from Indiana, "without being instructed to do it." I have not so much confidence in what they will do as to allow it to go this way.

Hence, I have offered this amendment in good faith, asking that they shall investigate this question. Inasmuch as the Senate intends to vote that they shall investigate the mode and manner of securing the seat by the sitting member, I propose that they shall investigate the mode and manner of the disorganization of that Legislature and the reorganization of the other for the purpose of depriving him of a seat in the Senate and giving that seat to somebody else. It is to that point that my amendment goes and to none other. It is to the question of the disorganization of one Legislature and the reorganization of another for a purpose. What purpose? To deprive the sitting member of the seat and give it to another. It goes to that, no matter who may have acted corruptly. It is a question as to whether or not the new Legislature was corruptly organized and the other Legislature corruptly disorganized, and that is the proposition. If gentlemen really wish to have honesty and fairness, and desire to have the country understand all that there is connected with this whole affair, if corrupt, let it be developed and demonstrated before the country; if not, let it be so understood by the country. That is what I desire, and it ought to be all that any other Senator would desire. Gentlemen who prate about their honesty, gentlemen who prate about their disinterestedness, Senators who prate about the desire of the democracy in this country to so shape legislation and everything else as to protect the rights of all and develop the corruption of every one, should not hesitate to accept an amendment of this kind, so that, inasmuch as they are going to investigate the matter, they may investigate the whole matter and let it all be understood.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, obtained the floor.

Mr. SAULSBURY. All I desire to say, Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Illinois, is that inasmuch as the Committee on Privileges and Elections will not be complimented by any expression of confidence on his part in the committee, so they do not feel injured by any expression of want of confidence.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I desire merely to say in reference to the mild manner of the Senator from Delaware, a State whose eyes gaze on the mighty revolving world as it goes on, that I was once a member of that committee, and I presume I did not have the respect of the Senator then from the kindly remark he has made about not caring whether I had confidence in it or not. I said nothing about a want of confidence.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator had expressed a want of confidence in the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. I said no such thing, sir——

Mr. SAULSBURY. The RECORD will show.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I believe I have the floor, and I have not yielded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor and must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the Senator will allow me to finish my sentence; that is all I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly he has.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator can explain after I get through.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wanted to finish the sentence I commenced about what I said in regard to a want of confidence.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, sir.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I have very little to say on this question. Everything that tends to show the corrupt election of Mr. KELLOGG or the corrupt election of Mr. Spofford, whether employed by the one or by the other or by their agents, this committee under the present resolution are authorized to investigate. If the disorganization or the disintegration of the Packard legislature and the organization of the Nicholls legislature were things done for the purpose and with a view of corruptly electing Mr. Spofford or of corruptly electing Mr. KELLOGG, the committee are authorized to investigate them. That is the whole question in the case.

The Senator from Illinois says that he goes further and that his amendment goes further. Now, I wish that we should understand each other. There seems to be a good deal of feeling shown over there, and they say the Packard legislature was corruptly disorganized by our side, and that we are afraid to investigate what our side has done. What do you mean by "our side?" Did Mr. Spofford disorganize the Packard legislature? Did Mr. Spofford's agents disorganize the Packard legislature? If so, we are authorized to investigate it by the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts and accepted by us. If somebody else disorganized the Packard legislature, not in the interest of Mr. Spofford nor for the purpose of securing the election of Mr. Spofford, what has Mr. Spofford or his election to do with it? Nothing. What do gentlemen mean when they talk in that kind of style?

The President of the United States, as we all know, sent or authorized a commission to go to New Orleans. That commission was composed of distinguished gentlemen, most of whom I believe were members of the republican party. According to my recollection they were. The President was a distinguished republican President. He sent that commission; and while that commission was there, and it is charged under their amendment, the Packard legislature dissolved and most of its members went into the Nicholls legislature. Now, if you will charge that Mr. Spofford did that, or that his agents did that, we are authorized to investigate it. If you will charge that any democrat did it, we are authorized to investigate it, if it was done for the purpose of affecting the senatorial election. If it was not done for the purpose of affecting the senatorial election, what do you mean by wanting to mix it with the senatorial election? Whom do you want to investigate? Do you want to investigate the distinguished commission which the President sent down there? Do you wish to investigate the President's motives for sending that commission down there? And when you investigate that distinguished commission and the distinguished gentleman who sent them, do you investigate our side? What is "our side?" What does this mean?

I have no passion or feeling in this matter, none whatever. I do not believe the President was guilty of anything wrong or corrupt in sending that commission to Louisiana. I do not believe that commission was guilty of anything corrupt or wrong there in dissolving the Packard legislature. I do not believe anybody was. If anybody was, he acted under the auspices certainly of the President and the commission; but I do not believe anything of the sort. I say that much for the commission and for the President. That is my judgment, though I know nothing about it.

But I say this—and I wish to be distinctly understood—I have said from the beginning of the controversy in answer to intimations made to me by distinguished republicans that they had an impression that the purpose originally perhaps of the Committee on Privileges and Elections was to reopen the investigation touching Louisiana affairs as they existed at the time of the electoral commission and the settlement of the Presidency—I have said from the beginning that as one member of the committee we had no such purpose. We have simply desired to investigate the question in relation to this senatorial election, and confine it to them. Whatever relates to that and affects that we shall feel it our duty to investigate; nothing further and nothing beyond.

Therefore, the objection to the amendment is simply this: you have no right to tack on an investigation of the President and his commission to an investigation of this senatorial election. If you desire, however, to have that thing investigated; if you desire to have the whole history of that commission investigated; if you will introduce an independent and separate resolution upon the subject I should not be surprised if you could get votes on this side of the House for it. I do not know, but I should not be surprised if that were so. If the gentlemen on the other side are anxious to move in that matter let them indicate it; let them say so. We shall offer no such resolution; we shall make no such motion; but I repeat that if the disorganization of the Packard legislature or the organization of the Nicholls legislature had in view the corrupt election of Mr. Spofford, then we are authorized to investigate it, and investigate it fully with that view. If the disorganization of the one or the organization of the other was for other purposes, by other men, and in other interests, the senatorial question has nothing to do with it.

Now, I wish to say distinctly to the country, as far as I am concerned, that I am in favor of investigating the senatorial question, and that only. I scout the idea that I will, under the cover of this or any other resolution, inaugurate a war against any distinguished citizen or citizens of this Republic. All I want is to investigate this senatorial question; that and nothing more. Whatever relates to that, whatever affects that, whatever shows corruption in that election, let us investigate, and let us understand. Beyond that let us draw the veil of oblivion, and let it pass away with those things in relation to which human minds can crave but one earthly blessing, and that is that they be forgotten.

Mr. LOGAN. I rise, Mr. President, to make a single remark, and I want to return my thanks to the Senator from Georgia for his kindly manner of treatment toward me in not allowing me to finish the sentence that I was trying to complete at the time when he declined to yield me the floor.

I desire to say a word to the honorable Senator from the State of Delaware who becomes so indignant because I presumed to offer an amendment to a resolution emanating from his committee, the one over which he presides, that he considers it no compliment to his committee to be commended by me. All I have to say in reference to that is that such language from myself toward that Senator has never been heard in this Chamber. Of course, his greatness, his towering superiority over others gives him that privilege that other lesser lights have not in this honorable body. A man of gigantic intellect, soaring above the great men and great lights of this nation, comprehending all subjects without their being elucidated by any save his own gigantic mind, he is not complimented by anybody! I beg the Senator's pardon if I have attempted to compliment him. I certainly shall not offend in that line again. The great State of Delaware should not be complimented!

Mr. President, in response to what was said by the Senator from Georgia, I have but this to say: the Senator cannot, nor can any Senator on that side of the Chamber, by any attempt on his part insinuate that I introduced this amendment for the purpose of a stab at this Administration. I will not use the term "hiding behind that," but I will say it is very easy for Senators when they do not wish to meet squarely a proposition, to intimate that it has a bearing which it has not. The amendment I offered has no such bearing, and can have no such construction; and Senators who insinuate that they do not desire to investigate the Administration or the statesmen who went to Louisiana, but only wish on their side of this question to settle the election, and therefore feel justified in voting against this amendment, will permit me to say that that is covering themselves with a fig-leaf, for there is nothing of the kind in this amendment, no such direction, no such intimation. It is a plain, simple proposition to investigate the question as to whether this Legislature was broken up for the purpose of electing a different member to the United States Senate. That is what it means, and that is what it was intended for, and it can have no other construction given to it by any fair means.

The honorable Senator from Georgia, by a wave of his hand, intimated to myself that I was not worthy to take his eye at the time, but he desires to cover all that is past, and only to speak of the present. Sir, I do not doubt that fact. I do not doubt the proposition that there are many who would like to let sleep forever in the tomb of oblivion that which is past.

Now, sir, I did not intend to allude to anything of the kind, but intended to discuss fairly this proposition; but I wish to say to Senators on this floor that I shall insist at least on being treated with the same courtesy that I accord to other Senators. This is all, Mr. President, that I desire to say in reference to this proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. BLAINE. I do not intend to prolong the debate, but if I heard the honorable Senator from Georgia aright he took directly the opposite ground from the honorable Senator from Indiana. The honorable Senator from Indiana endeavored to convince my humble self and the Senate that power was already in the resolution to investigate all that the Senator from Illinois proposed to investigate. Now the Senator from Georgia says that must be buried in the bosom of the deep ocean of forgetfulness, and not a single allusion must be made to it. Here is a flat contradiction between the two Senators. One says there is authority to investigate it; the other says it is a subject that must not be investigated at all. I do not know which to follow. I should be happy with either if I could get the other to agree with him. And I would like to ask the honorable Senator from Georgia a question, if he will pardon me. If I understood his argument aright, it went to this, that, inquiring into a seat in the Senate, it was not pertinent to inquire into the means by which the Legislature that chose the Senator was constituted. Did I understand him aright?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I did not say precisely that.

Mr. BLAINE. I understood the Senator to say what was tantamount to that, that it was no business of this body to inquire whether a Legislature had been corruptly or otherwise constituted; the only question was whether the man elected had himself used corrupt means to get votes.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say to the Senator very frankly that where there is no dispute in the State itself as to what is the Legislature, this body has no power, in my judgment, to go behind the constitution of that Legislature and inquire into the election of the members or the constitution of the Legislature.

Mr. BLAINE. There was a very large dispute in the State itself in this case.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. You have no right, for instance, to inquire whether that Legislature adjudged that members were properly entitled to their seats. You have no right to inquire whether they acted properly in electing their officials. But I will say this, wherever there is any corrupt means used for the purpose of affecting the senatorial election, then you have a right to inquire into that. Wherever means were employed which did affect and result in that election, you have a right to inquire into that. But wherever there were means used, without any reference to that, having no connection with it at all, not having it in view, you cannot go into that for that is not a field under the jurisdiction of investigating the senatorial election. That field does not cover investigating everything connected with the organization of the Legislature.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator from Georgia, I think, evades the point. Where there is a single Legislature, no dispute within the State at all as to the legality and proper constitutional organization of that Legislature, it is not right for the Senate to interfere; but the Senator knows that here were two legislatures. That is the exact case. Here was a Legislature that was the only Legislature in the State when Kellogg was elected, and afterward, by some sort of hocus-pocus—if that is not an offensive word to use, for I am limited, sir——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. As I had nothing to do with it, and the President and his commission had to do with it, you may speak of them as you please; you may say "hocus-pocus," or anything else.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not say who had to do with it; but another legislature springs up that may have been or may not have been brought together by corrupt means. The Senator from Georgia says in examining the election of the Senator who was the product of that Legislature you have no right to inquire into its constitution. All I have to say is that that is new in this body. We are learning something every day here. It is a new thing that where there are two legislatures in a State, each claiming to be the simon pure, each claiming to have been honestly and purely and constitutionally organized and a Senator is elected by each, the Senate of the United States has not the right to inquire into the constitution of each. If that is the view of that side of the Chamber, it is a new thing.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No one said that.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, I am at a loss to imagine what this matter of the disintegration of the Packard legislature, so called, can have to do with the question before the Senate. If Mr. KELLOGG was elected a Senator at all, if the body that elected him and sent him here had any right to elect a Senator, they elected him within about a week after the organization of that Legislature, in the early part of January. That Legislature was not disintegrated, and it did not go to pieces, if you call it a Legislature, until some time in the month of March. If Mr. KELLOGG was legally elected, what consequence can it make whether the Legislature which elected him, afterward disintegrated and went to pieces? What can it have to do with the question of the legality of Mr. KELLOGG's election? If Mr. KELLOGG, as it is charged in this memorial, procured his election from the body that elected him by the use of any unfair means or by the use of bribery, what odds does it make whether that legislature six weeks or two months afterward went to pieces or went to their homes? The question is whether it was a Legislature at the time when it professed to have elected Mr. KELLOGG, and whether Mr. KELLOGG was or was not elected by that body by fair means.

The honorable Senator from Maine seems to have a strange idea of the history of Louisiana at that period, when he says that that was the only Legislature existing in Louisiana, but afterward a new legislature was organized, which legislature elected Mr. Spofford. Why, Mr. President, it is the history of the time that there was a legally elected Legislature with a quorum in each body, sitting from the day appointed by the constitution for that Legislature to assemble, in the city of New Orleans, a Legislature which proceeded to pass laws, to enact statutes which are in force to this day; a Legislature which exercised the powers of legislation through the length and breadth of that State; a Legislature which went on calmly in pursuance of the duties confided to it by the constitution for nearly one hundred and twenty days before it fulfilled its legal and constitutional obligation of electing a Senator, and which enacted laws that to this day are obeyed and recognized by the people of Louisiana and by the courts of the land, the Federal courts as well as the State courts, and by the Executive of the nation. And, Mr. President, that Legislature had a quorum in both branches before a single member of the crowd that elected Mr. KELLOGG came in to take a seat on its floor.

Mr. BLAINE. May I ask the Senator, if it will not interrupt his argument, a question just there?

Mr. JONAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. If this Legislature of which he is speaking was thus early organized, on the 1st of January, why did it not elect a Senator on the day appointed by law?

Mr. JONAS. Because it preferred not to elect a Senator while the State of Louisiana was in the possession of a military government—while the United States troops were upon its soil.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Senator has just said that it went on and enacted laws, and have been obeyed and performed all the functions of a Legislature. Then, why did it not elect a Senator?

Mr. JONAS. It enacted laws with the bayonets suspended in the air; it enacted laws subject to the approval of the President of the United States and the commander of the Army. They preferred not to elect a Senator until the troops were removed from the military occupation of Louisiana. The moment that was done they elected their Senator. In the mean time they fulfilled their obligation under the law of balloting once every day for a Senator.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONAS. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. What other act except the pretended election of Kellogg was ever performed by the legislature of Louisiana that elected him or by the governor who signed his credentials—what other act except the single act of pretending to elect him and the signing of his credentials?

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, there is not an act on the statute-book, there is not a journal of that legislature, there is not a record made in Louisiana of the existence of that legislature except the election of Mr. KELLOGG who sits here to-day.

Mr. BECK. How about the governor?

Mr. JONAS. The governor is now consul at Liverpool, appointed by the President, and he was never recognized for a single day as the governor of that State, and never exercised power as such. He may have signed the credentials of Mr. KELLOGG, but that is all. He never resigned. That government was installed in the state-house of Louisiana. It surrounded itself with the metropolitan police, with the armed janizaries of that government, and it held itself installed in that state-house for ninety or one hundred days without performing any other act of legislation except electing Mr. KELLOGG to the United States Senate. It has left no history; it has left no record. Its power was never recognized for a day or an hour in the State of Louisiana. In the place of journals there are brought here to-day extracts from a newspaper published at the time, which is the only record that legislature has left, except such history as it has made in the reports of various investigating committees of Congress.

But the other Legislature, which has been recognized, which has enacted laws, which has maintained authority, which is recognized to-day, had a full quorum of both branches before a single member of the Packard legislature took his seat in it. In the roll-call the names of members of the Packard legislature who were entitled to seats on that floor were always called, and when they thought proper to come in pursuance of their constitutional obligation and take their seats they were admitted to their seats. A large majority, nearly all of them, came in and took their seats before the legal Legislature adjourned, and at the time of the election of Mr. Spofford there was nearly a complete Legislature upon the floor. Mr. Spofford could have been elected, he would have been elected, by the Legislature as constituted, with a legal quorum, without a member of the Packard legislature being present. Mr. Spofford was elected as a democratic candidate. Mr. Spofford was nominated by a democratic caucus. Mr.

Spofford received every democratic vote, and the democratic votes were sufficient to elect him as a Senator without his receiving the vote of a single republican and without its being necessary for him to bribe or induce any man of the republican party to cast his vote for him.

Therefore I say that these things are altogether out of the subject of consideration. The subject presented by the resolution is a proper subject for consideration I think, and it is one that is not adjudicated. It is one upon which the State of Louisiana has not been properly heard. It is a question as to which of these two legislatures represented the sovereignty of the people of Louisiana and was entitled to send a Senator here. But it is no question and does not affect this contest as to what were the causes which induced the Packard legislature to go to pieces, or what were the causes which induced the members of that body who had a right to do so to take seats on the floor of the Legislature.

Mr. BLAINE. I can hardly let one statement of the honorable Senator go without some comment, that the postponement of the election of Senator in Louisana was due to some sentimental feeling that they would not choose a Senator until the bayonets had been withdrawn. I make no assertion about it, but I think if the committee should choose to go into that subject when they are authorized they will find by a very small drag-net that that Senatorship was held off to trade on, and that it was hawked about in Washington to be bid off to a republican if certain things could be done in the way of recognizing Nicholls. Any time prior to the time that settlement was made, during the months of January and February, I think it will be found that an agreement to recognize Governor Nicholls from here by the Administration that was then expiring would have been followed by the election of somebody that the republicans might have indicated, whether Kellogg or some other man.

Therefore I think the honorable Senator from Louisiana will find that it was not purely a matter of sentimentalism about the suspended bayonet and the pointed musket that kept them from electing a Senator. There were a good many other considerations that were lying around loose at that time. The Senator from Louisiana said that the Nicholls legislature were balloting for Senator every day. Why was it derogatory to the dignity of Louisiana to elect, and yet entirely in accordance with the dignity of Louisiana to keep on voting and pretending to try to elect?

As to the point, if the honorable Senator chooses to make the point, that the state-house of Louisiana had to be surrounded by bayonets and therefore that there was no government, I can tell the honorable Senator that I saw this Capitol surrounded with artillery batteries to install a President of the United States. I hope it will never be seen again. If it be an impeachment of Mr. Packard that he had no title because there were bayonets surrounding the state-house, which was assailed by an unlawful mob, it was an impeachment of Abraham Lincoln that the then eminent and venerable Lieutenant-General of the Army, now deceased, stood himself in front of the Capitol in command of the United States troops, that rebellion might not assail the regularly elected President in the very seat of his power.

Mr. JONAS. It would seem that no question can be discussed in the Senate without the old ghost of the rebellion being immediately raised. We are now carried back to the days of Mr. Lincoln and the days of the rebellion. The scenes of which I speak occurred some eleven years after the rebellion. They occurred in 1877, long after reconstruction and long after Louisiana had been represented on this floor. I say to the gentleman that there is no truth in the charge, by whomever made, that the position of Senator in Louisiana was ever hawked off or offered in the market. I say that there never was a day when the representative people of Louisiana who had a right to elect a Senator in their Legislature were not determined and prepared to execute and perform that duty and to elect one of their own representatives and send him here.

The Senator asks why we balloted every day if we were not prepared to elect. The Senator is aware that under the act of Congress we were compelled to ballot at least once every day. That is the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If you elected, you were not.

Mr. JONAS. I gave the reason why we did not elect. We could not elect until our government was thoroughly established and recognized and free; and we elected a Senator on that day. I say that the charge that the Senatorship was either to be hawked off or traded or swapped is not true, and no one knows that it is not true better than myself. I was a member of that Legislature, and I was a candidate for United States Senator, and was beaten in the caucus of my party by a very small vote. I know it was an honest contest between representative democrats, members of the majority party, as to who should be selected and sent here to represent the people of Louisiana, and Mr. Spofford was selected. If there ever was a proposition made to trade—I will not say a proposition, but if there ever was an inducement held out to trade—it was not by the last Administration, but it was when the present Administration sent a commission down to that State to know whether something could not be obtained from its people in the way of concession or compromise before granting them the boon of withdrawing the troops from the control of the State. I say that if there was any such suggestion or any such proposition it came from that quarter and met with no response from the people of Louisiana.

Mr. BLAINE. I had stated that it came from the Louisiana side. I had not stated with any personal knowledge, but I had stated that it was currently reported here, and it certainly was rejected by the Grant administration. Now do I understand the honorable Senator from Louisiana to state that the commission that went down under the Hayes administration took up the trade on the other side and offered it? Is that what we are to understand the Senator to mean?

Mr. JONAS. I do not say that they went down to trade; but I do not know for what other purpose they went, and I have never been able to discover. Who did the Senator say traded or offered to trade with the people of Louisiana?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know. I had nothing to do with them.

Mr. JONAS. Who offered to represent them?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know. I had nothing to do with it; but the commission that went down, the honorable Senator states, went there to make a proposition. I said it was freely circulated here during the month of February that if the republicans would acknowledge Nicholls as governor they could have a republican elected Senator. That is what I said; that it was one of those things in the air. I do not say that I can state the man who did it, or the commissioner who did it; but it was in the air here all winter.

Mr. JONAS. I assure the honorable Senator that I do not know what was in the air of Washington; but in the air of New Orleans, which was much more pure and healthy, there was but one idea and one object, and that was to elect a representative democrat to the United States Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I had intended to take no part in this discussion, but I feel compelled to correct two or three statements made by my colleague. When my colleague speaks of the legislature in Odd Fellows' Hall as the legislature of Louisiana he should explain that it was composed of a quorum of persons not elected but returned as elected by the democratic State central committee. During the whole session of sixty days, the constitutional term of the Legislature of Louisiana, there was not a day when the so-called Nicholl's legislature or assemblage at Odd Fellows' Hall had a quorum in the lower house. The roll was called day by day and they fell short of a quorum except of members returned by the democratic State central committee from parishes where the colored registered vote was three and four to one over the whites, and where the evidence was overwhelming that there were acts of violence perpetrated in order to reduce the republican majority and secure the nominal election of democratic representatives.

Day by day they balloted, and it was said openly that they would not elect a Senator until they had secured a quorum of returning-board members. Why did they do that? It was not until April, I think, and after the full sixty days of the constitutional term had elapsed, and after the MacVeagh commission had gone down there, and influences had been brought to bear, it is asserted improperly, upon members of the republican Legislature, (and that is the question now involved in this amendment,) that enough of the Packard legislature sitting at the State-house were induced to go over and unite with the democrats to make a quorum of returning-board members—it was not till this was achieved that they would go into an election of a United States Senator.

Now let us look at the organization of the Legislature. When that body was organized, on the first Monday of January, as required by the constitution, the Nicholls assemblage had no quorum in either house. They had no lieutenant-governor to preside over their senate, and they sent a joint committee of their two houses to the State-house, the senate and the house meeting in one hall promiscuously, and asked in writing for recognition from me as governor. During the whole sixty days and for weeks after, as I have said, they had no quorum in the lower house. They never had a legal quorum for weeks afterward, except as they in calling their roll included the names of three men from the Seventh ward of the city of New Orleans, (an overwhelmingly republican ward,) who they themselves admitted had been defeated. The chairman of the democratic parish committee acknowledged this, and every paper in the city of New Orleans, including the democratic organ, recognized the fact; yet they included those three men in every roll-call, in order to make a quorum, and but for those three men they would not have had a quorum for at least ninety days after the first Monday of January.

It should be remembered that a democratic house with a republican senate had previously recognized me as governor by joint resolution passed in April, 1875. The President of the United States and the two Houses of Congress had accorded me full recognition, and the courts of the State, all the officials of the State, and the people of the State, had recognized my authority. During the first week of January, over which my term of office extended, there was no question as to any State officer in the State. The Legislature, both houses being in session, passed bills which I approved, and which were promulgated according to law in the official journal of the State.

There never was a question among the democrats in New Orleans that a returning-board quorum was necessary before going into an election for United States Senator. There never was a doubt among republicans that the democrats, before pretending to go into such an election, would endeavor to secure a returning-board legislature as they called it—that is to say, a quorum in both houses returned elected by the returning board. This was their point.

I think it can be proven, if necessary, that their leading representative men proposed that they would elect whoever the republicans would agree upon as United States Senator, provided by so doing they could secure a quorum of returning-board members. They were anxious to have a legal quorum in the two houses, and then to pass a joint resolution recognizing Nicholls, and that was their way out of the difficulty in which they found themselves and their plan of obtaining a recognition of their government by the President. I regret that I have been drawn into this discussion, but I could not sit by and hear what fell from the lips of my colleague without replying to him, because I think that he perhaps not intending to misstate the case failed to state the whole case.

Mr. MORGAN. Without interrupting the Senator, I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana whether he has any objection to the Committee on Privileges and Elections going fully into the investigation of the question of the alleged bribery of the members of the Legislature of Louisiana either as to himself or as to Mr. Spofford?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have not made any objection. I want to say to the Senator that had the resolution of the committee been voted down I should myself have risen in my seat to offer a resolution to go into that question.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I understand that the Senator has no objection to this inquiry?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is what I should have done. At the same time I should have said that this case, at Mr. Spofford's instance, had already been tried before the Legislature of Louisiana, that he had caused a resolution to be passed by the senate of Louisiana in the spring of 1878 reciting almost precisely the allegations contained in his present memorial; and a committee was appointed of two democrats and one republican, who were authorized to sit during the whole summer and report to the next General Assembly, and they failed to find anything against me.

Mr. MORGAN. My inquiry the Senator does not answer.

Mr. KELLOGG. Wait one moment, if the gentleman will allow me. Let me say as regards the other allegations of the memorial, that as soon as or very soon after the Packard government fell the Nicholls legislature by joint resolution raised committees to investigate every department of my government, covering my whole administration of four years. One committee especially was raised and directed to investigate into all matters pertaining to the executive department, and upon that committee was my colleague, [Mr. JONAS.] This committee appointed an expert. That expert pretended that he had found something, and telegraphed up here on the 29th of January, 1877, when my case was pending, that he had found documents showing that I had used improper influence with the returning board and upon that telegram the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] moved a recommittal of the case; but from that day to this there has been nothing more heard of it, and Hy. L. Smith, the sender of this dispatch, subsequently admitted that he sent that dispatch for a consideration and for a purpose, which was to secure the recommittal of my case and the taking up of the Butler case which was next on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. If I understand the Senator from Louisiana, he has no objection to this investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana declines to yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. My colleague was on the committee which appointed this expert—not that I find any fault with his action. They took a zealous man and a man of tact and ability. I left all my documents, even my private letter-books and private telegrams. I did not take anything when I came away. Yet with all this they failed to find anything against me and never made a report against me. Of the five or six committees directed to investigate all the different departments of my government not one ever found anything reflecting upon my official integrity. They raked the highways and the by-ways and the lanes and the gutters with muck-rakes and candles and drag-nets and they never have found anything against me. I am a "carpet-bagger," as the gentleman from Georgia says, but one who fears no indictment. It was threatened when my case was pending that I would be indicted, and I sat here menaced constantly. It was attempted to indict me before the grand jury, but, sir, they never indicted me, and I can go back to Louisiana without fear or favor now and hereafter; nor is there a record anywhere that impugns me or in any manner affects me personally. I defied them while I was governor, I have defied them since, and I defy them now to bring forward one official act of mine that will not bear the fullest and closest scrutiny.

Mr. MORGAN. After the Senator from Louisiana is so thoroughly protected, as he has been apparently, under all the different investigations, and after he has come off as he alleges innocently after all the persecutions that have been visited upon him, he surely can have no difficulty in coming forward now and answering the question that I put to him. Has he any objection that the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections shall investigate the question which is alleged and charged against him of the bribery of the members of the Legislature which elected him in providing for or securing his election?

Mr. BLAINE. If the Legislature is investigated at the same time.

Mr. MORGAN. Do not prompt the Senator. Let him answer himself without any prompting. I should like to have an answer from the gentleman on the floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know what the object of the Senator is. I started out by saying that I did not intend to participate in this debate. I sat here and heard this discussion yesterday and to-day patiently, and abstained from voting. I have not committed myself in any manner.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have asked the Senator a question——

Mr. KELLOGG. If I have not the floor I will wait until the gentleman is through.

Mr. MORGAN. If the gentleman will answer the question, that is all right.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will answer the question in my own way, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. MORGAN. Do not answer it by a speech that runs over the whole history of Louisiana.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will wait until the gentleman has concluded. I may have something to say upon that.

Mr. MORGAN. I will put the question again to the Senator. Has he any objection to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate investigating the question whether or not he bribed the members of the Legislature that elected him?

Mr. KELLOGG. Has the gentleman any objection to having the constitution of the body which Mr. Spofford claims elected him looked into and investigated?

Mr. MORGAN. Not a bit; not a particle. We have already put that into the resolution.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has the gentleman any objection to proof being taken by the Committee on Privileges and Elections showing that that Legislature was disintegrated and enough returning-board members detached from it and secured to the Nicholls legislature so as to secure to that body the semblance of a quorum with which to elect a Senator?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. None, whatever.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then why do you not agree to the amendment that has been offered? Why do you not vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MORGAN. I am putting the question in good faith to the Senator from Louisiana and he cannot escape it in that way.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will wait until the gentleman gets through.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will state his point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit that it is out of order for any Senator on this floor, where another Senator is personally concerned and a resolution is offered affecting his character, to propound any such question to him as the Senator from Alabama has done.

Mr. MORGAN. Inasmuch as the Senator from Vermont has made the proposition that the Senator from Louisiana is not bound to incriminate himself, I withdraw the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the proposition, Mr. President. My point of order is that no Senator on this floor has a right to put a question of that character, which in its nature is an insult to a brother Senator on this floor, who stands now just as free in his character as any other Senator until he is tried.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg leave to say to the honorable Senator that I mean no insult to any gentleman on this floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know the gentleman did not mean it.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Vermont need not take this matter up in that spirit. I have asked him no question. It will be time enough when I put obnoxious questions to him. I asked the gentleman on the floor whether he was willing to have this investigation. I made no charge. Still the charge has been made; and the Senator from Vermont is now trying to shield the Senator from Louisiana from an answer to that. The question I propounded to him did not imply an insult by the slightest intimation. I merely asked him if he now had any objection to this committee investigating that question, because it has been urged here that this committee have no right; it has been urged here that this is forced upon the Senator from Louisiana against his will and against his consent; and I had supposed from what I had heard uttered on the other side of this Chamber that there was a perfect willingness on that side that that Senator should come up and answer, and that he was entirely willing that the committee should investigate the whole question of the allegations of guilt made against him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. First I will say to the Senator from Alabama that I am not trying to shield the Senator from Louisiana from anything, which he imputes to me. I am trying to preserve the honor and the decorum and the integrity of the Senate, and in doing that I neither intend to shield the Senator from Alabama nor the Senator from Louisiana nor myself. My honorable friend from Alabama, whom I respect, has no right to say to me that I am trying to shield a Senator here because I stand up for the order and decorum and decency of the power of this body.

Mr. MORGAN. I must be allowed to say to the Senator, if I may interrupt him, as he charges me with having offended against the decency of the Senate, that allegations have been brought forward here and referred by the Senate to a committee to inquire with respect to a particular question, whether or not the Senator from Louisiana bribed the Legislature. If that reference was an indecency, then it is an indecency indeed to refer to it. I have referred to nothing else. That reference has been made. I asked the Senator from Louisiana whether he had any objection to this committee going into the examination of the question thus referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama will please suspend his remarks. The Senator from Vermont has made a point of order that the Chair must decide without debate, and then an appeal can be taken. As the Chair understands the point of order made by the Senator from Vermont it is that the question put by the Senator from Alabama to the Senator from Louisiana was out of order. If the Chair understood the observation of the Senator from Vermont, he claims that it was out of order upon the ground that it was insulting to the Senator from Louisiana. The Chair is unable to see anything of insult in the question. It is proposed that a certain charge against the Senator from Louisiana shall be referred to a committee for investigation. The Senator from Alabama simply asked the Senator from Louisiana whether he was willing that that charge should be investigated. The Chair can see nothing insulting, nothing criminating, nothing asking the Senator from Louisiana to criminate himself, in that question, and, therefore, rules that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, I beg leave, for fear I may have in some way in my manner of stating the question violated the proprieties of the Senate on this occasion, to withdraw the question.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I object to this proceeding, although I have not participated either by discussing or voting upon the question. I object to this proceeding because the case was disposed of after a month's investigation by a committee of this body to whom it was referred by a resolution of the Senate adopted unanimously directing them to inquire into the merits of the respective titles of myself and Mr. Spofford to a seat in the Senate, and because that committee upon the threshold of their investigation adopted a resolution offered by a democratic member, Senator Merrimon, of North Carolina, that they would proceed in accordance with the instruction of the Senate to investigate the substantial merits of the two contestants upon their respective titles, and to that end would determine which was the legal Legislature. For one month they proceeded to investigate and hear arguments, to consider thousands of pages of evidence, and finally they made an elaborate report to the Senate accompanied by a resolution declaring that I was entitled to my seat upon the merits of the case, and that the contestant was not. That resolution was adopted by a majority vote of the Senate.

I object because it is an unprecedented proceeding that the memorialist should come here with a petition, not verified by even his own affidavit, not supported by any exhibit, not sustained by any corroborating circumstances or facts, or by the oath of any person whatever. Such a memorial, however, has been presented to this body and sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the committee now report back a resolution upon that memorial proposing to go into an investigation, though the substantial facts alleged have been investigated by both the Packard and the Nicholls legislatures, and though, as affidavits I hold in my hand show, the memorialist has not even yet obtained possession of the evidence he desires, but within the last fifteen days, through men who claimed to be his accredited agents, has approached members of the Legislature who voted for me and offered them inducements if they would make a statement reflecting upon me in order that they might be used before the committee to support the charge made in his memorial.

I object further, because two years ago this same memorialist charged and put it in the mouth of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] that I went through a side door into the session of the returning board with affidavits to improperly influence the returning board, and because he then said to the Senator from Georgia, sitting by his side, "that he would prove that and a good deal more." And neither that nor anything else has been proved, though eighteen months have elapsed. The other day, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when I referred to this matter, Mr. Spofford stated it was only on hearsay that he told the Senator from Georgia that I had thus improperly influenced the returning board. The only evidence, hearsay or otherwise, which has been produced in support of this statement is the telegram of Smith, dated the 29th of October, when, as a matter of fact, the proceedings of the committee show it, the Senator from Georgia asserted the same thing seven days before in the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Here is a mere memorial signed by a man who has no standing other than as a citizen, whose case has been adjudicated, whose title has been determined, who has once made allegations that are disproved, who has been before the Louisiana Legislature, his own Legislature, and had a committee appointed to investigate the same charges, and they found nothing; who has been assiduously working through his agents for the last two years, and has been able to find nothing against me. There is not an allegation in that memorial for which I am not indictable under the laws of Louisiana. Why did they not indict me for bribery if they had any proof? Why did they not indict me for procuring the office of governor corruptly as they allege? See what a frivolous charge that is when both Houses of Congress recognized me, and the democratic Legislature recognized me by joint resolution eighteen months before I was elected to the Senate.

Upon that meager, one-sided, flimsy showing, the memorialist simply signing a petition without oath, the Committee on Privileges and Elections bring in a proposition to investigate, and send for persons and papers. If they do not mean to attack the title to my seat why did they not limit the investigation to an inquiry as to my having been guilty of bribery in securing my seat? I would then have been one of the first to have gotten up here and asked that the resolution be adopted.

In answer to the Senator from Alabama my reply is, nothing shall go upon the record showing consent on my part to this proceeding, for the reason that it is illegal and revolutionary because the memorialist has not of himself a standing that would entitle him to the degree of consideration awarded by this committee. I undertake to say that if it had not been that I occupy the peculiar relation that I do, no man would have thought for one moment of bringing in a resolution of that kind predicated upon so flimsy a showing.

Why, sir, for four years I have had men surround me on every side and threaten me with perjury. After my administration I have seen the courts pass into the hands of my opponents. While they were riding on the crest of the wave and in the full flush of their victory, after the Packard government had been overthrown and when the Nicholls government was established, for seven or eight months my case was pending, and it was their interest as it was their intent to find something against me upon which to predicate an indictment, to handicap me in the door of the Senate and make it more difficult for republican Senators to vote for my admission.

I had, during my administration, revised the whole financial system of the State. I had funded between ten and eleven millions of State bonds, and had never directly or indirectly held a bond on my own account. Not a single dollar had been added to the State debt by any act passed during my term of office. Under my administration the rate of taxation, State and municipal, had been reduced over one-third; the taxes had been collected, the interest on the public debt promptly paid, and a large balance left in the treasury to the credit of the interest fund.

Even my political opponents have accepted my financial policy with commendation. Nine-tenths of the bankers and business men of the city of New Orleans will tell you that they earnestly wish the present administration had carried out faithfully in the interest of the people the financial policy that I inaugurated. Under my administration the sanitary regulations were rigidly enforced, and the yellow fever was kept out of New Orleans. Sir, it is not thirty days since, driven to the expedient by the force of circumstances, by the unfortunate and calamitous result of the laxity of sanitary regulations of the last year, a citizens' committee has sprung forth from among the commercial community of New Orleans, prompted into existence for the purpose of enforcing the sanitary regulations outside of and without the aid of the local authorities, and they have made the gentleman who served as president of the board of health under my administration their director.

I ought not, perhaps, to have said as much as I have. Some things are best answered by silence and by withholding the words that leap impulsively to the lips. But I contend that I have had somewhat of provocation, somewhat of justification.

I know very well that I have incurred the political animosity, not personal I think, of very many gentlemen whose personal relations with me have been friendly. I know that my character and my official conduct have been criticized very severely on the floor of the Senate, and for that matter in times past and before I became a member of this body in both Houses of Congress. I have had little opportunity to defend myself while warding off blows in Louisiana, and he who heard much against me simply verified the old French maxim that "he who hears but one bell hears but one sound."

It ought to be a sufficient reply, I say to my friends on the other side, when I can point to the fact that committee after committee was organized to convict me, that grand juries have been packed to indict me, that witnesses have been approached and great inducements have been held out to them to furnish evidence that would justify upon a prima facie showing the finding of an indictment against me even by a partisan court, and it never has been done, sir, and it never will be done. I have interests in Louisiana that are abiding. I should like to see the material resources of that State developed; but it can never be done by the policy pursued by the democratic party now in power. I will not go into that to-day. By and by, when this investigation shall have come to an end, I may tell the Senate and the country much that I have hitherto abstained from saying on the floor of the Senate, and which some of my friends think I ought to have said long since. I will endeavor to show by what means the republican party has been crippled and in a great measure overthrown in Louisiana. I will try to show what part and parcel in alleged frauds the democratic party have taken, how far they are particeps criminis.

Nay, more, I will endeavor to show by what means the Nicholls government was installed in power, and how it is that to-day and last winter legislature parishes were represented by democratic representatives and senators where there are in some instances four republican voters to one democratic voter; while at an election recently held for members of the constitutional convention the same parishes have by overwhelming majorities sent republican members to the convention, because there being no general ticket run and no members of the Legislature to be elected and no United States Senator to be chosen there was not sufficient inducement to resort to violence to affect the result.

In his last annual message even Governor Nicholls admitted that the men who precipitated that unfortunate massacre in Tensas Parish at the last election did so in the interest of the democratic party and for political purposes. Ten or twelve men at least we know to have been killed in that one parish where under my administration we never had anything but peace and good order. It was the model, the banner parish of the State. There are only three or four hundred white voters in that parish to four thousand colored voters, but in some strange and inexplicable manner the democratic candidates were returned elected and sat in the democratic Legislature and voted for my colleague. Mr. President, I am comparatively a young man, and if the apparent object of this resolution should prevail I will doubtless be able to survive it, but I may live to see the day, perchance, when this chalice will be commended to other lips, and when the precedent which the Senate thus establishes may come back to plague its inventors.

And the inquiry may then arise how it happens that in four or five States including Louisiana the voice of the majority of the legally qualified voters is suppressed by violence or fraud and in districts where there are three colored voters to one white voter only the white votes are allowed to count.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I want it understood that my relations personally with many of my political opponents in Louisiana are kind, and all through my difficulties in the South I had very many friends for whom I entertain a warm regard.

I conclude by saying as I began, that I protest against this proceeding; and I can only answer the honorable Senator from Alabama that thus protesting and admitting nothing I await the investigation, and I will stand or fall by it. And I defy any investigation that may be set on foot to injure me personally or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. LOGAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BLAINE, (when his name was called.) I repeat that as to all questions on this resolution I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and that my colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.] I would vote "yea" if I were at liberty to do so.

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] on all questions arising upon this resolution.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] on questions connected with this case.

Mr. MCDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS, (when Mr. PLUMB's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. PLUMB] was obliged to leave the Chamber a short time since, and requested me to say that he was paired on this question with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.]

Mr. THURMAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

The Secretary concluded the roll-call.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] Were he here, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My colleague [Mr. HEREFORD] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.] They are both absent in obedience to an order of the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 28; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] for the original resolution.

Mr. HOAR. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not aware that the yeas and nays had been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] on this question.

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. BECK's name was called.) I was requested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to state that he was paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH.]

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On these questions I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Bell,	Ferry,	Logan.	Rollins,
Bruce,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Saunders
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Windom.

Butler,	Farley,	McDonald,	Withers.
Cameron of Pa.,	Gordon,	McPherson,
Carpenter,	Grover,	Paddock,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the orignal resolution as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays and they were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. Was my name called on the last roll-call? I intended to vote and I ask unanimous consent to record my name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's name was called but the Clerk did not hear any response.

Mr. DAWES. I intended to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent, the vote having been announced.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A vote cannot be recorded by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. I intended to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair believes that this rule cannot be suspended at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A vote cannot be recorded after the result has been announced.

Mr. DAWES. I intended to vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It cannot be done.

Mr. DAWES. I will state that I intended to vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator voted "yea" and his response was not heard, the Journal can be corrected.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That can be done.

Mr. DAWES. I would not say positively that I did vote, but I think I did.

Mr. EATON. I think the Senator did, for I said to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] here, that he had voted and the pair was at an end.

Mr. DAWES. It was my impression that I had voted, but I was a little uncertain about it, and I would not state it positively for the sake of getting my name on the record, but I should like to have it there, and I believe I did vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am satisfied the Senator from Massachusetts voted, because I had been paired with him and voted because I understood the pair was at an end.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kentucky was kind enough to pair with me for a couple of hours.

Mr. VOORHEES. Whether the Senator voted or not, this body is master of its own rules and can suspend the rule and allow him to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one rule that cannot be suspended.

Mr. VOORHEES. Why? What rule has a higher power than this body?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule 18.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Indiana that inasmuch as several Senators state that the Senator from Massachusetts did vote, the record can be corrected according to the fact.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is certainly sufficient.

Mr. FERRY. I make that motion if a motion is needed, though I think one is not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The eighteenth rule reads as follows:

> When the yeas and nays shall be taken upon any question, no Senator shall, under any circumstances whatever, be permitted to vote after the decision shall have been announced from the chair; but a Senator may, for special reasons assigned by him, with the unanimous consent of the Senate, change or withdraw his vote after such announcement. No motion to suspend this rule shall be in order.

This relates to a Senator voting after the announcement of the result is made; but here the Senator informs the Senate that he did vote and the Chair sees no reason why the record may not be corrected on motion.

Mr. DAWES. All I can say is that I am confident I voted, but I am not absolutely certain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is enough. Shall the record be amended by inserting the vote of the Senator from Massachusetts on the last roll-call?

Mr. EATON. I assert that the Senator voted whether he remembers it or not, for I immediately went into the cloak-room and said to my friend from Kentucky that Mr. DAWES had returned and voted and therefore the pair was broken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the record being corrected, and it will be so ordered. The question is on the resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BOOTH, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THURMAN, (when the name of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. FERRY, (when Mr. CHANDLER'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] Were he here, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.] On this question my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to state that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BECK] is paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH.] My colleague, if here, would vote "yea."

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to state again that I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] and myself are paired.

Mr. MCDONALD. If I were not paired, I should vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS. If it has not been already stated, I will say that my colleague [Mr. PLUMB] when he left the Chamber requested me to say that he was paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] My colleague would vote "nay" on this resolution if he were at liberty to do so.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bailey,	Coke,	Garland,	Hampton,
Call,	Davis of W. Va.,	Groome,	Harris,
Hill of Georgia,	Lamar,	Ransom,	Voorhees,

So the resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I move to take from the table House bill number——

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator is looking for the appropriation bill, it is No. 2.

Mr. EATON. My friend knows I was not looking for that.

Mr. WINDOM. I supposed the Senator was looking for that.

Mr. EATON. It is a very different bill, a bill to prohibit military interference at elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections.

Mr. ALLISON. I raise the point of order that that is not in order; it was only read the second time this morning.

Mr. EATON. I have not asked to have it read, but simply taken up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When taken up, the question will be, Shall it be read the third time, which the Chair will be bound to put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sees no reason why the bill may not be taken up to-day, though it cannot be read the third time to-day if objection be made. It is subject to be debated now.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire whenever the bill may be taken up to give notice of an amendment, which I shall ask to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on taking up the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that is done I ask the Senator from Connecticut to give way for a motion to adjourn. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is absent and has charge of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. EATON. I can inform my friend that I do this with the concurrence of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. ALLISON. I regret exceedingly to hear that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should like to make a short speech on that subject. It has got to be about the right time now.

Mr. President, this bill has no proper place to be taken up to-night for consideration, because when it is taken up, unless some motion intervenes the Chair would be bound to put the question shall the bill be read the third time. It has been read once to-day already. But I do not address myself——

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to present a question of order to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama will state his question of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In obedience to the rules I will take my seat.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is that a motion to take up a bill is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill is subject to debate, but not upon the merits of the bill itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Am I in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to yield to me to move an adjournment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do, I shall lose my chance. Mr. President, if we have discovered that it is in order to debate a question that is pending before the Senate, I will proceed to debate it.

There has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill very like this one, exactly like this one excepting the amendments recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary; which is on the Calendar. There has been reported from the Committee on Appropriations the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill two days ago after that bill had been here for more than a week, substantially the same as the one that was passed through the Senate at the last session, and that bill is on the Calendar. Now my opposition to the taking up of this bill is that it is due to the state of the business of this body, it is due to public considerations, it is due to the President of the United States who has called this special session on account of the failure of two appropriation bills, mentioning no other subject in his message needing present legislative consideration, that this appropriation bill should be first taken up and disposed of, and then this other measure can receive attention.

I think it is due to another thing, Mr. President, that the appropriation bill should precede this. In the attitude of events which have occurred at the last session and this, and in the light of the declarations that have been made on the floor of the Senate, and from the very nature of the case as it now stands, no matter what people may say about it, the compulsory precedence given to this bill over the appropriation bill is a declaration, no matter who may deny it, it is an effective declaration, which has so often in unguarded moments already been made on this floor, that there shall be no appropriations until satisfactory legislation, be it much or little, on some kindred or other subjects, shall take place.

Now, for one, as a Senator I do not wish to occupy that attitude, because I believe it to be unconstitutional and destructive of the balance and the framework and the essence, and so finally of the liberty of this Government. I am not speaking of what some other department of the Government may think or feel about it, but I am speaking of what I think and feel about it myself, that I do not wish to be a party to occupying any such attitude. This is not the ordinary case of going on at the beginning of the session with a variety of legislation upon a variety of topics in advance of the appropriation bills; but the test was applied at the last session by an attempt in one House to persuade the other—I will not say coerce—into agreeing to legislation it did not like as the only and the necessary price that must be paid for obtaining appropriations to carry out existing laws.

We have already had—which I suppose we may refer to—in a message of the President of the United States to another branch of Congress, where the Constitution required him to send it, (that is a public event,) attention called to that very subject; and now it is proposed, whatever may be said about it, the very act of doing it is the thing, that before we shall take any further steps about appropriations some legislation of this same character, which has been attached to those subjects of contest and is a part of them, must go ahead of the appropriation bill instead of going after it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is the Senator from Vermont opposed to the legislation now proposed to relieve the polls of the troops or whatever may be embraced in this proposed bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the rules of this body absolutely forbid my stating how I feel about that.

Mr. VOORHEES. I suppose so. Then next——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be called to order by some Senator on the other side for getting over the line if I say anything about that.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then next, allow me to say to the Senator from Vermont that he has no divining-rod, he has no power of prophecy to tell what this side of the Chamber, after this proposed and most just and righteous measure may be adopted or rejected, will do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if my friend's question is through, I will go on——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am not quite through, but still I will yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very much obliged for my friend giving me back my own property, that is the floor at this time. I am glad to get something back.

My honorable friend from Indiana is perfectly correct when he says that I have no divining-rod which shall point out to me what that side of the Chamber will do after they have done this. I am willing to agree that no human foresight—I do not claim to have much—whether there is any divine foresight that will point out either in this world or in any other precisely what my honorable friends over there will do next, I do not know. I have great faith in Providence, but it would be a pretty strong strain to go even that far. I dare say that the honorable gentlemen over there will do what they believe to be right and for the best interest of the country, by which they understand their own particular party. So much I believe.

Now, Mr. President, to come back to the substance of this thing and leave off the part of it referred to by the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. VOORHEES. That was the substance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not see it in that light.

Mr. VOORHEES. No.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The case stands thus, I repeat: here, although there is an appropriation bill on your table and ready, and although there are involved in this bill the very controversies which have been the subject of dispute before, it is proposed that this bill shall go ahead of the appropriation bill. It will make no difference to the actual attitude of it in going ahead of it, whatever palliations or excuses or disclaimers gentlemen may allege. Gentlemen may say that they are opposed to a bill and vote for it; I have seen that done very often. Gentlemen may say that this is no menace, this does not put Senators who are opposed to this sort of thing in the attitude of holding an unconstitutional and revolutionary relation to some other department of the Government at all. They may say that it does not do it; but there is the fact, the event, that the body that talks so fairly, at the same time says "we will not go on with an appropriation bill, although our usage and the practice of the Senate requires it, but we will go on with the other before the appropriation bill shall go on." Without speaking of any other department of the Government, I say as one Senator that I will not consent to any such thing, and by my vote will endeavor to resist it.

Mr. VOORHEES. The position of the Senator from Vermont as a great leader of his party seems to be this, that he is unwilling to say whether he is for or against this most ordinary and proper, as it seems to us, measure of legislation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I am not at liberty to debate the merits of this bill on this motion, I must appeal to the Chair and my honorable friend to keep within the line.

Mr. VOORHEES. When the Senator from Vermont a moment ago was complaining that this measure was put before the appropriation bill, and saying that it was a menace and a threat to the appropriation bill, I asked him whether he was for this measure. I was ready to respond to the corresponding question which he might have put to me. I am for this bill and for the appropriation bill too. But I had him at this disadvantage, that he was not for this bill; at least, if he was, he was not ready to say so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not any right to say so.

Mr. VOORHEES. You said you would be called to order. I am not called to order. I say I am for it; I am a Senator on this floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know it; but my point was, and why I did not say it, was (because the Senator knows perfectly, I suppose, my real opinion) that the rule says that the merits of the measure proposed to be taken up shall not be discussed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On its merits.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On its merits; and if it is not speaking on the merits of the bill for the Senator to say he is for or against it, I do not know what is.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have admired the Senator from Vermont for a great many years, and I never knew a cover that he took to with such skill as he does this. The merits of this bill are not much in controversy when I ask him, especially when he is menacing this side with saying that we have put it in as a threat, whether he is for this bill or against it, and he says he declines to answer. I do not decline to answer, and I am not called to order. I am for this measure, and I am for the next one that comes after it, and there is no trouble about this at all. If this legislation is right, let us pass it. There is no necessity whatever of linking the two matters together at this time. I am for the appropriation bill. That comes after this. This is not the first bill that has interposed before an appropriation bill. There have been many bills before appropriation bills heretofore. I see no trouble about taking this bill up and passing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAINE, (when his name was called.) I should vote "nay" if I were not paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.]

Mr. BOOTH, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] Otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FERRY, (when Mr. CHANDLER'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] Were he here, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] Were he here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

Mr. INGALLS, (when Mr. PLUMB'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THURMAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My colleague [Mr. HEREFORD] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.]

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. I gave notice of an amendment to this bill, which I should be glad to have read and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It can be printed without being read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be read if desired. ["Read it."] The amendment of the Senator from Maine will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Any person who shall carry a concealed deadly weapon at any place, or within a mile of any place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished with a fine not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. BLAINE. I limit that amendment to "concealed" weapons.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that my amendment be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks for the reading of the bill. It will be read for information.

Mr. EATON. I hope my friend will not ask for the reading of the bill to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be read the third time to-day except by unanimous consent.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor now, and to leave him on the floor I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield for that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at seven o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 7, 1879.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move to dispense with the reading of that portion of the Journal relating to the introduction and reference of bills.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The remainder of the Journal was then read and approved.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was necessarily absent on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. It was so announced.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to be excused for that absence, and to announce that had I been present at the time the bill in relation to elections was passed, I would have voted in the negative.

Mr. WRIGHT. I find in the RECORD of this morning an entry which I think does me injustice, and I feel called upon to request the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to make such an explanation to this House and to me as may be satisfactory. I ask the Clerk to read a paragraph of this morning's RECORD which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WRIGHT also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1800) to exempt all persons making less than sixty gallons of brandy from apples or peaches from taxation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I want it understood that I am not an advocate of cheap whisky. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state what is wrong?

Mr. WRIGHT. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] put that bill in my hands and requested me to present it. I had no knowledge whatever of its contents, but as I am inclined to be civil on all occasions, particularly toward him——

Mr. CONGER. We do not hear the gentleman.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not hear the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. I said that we could not hear on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will repeat what I said for the benefit of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. Thank you.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yesterday, during the regular call for the introduction of bills I introduced a bill, and it is credited to me, which purports to take the tax off whisky.

Mr. CONGER. So we notice.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] handed me the bill when it was my turn to introduce bills, and requested me to introduce it, which I did. But his name was marked on the back of the bill; I was merely the agent.

The SPEAKER. Then the RECORD is correct; the gentleman did present the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. The paragraph from the RECORD which I have had read gives me credit for presenting that bill.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman himself states that he did present it.

Mr. WRIGHT. This case is governed exactly by the principle of qui facit per alium, facit per se. I was the agent merely of the gentleman from North Carolina. I want the RECORD corrected; I want it to appear that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] presented the bill, and I want him to explain to this House that he had no personal motive in getting me to present it, or I will hold him responsible here or elsewhere. [Great laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Do I understand the gentlemen to ask permission to withdraw the bill?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not ask to withdraw it. I only ask that it may be put under another flag—the flag of North Carolina. I want an explanation from the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. KITCHIN.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I will state that, knowing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] was a greenbacker, and believing that he was fonder of whisky than any other gentleman in this Hall, [laughter,] I handed him the bill, with my name indorsed upon it, and asked him to present it, as I was not entitled to the floor for that purpose at that time. As it seems to be too weighty for him I will take the ponderous weight from the shoulders of that gentleman, which seems to have broken his spinal column, and will place it upon my own shoulders, and "daddy" the bill myself. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The RECORD is correct nevertheless.

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall hold the gentleman responsible. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not think that the greenbackers held gentlemen responsible for anything.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. At the time of adjournment yesterday the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] was on the floor claiming the right to make a personal explanation. Does the gentleman desire the floor now for that purpose?

Mr. CHALMERS. I do.

Mr. CONGER. Does that cut off the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—FORT PILLOW.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire to say that many gentlemen on both sides in this House, I hope I may say my friends on both sides of the Chamber, have pointed out to me the difficulties that stand in the way of the passage of the resolution which I have offered. I recognize the great necessity of being careful in the precedents we establish. I recognize also the delicate position in which gentlemen of the republican party might be placed at my request if called upon to review a report made years since by a distinguished republican Senator now dead. I recognize further the possibility that this investigation might rekindle the flames of passion and prejudice which all good men certainly desire to see covered in their own ashes. But, Mr. Speaker, it is a very hard thing to ask soldiers who have lost all save honor in the war to permit that to be taken from them by the constant repetition of accusations which are utterly untrue, and which in my own case I most emphatically deny.

During the last three weeks Mr. Leming, who was at Fort Pillow as adjutant of the Thirteenth Tennessee Regiment, was here in Washington and sought an introduction to me for the purpose of returning his thanks for kindness I had shown him while a wounded prisoner at Fort Pillow. Captain Young, of the Twenty-fourth Missouri Regiment, who was a provost marshal at the post, was with me almost continuously after I entered the fort and remained with me several days afterward as a prisoner of war. I would be glad, therefore, to put on record the testimony of these gentlemen and the testimony of many others on my own side for the purpose of showing my personal conduct upon that occasion. I desire especially to show that some hours after all the firing had ceased a soldier infuriated with whisky, taken from the sutler's stores, attempted to fire upon the prisoners, and I prevented it at the risk of my own life.

But I would much prefer that sworn witnesses should speak for me in this matter, and therefore it was I asked an investigation. But the action of the House yesterday satisfies me that gentlemen are not willing now to go into such an investigation. Therefore I have concluded to accept the advice of my friends and make my own statement, which I shall do very briefly, asking at the same time to publish as part of my remarks extracts from the history of Forrest and his cavalry, and also extracts from the testimony taken by the congressional committee.

Mr. DUNNELL. Are we to understand that the gentleman does not propose to press action upon his resolution now pending?

Mr. CHALMERS. I propose to leave that matter to the House. While I would like to have that resolution adopted, I do not desire to be in the attitude of demanding anything that is disagreeable to the House, especially when it is a personal matter and when it may involve expenditure to the Government. I will leave that question entirely to the House.

Mr. WILBER. Suppose the gentleman should try to have a vote of the House on the resolution.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am perfectly willing and indeed anxious that the action proposed in the resolution should be adopted. When I finish my statement I will endeavor to bring up that question.

Now the most outrageous and inexcusable conduct charged against the confederate troops on that occasion is said to have occurred on the morning after the battle. In regard to this I have no personal knowledge. I can only say that I never heard of those charges until after the war was over and I saw them published in the report of the congressional committee. No gentlemen of my command with whom I have conversed on this subject ever heard of them until after the war when they saw them printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I call attention to the fact that in this very testimony a number of witnesses who were examined state that they did not see the outrages charged and never heard them until they were at Mound City, Illinois. At that time I was the commander of the first division of Forrest's cavalry, and when the fight commenced I was in command of troops composed of one brigade of my own division and one brigade of Buford's division. About nine o'clock in the day General Forrest arrived and took command in person.

In order to understand this matter it is necessary I should briefly allude to the situation. The ground had been fortified both by the confederates and by the Federals. The fort in which the last stand was made was an earthwork thrown up in the angle formed by Cold Creek emptying into the Mississippi River. Circling in front of that was a line of intrenchments that had been thrown up by the confederates. Between this line of intrenchments (which had been taken possession of by the confederate troops early in the morning) and the fort there was a deep ravine which afforded shelter to an attacking force; for the guns of the fort could not be depressed so as to reach troops that were in that ravine. This ravine could be reached by getting down under the banks of Cold Creek; and troops could come up almost under the fort without being exposed to any fire except from the sharpshooters who were thrown out. Upon the river side the approach was more difficult, because troops coming from that side were subjected to the fire from the gunboats. Upon that side, too, the ravine widened out into a platean, upon which there were three rows of houses. These houses were taken possession of by the confederate forces before any demand for surrender was made, as is shown by the testimony of several witnesses before the congressional committee. In truth, the place had been thoroughly invested in front, and troops had been sent down below; for I should say this fortification was at that time about forty or fifty feet above the level of the water so as to cut off any retreat in case the garrison should attempt it. The fort was untenable; and this was so plain that the commander of the fort in the morning had made an agreement with the commander of the gunboat that in case it could not be held a signal to that effect was to be given, and when the retreat began the gunboat was to open with canister upon the confederate troops. The testimony taken before the congressional committee shows that this signal was given before the fort was taken.

I say here, too, that in my judgment that fort would have been surrendered had it not been that Major Bradford, who was then in command, feared violence at the hands of the Tennessee confederates, who were bitterly hostile to him and his command, growing out of charges, whether true or false I do not know, of bad conduct on the part of Bradford and his command toward the wives and families of the confederate Tennesseeans.

When the demand for surrender was made and refused the bugle was sounded and the works were taken by assault. As we went in a large number of the garrison ran out and down this steep hill toward the water's edge with their guns in their hands. That a number of them were killed is unfortunately true; but if any were killed in violation of the usages of war the most searching examination on the part of this committee has failed to fix any responsibility for it, at least upon the general officers in command.

The witness Ledbetter was asked the question, "Did you see any confederate officers there when the shooting was going on?" His answer was, "No; I did not see them until they carried me up upon the hill."

Three different witnesses undertook to criminate me in regard to this matter. The first is the witness Ray, to whom I alluded before. Ray described the killing of a child on that occasion. I call the attention of gentlemen to the testimony taken by the congressional committee, and they will there find the captain of the gunboat testifies that he carried off all of the women and children from that fort when the fight opened and that he put them above Cold Creek on the bank of the river. I furthermore say to gentlemen that there is now in the city of Washington a gentleman, a practicing lawyer, J. B. Archer, who was at that time in charge of the steamboat Liberty No. 2, and by him it can be proved that he came with his boat during the fight and carried off all of those women and children to the city of Memphis, and they did not return till after the confederates had left Fort Pillow. Therefore it is manifest to any man this story of the killing of a child was fabricated from beginning to end.

I have already called attention to the statement of the witness Ray. He knew that a star upon the coat was the insignia of a Federal general, and, he said, he supposed it was General CHALMERS because the man had a star upon his coat. I have already said to you that a star on the coat was the insignia of a major and not of a general officer in the confederate service.

The next witness, Mr. Purdom, who connected me with this matter, said that he had a conversation with a captain of the Second Missouri Cavalry, who said he was a staff officer of mine, and this staff officer said to him we did not regard negroes as soldiers; that we would show no quarter either to the negro troops or their officers. Now, if I am permitted, I will show that no officer of the Second Missouri Cavalry was ever on my staff at any time during the war.

Another witness, Dr. Underwood, testifies to having seen me on the steamer Platte Valley, and to have heard me say to a Federal captain that I would treat him as a prisoner of war, but that I would not treat as prisoners of war the "home-made Yankees," meaning loyal Tennesseeans. Now, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I was at that time delivering prisoners—wounded loyal Tennesseeans—to the gunboat, it seems to me gentlemen should know that this statement could not have been made by me. As I was then delivering wounded negroes to the gunboat, it ought to satisfy any man that the pretended staff officer did not express my sentiments on that occasion.

Another statement is made that several officers of the Federal Army, whose names could not be found out, had treated me to drinks on that occasion, and they were severely censured for it. Now, it is well known by every member of my command during the war, and I believe it is well known to all of my associates in Congress, that I never drink spirituous liquors of any kind. So on every single point which has been made and every insinuation made against me I think I can show conclusively they are utterly untrue.

In the evening after the battle I withdrew with my command about two miles from the river, leaving an officer with a detachment to bury the dead and gather up the arms. I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact shown by that officer in his report that a large number of the guns were picked up on the very water's edge, showing that the garrison did not surrender, but ran out with their arms in their hands.

Upon the next morning, the gunboat No. 28 came up the river and commenced to shell the fort while this detachment was burying the dead; and the officers upon that gunboat testify that then, and not till then, the confederates set fire to the town. I call attention to this for the purpose of showing that there was no deliberate purpose on the part of any man to burn up men who were wounded and not dead. I have always believed, since I have heard that anybody was burned, that when the houses and tents were set fire to, if any were burned they were bodies of men who were dead that were lying in the tents and houses set fire to. And upon that point I call attention to the evidence of two witnesses already published by the congressional committee. Mr. Alexander is one. He testifies he heard the rebels say they would not fire the building until the wounded were taken out of it. Mr. Shelton testifies distinctly that the house he was in was not set fire to till he was taken out of it. When I heard the firing on the next morning, believing that an effort would be made to retake the place, I moved back with my command to the scene of action; but before any fighting commenced Major Anderson, of General Forrest's staff, arrived with a flag of truce, and proposed that all the prisoners should be turned over to the gunboat under parole, if their parole would be respected. That proposition was accepted, and it was carried out by Major Anderson and myself.

Human testimony in regard to a battle, and even in regard to a single conflict, is seldom consistent; and while I have been examining the printed testimony on both sides in regard to this matter I have been greatly astonished to find that there is but one single witness who seems to recollect the matter as I recollect it. Most of the witnesses say that shortly after or when the confederates ran into the fort the whole of the Union troops ran out; and General Jerdan, who wrote the life of Forrest, has adopted that as a true statement in his book. Now, I call attention to this fact: that if that had been true when about twenty-five hundred men were firing, some from above and some firing from below, it would have been almost impossible that 40 per cent. of that garrison could have been saved unhurt; and yet 40 per cent. were saved wholly untouched.

There is one witness, however, whose statement agrees with my recollection. That witness states that only a portion of the troops ran out and that nearly all who did run out were either killed or wounded. Now, my recollection is very distinct that a large number of the garrison remained in the fort, mostly white men, and they gathered around General Forrest and myself for protection, and they were protected.

As to the charge that is made that we took advantage of the flag of truce in order to obtain a better position for making the final assault, as I was not in command of the forces on that occasion this could not properly be made as a charge against me. But knowing as I do that it was not true, knowing that brave men never stoop to acts of cowardice, and in defense of my dead commander whose reckless courage shown upon a hundred battle-fields would have scorned such a mean advantage, I have selected certain portions from his book which I propose to publish in vindication of himself and his troops.

Mr. Speaker, this is all the statement I desire to make upon this subject now. So far as I am concerned I think I have said enough to satisfy any reasonable man that the charges made against me personally are untrue. Now, I am perfectly willing to leave this matter with the House of Representatives. I say distinctly whether they give me the committee or not I have no fears that injustice will be done me by men who were brave enough to fight for their principles. I am willing to risk my defense in the hands of gallant Union soldiers of any party.

This is no party matter. It will not add to the glory of the Union victory to detract from the heroism of the confederate soldiers; and I do not suppose there is a soldier upon either side who for mere party purposes would for one moment tolerate the idea of blackening the character of a soldier upon the other side.

Glory is the sodger's prize:
The sodger's wealth is honor.

Mr. HAWLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question or two for information.

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. I also say that I do not regard this as a party matter at all. I coincide with the gentleman entirely in that, and I should be very glad if any inquiry should show to the American people that no such scenes took place at Fort Pillow as were described in the journals all over the country, and as were believed to have taken place by the vast majority of the people of the North. I should be glad to believe that history is mistaken in that for the credit of the American name, and I cannot but sympathize with any gentleman who desires to be personally relieved from any of the opprobrium supposed to rest upon Fort Pillow. But I want to ask the gentleman how many Federal soldiers does he suppose were killed on that day?

Mr. CHALMERS. There were five hundred and seventy-seven altogether, if I recollect aright.

Mr. HAWLEY. Killed?

Mr. CHALMERS. No, sir, the whole garrison; of which about 40 per cent. were saved unharmed. I do not recollect the exact number now.

Mr. HAWLEY. Perhaps some three hundred killed and wounded?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. How many on the confederate side?

Mr. CHALMERS. In my own brigade there were one hundred and ten, and I presume the same proportion in Beaufort's, though I am not certain about that.

Mr. HAWLEY. Killed and wounded?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. On the confederate side three hundred in all killed and wounded?

Mr. CHALMERS. About two hundred and twenty, I should think.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is all I care to ask.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat. I desire to ask him whether his brigade had charge of the prisoners who were surrendered there after the surrender took place, or whether they were turned over to Beaufort's command?

Mr. CHALMERS. The prisoners taken to Mobile?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHALMERS. I forget about that. I think a special detachment was immediately sent with them on to Mobile. If I remember aright there were about sixty negroes among them.

Mr. CALKINS. From whose commands?

Mr. CHALMERS. That I do not remember.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to ask another question. Major Bradford was in command at Fort Pillow?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALKINS. What is the recollection of the gentleman as to whether Bradford was killed or wounded?

Mr. CHALMERS. I will state that Major Bradford was the commanding officer at Fort Pillow, and was neither killed nor wounded in the fight. After the surrender was over he was being pursued by a Tennessee soldier, and came to me and asked me not to permit him to be guarded by the Tennessee troops, because if he was so guarded he would be killed. At his own request I took him and put him in charge of Colonel Bob McCulloch, who commanded a brigade of my division. McCullock, in my presence, said to him: "Major, I put you on your parole of honor; remain with me and my staff." During that night Major Bradford disappeared. I had sent the Seventh Tennessee Cavalry about seven miles below in order to prevent any reinforcements coming from Memphis without my knowledge. They were picketed all along the roads and scattered through the woods. The next morning Major Bradford was caught by this Tennessee regiment attempting to get to Memphis. He was then taken in charge by the regiment and started for Jackson, where General Forrest had gone, for the purpose of turning him over to General Forrest with a view to his trial for a violation of his parole.

On the road to Jackson Major Bradford was shot. It was said by the men having him in charge that he again attempted to escape and they shot him. That is all I know about it.

Mr. CALKINS. One other question. Captain Leming was in command of the Tennessee regiment?

Mr. CHALMERS. He was the adjutant of the regiment, and he is the man who came to me the other day here to thank me for my kindness to him while he was a prisoner. He acted as adjutant during the fight and afterward. He is the gentleman whose testimony I am particularly anxious to obtain.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is one question I would like to ask the gentleman. Did he make an official report of his share in the battle?

Mr. CHALMERS. I do not remember; I presume so. I will state this on that subject, however: while in Forrest's command we were so much without books and papers that we very seldom made the same kind of official reports which were made in the infantry service. I served in both arms of the service. I do not remember now whether I made a formal report or not.

Mr. McMILLIN. Did you say that the officer of the Tennessee regiment was here the other day to thank you?

Mr. CHALMERS. I did say so; it was at that very door, [pointing to the north door of the Hall.]

The following is the paper referred to by Mr. CHALMERS in the foregoing remarks:

[From The Campaigns of General Forrest, pages 426 and 427.]

The Federal works were constructed with the trace and in the position exhibited in the map opposite; that is, upon the highest part of the bluff chosen for occupation, and inclosing the northwest angle formed by the river and Cold Creek, upon the last of which it jutted abruptly, while a bench of some forty feet lay between it and the immediate river bank at that stage of the water. Eastward there was a gradual slope from the crown next the river for from twenty to sixty yards, when the descent became sudden into a narrow gorge that separated it from a labyrinth of hills and ridges divided from each other by a network of interlacing and deep gullies, affording well-covered approaches for an enemy to within thirty to one hundred yards of the interior intrenchments. Southward this eminence also fell off gently for about two hundred yards and then rapidly into a narrow valley, the course of which was perpendicular to the river, and in which were a number of trading-houses and other buildings known as "the town." This slope, as will be seen in the diagram annexed, was seamed by a ravine which gave hostile access to within one hundred and fifty yards of the southern face of the works. Immediately exterior and parallel with the face of the works commanding this part of the ground were four rows of cabins and tents, the outer line of which (cabins) was not more than sixty yards distant from the ditch, and rightward from these stretched around to the north for some two hundred yards a rifle-pit along the eastern verge of the acclivity.

Same, pages 429 and 430:

It was about nine o'clock as General Forrest reached the ground, and about the same hour Major Booth, the Federal commander, and his adjutant by his side were killed.

* * * * * * *

Orders were therefore given immediately to "move up." Bell threw his brigade forward until he gained a position in which his men were well sheltered by the conformation of the ground. At the same time McCulloch advanced and gallantly carried the intrenchments on the highest part of the ridge immediately in front of the southeastern face of the work. The Federals fell back without further stand to their main work, and the rifle-pit in its front, closely pressed by McCulloch, who seized and occupied the cluster of cabins on the southern face of the work which, as we have said before, were about sixty yards from it, foiling an attempt on the part of the enemy to burn the buildings. He also carried and occupied the rifle-pits. The positions thus secured were fatal to the defense, for the confederates were now so placed that artillery could not be brought to bear on them with much effect except at a mortal exposure of the gunners. Moreover, the line of investment was now short and complete, extending from the river bank south of the fort to Cold Creek on the north, so swollen at the moment by backwater as to be impassable, while rearward of the advanced line were numerous sharp-shooters favorably posted on several commanding ridges ready to pick off any of the garrison showing their heads above or, indeed, any men moving about within the circuit of the parapets. Fully satisfied of his ability to carry the position without difficulty or delay, but desiring to avoid the loss of life that must occur in storming the works, Forrest determined to demand the surrender of the place.

THE CHARGE OF VIOLATING THE TRUCE.

Same, pages 432 and 433:

Pending the delivery and consideration of this communication, and during the period of the truce, the smoke of several steamers was discovered ascending the river, and speedily one, crowded with troops and her lower guards filled with artillery, was distinctly seen approaching near at hand, and manifestly bearing directly for the beleaguered fortress. Apprehensive that an attempt would be made to land re-enforcements from these steamers, Forrest promptly dispatched his aid-de-camp, Captain Charles W. Anderson, with a squadron of McCulloch's brigade, down the ravine through the "town" to occupy the old trenches constructed by the confederates in 1862, under the bluff at the river, about the mouth of that ravine, and just below the southern face of the invested work. That able, zealous staff officer, promptly moving his detachment in full view of the fort, swiftly took up the designated position directly in sight also of the gunboat New Era. And the Olive Branch in her course soon came so near that by opening with a volley on the mass of men with whom she was laden a heavy loss of life must have been inflicted; but Captain Anderson, limiting himself strictly to preventing the landing of any re-enforcements during the truce, caused two or three admonitory shots to be fired at the pilot-house, with the immediate effect of making her sheer off to the opposite shore and pass on up the river.

This clearly legitimate movement constitutes in large part the gravamen of the charge made with so many weighty epithets, and so widely believed at the North, that Forrest acted in bad faith and violated the flag of truce. Assuredly no allegation could be more unfounded in this connection. The movement was made under the eyes both of Major Bradford and Captain Marshall, who expressed no objections and took no steps to resist or check it. It was the necessary consequence of the menacing approach while the truce existed of these steamers, at a time when the river was full of transports bearing troops, and when the commander of the fort was manifestly seeking to gain time by negotiations with the hope of receiving succor. The Federal commanders made no signal, says General Shepley, (Reb. Rec. 8, Doc. 1, pp. 78-79 any kind to the Olive Branch, but permitted it to approach to the immediate vicinity of the New Era (that is, past the fort, it may be noted) before it was boarded from that gunboat and told "to proceed immediately to Cairo, and send four or five hundred rounds of ammunition, and stop all boats coming down." (Vide evidence of General Shepley and Captain Thornton, Reb. Rec. 8, Doc. 1, pp. 78-79.) It is to be noted as somewhat singular that while these Federal commissioners are lavish with their harsh comments upon this movement as a violation of the flag of truce, their official reports exhibit clearly the fact that they examined closely into the conduct of General Shepley in not carrying succor at that very juncture to the fort; or, in other words, for not attempting to do precisely what General Forrest justly apprehended would be undertaken, and therefore took the warranted precaution to foil. They accepted as his excuse only his inability, not that there was a truce.

[From congressional report, pages 37 and 38.]

Testimony of Lieutenant McJ. Leming.

Question. Were you in the fight at Fort Pillow?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. What is your rank and position?

A. I am a first lieutenant and adjutant of the Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry. A short time previous to the fight I was post-adjutant at Fort Pillow, and during most of the engagement I was acting as post-adjutant. After Major Booth was killed, Major Bradford was in command. The pickets were driven in just before sunrise, which was the first intimation we had that the enemy were approaching. I repaired to the fort, and found that Major Booth was shelling the rebels as they came up toward the outer intrenchments. They kept up a steady fire by sharpshooters behind trees and logs and high knolls. The major thought at one time they were planting some artillery or looking for places to plant it. They began to draw nearer and nearer, up to the time our men were all drawn into the fort. Two companies of the Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry were ordered out as sharpshooters, but were finally ordered in. We were pressed on all sides.

I think Major Booth fell not later than nine o'clock. His adjutant, who was then acting post-adjutant, fell near the same time. Major Bradford then took the command and I acted as post-adjutant. Previous to this, Major Booth had ordered some buildings in front of the fort to be destroyed, as the enemy's sharpshooters were endeavoring to get possession of them. There were four rows of buildings, but only the row nearest the fort was destroyed; the sharpshooters gained possession of the others before they could be destroyed.

Thomas Adison, Company C, United States Heavy Artillery, says, page 21, congressional report:

The rebels never would have got the advantage of us if it had not been for the houses built there, and which made better breastworks for them than we had. The major would not let us burn the houses in the morning. If they had let us burn the houses in the morning, I do not believe they would ever have whipped us out of that place.

THE FINAL ASSAULT.

Same, pages 436 and 437:

At this time the main part of Bell's brigade present, with the Second Tennessee on the right, were in position within from thirty to one hundred feet of the ditch, on the eastern face of the work, and McCulloch's men occupied the cabins, as will be remembered, within sixty yards of the southern face and the rifle-pits on their right. At the same time, the commanding ridges eastward and northeastward of the work were studded with sharpshooters, and from one of which, as may be seen from the diagram prefixed, they completely enfiladed the southern face of the Federal works; that is, the face most strongly garnished with artillery. It is injuriously charged against General Forrest that these positions were mainly secured by a perfidious breach of the flag of truce. That this allegation, however, is utterly unfounded ought to be apparent even from the evidence cited of Lieutenant Leming, the witness chiefly relied on to establish it. The fact is, the position selected by the Federals was so unfavorable that while commanded from several surrounding points within easy range of musketry, it could also be approached with impunity by an investing force, properly handled, to within a few yards of its ditch, as was done by the confederates before the flag of truce, which, be it remembered, did not actually advance beyond McCulloch's line.

On reaching the position we have mentioned, Forrest, scanning the field and observing that all was ready, caused the signal to be given for the resumption of hostilities; and at the first blare of the bugle the confederate sharpshooters at all points opened a galling fire upon the hostile parapet, to which the garrison replied for a few moments with great spirit. But so deadly was the aim of the confederates from their enfilading positions that their enemies could not rise high enough from their scanty cover to fire over at their foes, nor use their artillery on the southern face without being shot down. Consequently there was practically little resistance; when, a few moments later, the bugle still sounding the charge, the main confederate force, as with a single impulse, surged onward like a tawny wave, and crowning the parapet poured over on all sides into the work. Leaping headlong into the ditch, these agile, hardy young men found it a feeble barrier, and helping each other they clambered nimbly and swiftly and simultaneously over the breastworks beyond, opening from its crest a fearful, converging fire from all its faces upon the garrison within. In anticipation of this contingency, Major Bradford, it appears, had arranged with the captain of the gunboat that if beaten at the breastworks the garrison would drop down under the bank, and the gunboat would come to their succor and shelter them with cannon. The evidence of Captain Marshall, of the gunboat New Era, conclusive upon this point, is as follows: "Major Bradford signaled to me that we were whipped. We had agreed on a signal that if they had to leave the fort they would drop down under the bank, and I was to give the rebels canister." (Reb. Rec. 8, doc. 1, p. 55.)

The prearranged signal was now given, and the garrison en masse, white and black, for the most part with arms in their hands, broke for the place of refuge and naval aid there expected, leaving the Federal flag still afloat on its staff, and turning repeatedly as they sped down the precipitous bank to return the fire opened upon them.

THERE WAS NO SURRENDER.

The following testimony is introduced to show there was no surrender and that the garrison attempted to escape by way of the barges in the river, under cover of the gunboat, and that they were prevented by troops who had been sent down Cold Creek and the Mississippi River to prevent any escape.

Lieutenant Leming, (page 39, Congressional Report,) says:

It was not long after the flag of truce had retired that they made their grand charge. We kept them back for several minutes. What was called —— brigade or battalion attacked the center of the fort where several companies of colored troops were stationed. They finally gave way, and before we could fill up the breach the enemy got inside the fort, and then they came in on the other two sides and had complete possession of the fort. In the mean time nearly all the officers had been killed, especially of the colored troops, and there was no one hardly to guide the men. They fought bravely, indeed, until that time. I do not think the men who broke had a commissioned officer over them. They fought with the most determined bravery until the enemy gained possession of the fort. They kept shooting all the time. The negroes ran down the hill toward the river, but the rebels kept shooting them as they were running.

Nathan G. Fulks, Company D, Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry, (Congressional Report, page 42,) says:

I was at the corner of the fort when they fetched in a flag for a surrender Some of them said the major stood awhile and then said he would not surrender. They continued to fight for awhile, and after a time the major started and told us to take care of ourselves, and I and twenty more men broke for the hollow.

Sergeant Henry F. Weaver, Company C, Sixth United States Heavy Artillery, (Congressional Report, page 92,) says:

The rebels charged after the flag of truce; the Tennessee cavalry broke and was followed down the hill by the colored soldiers. They all appeared to go about the same time, as near as I could tell in the excitement of the battle. I came down the hill to the river and jumped into the water, and hid myself between the bank and the coal-barge. They were shooting the negroes over my head all the time, and they were falling off into the water.

Same, pages 445, 446, and 447:

"Valor as well as other virtues, has its bounds, which once transgressed, the next step is into the territories of vice; so that by having too large a portion of this heroic virtue, unless a man be very perfect in its limits, which upon the confines are very hard to discover, he may very easily unawares run into temerity, obstinacy and folly. From this consideration it is, that we have derived the custom in time of war to punish even with death those who are obstinate to defend a place that is not tenable by the rules of war. Otherwise, if there were not some examples made, men would be so confident upon the hopes of impunity that not a hen-roost but would resist and stop a royal army." So wrote old Michael Montaigne, who then proceeded to illustrate the practice in civilized warfare by these historical examples:

"Monsieur the Constable de Montmorency, having at the siege of Pavia been ordered to pass the Tesino, and to take up his quarters in the Faubourg St. Antonio, being hindered from doing so by a tower that was at the end of the bridge, which was so independent as to stand a battering, hanged every man he found within it for their labor. And again, since accompanying the Dauphin in his expedition beyond the Alps, and taking the Castle of Villane by assault, and all within having been put to the sword, the governor and his ensign only excepted, he caused them to be trussed up for the same reason; as also did Captain Martin du Bellay, then governor of Turin, the governor of St. Bony, in the same country, all his people being cut to pieces at the taking of the place."

Any one who has read our narrative attentively must be satisfied that Fort Pillow, at least after the confederates secured possession of the rifle-pits and huts near the parapet, was untenable, and consequently its defense unjustifiable. Indeed, we know of no instance of such manifest indefensibility. It was not so, however, be it noted, merely because of the numerical superiority of the confederates, but for the reason of the situation of the Federal work at the moment, even had the confederates not been able to get so close as they did to its parapets. Every foot of it was completely enfiladed and swept, as may be seen from the map, by confederate sharpshooters. Furthermore, so small was the scope of the place that, when the whole garrison was driven back within it, the work was so densely crowded that a sharpshooter's bullet could scarcely miss an object, and the jeopardy of the men was the more fearfully augmented. In fact, Forrest could have established his men under cover at good rifle-range and made the work untenable without attempting to storm it.

Compare what actually happened at Fort Pillow with the hideous scenes of slaughter, lust, and rapine that followed the storming of places in Spain or Portugal either by the French or English, as Oporto for example. How trivial and insignificant in comparison were even the worst alleged at Fort Pillow to what it is not denied actually happened at Oporto as related by Napier. Yet Marshal Soult was never overwhelmed with obloquy in prose and verse, nor besmirched with foul epithets for what occurred there. At the storming of Palamos, after the third demand for the capitulation of the place, the Spaniards, flying to the sea-shore with the purpose of finding refuge aboard some vessels—just as the garrison at Fort Pillow expected to be rescued by the gunboat—were intercepted by the French troops and put to the sword. We might readily fill as large a volume as this with like instances. The fact is, as was said by a recent writer in Blackwood's Magazine, in connection with a late affair in China, "Every military man knows that whenever a place is taken by assault under the flag of any nation, many of the defenders are put to death though they throw down their arms and cry for quarter."

Same, pages 439 and 440:

It should be remembered that the entrance of the confederates into the work had been achieved by an impetuous rush over the parapet by each individual, and therefore, for some moments afterward, there was necessarily a general confusion and tumult, in fact a dissolution of all organizations. Accordingly, as always happens in places taken by storm, unquestionably some whites, as well as negroes, who had thrown down their arms and besought quarter, were shot under that insania belli which invariably rages on such occasions. Nor must it be forgotten that there was no surrender of the place at all. When the confederates swarmed over the trenches that had been held defiantly for some eight hours in the face of numbers so manifestly superior the garrison did not yield, did not lay down their arms, nor draw down their flag; but with a lamentable fatuity, the mass of them, with arms still in their hands, fled toward another position in which they were promised relief, and while on the way thither returned the fire of their pursuers, it is true, not as a mass, but in instances so numerous as to render inevitable a fire upon their whole body, even had it not been the necessary consequence of their efforts to escape capture, whether with arms in their hands or not. In the mean time, or as soon as he could reach the scene, Forrest, riding into the work, assisted by Captain John Overton, lowered the flag; and immediately both he, General CHALMERS, and other officers interfered so energetically to stop the firing that it ceased speedily, ceased within fifteen minutes from the time that the signal for the termination of the truce was given.

Same, page 444:

During the day several transports came to the landing, and before the hour when the truce was to expire the prisoners had all been transferred to the cabin of the steamer Platte Valley, numbering at least seventy officers and men. It remains to be added that seven officers and two hundred and nineteen enlisted men, (fifty-six negroes and one hundred and sixty-three whites,) unwounded, were carried off as prisoners of war, which, with the wounded, make an aggregate of those who survived, exclusive of all who may have escaped, quite three hundred souls, and fully 55 per cent. of the garrison, while those who survived unhurt constituted 40 per cent.

Captain Marshall, of gunboat New Era, says:

I came along up, and the women and children, some sick negroes and boys, were standing around a great barge. I told them to get into the barge if they wanted to save themselves, and when I came down again I would take them out of danger.

They went in and I towed them up and landed them above Cold Creek. (See congressional report, page 86.)

In conclusion I ask attention to the testimony of Lieutenant William Clary, Company B, Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry:

Question. Were you at Fort Pillow when it was attacked?

Answer. No, sir; I was sent to Memphis the day before, and returned to Fort Pillow the morning after the fight. I came up on gunboat No. 28. The rebels were at Fulton, about two miles and a half below Fort Pillow. We fired at them, and the rebels at Fort Pillow heard it, and thought we were bringing up re-enforcements, and then they set the town on fire.

This shows there was no deliberate intention to burn either the living or the dead. The charge that a man was nailed to boards and then burned, and yet when found neither the boards nor his clothing through which the nails were driven were burned, is so manifestly false that it needs no refutation.

Mr. GARFIELD. When this subject was up before I reserved all points of order upon it. I also suggested that it was a question of very great doubt as a matter of propriety whether we should undertake by a committee of Congress to rewrite any considerable portion of the history of our war; and that if we did undertake it in that way, perhaps there was no chapter that would be so difficult and so painful to attempt to reconstruct as the chapter that contained the history of the Fort Pillow massacre.

Now, while saying that I repeat what I said then, that I would be sincerely glad to have any person, officer or private, over whose name a cloud has fallen in regard to the atrocities of that massacre, do anything in his power to disconnect his name with the horrible facts of that affair. While I have not heard all that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] has said, I shall give him my congratulations in so far as he may have succeeded in removing from the public mind the belief that he was responsible for the events referred to.

On the question of going into an investigation by the House, I want to say generally that there are several special reasons why it would be an unjust and unwise thing to do in this case. In the first place, the man who conducted the investigation and made this report which I hold in my hand—the official report concerning the massacre at Fort Pillow—and who was during nearly all his life a resident of my district—I refer of course to the late distinguished Senator Wade—is now dead. To undertake now to go over the ground of his report and controvert his conclusions by a new committee would be an injustice to the dead statesman, whose probity was never questioned. In the next place, many of the witnesses whose testimony is embraced in this report are dead; and to traverse their testimony for the purpose of disproving it, when they can no longer be heard, and when possibly no one without power on their part can speak for them, would be an injustice to them which we ought not to permit at a time so long after the facts occurred.

The main facts of that transaction, marking one of the most terrible episodes of the war, have become so fixed in the American mind that the attempt to uproot them will not only prove a failure but will reawaken passions which can do much harm and no good. I do not now speak of the relation of any one person to those facts. I am ready to believe that the massacre was partly the result of a frenzy which officers could not wholly control. Indeed, I have heard that some years after this report was made there was a conversation between Senator Wade himself and General Forrest on the subject of the massacre, and that the result of that interview was that Senator Wade expressed himself as gratified to find that General Forrest was not himself so far personally responsible for the massacre as he, Mr. Wade, had supposed. I understand that one of the statements in the explanation made by Forrest was that a considerable number of the assailing force had not long before captured a sutler's wagon containing spirits and had become so infuriated by drink that to a great extent their officers lost control of them. In so far as this was the fact, it lessens the responsibility of the officers in command. But the impression that sunk deepest in the public mind about this whole matter was created by two facts. The first was an order of General Forrest issued some three weeks before the Fort Pillow massacre in regard to the surrender of Paducah, an order whose authenticity and genuineness, I believe, have never been questioned and which is recorded on page 116 of the evidence taken in the Fort Pillow case. I quote it:

HEADQUARTERS FORREST CAVALRY CORPS,
Paducah, Kentucky, March 25, 1864.

COLONEL—

This was addressed to Colonel Hicks, commanding the Federal forces at Paducah—

Having a force amply sufficient to carry your works and reduce the place, and in order to avoid the unnecessary effusion of blood, I demand the surrender of the fort and troops, with all public property. If you surrender you shall be treated as prisoners of war, but if I storm your works you may expect no quarter.

N. B. FORREST,
Major-General, Commanding Confederate forces.

This order, or letter—undenied so far as I know—having been issued about three weeks before the Fort Pillow affair, gave the impression of a policy in advance, which the facts connected with the capture of Fort Pillow seemed to carry out in the most horrible reality.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether that is an order of General Forrest to his men or a demand upon the Federal commander?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is of course a demand upon the Federal commander, but it was understood throughout the United States to be the declaration of a policy on the part of General Forrest and his troops——

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman from Ohio will allow me to ask whether that is not the usual form of a demand for surrender preceding an assault?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. GARFIELD. Not under the laws of war as recognized among civilized nations anywhere, since the days of the Duke of Alva.

Mr. HASKELL. I would ask whether the demand for surrender made by General Grant at Appomattox was in any such terms?

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course not. The second fact I wish to mention is this, that it was understood at the time of the massacre to be the declared policy of those who commanded the confederate forces that they would not treat negro soldiers as prisoners of war. It is true they did afterward treat them as such; perhaps in this very case a few of the negro troops who survived were so treated. But the policy was understood to be proclaimed about that time that negroes were regarded as property, and not men in the sense in which we recognized them, and would not be treated as prisoners of war; and the Fort Pillow garrison was, I believe, the first garrison largely composed of negro troops that was taken by assault. These two facts, the previous letter of Forrest in regard to Paducah, and the understood declaration that negroes, then for the first time serving as soldiers, in a place carried by assault would not be treated as prisoners of war, gave to the mind of the American people the impression which, followed up by the shocking details of this report, became deep and lasting, that the massacre of Fort Pillow was deliberately executed for the purpose of preventing the further employment of negro troops for the defense of the Union.

I have said these things, Mr. Speaker, to show the grounds upon which public opinion was formed in reference to the massacre at Fort Pillow. And I am quite sure that the general facts set forth in Senator Wade's report will remain as a veritable part of public history, which no subsequent investigation can overthrow; and no attempt to do so ought to be made by this House. At the same time, I am glad to hear anything that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] has said or may say which tends to relieve him from the responsibility of the massacre. And I am bound to say that in the portion of his remarks which I have heard he has done much that tends to disconnect his name from that responsibility; but how fully he has succeeded those who heard the whole of his explanation can judge better than I can.

I now yield to my friend from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, is this discussion in order while the point of order is pending?

The SPEAKER. The point of order was reserved by the gentleman from Ohio as to whether it was a question of privilege or not, and as such entitled to come before the House. That point, however, has not been insisted upon by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. REAGAN. It has been in my mind to insist upon that point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the gentleman from Michigan may have the opportunity to be heard.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not wish to interrupt anybody from saying anything, but I do wish the point of order reserved that there is no authority in this House for any such investigation. That is the point I have in my mind.

A MEMBER. Well, make it now.

Mr. REAGAN. I do make the point of order now, Mr. Speaker. I call the attention of the House to the precedents and the explanation of the rule about questions of privilege on pages 291 and 292 of the Manual. This is a matter which does not relate——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is hardly a question of privilege. It is in the nature of a personal explanation. The Chair is inclined to believe the point of order which was intended to be made by the gentleman from Ohio is a correct one; that this does not embrace a question of privilege; that it does not relate to any strictture upon the gentleman from Mississippi in reference to anything done by him during his occupancy of a seat upon this floor. The Chair has listened to it as a personal explanation with the apparent consent of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, as this is held to be a personal explanation, is it necessary we shall go into any further debate on the subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. As this is held to be a personal explanation, of course it applies alone to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. And that gentleman has had the benefit of having his personal explanation made upon the floor go into the RECORD.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the point I make, Mr. Speaker, is that that personal explanation having been made, further discussion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The discussion is going on in elucidation of the facts.

Mr. CHALMERS. And I hope the gentleman from Michigan will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not like to object to any further proceeding of the debate, but I do not see that a personal explanation makes it necessary we should enter into a general discussion of this whole subject.

That is the mischief I am trying to prevent by insisting on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The House has allowed it to go on by unanimous consent. What point does the gentleman from Texas make?

Mr. REAGAN. The point I make is that the matter of this personal explanation is not such as relates to the action of the gentleman from Mississippi as a member of Congress, or in any way relating to his duties as a member of this House, or to anything of which he can claim as a privilege of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas will observe that this is the first time this point of order has been made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not wish to cut off the remarks of my friend from Michigan, and therefore I withdraw my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to see that no injustice is done to anybody.

Mr. REAGAN. I insist on the point of order, and especially because of the fact that on a former occasion, in reference to another member of this House, I felt compelled to make the same point so as to prevent the consumption of the time of the House in going into the discussion of questions merely personal, and which had no relation whatever to the official position of a member of this House or calling for any vindication which this House had the power to afford. It will be seen that among the various questions of privilege, so far as the rulings of the House are concerned, there is not a single ruling to be found which sustains any question of this character as being in order, that is, where a member complains of an outside injury done to him, not by this House, not by any member of this House, not by any officer of this House so as to give jurisdiction and remedy over the subject. The House has no jurisdiction of it, and can give no remedy. And besides, while I would not restrain any one from making any personal explanation, I feel it is a service to stop this kind of debate as soon as we can.

The SPEAKER. The Chair concurs in the propriety of the purpose of the gentleman from Texas, but the Chair desires to state in ustice of his recognition of to-day that when this subject was formerly before the House, the gentleman from Mississippi rose and offered a resolution, and it was upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that the resolution was postponed for the present to be called up by the gentleman from Mississippi at his pleasure.

Mr. REAGAN. But at the same time both the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] made and reserved the point of order. I did not do so because both of those gentlemen reserved the point of order at the time.

The SPEAKER. Still it appears of record that the House postponed the consideration of this resolution for the present, to be called up at the pleasure of the gentleman from Mississippi; and that clearly would bind the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman from Mississippi has been recognized. The point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that this is not a privileged question, was sustained and the resolution is not before the House. Then, I ask what is before the House? The gentleman has made his personal explanation and I submit that there is now nothing before the House.

The SPEAKER. The only difficulty about the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia is that no such point of order was sustained. No such point of order was made. The point of order simply was reserved. It never was made nor ruled on. But the Chair has no doubt in his own mind that if the point of order had been pressed he would either have decided that the provisions of the rule did not cover this resolution or else he would have submitted the question to the House to allow the House to determine, as he did in a former instance. And the Chair desires to say it is altogether the most proper and most satisfactory way for the occupant of the chair in a case of this sort where a gentleman brings up a matter claiming it to be a question of personal privilege, or where he proposes even to make a personal explanation, to permit the House to determine rather than for the Chair arbitrarily to rule the matter out of order.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I hope the question will be submitted to the House whether there is a question of privilege here presented by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, as the consideration of this resolution was postponed, and the gentleman from Mississippi having made his statement, it is but just and fair that any gentleman who wishes to discuss a particular point of his statement should have that privilege.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not want to be understood as desiring to interpose against any suggestion any gentleman wants to make. But I want to arrest general debate, and I do not wish to waive the point of order made upon the question of privilege.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman certainly can reserve the point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not wish that the point of order shall be considered as waived.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Texas reserves the point of order. I yielded to him for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was the gentleman who reserved the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. And I yielded to the gentleman from Texas upon the point of order. I have yielded also to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] knowing that he seeks to make some statement about this matter.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Michigan desire?

Mr. BURROWS. Only a few moments.

No one can regret more than I do——

Mr. McLANE. I rise to a question of order. There is so much dissatisfaction with the condition of this question that I wish it to be understood by the House before the gentleman from Michigan proceeds whether we are to go on with this debate by general consent. I submit to the Chair there is no other mode by which this debate can be continued but by general consent. It is altogether out of the power of the gentleman from Ohio, having reserved his point of order, to give the floor to the gentleman from Michigan.

Now, for one, I have no objection at all that this debate should go on.

Several MEMBERS. Well, let it go on.

Mr. McLANE. But I concur entirely in the remark made by the gentleman from Ohio, that this subject is not one which ought to be inquired into here or which ought to be debated here, and I think the gentleman ought to be consistent with himself, and having heard the explanation of the gentleman from Mississippi, and having said what it was proper for him to say in explanation, that he should now insist on his point of order, or else have it understood by the House that by general consent we go on with the debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. McLANE I wish the gentleman from Ohio to understand that I take no exception to this debate at all.

Mr. CONGER. Well, let it go on.

Mr. McLANE. But I do not think that it is reasonable or proper that it should go on without the consent of the House; and I submit that the gentleman from Texas or any other gentleman on this floor is at liberty to stop it by making the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the House was in possession of this resolution, and actually did, by a vote of the House, act upon it; and in order to show that he will cause the RECORD to be read.

Mr. REAGAN. Before that is read let me make this suggestion. The resolution was before the House, but by the interposition of other business it was put over. It did not go over by design, but it was an enforced postponement.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the House to postpone this subject to a day certain. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] make that motion?

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that it be postponed for the present, to be called up by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] at his pleasure.

Mr. CLYMER. It is a privileged matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. It can be called up as a privileged matter.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we may as well dispose of it now.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to postpone this subject for the present, to be called up when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] may choose to do so.

The motion to postpone was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 85, noes 69.

The SPEAKER. Now, there was a vote of the House upon postponement. It is true that the point of order was reserved, but it never was pressed, and in fact no decision was ever asked from the Chair.

Mr. WARNER. If in order I move to lay this whole subject on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. WARNER. And upon that I call for a vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WARNER. I do not yield; I insist upon my motion.

Mr. BURROWS. The Speaker recognized me, and I have not yielded for any such motion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to what has occurred since the facts recited from the RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is debate in order?

Mr. BLOUNT. It was understood at the time that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] agreed that this matter was to be called up whenever the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] saw fit to do so. Since that time there have been on both sides of the House indications of disfavor toward the proposition. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] so stated in his remarks, and said that in lieu of pressing the resolution he would simply rise to a personal explanation.

Mr. WARNER. I insist upon my motion to lay this subject on the table.

Mr. WILBER. Who is entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.]

Mr. CHALMERS. And I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is not the time out?

Mr. BURROWS. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for his courtesy.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That would not get rid of the difficulty; it would come up again to-morrow.

Mr. BUCKNER. Very well, let it come up then; we then may be better able to dispose of it.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. There are a few gentlemen who desire to be heard upon this subject; and if members will remain quiet we can soon dispose of the matter—dispose of it in less time than will be taken up if points of order are insisted upon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi yields to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WARNER. How much time?

The SPEAKER. For five minutes, the Chair understands.

Mr. WARNER. I give notice that at the end of that time I will move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

Mr. BUCKNER. I insist upon my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BURROWS. Do I understand the gentleman from Mississippi to limit me to five minutes?

Mr. CHALMERS. I do not; I yield to the gentleman. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BURROWS. Only a few minutes; perhaps ten or fifteen; not so much as the gentleman occupied.

Mr. CHALMERS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURROWS. I first owe an acknowledgment to the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] for his courtesy in yielding to me. And I would say to gentlemen on the other side that there was no occasion at all for uneasiness. The gentleman from Mississippi was permitted to make his statement in relation to the affair at Fort Pillow, and, as the Speaker suggested, it is no more than fair that an opportunity should be given to gentlemen on this side of the Chamber to present a few facts from official reports touching that same terrible tragedy.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. There have been three statements on that side already.

Mr. BURROWS. It seems that it is yet uncertain whether the gentleman from Mississippi will insist upon his motion and demand an investigation in this matter, or whether he will be content to rest his vindication upon the statement which he has just submitted. If the latter course is to be pursued, then it is due to history that the sworn testimony of a cloud of witnesses should accompany that statement, that both sides of the question may pass under public examination.

I hold in my hand the volume containing the evidence of the outrages perpetrated at Fort Pillow; outrages so dark and damning, so wicked and wanton that a savage might sit at the feet of the men who perpetrated them and learn new lessons of cruelty. Without pausing to read this testimony or any portion of it, I desire simply to call the attention of the House and the country to what seems to be established by this evidence, and which up to this moment has gone unquestioned.

If you will examine this evidence you will find that no less than fifty witnesses testify to the fact that after our troops had surrendered and laid down their arms, and while many of them were upon their knees pleading for their lives, they were shot dead.

Will you pardon me if I call attention to one or two instances. One witness testifies to this:

Question. How did you lose your eye?
Answer. They knocked me down with a carbine, and then they jabbed it out.
Q. Was that before you were shot?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. After you had surrendered?
A. Yes, sir; I was going up the hill; a man came down and met me; he had his gun in his hand, and whirled it around and knocked me down, and then took the end of his carbine and jabbed it in my eye, and shot me.

As I said before, I do not care to go into the details of the testimony. It also appears from the testimony of fourteen witnesses that on the next morning after the battle a large number of wounded Federal soldiers were killed by the confederates in cold blood. Twenty-two witnesses testify that there were found no less than five bodies of Federal soldiers whose charred remains told the terrible story of their death. The gentleman from Mississippi states that if this was so they must have been burned in their tents, and that there was no evidence that they were burned alive. But unfortunately the evidence discloses that many of the bodies found burned were nailed to boards, the nails being driven through their clothing and cartridge-boxes into the planks on which they were lying, so that when the remains were removed the boards were still attached to them. The evidence shows conclusively that these men were nailed to the boards while living and in that condition burned. Four witnesses testify that confederate officers were present while these outrages were being perpetrated. Fourteen witnesses testify that among confederate officers and soldiers the common cry was "No quarter!" and, to use their common expression, "Kill every damned one of them!" Fifteen witnesses testify to the general robbery of the dead and the dying. Four witnesses testify that the wounded, still living, were kicked into the river. Six witnesses testify that a large number of wounded soldiers were buried alive, and witnesses testify that they themselves crawled out of graves in which they had been partially buried while wounded. Sixteen witnesses testify that the confederates did take advantage of the flag of truce, and that while there was a cessation of hostilities moved their forces and gained a position that could not otherwise have been acquired except by the severest loss.

Now I have simply glanced at the testimony; and it is all I desire to do. I thought that the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi ought not to go before the country unchallenged and this mass of sworn evidence be wiped out at one breath. I want to call the attention of the gentleman, the House, and the country to another fact in conclusion; for I have endeavored without the slightest warmth to state the simple facts as shown by the testimony. Does not the gentleman know (I desire him to answer) whether he made a report of that transaction or not?

Mr. CHALMERS. I have answered that I am not distinct in my recollection about it.

Mr. BURROWS. Then I desire to state that the commanding officer, General Forrest, as we all know, did make a report of that bloody affair at Fort Pillow. That is a matter of history. I charge it as a matter of public notoriety, about which there is no question—a fact that cannot be denied—that General Forrest did make an official report. In that report General Forrest sustains the gentleman from Mississippi as to the officers and forces engaged. By that report it appears that the gentleman from Mississippi was in command till nine or ten o'clock in the morning when the pickets were driven inside of the fort; that he himself was in immediate command of the assaulting forces. And it is a matter of notoriety that General Forrest in his report estimates our force inside the works at about seven hundred men; and the evidence as taken by the committee shows that the force was between six and seven hundred. I charge it as a fact that in that report General Forrest places his own force at fifteen hundred men. I charge it as a fact, sustained by that report, that when the assault was made upon the works, to use the language of the report, "within twenty minutes after the bugle sounded the charge the fort was captured and firing ceased."

Mr. WARNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know how much time the gentleman has. The silver bill is entitled to consideration to-day.

The SPEAKER. The silver bill does not come next. The business of the morning hour is next in order.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from Mississippi has stated the loss on the confederate side to be something over one hundred. I say that it is a fact that General Forrest's official report shows the loss upon the side of the confederates to be twenty killed and sixty wounded.

Mr. CHALMERS. Does the gentleman state that to be General Forrest's report as given in his history?

Mr. BURROWS. I have not seen his history.

Mr. CHALMERS. The loss in McCulloch's brigade was one hundred and ten.

Mr. BURROWS. I state it as a fact that General Forrest in his official report gives the loss on his side at twenty killed and sixty wounded. The evidence in this book shows that our loss inside the fortification did not exceed thirty before the confederates gained complete possession. The report of General Forrest also shows that the fort was taken without a charge with fixed bayonets, and the gentleman from Mississippi was complimented by General Forrest for his gallantry and bravery in that charge and the faithful execution of all the movements necessary to success. The gentleman from Mississippi says he knew nothing of the outrages perpetrated there until the war was over. I say that the official report and the papers connected with it show that Jefferson Davis in the same year, in August, 1864, (and this massacre was in April, 1864,) commended the conduct of General Forrest on that occasion, saying that he exhibited forbearance and clemency far exceeding what the usages of war under the circumstances required.

Mr. WARNER. Has not the time of the gentleman from Michigan expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. WARNER. If this discussion is allowed to go on it will take up the rest of the day to the exclusion of the regular order, which is the silver bill.

Mr. REED. Oh, the silver bill can wait. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. It is a notorious fact, Mr. Speaker, that at that charge inside the fortification, after the men had surrendered, with but a loss of twenty on the side of the confederates as appears by the official report of General Forrest, there were between four hundred and five hundred Federal soldiers, black and white, murdered in cold blood after they had surrendered. The report of General Forrest will show that his loss, as I have already stated, was twenty killed and sixty wounded; and in his report he stated that the loss of the enemy "will never be known"—that the enemy's loss was at least five hundred, and, to use his own language, which is exceedingly expressive, that "the river was dyed with blood for two hundred yards."

I remember well that General Forrest said, in relation to the massacre, "I regard captured negroes as I do other captured property, and not as prisoners of war."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CHALMERS. One word in reply.

Mr. WARNER. I insist on the regular order of business, which is the silver bill.

Mr. REED. The silver bill can wait.

Mr. GARFIELD. Permission ought to be granted to the gentleman from Mississippi to reply.

Mr. ELLIS. I object.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana not to do it.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes; I object.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope there will be no objection, as no harm can come from this discussion. Let the gentleman be heard.

Mr. ELLIS. Never with my consent shall a debate of this character go on in this House, and I insist on my objection.

Mr. WHITE. I trust no soldier on that side will object. It is nothing but fair play. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to make reply.

A MEMBER. And the silver bill can wait.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHALMERS. I wish to say this, Mr. Speaker. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I wish to say that I think the gentleman from Michigan is the last man in this House who should undertake to rake up charges against another, for, while I make no charges against him, he will remember that charges have been made against him that his own conduct in the war was not that which characterized the gallant soldier in battle. I do not believe it, I do not charge it upon him, but yet as that charge has been made the gentleman ought not to make charges against me. [Cries of "Regular order!" on the democratic side.]

Mr. WARNER. I demand the regular order, and I do not want the entire session consumed in this sort of talk.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker——[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. BURROWS. But I rise to a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURROWS. With that courtesy which has always marked the gentleman from Mississippi, I desire to ask him to state what he means. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CHALMERS. I mean to say, sir, I was informed that charges had been made against you in your canvass that you had not been—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BURROWS. Let us hear it.

The SPEAKER. These statements had better be made, as they will save time.

Mr. CHALMERS. I said I did not make the charge and that I did not believe it, but as such a charge was made against the gentleman I said he was the last man to rake up charges against me.

Mr. WHITE. Then the gentleman withdraws it.

Mr. CHALMERS. I said that I did not know anything about it.

Mr. BURROWS. When a charge is made against me by a gentleman I have the right to know what it is.

Mr. CHALMERS. I made none further than what I said.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand the gentleman to say that he does not believe it. But what is it?

Mr. CHALMERS. The charge is that you resigned your office because your command did not think you were fit to have it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. Who made it?

Mr. CHALMERS. It was made by a newspaper reporter in this city.

Mr. BURROWS. When?

Mr. CHALMERS. During a political canvass. I wish to say to the gentleman I made no charge against him; I simply repeat the statement made to me.

Mr. BURROWS. It is the first time I ever heard of the charge suggested against me, the first time in my life.

Mr. CHALMERS. I simply state it; I do not make it.

Mr. BURROWS. Whoever made it told you that which was absolutely untrue.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. BURROWS. I am glad to know the gentleman does not believe it.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called, the question is on the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CONGER. Before that question is put——[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a proposition which affects the order of business. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Mississippi proposes to publish what he has not spoken——

Mr. COX. Is that a question of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is listening to the gentleman from Michigan to ascertain what point he makes.

Mr. CONGER. My point is that the gentleman from Mississippi has asked and obtained permission to publish much more than he has spoken to the House.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Is that a point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is trying to find out.

Mr. CONGER. Before we determine to lay this motion on the table I submit we have the right to wait until all the documents he proposes to present are published.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CONGER. I thought it right to present that question to the House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question being put on Mr. WARNER'S motion to lay the resolution on the table, there were—ayes 98, noes 70.

Mr. WHITE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only sixteen members voting therefor.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Having been deprived of the opportunity of saying anything on this subject, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to print in the RECORD the remarks I intended to make. I give my personal assurance that there will be nothing personal or offensive in the remarks I shall publish.

Mr. WHITE. I object; I do so because debate has not been allowed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Then I will see that the gentleman never speaks again during his service in Congress if I can prevent it. I have never in my life made an objection to any man either speaking or printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at thirty-two minutes past one o'clock, and reports from committees are in order. The call rests with the Committee on the Judiciary.

There were no further reports from the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. GOODE, from the Committee on Education and Labor, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 9) to provide for the enforcement of the eight-hour law.

The joint resolution was read. It declares that according to the true intent and meaning of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, entitled "An act constituting eight hours a legal day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States," eight hours constitute a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics; and while said act remains upon the statute-book no reduction shall be made in the wages paid by the Government, by the day, to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, on account of the reduction of the hours of labor; and the joint resolution directs all heads of Departments, officers, and agents of the Government to enforce said law as long as the same is unrepealed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia if a resolution very like the one which has just been read was not passed by the last Congress?

Mr. GOODE. This identical resolution was passed by the last House by a vote of 120 to 27. It was sent to the Senate, but for some reason no action was taken on it by that body. It has accordingly been reintroduced this session.

I do not desire to discuss the joint resolution, but will simply say that upon the 25th day of June, 1868, Congress passed an act providing that from and after that date eight hours should constitute a day's labor for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States. During the official term of President Grant he found it necessary to issue two proclamations calling upon the officers of the Government and the heads of Departments to observe and enforce this law; and in May, 1872, the Congress of the United States interpreted this law by providing that the officers of the Government and heads of Departments, notwithstanding the reduction of the hours of labor, should pay the employés a full day's pay.

I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota and to the House that notwithstanding the plain and explicit terms of this law, notwithstanding these two presidential proclamations, notwithstanding the legislative interpretation which has been placed upon the act, some of the heads of Departments have disregarded the act entirely. The workingmen come and ask that Congress shall require its enforcement. And it seems to me that, however much gentlemen may differ about the wisdom and policy of the law in the beginning, these men have a right to claim that while it remains upon the statute-book unrepealed it shall be observed and enforced.

If any gentleman upon the floor will examine the debate which took place in Congress in June, 1868, when this law was passed, he will be satisfied as to what the intention of Congress was. That debate makes it clear that Congress intended that from and after that time eight hours should constitute a day's labor, and that there should be no reduction of pay on account of a reduction of the hours of labor. In November, 1868, Mr. William M. Evarts, who was then Attorney-General, gave an opinion, of which I desire to read an extract. He says:

It may be collected from the papers referred to this office that the question on which the Attorney-General's opinion is desired is, whether the act of June 25, 1868, reducing the number of hours constituting a day's work, was intended to work a corresponding reduction in the compensation for a day's work?

There is nothing in the language of the act to indicate such intention, nor does this construction seem at all consistent with the aim and purpose of the law, which were reformatory in their character, having in view the promotion of the physical, intellectual, and moral welfare of those who are engaged in manual labor, and of the general interests of society. The theory appears to have been that the laboring-man or mechanic, by means of the increased physical strength and vigor acquired through a reduction in his hours of toil, would be enabled to accomplish daily as much upon an average in eight hours' constant labor as he formerly did in ten or even a longer period, while at the same time he would enjoy a longer season for mental and moral improvement. Whether this is sound in principle is not here the question. That it constituted the main ground upon which the act proceeded, a reference to the debates in Congress on its passage will clearly show.

That is all I desire to say in explanation of this bill. It is plain and simple, and I hope it will pass. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] for five minutes.

Mr. COX. I feel a great interest in this matter. For years we have labored to pass a bill to re-enforce the law upon this subject which we had passed, not so much because the laborers employed by the Government need the extra pay as because when the Government sets an example other employers are sure to follow it in the interest of honest skilled labor. The law in section 3738 is very short and very explicit:

Eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics who may be employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States.

The interpretation of that law has been given in another section of the Revised Statutes, to be found on page 727 of the second edition, and is as follows:

Allowance for reduction of wages under eight-hour law:
Of such sum as may be required in the settlement of all accounts for the services of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government, between the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and the 19th day of May, 1869, the date of the proclamation of the President concerning such pay, to settle and pay for the same without reduction on account of reduction of hours of labor by said act, when it shall be made to appear that such was the sole cause of the reduction of wages.

I hope that this bill, which is intended to enforce the law, will be passed by this House unanimously, so that it may go to the Senate with some emphasis of our opinion. The Senate has not been very forward in taking notice of the laboring-men of this country, if I may be allowed to speak at all of what the Senate has done or should do. We passed in the last Congress a bill of this kind; but it did not pass the Senate, as it should have done.

I would like, if possible, to have an elaborate discussion of this matter; but I will not undertake it to-day. It was proved in the last Congress by examples cited from England and from Massachusetts, by statistics which were gathered, that there was more work done in a day's labor of eight hours than in a day of ten hours; that there was really more energy in the workingman who had an opportunity for mental, moral, and physical recreation by the shortening of the hours of labor to eight instead of the old rate of ten hours a day.

There are many reasons why the people of this country who are laboring-men should have the good-will of this Congress on both sides of this House. They have not asked much from Congress; they have no lawyers or lobbyists here to assist them. But they have spoken almost all over the country for a law of this kind to give them that recreation to which they are entitled, and which God intended they should have for the benefit of themselves and their families. I hope the House will at once pass this bill, and with such unanimity that the Senate will take notice of it.

Mr. RICE. I trust that I shall be found second to no other member of this House in favoring anything really intended to promote the interests of the workingmen. But this is not for the interest of the great laboring classes of the country. It is only in the interest of those who by good fortune and by favor find themselves in the employ of the National Government. I am unable for one to see why they should be exempted from the rules which obtain in regard to other laboring classes.

It was undoubtedly the intent of this law to set an example by the Federal Government of limitation of the hours of labor which might be followed by the State governments. That example has failed; so far as I am aware it has not been followed by a single State government. It has failed, as I believe all legislation is destined to fail which attempts to limit the hours of labor. Those hours are limited by other causes than by legislation, by influences which are not controlled by legislation but which control legislation, and which have reduced the hours of labor from fifteen or sixteen, as they were less than fifty years ago, to twelve and ten hours as they are now. That influence will continue to be felt until the hours of all laborers are reduced, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] desires to have them, and in which desire I most heartily concur. This legislation attempted by Congress has had and will have no effect in that direction. It only tends to exempt a certain privileged class of laborers from the burdens which rest upon all the others.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICE. Certainly.

Mr. COX. The law exists now as I have read it. Is my friend in favor of repealing or enforcing that law?

Mr. RICE. I should be in favor of repealing the law.

Mr. COX. You have never brought in a bill for that purpose. Why not enforce the law so long as it stands?

Mr. RICE. I should be in favor of repealing the law, because I believe it has failed to accomplish the end for which it was intended. If it would accomplish that end, I would most heartily concur in its support.

It has been said by the gentleman who reported this resolution that there is nothing in the law (and he quotes high authority to support him) which indicates it was the intention of Congress that those who work for the Government and come within the operation of this law should work for less than a full day's wages. I say, Mr. Speaker, that I see nothing in the law to justify the supposition or the argument that it was the intention that Government employés should receive larger wages for a given amount of work than those who work by their side but not in Federal employ. Believing that the law has failed to accomplish its end, and believing also that there is no great hardship in the lot of those who work for the Government as distinguished from those who work in similar employment for other masters, I see no reason why Government employés should receive as much for eight hours' labor as others receive for ten. I see no reason why those who work in the granite-yards of the Government should be paid $1.50 or $2 for eight hours' labor while those who work in the granite-yards of private employers receive only the same amount for ten hours' labor. I see no reason why the employés in the navy-yard in the district of my friend on my right should be paid the same for working eight hours a day (and not very laborious work either) as the hard-handed laborer who is obliged to find employment with some other master receives for working ten hours. Because I believe that this resolution if adopted would establish an unfair and unjust discrimination between those who work for the Government and those who do not, I am opposed to it.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I regret to feel constrained to oppose this joint resolution. Were it possible to extend the provisions of the law to all the workmen of the country, it would be a different proposition; but to declare that those who work for the Government shall be paid more than others or shall be required to work fewer hours for the same pay, will accomplish no good. If we produce in the United States five billion dollars' worth of commodities in a year (and that is all we do produce, and probably more than we are producing now) then that $5,000,000,000 is all that there is to divide among the people of the whole country. That is not more than about $100 per capita. Now, it is a plain proposition to me that if we vote to give the workingmen who are employed by the Government more, we vote at the same time that the rest of the workingmen and producers of the country shall have less. If we produce but five billion dollars' worth of commodities, and if one receives more than $100, somebody else must take less, for an average of $100 for each person is all there is to divide, which gives but five or six hundred dollars to a family. The only effect of this resolution is to so distribute what we produce as to give to a small class who are fortunate enough to receive Government patronage a larger proportion of the whole than they would otherwise receive or than their fellow-laborers elsewhere receive, and the increased pay which in this way is voted to Government employés they who labor in other fields must make up in some way.

I can see no justice, therefore, in this measure. This is not the way to take up the great labor question. We must go further than this resolution proposes. The labor question is one that extends to the distribution of the whole production of a country. I think it a mistake, therefore, to attempt to give to the already favored class of Government employés a greater proportion of the rewards of labor when by such an act we of necessity decree that laborers elsewhere shall make it up. I wish it were possible to support the world on even less than eight hours' labor a day, but in such benefits all should be permitted to share.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say but a very few words on this subject. It seems to me that the discussion so far has traveled away from the true issue. The question is not upon the merits of the existing law—not whether that law should ever have been enacted, but now that it is upon the statute-book whether it shall be carried into execution.

Mr. RICE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FROST. Certainly.

Mr. RICE. Does the gentleman understand that there is now anything in the law requiring that employés of the Government should receive any fixed price, or that they should receive the wages of a full day's labor when working only eight hours?

Mr. FROST. As I understand the law, while no specific price for labor is established in the statute the intent of the law at the time of its passage was that the employés of the Government should be required to labor but eight hours daily and that for working these eight hours they should receive the rate of wages prevailing in the neighborhood for a full day's labor, no matter how many hours were employed in that labor.

Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] says that this law, if intended as an example to private employers of labor, has failed to accomplish that purpose. I reply that if it has failed it is because it never has been executed. It never has been held before the people as an example.

When interrupted I was about to remark that gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have reproved us on this side very severely upon the ground that we have attempted to interfere with the Executive of this country by preventing him from executing the laws upon the statute-book. I hope they will show the sincerity of their desire to see the laws executed by coming to our assistance now when we are maintaining the right of the people of this country to have the laws enacted by us carried into execution.

This is no time to discuss the merits of this law. I do not desire to enter upon that question. But, I maintain, sir, so long as a law is upon our statute-books the people of this country have the right to demand that the Executive shall perform his constitutional duty of executing it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. FROST. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is there any penalty provided in this act for non-compliance with this law?

Mr. FROST. I understand not.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word about this proposed joint resolution. Turning to the section of the Revised Statutes I find it reads as follows:

> Eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics who may be employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States.

Now, sir, I understand that law has been enforced. Eight hours is a legal day's work; but the law does not say the laborer shall receive ten hours' pay for eight hours' work.

Mr. MURCH. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I wish to finish my statement; I will allow the gentleman to interrupt me before I get through.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it does not say that ten hours' pay shall be given for eight hours' work. I understand for eight or ten years past in the navy-yards of this country, and in the cities or elsewhere where the Government does employ laborers, they have been doing eight hours' work and getting eight hours' pay for it; but if this resolution passes I apprehend that for those eight or ten years past those persons will be claiming arrearages for two hours' extra pay each day. I have been here for some years, sir, and I can nearly always tell when a man has a navy-yard in his district, for he is generally anxious about the enforcement of this law so as to give ten hours' pay for eight hours' work. [Laughter.]

Now, then, every dollar that is paid to this proposed favored class of laborers has to be raised by taxation. Who pays the taxes? The nine hundred and ninety-nine men in the country who are not employed as Government laborers. They have to pay that taxation; your constituents, Mr. Speaker, and mine. There is not one of these Government laborers in my district, and I doubt whether there is one in fifteen out of the nineteen districts in my State. What is true of my district is true of other gentlemen's districts. The laborers who pay taxes in order to pay enhanced wages to this favored class, themselves work from twelve to fifteen hours a day. Is it fair or is it just, then, that the masses of the people who work twelve to fifteen hours a day should work a half hour longer each day in order to pay navy-yard and other Government employés ten hours' pay for eight hours' work? I think not; and with all due respect to gentlemen I think it comes with ill-grace from them to urge any such proposition. I will not, for the reason I have stated, vote to impose this additional burden upon the masses of laboring-men who now work as stated to give favored laborers in Government navy-yards and elsewhere wages which they do not earn.

Mr. MURCH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. MURCH. Did not the proclamation of President Grant, made on the 19th of May, 1872, declare that no reduction should be made in the wages of workmen employed by the Government of the United States on account of the reduction in the hours of labor?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not now recollect, but it is not material; the fact is the law as now executed is this: if they work ten hours they get ten hours' pay, and if they only work eight hours they only get eight hours' pay. In other words they only get pay for what they earn. That is the way the law is now being executed and so far as I am concerned it will go on in that way, proclamation or no proclamation.

Mr. GOODE. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. MURCH.]

Mr. MURCH. Mr. Speaker, I had intended when this resolution came up to make some extended remarks in favor of its passage, but the committee having it in charge having made such an unexpectedly early report of the measure I have not had time to make the research and prepare an argument such as I deem the importance of the subject demands. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the committee having this matter in charge are entitled to great praise for the prompt attention they have given to the desire of the workingmen who have so frequently petitioned this House for the passage of a bill settling the status of the act of June 25, 1868. Nearly eleven years have passed since the eight-hour law was enacted, with provisions so plain that it seems as if no one having the least desire to do justice to the people in whose favor it was enacted could presume to evade its provisions. Yet it has been continually evaded, and by the very men who were sworn to see the laws of this country enforced.

The eight-hour law was passed just before the presidential campaign of 1868 was opened, no doubt with the intention of making a bid for the workingmen's vote for General Grant, and the present President of the United States is on record as voting for its passage, he being then a member of this House.

Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this law were disregarded and set at defiance from the time of its passage. True, the heads of Departments reduced the hours of labor to eight, but they also made a corresponding reduction of wages. The attention of President Grant having been called to this fact, on the 19th of May, 1869, he issued a proclamation directing that no reduction should be made in the wages of laborers, workmen, or mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States on account of the reduction of the hours of labor. Again, on the 11th of May, 1872, President Grant issued another proclamation of similar import.

On the 18th of May, 1872, an act was passed which provided that all laborers, workmen, and mechanics in the employment of the United States whose wages had been decreased under the idea that such decrease was warranted by the aforesaid act of June 25, 1868, should, notwithstanding, be paid without any such decrease.

It does not seem, Mr. Speaker, that in the face of all this legislation and the proclamations of the President of the United States, the parties having in charge the execution of the laws of this Government would or could find any pretext for its evasion and create a necessity of further legislation; but such is the fact, and to-day this House is called upon to declare in unmistakable words that the rights of workingmen shall no longer be infringed upon, and laws enacted for their protection shall no longer be trampled under foot. Let us consider for a moment the relative position of the workingmen and the gentlemen who are honored by their votes to a seat on this floor, and who think it a hardship to sit here three or four hours a day for four or five months out of a year and draw a per diem wage of about $13 the year round. Why, they thought it such a hardship a few years ago that they attempted to help themselves to a little more, while the poor drudges that sent them here are taxed to pay their "salary grabs," and all working ten or twelve hours at from seventy-five cents to $2 per diem.

Mr. Speaker, writers and speakers have told us that a reduction of wages is consequent upon a reduction of the hours of labor. I defy them to name a single instance where such has been the fact. On the contrary, a reduction of the hours of labor from ten to eight will create a demand for one-fifth more men to produce the same amount per diem. That will set some of our idle, starving men to work who are seeking charity in our broad land and finding it not, but instead find laws enacted by State Legislatures to make criminals of them for the crime of being out of employment. I say a part of these poor outcasts would become producers and enlarged consumers, and the very fact of their finding employment by a reduction of the hours of labor will stimulate all business, and the agricultural portion of our people will be especially benefited by a new demand for their products. The workingmen of this country are studying this question deeply, for their future depends upon it. They see machinery superseding manual labor day by day, and they are being thrown out of employment by its introduction. Look at our Government Printing Office here in this city. The introduction of every sewing-machine in that institution, I am told, throws seven girls out of employment. That one fact is enough to illustrate what the thousands of machines are doing in our large manufacturing centers.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that the workingmen are thinking deeply on this problem. Forty-eight witnesses before the Hewitt committee, of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] was a member, in New York and elsewhere, out of a little over a hundred that were examined, testified to their belief that the reduction of the hours of labor was the only thing that would bring relief.

Mr. RICE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MURCH. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICE. Was there anybody who stated that it was possible for any State government to limit practically by legislation the hours of labor, when other State governments surrounding it did not limit them, and in the same way? While there was a desire the hours of labor should be limited, yet is there among all those witnesses one who expresses the opinion that they can be limited by the States, part of them limiting and part of them not?

Mr. MURCH. I do not know that there is; but I believe there is no question but the General Government has the power to regulate that matter.

Mr. RICE. Does the gentleman claim that the General Government has power to regulate that matter except as to its own employés?

Mr. MURCH. I do not.

Mr. RICE. And if the Government regulates it as to its own employés while others do not receive the advantages of that legislation, I ask is it fair, or is it in favor of the laboring classes whom the gentleman represents, and whose interests I also and other members of this House desire to see promoted?

Mr. MURCH. I may say to the gentleman that immediately after the proclamation of President Van Buren, making ten hours a legal day's work, that system was adopted all over the country. I know the law has been violated by the Government. If the Government at any time had enforced this law it would to-day have been the standard all over this country.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the workingmen are thinking, and on the 4th day of July, 1879, they will declare from one end of this land to the other that eight hours shall constitute a day's work, as they declared for ten hours when President Van Buren issued his proclamation making ten hours a legal day's work. Gentlemen need feel no alarm; it will be a peaceful, law-abiding demonstration, but it will show with what unanimity they think on this question.

One more view of this question and I am done. The whole history of the short-hour movement in England proves conclusively that the question of wages has no connection with the justice of this claim. In fact, every reduction in the hours of labor there has invariably been followed by an increase in the standard of wages. Short hours means long pay; for whatever gives the workingman more leisure gives him more opportunity for culture, brings higher wants, and it is these wants which determine the standard of wages. The more hours the poor drudge is employed the lower are his wants, and consequently the smaller the sum required to sustain him.

Give the workingman increased leisure. Rest cultivates. Raise his wants; increase his desires for the comforts of life, and wages will take care of themselves. Our business is to perform a public duty, to declare the intent and purpose of a law. The changed relations of productive industry, rendered necessary by the rapid increase of machinery, forces this question on us as one of the greatest importance. Sir, this is not buncombe legislation. We propose no new legislation. The workingmen ask no favor at our hands. They demand simple justice. Shall this be accorded? Shall we by our action to-day indorse our own action in the past? Public policy demands it, political economy demands it, enlightened statesmanship demands it, Christianity demands it. The social future of our workingmen is largely at issue and our own honor is at stake. Let us declare by our action to-day that the prosperity of the workingmen is worth our consideration.

Mr. GOODE. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] for five minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. I had not intended to speak on this question, and I will say but one word now.

There is evidently a misapprehension as to what is pending before this House. We are not called upon, I take it, under the resolution reported by the Committee on Education and Labor, to vote on the merits of this bill. That is not a question which addresses itself to us at present. The only matter we are called upon to decide is, first, whether there is such a law as this upon the statute-book, and, if so, shall it be enforced? That is the purport of the resolution which has been offered by this committee. It simply places a construction and requires the enforcement of a law that is already upon the statute-book. It does not propose to place a new law there. Gentlemen therefore will vote unadvisedly if they vote with the expectation that they can change this law. The fact is, as appeared in evidence before the committee, that this law is enforced at some of the arsenals and not enforced at others. Certainly no gentleman desires such an unequal enforcement or execution of the law as that. We simply desire to say by this resolution and by this action of the House what we said last year, without, I believe, twenty dissenting votes upon this floor: that here is the plain law, and it shall be the same law in Maine as in Virginia; the same law in Kentucky as in Massachusetts.

There is no arsenal, no fort, no public building in my district that is affected by the enforcement of this law. I simply find as a member of this committee that years ago, in 1868, whether wisely or unwisely, this House placed such a law upon the statute-book, and when called upon as a lawyer to say what the meaning of that law is I declare and I say the House is called upon to declare that it means that eight hours shall, in all works of which the Government has control, constitute a full day's labor and that for a day's labor full pay shall be received.

Mr. MURCH. I wish to say one word. During the investigation in New York Mr. Hewitt stated to a witness that he believed this law was intended to deceive the workingmen.

Mr. WILLIS. It was in evidence before the committee that in this very city in the removal of débris from the War Department two of the contractors differed in their view of this law, one of them declaring and acting upon his construction that eight hours constituted a full day and paying his workmen according to his construction of the law, and the other believing that ten hours was a proper day's labor and paying his men the same price for the ten hours. Certainly we do not wish that. We desire the law to be enforced in the same way and to the same extent all over the country.

If gentlemen desire to vote upon the merits of the law they will have the opportunity in another bill that will be offered by this committee in a few weeks. But at present we are only called upon to say what the law is and I do not think any two gentlemen who read it can differ as to its meaning, and the debates at the time show clearly that this was an experiment to be made by the Government extending over all its employés fixing eight hours as a day's labor, the gentlemen who made the experiment believing that within that time as much work would be done as was done in ten hours. Whether that be true or not is not the question. The only question we have to decide is, is this a law on the statute-book, and, if so, what is its meaning and shall it be enforced uniformly throughout the country?

Mr. GOODE. I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will advise the gentleman from Virginia that he will not have an hour after the previous question is seconded as he has occupied his time before calling the previous question, and there has been no intervening debate.

Mr. GOODE. I understood that as having reported the bill I would have an hour after the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The interpretation of the rule has been that where a gentleman occupies an hour before calling the previous question and then demands the previous question he is not entitled to another hour after the previous question is seconded.

Mr. GOODE. Then I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. COX. How much time remains of the hour?

The SPEAKER. Eleven minutes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Ten years ago the Congress of the United States enacted a law making eight hours a legal day's work in all the manufacturing establishments and depots and places of business under the control of the Government. For ten years that law has run uninterruptedly with a construction upon it that a day's labor should be ten hours instead of eight hours. A strange construction to be placed upon a plain law, positive in its terms, easily understood, and almost criminal to be wantonly violated.

Now, I want to know by what authority the men who are at the head of the different Departments of this Government have restricted and restrained the law of 1868, which provided that eight hours shall be a legal day's work, by extending it to ten hours? It is unjust, it is wrong, upon every principle of justice or humanity, that honest labor should be prevented from the fruits of its toil. Class would not submit to this; laboring-men must.

I was somewhat surprised at a remark which slipped from the mouth of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] in speaking of the man and "the master." He made use of the word "master" to represent the man who was the employer. It brings us back to the era of slavery—master and slave. And capital is that master.

Mr. MURCH. That is a term commonly employed by all class-men.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was surprised to hear that word used in the manner in which he used it. One of those men who have been controlled by a master has just taken his seat upon this floor. These things are becoming reversed. The time may come when the master will be in the background and the servant will come to the front. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MURCH] is the man—the master is at home—and a man, too, who does honor to his high position. More changes in this Chamber like this will be so much better for the country. I do not like such language; it is not applicable to the times in which we live; it is not according to our sense of propriety and the relations which we occupy and enjoy in this free Government of ours. I contend that under our principle of equality the laboring-man in this country has as much right to be heard upon the floor of this House as the most favored citizen of the community in which we live. Class is always responded to favorably when it makes its application here. Labor submits to rebuffs, even in the rejection of its humble petition.

Now, when we pass a law fixing eight hours for a day's work, the men who have the control of employment set that law at defiance. Although that law says that eight hours shall constitute a day's labor, they say that under the brief authority which they hold eight hours shall be ten hours. Strange logic! But so say our masters. When shall men speak out?

As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has well said, this is not a question as to the merits of the original law. The question before the House is whether that law shall be enforced, the law which we have enacted, or whether men who are the agents of the Government shall be permitted to say that they will disregard the law because only the laboring-men are brought into question and who are powerless to do anything against the iron decree which they set up and enforce against every principle of justice. Let the law apply to the high and the low. If the law says that a man shall only work eight hours a day, let that be the law, and do not permit those who are in official place to say that eight hours a day shall be ten hours.

I believe that this enforcement law, as we call it, passed this House in the Forty-fifth Congress with little or no opposition. It went to the Senate, and there it failed; not on account of its merits, but for want of time or for some other reason. Now let us say that so far as our Government is concerned we will set an example to the men whom we employ and that they shall work eight hours for a day's labor. And although we have not the power to regulate the employment of men in the States, we have the power and we ought to set an example that the States may follow. And if this law is passed it will be the establishment of a good example. As we have the power to legislate on this question, let us pass this bill, and thus inform those who are intrusted to carry out its provisions that we are in earnest and that our decrees shall be enforced. We are the "master," they the "man."

Mr. GOODE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Gentlemen have attempted to present an issue to this House and to hold the House to an issue of their own fancy. I imagine that the House will give such scope to this discussion as the public interest may require.

What are the facts? It is alleged that a law has been passed fixing the number of hours to constitute a day's labor, and that it was the intention of that law that laborers should be paid for eight hours the same as they were paid before for ten hours. It is further said that some of the Departments of this Government, exercising a duty devolving upon them, have construed that law differently from what the committee and certain gentlemen here think it should be construed.

Now whether that construction was right or wrong, in my judgment it was in the interest of the people of this country. If it be true that their construction of that law is wrong, may not gentlemen be permitted to consider the question now whether or not it is proper, and to say that we will pass no such resolution enforcing the other construction, but we will turn our attention to what is right in this matter; that we will vote down this resolution and so indicate to the House and to this committee that we are opposed to such legislation?

For one I am prepared to vote for the repeal of the law. In a few districts or a few sections of the country it may be to the interest of labor; but as has been said by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] I may say and so may the great body of men on either side of the House, that this law is not in the interest of the laboring people of our country.

When we come to make the appropriations for the support of this Government, if this law is to be carried out in the manner gentlemen contend for, we must necessarily make increased appropriations for paying laborers in Government employ all over the land, thus increasing the burden borne by the American people. This is wrong. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] states that the Government will get more and better service by requiring eight hours as a day's labor than by demanding ten; and he quotes from reports of the State of Massachusetts. I am informed by a gentleman from Massachusetts that no such report has been made; that no such experiment has been had there; that the ten-hour law obtains in Massachusetts.

Mr. MURCH. The ten-hour law is violated in Massachusetts.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. He has had more time than I have.

Mr. MURCH. I only wanted to make a correction.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to make a correction?

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman certainly would not take up the little time I have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has half a minute remaining.

Mr. COX. I certainly would not intrude upon the gentleman in his half minute, but will reserve what I have to say.

Mr. BLOUNT. Gentleman have been debating this question all on one side, and I think I might be allowed to proceed without interruption.

Mr. COX. You will lose your half minute if you do not hurry up.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, I have no doubt the gentleman is glad to see every member who does not agree with him lose more than half a minute.

It has been said that the States have not adopted this policy simply because it has not been enforced by the Federal Government. Why, sir, I undertake to say that no State could do it. I am not prepared to admit the right of a government to dictate to me how I shall manage my own business.

Mr. MURCH. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir. I trust that the time is not near at hand when we shall grow so wild upon this subject as to forget all the rules that govern prudent business men.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. I would like to have the gentleman's time extended if possible.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] yield?

Mr. GOODE. To the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. FRYE. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. Half a minute of the hour remains.

Mr. KELLEY. Suppose the morning hour be considered as expired, and I will take the floor when the bill comes up again as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. It will come up to-morrow morning, in all human probability. The morning hour has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 67) providing for a new propeller for the United States ship Alarm.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ACKLEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the resolution now pending as business of the morning hour in relation to claims against Nicaragua shall be fixed for consideration on Saturday next after the morning hour. It is evident that this resolution can never be reached in the ordinary course of business, for reports from committees are constantly increasing. I think it eminently proper that a time should be fixed for its consideration.

Mr. MILLS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. ACKLEN. I trust that the gentleman will withdraw his objection. I do not propose to take up any time now, but simply to have a time fixed for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BREWER. I call for the regular order.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the bill known as the coinage bill; a bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, with amendments. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I believe it will be conceded by all men who have spent their lives in business that there is nothing more detrimental, directly, to the great business interests of the country than the constant agitation of financial schemes in Congress. When the Forty-fifth Congress assembled the returning tide of prosperity seemed assured to the country. The crops were larger than ever before, there was a heavy demand for all our surplus abroad, there seemed to be nothing in the way of the resumption of specie payments as designated by the act of 1875, and business men and capitalists began to turn their attention, with confidence, to the revival of old and the establishment of new enterprises. In a short period after the assembling of Congress all the high hopes of returning prosperity became suddenly clouded, owing mainly to the agitation of numerous financial schemes and the persistent attempts to repeal the resumption laws.

The stagnation of business and the fall of prices continued until the defeat of all projects which would postpone or delay the return of specie payments was assured. The triumphant return of the country to a sound currency gave promise of future stability in all business and a higher place to the public credit than it had ever attained since the foundation of the Government. The predictions of the failure of the financial measures established by the Forty-fourth Congress made by many distinguished theorists proved false in a most signal manner, and the highest hopes of those who had sustained through good and evil report the policy established are more than realized. The inflationists having lost their hold upon the popular mind by the return to specie payments now turn their attention more earnestly than ever to debasing the standard of value. In hot haste a bill is reported to open the flood-gates of the Treasury and fill it with the discarded metal of other nations.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] who has reported this bill from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, explains it in his speech in his blandest and most genial manner. It is a very simple matter to him after he has studied the question so faithfully. He makes five and six count twelve in a way delightful to behold. According to his theory we have nothing to do but to let any one bring to the Treasury all the silver bullion he can lay his hand upon and receive legal-tender dollars therefor. He explained very elaborately and clearly that by the bill there is no charge for coining silver brought to the mints, but there is a charge covering cost only for cleaning, refining, adding copper, &c., so that every encouragement is held out to our people to bring bullion to the Treasury in order that the mints may have plenty of work, at least in appearance if not in reality.

And, Mr. Speaker, lest there should be any delay in filling the Treasury with the coveted silver, and the gold therein no longer be allowed to disturb the dreams of silver inflationists in their examinations of the monthly bulletins, the bill provides that certificates of deposit shall be issued in sums of $5 or more to any one bringing $20 of gold or silver bullion to the Treasury, which certificates shall be received for public dues, including duties on imports, and may be used by the national banks as part of their lawful reserve and also in payment of interest upon the public debt. They are to be issued as a part of the lawful reserve of the national banks, but what part is not stated.

In addition to all these purposes, it is further provided that the coin and bullion received by the Treasury shall be retained for the redemption of these certificates; but here comes in a curious feature, doubtless dear to every inflationist heart. Up to this time, while he has elaborately explained, as I have already stated, the minor details of the proposition, he has entirely omitted the weightier matters, as any one will see who examines the bill for himself. Now the Secretary of the Treasury, if he is short of gold or silver, or for any other reason, may issue additional certificates representing coin in the Treasury; but he shall not exceed 20 per cent. the sum total of coin in the Treasury.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLAFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to say, in order that I may not be misrepresented, that the law in this respect is not a change of existing law, but that the existing law is left where it now is. That is the law in reference to gold now.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Does the gentleman say they can now issue certificates representing coin in the Treasury?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; that is the law now, and 20 per cent. more than he has either of coin or bullion in the Treasury. The law in that respect, in other words, is not changed by this bill.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Your amendment does not show that. It is provided that he shall not exceed 20 per cent. beyond the total sum of coin and bullion in the Treasury; that is, that he may issue certificates representing coin of which he has not a dollar. Now, if that is the law why was it put into this bill?

Mr. BUCKNER. If my friend will allow me I will say that this bill is intended to apply the law now applicable to the coinage of gold to the coinage of silver in every respect. This bill merely does apply the principle of gold coinage to silver coinage, and that is the whole of it.

Mr. WARNER. Yes, that is it.

Mr. CLAFLIN. It has the effect of receiving silver bullion, and issuing certificates for it.

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir; just as it is in reference to gold now.

Mr. CLAFLIN. In other words, it says: "Mr. Secretary you may lie a little as to the certificates, but do not lie to exceed 20 per cent." [Laughter.] The Secretary may issue as many coin certificates as he has coin and bullion representing standard dollars and 20 per cent. in addition. For instance, to-day the Treasury holds $171,000,000 in coin, for which, by the bill, five-dollar certificates may be issued. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether they have the right to issue five-dollar certificates now?

Mr. BUCKNER. No; only twenty-dollar certificates. That is a change.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Yes; that is just where the essential change comes in. And in addition thereto we have $34,000,000 representing coin, but for which the Treasury holds not a dollar, thus aggregating in amount $205,000,000 which may be issued in five-dollar certificates, the certificates which the Government cannot now issue. This certainly would please our venerable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WRIGHT.] He asked us to issue $400,000,000. It would furnish a pretty fair installment toward the $1,000,000,000 proposed to be issued by the Government to be expended in building railroads, digging canals, reclaiming submerged lands, and constructing public works of all kinds. To be sure, laws must be passed before the money could be appropriated and drawn from the Treasury; but if a majority is found to pass this bill it may be relied upon to pass any bill making the distribution, unless it be the Geneva award.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot see under this section of what use the mints will be, as the Treasury has already more standard dollars than it needs, as is evinced by the small demand for them, although the Secretary has faithfully endeavored to dispose of his surplus, and our silver friends constantly proclaim the virtue of the "dollar of the fathers."

Mr. WARNER. If the gentleman will allow me, I should be glad to say that under this bill all that is taken away from the Secretary of the Treasury. If the people do not want the money they will not take it to the mint to be coined.

Mr. CLAFLIN. They do not wish to have it coined when they can put it into the Treasury and take out certificates therefor. They put in the bullion and get certificates.

Mr. WARNER. If they do not want the money they will not take the bullion to the mints to be coined.

Mr. CLAFLIN. It will be readily seen that no provision whatever is made to keep the Treasury supplied with silver, even to float the greenbacks. It has been supposed by sound financiers and able statesmen that the money in the Treasury was to be used in their redemption; but this bill ignores this duty altogether, as the certificates represent that hitherto so-called reserve. Can there be a greater violation of public faith or a more dangerous experiment than the action proposed by this section of the bill? It presupposes a degree of ignorance of the laws of demand and supply, and demand in the business world and of the common sagacity of men as to their real interest, difficult to measure. How long would there be any confidence in money issued with such evident disregard of the public wants and the manifest inability of payment without laying additional burdensome taxes?

Let us look into this bill a little further and judge of it in the light of modern experience and not in the times of the emperors of Rome or the monarchs of later days. What are the complaints of the advocates of this bill? The gentleman from Ohio alleges that the silver dollar was demonetized by a trick. This story has been used so much that the advocates of the restoration of silver really believe that the far-sighted moneyed men and capitalists, when silver was above par as compared with gold, knew that there was to be a fall, and therefore managed to smuggle into a coinage bill the provision stopping the coining of the silver dollar. I will not stop to detail the whole series of bills, amendments, substitutes, &c., through which the act went before it was finally passed. Suffice it to say that it was considered in two Congresses, was debated many times, printed in thirteen different forms. The feature complained of was known and approved of by the Banking Committee, the committee which had charge of the bill, and the principle assented to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] who joins the complainants, as will be seen by the extracts which I send to the Clerk to read.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania begs leave to say that he never assented to it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. CLAFLIN. I yield for that explanation.

Mr. KELLEY. I have made my explanation.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I ask the Clerk to read the sentences I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KELLEY also said:

"I wish to ask the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. Potter] if he knows of any government in the world which makes its subsidiary coinage of full value. The silver coin of England is 10 per cent. below the value of gold coin, and, acting under the advice of the experts of this country and of England and France, Japan has made her silver coinage within the last year 12 per cent. below the value of gold coin, and for this reason: it is impossible to retain the double standard; the values of gold and silver continually fluctuate. You cannot determine this year what will be the relative values of gold and silver next year. They were 15 to 1 a short time ago; they are 16 to 1 now.

"Hence all experience has shown that you must have one standard coin which shall be a legal tender for all others, and then you may promote your domestic convenience by having a subsidiary coinage of silver, which shall circulate in all parts of your country as legal tender for a limited amount, and be redeemable at its face value by your Government. But, sir, I again call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentlemen who oppose this bill insist upon maintaining a silver dollar worth three and one-half cents more than the gold dollar, and worth seven cents more than two half dollars, and that so long as those provisions remain you cannot keep silver coin in the country."

On May 27, 1872, the bill was again called up by Mr. Hooper, for the purpose of offering an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and the bill, as amended, passed that day—yeas 110, nays 13.

Just previous to the passage of the bill Mr. McNeeley, of the Coinage Committee, said:

"As a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, having carefully examined every section and line of this bill, and generally understanding the subject before us, I am satisfied that the bill ought to pass. (Page 3883, volume 104.)

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say before the gentleman proceeds that I will not interrupt him now to respond to what he has said. I will simply remark, we were discussing the question of subsidiary coinage and the fact that our dollar was worth more than the equivalent silver coins of the world, and therefore it could not be retained in this country. But that I ever assented to the demonetization of the standard dollar knowingly, I deny.

Mr. WARNER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me also, as he asked me a question on this very point, I wish now to ask him——

Mr. REED. I suggest that the gentleman from Massachusetts be first allowed to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WARNER. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts yields to me. I wish to ask him if he finds one word in the record of the debates that took place in this House or in the other House upon the bill that passed and is known as the act of 1873, referring to a change in the standard or to the question of the demonetization of silver, except the few words of Mr. Hooper himself in introducing the bill?

Mr. CLAFLIN. It presupposes an amount of ignorance in two committees, which I am not willing to attribute to them, to suppose that they did not know what sort of a bill they were reporting to the House, and I do not think it is very creditable for gentlemen to attempt to take advantage of any such supposition. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was on the committee. He knew what the bill was. The bill passed by a vote of 110 against, I think, some 10 to the contrary.

And here is another expression made use of by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. On the 9th of April, 1872, Mr. KELLEY said:

Every dollar that is not gold is subsidiary. Our dollar, half dollar, and every other coin that is not gold is subsidiary.

He said that.

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly I did.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Then we agree on that. They are now in effect subsidiary coins; that is all that they are.

Mr. KELLEY. But a young pup gets its eyes opened in nine days; and in the intervening years I have learned a great deal.

Mr. REED. Oh! [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAFLIN. And I tell the gentleman that an old dog cannot be cheated. [Continued laughter.] My friend from Pennsylvania has been passing all around the goal and has landed where he now is. I do not think that he should complain that he is very young in this business. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I have not said that. I state what is a fact in nature. And it is no disgrace to a man to learn as he lives.

Mr. CLAFLIN. No; but when a gentleman brings up the fact against other gentlemen who are advocating a principle which he advocated at one time, that it is an evidence of an evil design, then I think he will have to take home a little of it to himself.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not charged you with an evil design.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Well, a trick must have an evil design.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not charged it as a trick.

Mr. CLAFLIN. The other day when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] said that it was a trick, I understood you to say, "Yes, it was a trick."

Mr. KELLEY. I said that nobody could explain it; that the bill I introduced contained the provision for the standard silver dollar. I said that I had gone on pleading guilty all the time that as chairman of the committee and as its organ I had introduced the bill which passed; until the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] brought me the Senate copy of the bill with that section stricken out, and one inserted, in which there was no standard dollar.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I think the gentleman puts it right. He says that he has had some new light, and I am willing to give him credit for it. But let him give credit to other people for honesty of purpose, even if they do not agree with him to-day in his new light.

Now, in answer to the statement that the country did not know of this thing when it was done, allow me to state that resolutions in favor of stopping the coinage of the silver dollar were passed by the New York Chamber of Commerce and by the National Board of Trade, composed of gentlemen from every part of the United States. That policy, too, had the active support of the Treasury officials, including Dr. Linderman, so well known for his information and learning, especially in regard to matters relating to metallic money. All financial men saw then as we see now that a single standard was easily maintained and was free from the constant fluctuations incident to a double standard.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman give the date of that indorsement of the National Board of Trade?

Mr. CLAFLIN. I would like to accommodate the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.] I did not interrupt him, except once to deny a statement. He had a couple of hours, and I am willing he shall have two more. I would like, however, to go on now with my own remarks.

As we were then without coin currency in use, it seemed unwise to allow these constant fluctuations to go on when we came back to a specie basis. It is well known to gentlemen here that we never have had in use two coinages equal in value. At one time the proportion of silver to gold was as 15 to 1, and then all the silver went out and we had nothing but gold. Then we put it up to 16 to 1, and then went out all the gold and we had nothing but silver.

Those men who have studied these questions most elaborately thought the time had arrived when we should dismiss the double standard. Every one knows that England under like circumstances adopted the gold standard, and found it so beneficial to her interests that through all depressions and fluctuations of trade she has continued to retain it. Therefore the change was made.

Now, how is it possible that this change should have affected values in the way so graphically described by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] who seems to think that his noble services in the war and his great sacrifices were lost by the act of 1873, when that act had no effect for six years after it had passed.

No act was ever better considered by an intelligent committee than was that act. And when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] stands up here and heaps epithets upon the men who then favored the single standard, he does injustice to them and to his own better nature. I can only account for his harsh words by ascribing to him the infatuation of the inflationist, so prominently displayed for the last five years. Driven as they are from their old complaints regarding the greenbacks by the successful resumption of specie payments, they now ascribe all the real and imagined woes of the country to the act of 1873. They forget the vast rise in property from 1865 to 1873. They ignore the fact that thousands of farms were bought and mortgaged during those years, which increased in value often several times beyond their cost, enabling their owners to accumulate largely, pay off the mortgage, and have abundance left. Did the mortgagee reap any direct benefit from the rise? Gentlemen forget the enormous increase of railroad facilities spread through the country and built with such rapidity that the profits of the great iron interests were beyond all parallel. There must come an end. Furnaces making pig-iron at $20 a ton profit could not always keep up a night and day blast. In 1872 I visited Saint Louis, and there I found the furnaces running night and day, making forty or fifty tons of iron daily, at a profit of $20 a ton. To-day you can buy iron of the same quality on the same ground for eleven or twelve dollars a ton.

The country could not turn all its wealth into railroads, and the end came. The shock was frightful; but the act of 1873 had as much to do with it as the weather-vane on yonder steeple has with the coming storm. The strain upon the wealth of the nation was too great, and the bubble burst. Of course values began to recede, and no device could stay their downward course. Neither will any device of inflation restore their upward tendency. Let the people fully understand that the financial policy of the Government is settled, and they will go to work under the established conditions. Prosperity will surely follow their exertions.

The inevitable effect of this bill will be to demonetize gold. The French bimetallists, Cernuschi and Seyd, agree that the efforts of the United States to restore silver to its former position will certainly fail unless the European nations, especially England, join in remonetizing silver with free coinage. In the face of the admission of these distinguished men, when their worst apprehensions have been realized, we, solitary and alone, are to make the attempt. Look at the condition of the Bank of France, and you can readily understand why Frenchmen desire us to establish unlimited coinage. Here are the figures of the movement of her coin:

In 1873 the Bank of France possessed $119,000,000 in gold and $30,000,000 in silver; in 1874, $197,000,000 gold and $60,000,000 silver; in 1875, $228,000,000 gold and $98,000,000 silver; in 1876, $297,000,000 gold and $124,000,000 silver; in 1877, $229,000,000 gold and $168,000,000 silver; and in 1878, $191,000,000 gold and $205,000,000 silver. Thus in six years the Bank of France has increased its surplus of silver from $30,000,000 to $205,000,000. It has been computed by Mr. Cernuschi and others that there are 2,500,000,000 francs of silver in France. According to this estimate the Bank of France has about one-half of all the circulation of silver in France. But it will be observed that last year while the Bank of France increased its stock of silver nearly $40,000,000, it lost $39,000,000 of gold. The people of France are prudent and careful of their hard-earned wealth.

Since 1876 they have steadily drawn gold from the vaults of the bank, and to-day she probably holds $220,000,000 of silver, which she will be glad to exchange upon almost any terms for our one hundred and thirty-three millions of gold. She sustains gold prices, but the silver on hand aids her very little, if any at all. No silver is coined, yet the bank gains thirty or forty millions yearly and loses nearly that amount of gold. Open our Treasury to bullion certificates, and you will soon find the load taken from France and put upon us. She has no mines. We take forty millions yearly from the earth.

If we take French silver what shall we do with our product? Europe will take none, for her stores in the great centers are filling not only with silver but with gold. Notwithstanding the great demand by Germany, the Bank of England steadily increases her stock of gold in reserve; and so would the Bank of France but for the desire of the French people to rid themselves of their silver. Here is a statement showing that the average amount of gold in the Bank of England for five years, from 1865 to 1870, was £15,200,000 or about $75,000,000. Let us see how her stock of gold has increased since. In 1873 she had £22,600,000; in 1874 the amount ran down a little—it was £21,500,000. In 1875 the amount was £22,000,000; in 1876 £28,400,000. In 1877 the amount ran down to £24,000,000, there being a great demand for gold in order to pay for products of this country. In 1878 it runs up to £28,000,000—£13,000,000 more than the average amount from 1865 to 1870, when the bank carried all the commerce of that country on £15,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as every man having dealings with the Government will have the opportunity of paying in silver, he will do then as men are doing now under our present laws, bring silver dollars or certificates to the Treasury. All your receipts from customs or internal taxes will be paid in this money, while the Treasury to keep its standard with the commercial nations will have to pay in gold or its equivalent. How long can the Treasury maintain this vaunted bimetallic standard? I think the gentleman from Ohio himself will assent to the proposition as I have stated it, or rather, I will not do him the injustice to question his understanding of it. The whole scope and bearing of the bill is to establish a single standard and that standard the silver dollar of 412½ grains. The day so long looked for, and I may say prayed for, by England and France will have come. Both nations want gold; the latter wishes to sell silver. They covet the hundred and forty millions of gold in our Treasury. Possessing, according to her earnest friend, Mr. Cernuschi, five hundred million five-franc pieces, she cannot afford to demonetize them, as he plainly states, but the people of France are shy of them, and begin to run them into the Bank of France and draw therefrom its gold. They are a provident people, careful individually of their money, and look sharply after that which is likely to be worth the most. In no other way can we account for the steady increase of silver in the Bank of France, and as steady a decline of her gold reserve.

By our present laws we stand exactly in the position of the great commercial states of Europe. We limit the use of silver, in reality making it subsidiary coin; so does Germany and the Latin union. The German thaler is still legal tender, and there is all the subsidiary coin needed in that empire. The coining of gold supplied the vacuum left by stopping the coinage of silver, and consequently a surplus of silver was created. The law establishing a gold coinage was partly political and partly financial, or rather the reasons creating a new standard were partly political and partly commercial. Several kingdoms were brought together, each one possessing a currency of its own. Bismarck saw that nothing of a financial nature would tend to consolidate the empire more certainly than to establish a uniform currency. With him a fixed idea must be carried out and the standard was changed, leaving, as I said before, a surplus of silver which must be sold. Its place has been supplied by gold, yet there is plenty of gold. This arises from the enormous production as stated by Mr. Seyd in the report of the silver commission. Here it is:

Production from 1800 to 1848: of gold, $496,000,000; of silver, $1,277,000,000. Production from 1848 to 1874: of gold, $3,645,000,000; of silver, $1,818,000,000.

Gold being abundant, is much more readily brought into circulation. In forty-eight years we had $496,000,000 of gold, and in twenty-six years, from 1848 to 1874, $3,645,000,000. In the first period $1,277,000,000 of silver were produced, and in the latter period $1,818,000,000. People like better to use gold than silver. Who wants to carry twenty dollars of silver in his pocket when he can get four five-dollar gold pieces, which will better answer his purpose?

The world advances in this as in everything else. Men will use those forces which are most convenient. The cumbersome coach gives way to the rail-car; the elevated railroad succeeds the street-car. The clearing-house drives from the street hundreds of men formerly employed in transporting gold and silver in settling daily balances, and the certificate of the deposit in the Treasury pays the duties formerly received in coin only.

What is true in Germany is equally true in France. If you want gold in France you can go to the bank and ask for it, but they keep the bank-notes at par by doling out gold only as it is needed. This is the experience of every man who visits France and has occasion to pay a bill. The French who have taken silver at a higher value than it is worth for years now find themselves burdened with it. Fifteen and one-half to 1 they find is more than it is worth, and that 19 to 1 is nearer its value. They keep up the circulation of subsidiary silver coin as it is done in this country, by being made redeemable in gold.

England uses a hundred million dollars, perhaps two, no one can tell the amount certainly, of silver which is legal-tender for £2 or $10. We have just passed—that is, through this House—a law for subsidiary silver, legalizing the same amount. It would seem the very height of folly to place ourselves in a doubtful and uncertain position, and I believe the wisdom of the House will announce to the country that there is to be no change in our policy until experience, which is the only safe guide in legislation, demands it. Our financial system as it stands to-day is superior to any and all others in the world. It is one of the great benefits brought to us by the necessities of the war. The genius and wisdom of Secretary Chase, assisted by wise and sagacious men in Congress, established it. Experience has perfected it, and if it can be allowed to stand yet a little longer, no change of parties, no political storm will ever bring its overthrow. The French financial system was wrought out amid the thunders of the great revolution which awoke the nation to wondrous deeds and a new life. It has survived all changes of dynasty and all revolutions. The commune even, which burned and destroyed the most cherished memorials of France, though starving, dared not touch the nation's great depository, although it contained untold millions of the precious metals, so firmly fixed in the minds of the people is its value to their great commercial and industrial interests. Thus, as the years roll on, will our system be found to yield such benefit to the masses that neither the wildest fanatic nor the boldest iconoclast will dare to raise his hand against it.

The bill I have here is, I think, one of the most extraordinary ever introduced into the House. It will place our Government on the sea of irredeemable currency. Every day men will have to take the quotations of the gold room to find the price of gold. Every bale of cotton, every barrel of pork, every article sent abroad will have to be valued by the Liverpool standard. One day gold will be 16; another day it will be 20 above the standard which we have made. Shall we again open the gold-room in New York? Shall we again place in their former position the men who were the habitues of that gold-room, but who have now grown seedy for the want of business? I would fain believe that this House so understands the real benefit to the nation of maintaining the currency as it now stands that it will refuse to pass this bill.

Mr. Speaker, if I have any further time, I retain it for future use.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia.) The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Speaker, the bill under discussion proposes to restore the double standard; that is, the silver dollar of 412½ grains shall be a unit of value as the gold dollar of 25.8 grains is a unit of value. The bill also proposes free and unlimited coinage of the standard silver dollar, when the silver is presented at the mint, together with the issuing of certificates when the silver, either coined or in bars, is deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury.

The provisions of the bill have been explained at length by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who reported the bill from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. I do not propose, therefore, to occupy the time of the House in going over the provisions of the bill. I propose to talk upon the general question—the general aspect of the silver question, the restoration of silver to its proper place.

In discussing the question of silver the mind is directed, Mr. Speaker, to the beneficence of the Creator. We find that he has wonderfully provided for his creatures. There is nothing wanting. We can find no fault with the works of the great Creator in providing for the beings he has made. When we look abroad upon the earth, our home, we see that it is carpeted with a color that is suited to the eye. The trees of the forest wave with their thousands of leaves and the eye is not injured in gazing upon them. And whether we look into the atmosphere or into the waters upon the face of the earth, or whether we delve into the earth, we find that God Almighty has wonderfully provided for all our wants. This is a subject that should be pleasing to the mind of every reflective man. All our wants are met. The earth is genial and kind in producing its harvests. We have the early and the later rains. We have the clouds to temper the heat. We have the streams of water pouring through the earth, sparkling on the mountain sides and flashing in the valleys; and looking down into the earth we find iron, mica, corundum, agalmatolite, lead, silver, and gold, provided for the wants of man.

Among the precious metals are gold and silver. Gold is perhaps the most beautiful of all metals. Next to that in usefulness, in beauty, and in brilliancy is silver; and undoubtedly the all-wise Creator has placed in the earth the veins here and there of this beautiful metal that it may become a medium of exchange representing values among mankind.

We find, Mr. Speaker, that for thousands of years silver has been "current among the merchants" of the earth. Three thousand seven hundred years ago Abraham bought the field and cave of Macphelah in which to bury Sarah, and the record states that the purchase money was four hundred shekels of silver, "current money with the merchant," which sum was paid to Ephron, and the right to the field was made sure unto Abraham for a possession forever. Two thousand seven hundred years ago, when David numbered the people and offended God, the prophet placed before him three things: that he should have seven years of famine, or be pursued three months by his enemies, or have three days of pestilence. David chose the pestilence. "Let us," he said, "now fall into the hands of the Lord." And when the angel stood with his drawn sword over Jerusalem the prophet directed David to go up and worship, and he bought the threshing-floor and oxen of Araunah for fifty shekels of silver; in value about $25, I believe.

So reaching through the flight of ages for thousands upon thousands of years silver has been a legal tender. And it remained for these latter times, when the wants of men have increased, and when men have multiplied upon the face of the earth until now they number more than a thousand millions—it remained for these latter times for men to destroy the commercial value of this beautiful metal, silver, and to commit a great wrong upon mankind.

What is money after all? It is the representative of value. Sometimes people resorted to barter; that is, they swapped cattle or sheep for some other commodities. But that was inconvenient, and it was necessary to have some representative of value.

I recollect reading in Wheeler's History of the State of Frankland, that is now, I believe, covered by a part of Tennessee, that in those days when the people had to pay their taxes the currency was coonskins. It was said that upon a certain occasion a man came in to pay his taxes and presented a lot of opossum skins with coon tails tied on to them. Governor Swain, president of the University of North Carolina, used to relate with glee a story of a pupil from the mountain section of the State. When the mountain boy was asked what kind of currency he called that, he said that it was a "re-tail" currency. [Laughter.] That shows that there have been different ways of trade in the world. It became necessary that men should have something to represent value. Consequently coin has been made and kept in circulation.

The act demonetizing silver startled the people of this country; such a thing was not contemplated. It has already been stated that the act was unknown to the people, that it was a fraud. I believe some explanation was made over on the other side awhile ago by my friend who preceded me, [Mr. CLAFLIN,] but I could not hear very distinctly, and I do not know what his statement was.

I am under the impression that the provision demonetizing silver was perhaps placed in the statutes when they were revised, and that the act dropping the silver dollar from coinage was passed in 1873. At any rate it was unknown to the country at the time, and when known it had a startling effect.

In 1876, during the canvass for President, in many parts of the country, when it was charged that the silver dollar had been demonetized, and that gold alone was the standard of value in the United States of America, that was denied; it was denounced as a falsehood. Such a thing as that had never occurred to the people, and they did not suppose it ever would occur.

What was the effect of the demonetization of silver? It was to establish a single standard of value and that standard gold. I do not hesitate to say that gold is not the money of the people, and never can be. Gold is royal money; gold is not a money that can be obtained by the laboring masses of this country. Silver is the money of the people; silver is the money they have been accustomed to from time immemorial. The single standard of gold was therefore a contraction measure, fraught with disaster to this great country of ours.

What further effect did it have? It had the effect of diminishing the value of silver in the markets of the world; silver went down in price. What an unwise act that was for statesmen to carry out in the United States, seeing that we are a silver-producing country? My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] says that the interests of this great people ought to be protected. Now it looks to me that it was a very unwise thing for us to legislate in the interest of those countries that do not produce silver and against our own country which is a silver-producing country.

What further has been the effect of this contraction scheme, this making gold alone the standard of value in the United States of America? My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] in his opening remarks spoke of returning prosperity in the United States. I do not know upon what he bases his calculations. Does he base them upon the fact that corn in North Carolina has been selling for twenty-five or thirty cents a bushel? Or is it because bacon was delivered last summer at Raleigh from Chicago at $3.90 a hundred pounds?

What is the sign of returning prosperity in our beloved country? Low prices; failures all over the land. Every day the papers tell us of failures; of operatives thrown out of employment; of large factories closed, the music of their machinery still; bread taken from the mouths of the laborers, and the cries of their children, because of hunger, going up to God.

That is not all. Look at the mournful pictures in the newspapers of men driven to suicide because their poor ones at home could not be fed. I will tell you one of these signs of prosperity. A man is found in the river, having drowned himself; and when his pockets are searched, in them a letter is discovered saying that he had not the heart to go home to his children because he had no bread for them. That is the kind of prosperity to which the gentleman refers. Then there is the shrinkage of values. What becomes of the debtor class?

A man bought a farm on credit at $2,000 when money was plenty. Four thousand bushels of corn at fifty cents per bushel would pay for it. Contraction of the currency and demonetization of silver reduced corn to twenty-five cents. It then takes eight thousand bushels to pay for the place, and it is then only worth $1,000. A hotel in my town cost $18,000, and after contraction sold for $6,000.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the legislation for years has been in behalf of the money-rings of the country and against the poor. Gentlemen tell us, "You can buy so much more with a dollar." But how are you going to get the dollar? That is a very significant question.

I think it a true position that there ought to be money enough for the wants of the people; and to say that the States shall not bank, that the Government only shall issue money, and then to destroy a large portion of the currency, to demonetize silver and adopt gold alone as the standard, is a crime against labor, a crime against the toiling people of our country. It is class legislation and in the interest of the money-rings and money-sharks of the land.

Now, let us look a little at the benefits of free coinage. Free, unlimited coinage will give us the money that we want. Why should people be afraid of having too much silver? To talk in that way is an absurdity. Can you have too much of a good thing? There is no reason in saying that we shall ever have too much silver. Objections of that kind might be made against an irredeemable inflated currency. I deny that I ever was an inflationist. What is the meaning of an inflated currency? It means to have as money a great bulk of something for which there is no redemption. Nobody proposes that. But we want enough money for the demands of the people, enough to enable them to pay their taxes, enough to keep the factories going, so that plenty may prevail in every home throughout the length and breadth of the land. Gentlemen need not be scared at the idea of having too much money. Therefore we say let the coinage of the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains be unrestricted. Let the people of the country come in with their silver and have it coined.

Then there is another thing that we ought to do. We ought, as speedily as possible, to provide for recoining such coins as have been discredited by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury. Take the trade-dollar for instance. That has the stamp of the Government on its face—the eagle—and you know we are all in favor of the eagle; it is a great bird. The Government of the United States on the face of the trade-dollar has declared that it is worth a dollar. It contains 420 grains of silver. The other day when the Secretary of the Treasury was before our committee I asked him what the trade-dollar was worth at the Treasury. At first he said that they did not take it at all; then he said that it was worth at the mints about eighty-five cents. Then there is the Mexican dollar, containing 417 grains, which I believe used to pass current. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is such a thing as demonetizing silver without doing it legally; and the action of the bankers, as I think, assisted by the Secretary of the Treasury, has practically demonetized silver. We propose to restore free and unlimited coinage. Let the people bring in their trade-dollars and let them be coined into standard silver dollars of 412½ grains, which shall be a legal-tender. There is now confusion in the country in regard to these coins. To show this, I will send to the Clerk to be read an article which I have clipped from a paper published in my district.

The Clerk read as follows:

HE CHANGED HIS VIEWS.

"Rah for BOB VANCE, for givin' us back our silver money," said a countryman about a year ago, when one of our merchants paid him seventy-five cents in silver.

He came in the post-office yesterday and wanted to send a money order to his uncle; he pulled out of his "breeches" pocket twenty-five trade-dollars, and with the air of a man who is on good terms with himself, flung it down on the desk asking the clerk to count "that thar money." On being informed that this sort of money didn't go at the post-office he vented his astonishment: "What, not take silver money; the dollars of our daddies. Not take that? What the dival do you mean?"

"No, sir; can't take that," quietly replied the clerk.

"Well, that heads anything yit," said he, as he slowly gathered up the coins, wearing a look that better belongs to a man that buys a prize box and draws a blank.

"Plague on BOB VANCE for givin' us sich money. A greenbacker will get my vote next time."

[Laughter.]

Mr. VANCE. So you see there is confusion in the country.

Mr. FISHER. I hope the gentleman will not add to the confusion by bringing the trade-dollar into this discussion. As I understand, this bill does not propose any action in regard to the trade-dollar.

Mr. VANCE. I will explain that matter hereafter.

Now, I wish to say that the effect of this bill, as I understand, will be to enable the holder of a trade-dollar or a Mexican dollar to go to the mint and have it coined into legal-tender dollars. The effect of this, I believe, will be to bring the trade-dollar and the Mexican dollar to par.

Mr. KEIFER. I will ask the gentleman whether he means to say that the trade-dollar was not originally a legal tender in amounts of $5, and whether he did not participate in the legislation of the Forty-fourth Congress (of which I believe he was a member) which totally took away the legal-tender character of the trade-dollar, the democratic House leading off in that movement?

Mr. VANCE. I do not remember how I voted on that question; but I am free to say to my friend that at that time I did not understand or have my attention called to the matter. At any rate I had nothing to do with establishing the trade-dollar. The sum of $5 as a legal tender was of very little value.

Mr. REED. Your constituent seems to have understood it.

Mr. KEIFER. It was a very short bill.

Mr. VANCE. It may be that I did not oppose the bill, supposing the trade-dollar to be in China, where it was intended to go. But suppose I did not oppose the bill referred to at that time, and have since discovered there was a wrong about it, should I not seek to correct it. Now, the trade-dollar ought to be a legal-tender dollar; we ought not to have a discredited coin like this circulating in the country. It leads to confusion. The trade-dollar, not the legal-tender dollar of the Bland bill, was established before I came to Congress, for the avowed purpose of trading with China, and not for circulation at home. It is urged, Mr. Speaker, that the restoration of the double-standard will flood our country with silver; that it will drive out gold. I do not see how that can be if we have the balance of trade with us. I asked my friend from Massachusetts in committee what would carry the gold out instead of the silver. He said the inferior coin would drive out the superior coin. How can silver be inferior to gold when each one of these metals is valuable in its proportion, that is, about 15 or 15½ to 1.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I would ask the gentleman if that is the proportion now?

Mr. VANCE. Then, what is it?

Mr. CLAFLIN. Is silver 15½ now in England or any other country?

Mr. VANCE. I believe that it is not since silver has been demonetized abroad. Not because of the increased quantity, but because the acts demonetizing silver in England, Germany, and elsewhere, have appreciated gold and depreciated silver.

Mr. CLAFLIN. In what place has silver been demonetized abroad?

Mr. VANCE. England, Germany, &c.

Mr. CLAFLIN. No, sir; not in Germany.

Mr. VANCE. I do not understand the gentleman's question exactly. Where does he speak of when he asks concerning the proportion of silver to gold?

Mr. CLAFLIN. The standard was 15½, but on account of the depreciation of silver it is now about 19 to 1.

Mr. VANCE. What caused the depreciation in the price of silver? It was the demonetization of silver that caused it. That is the reason why the gentleman computes the proportion 19 to 1.

Mr. CLAFLIN. But allow me to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that silver has not been demonetized.

Mr. VANCE. Oh, yes, it is demonetized in England and other countries.

Mr. WARNER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts mean to say that silver has not been demonetized in England?

Mr. CLAFLIN. I do.

Mr. VANCE. I decline to yield any further.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my reading is that silver has been demonetized in Germany, in England, and in other portions of Europe. That has been my understanding, and I think I am correct. I say it was the act demonetizing silver which caused bullion to go down in value in the markets of the world.

We now have the information, Mr. Speaker, that the governments which demonetized silver have discovered their error, and are about to make a change. It becomes the United States Government to lead off in restoring silver to its place as one of the coins in the circulation of all countries.

When the honorable Secretary of the Treasury was before our committee, Mr. Speaker, he was asked whether there was too much silver in the country, and whether the making of silver coinage free and unlimited would be a wise act, to which he replied that silver would come back into the Treasury. Then I asked him why not pay it out to the bondholder; why let the money stay in the Treasury when we have this vast bonded debt crushing out the lives of our people? Why not pay it out to the bondholder? He said if that should be done the money would come back again into the Treasury. If so, let it come back into the Treasury, and let us continue the operation of receiving it and paying it out to the bondholder until we are entirely freed from the enormous bonded debt now oppressing us.

It seems to me the time has come, Mr. Speaker, when there should be some legislation in behalf of the people, for nearly all the legislation has been in behalf of the bondholder. The bondholder bought his bonds at sixty cents on the dollar, greenbacks, and they were to be paid in the currency of the country, but a bill was afterward passed which made them payable in coin, and then the next step was to demonetize silver so the bondholder was left with the right to payment in gold from the Government of the United States for his bond, making the bondholder all the time richer and the people poorer.

So it seems to me there is no difficulty in the case in regard to the country having too much money. I believe the production of gold and silver throughout the world is about equal. I refer to the proportion stated awhile ago. If I remember correctly, there are about $3,500,000,000 of gold in the world and about $3,250,000,000 of silver, and this proportion between the metals has continued for many years, over two hundred, I believe. It is not probable that we will ever discover more gold and silver than we want. It is not at all likely. I think the great Maker of all things has so arranged it that the precious metal will be dug out of the earth in proportion as the people increase in population. Now surely forty-five millions of people in the United States need more money than three millions did at the close of the revolutionary war.

The restoration of the double standard I think will be beneficial to the Government in another respect. If gold is scarce the Government can redeem its paper with silver, and I think that will be an advantage.

I say, sir, in conclusion, that in my judgment the removing of silver from its proper place in circulation, in other words, the demonetization of silver, is a crime against the laboring and toiling millions of mankind. It makes money more difficult to obtain. It makes it scarcer. It enables those who hold money to demand exorbitant rates of interest; and to-day I am told that the national banks are charging as high as 18 per cent. for money. I have a letter now in my possession from a gentleman in Connecticut complaining of the exorbitant rates of interest. Within the past few years I have myself known 5 per cent. a month to be demanded for money by those who held it. Is that prosperity? Is that happiness? Is that peace? Is that plenty in this land of ours? Five per cent. a month! Five times 12 are 60; 60 per cent. a year for the use of money, compounded every month, the man demanding his interest in advance every month!

How long will it take this country of ours to grow into prosperity and be happy with such a rate of interest as that? The Bank of England for two hundred years has never got a higher rate of interest than 10, and sometimes it is as low as 2 per cent., and the consols of Great Britain, I believe, bear 3 per cent. interest, and yet are taxed, holders thereof paying their share of the expenses of the Government.

There ought to be legislation that would cheapen money. Money ought to be plentiful. For whom shall this honorable body legislate, pray tell me? Shall we legislate alone for those who live in palaces, for those who live in banks whose fronts are marble? Shall we legislate for the nabobs who drive their carriages with six horses, and have their servants dressed in livery, aping the royalty of the Old World, smacking of the rotten dynasties of those countries that trample the people into the dust? Is that the class for whom we shall alone legislate?

I say it is the duty of the Government, it is the duty of the National Legislature, to protect the masses, to protect the people. The laws should rest equally on the rich and on the poor. I believe in an equality of law for the humblest and the poorest as well as for the wealthiest. And do not forget that some of the humblest and poorest in our land have been swindled out of their earnings. Do not forget that the earnings of the humble colored washerwoman, as she toiled at the tub, were placed in the Freedman's Savings Bank, and the little amount was taken away from her. I say it becomes this National Legislature now to do something for the people, and I hope that they will do something for them. I hope, sir, that the day is dawning when that will be done. It is said of Frederick the Great that in the midst of his great and wonderful wars, and they were wonderful victories which he gained, that in passing from one point to another in his dominions he would stop by the roadside even to hear the petition of the poorest and humblest citizen, and on one occasion he actually put his judges in prison because they did not redress the wrongs of one of the humblest of his people. That is something we may learn from so great a man as Frederick, though he was a king.

I say it is the duty of this Government to protect its masses and to make the people happy. It is said that a happy home is like heaven; but how can a home be happy where there is a gnawing for the want of bread and where the children are crying from hunger? Therefore I hope that the representatives of the people will take such steps as will relieve the people and give them that money which they want and which they need. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] the other day said in his speech on the Army bill, making, as I think, a somewhat unkind allusion—I do not see him in his seat, but I have nothing personal to say; I never do anything of that kind—that the South had first attempted to shoot the Government to death, and that now the proposition was to starve the Government to death. Mr. Speaker, there is much more danger, in my opinion, of destroying this Government by injustice and by class legislation than there is to apprehend from the men of the South starving the Government to death. A friend beside me remarks that there is much more danger of the Government starving the people to death. That puts it just the other way. But it is not the Government that is starving the people to death. It is not the Government; it is those who have the control of the legislation. The Government is good. The Constitution is good. The spirit of liberty that lives in our people, that animates their hearts, the love of country that is developed by the fireside as the mothers of the land take their little ones upon their knees and teach them the great lessons of human liberty—all these are good. The Government is good; thank God for the Government—the Government established by our fathers! It is not the Government that is doing the mischief; it is the laws that have been passed by those in authority that are crushing the life out of the people. The gentleman talks of starving the Government to death. Why, sir, if he would come down to my country and go into my Sunday school the children there would teach him a better philosophy than that. They would teach him that nothing can die. They would teach him, what Bulwer has so sweetly expressed:

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore,
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

There is no death! The dust we tread
Shall change beneath the summer showers
To golden grain or mellow fruit,
Or rainbow-tinted flowers.

There is no death! The leaves may fall,
The flowers may fade and pass away;
They only wait through wintry hours
The coming of the May.

Talk about death to this great country; that is a thing that can not be. No, sir; gentlemen of the North, I stand here to-day with you to proclaim my love for this country and for its institutions. I stand here to-day to say that I love it, that I love its traditions. The talk about this great country being starved to death is a useless waste of time; it cannot be done. Can it, [addressing General HARRY WHITE,] my friend from Kiskiminetas? [Laughter.]

I am happy in that belief, and my faith is in the integrity of the people. I have faith that around the firesides of the humble homes of the poor, and scattered all over our land, the children will be taught the sublime lesson of heroism through which our fathers passed in building up this great and noble Government, the pride of the whole earth.

Men may come up on the surface and do wrong. Laws may be passed that are unjust to the poor; laws may be passed that will wring the sweat and blood out of the children of toil, but this Government cannot be destroyed. Built up in tears and in suffering, cemented with blood and made heroic and glorious by the death of its noble sons, its base is the great granite rocks of the Constitution. Cursed be the arm that tears a single stone from the grand edifice.

No, sir, this country cannot die. We may differ, we do differ, as to the proper means we should pursue. It is manly to differ. Come up and speak your sentiments like men; do not be afraid. Let us all try to do right.

Let us lay aside all sectional prejudices. I wish to God that I never again in this House might hear any allusion to the mournful and sorrowful scenes of our unhappy civil war, at least in a way to arouse sectional hate. I wish from my very heart that I might never again hear an allusion to them, spoken in unkindness or want of charity on either side in our debates.

As I pass through the country I see the cemeteries, the national grave-yards. I see the national flag flying over them; I see the mounds here and there. On the one side are those of the blue, on the other are those of the gray. There they sleep—how peacefully! Let us learn a lesson from these brave men who fought and died, and now together they sleep their last sleep.

What we want to-day is not to look mournfully into the past; that is gone. Let us wisely improve the present; it is ours. This is our opportunity, this is our time to do something for the country. This is the day and this the hour when we should do something for our country.

I have endeavored to do that. I have voted against the adjournment of this session because I believe the country ought to have relief. Gentlemen may differ with me. They can do so, and I will be friendly with them; I will love them. I can beat you to death in that loving business. I say I have steadily voted against the adjournment of this session without doing something for this country. It becomes you and it becomes me to lay aside all party prejudices. After all, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, what is party? There is something grander, nobler, and better than party. There is something that rises higher into the pure atmosphere of man's better nature and calls out, if he has it, that which is good and true and beautiful within him. Surely, we ought all of us to try to cultivate a love for that which calls out those better traits. It is our country, our common country—our country first, our country last, and our country forever. [Applause.]

Mr. FISHER. As it is my purpose to address the House on this bill, and as the hour is now somewhat late, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the House will not adjourn; we might consume an hour more on the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia.) The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

To Mr. URNER, in the case of Redmond Tully, no adverse report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FISHER,] that the House now adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS. I trust the House will adjourn for the accommodation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 8, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 343) relating to printing impressions from portraits and vignettes, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 571) extending the limitation of the liability of vessels in cases of collision to foreign vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COKE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 572) to amend an act approved February 24, 1879, entitled "An act to create the northern judicial district of the State of Texas and to change the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, and to fix the time and places of holding courts in said districts;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STATISTICAL REPORTS ON INTERNAL COMMERCE.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, it is provided that "It shall be the duty of the officer in charge of the Bureau of Statistics to gather, collate, and annually report to the Secretary of the Treasury, for transmission to Congress, statistics and facts relating to commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, the railroad systems of this and other countries, the construction and operation of railroads, the actual cost of such construction and operation of railroads, the actual cost of transporting freights and passengers on railroads, and on canals, rivers, and other navigable waters of the United States, the charges imposed for such transportation of freight and passengers, and the tonnage transported; and the reports now by law required to be prepared and published monthly in the said Bureau of Statistics shall hereafter be prepared and published quarterly, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury;" and the said law required that "the statistics and facts relating to commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," &c., should be reported annually to the Secretary, to be transmitted to Congress; and

Whereas, in November, 1876, the first annual report on commerce and navigation made under said law was transmitted to Congress and did not contain the annual report on the domestic or internal commerce of the United States, and the first annual report on internal commerce which should have been made in November, 1876, was not made until June 30, 1877, and the second and third annual reports on internal commerce which should have accompanied the annual reports on commerce and navigation made in November, 1877, and November, 1878, have not yet been made, or if made to the Secretary of the Treasury, have not been transmitted to Congress; and

Whereas the statistics and facts required to be gathered, collated, and annually reported to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmission to Congress are of great value and should be regularly and promptly each year transmitted to Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required and directed to report to the Senate, when said second and third annual reports on internal commerce will be transmitted to Congress, and why they have been delayed, and whether such annual reports on internal commerce can hereafter be transmitted to Congress at the beginning of each regular session in December of each year with the regular annual reports on commerce and navigation, and, if not, then what additional legislation, if any, is necessary to secure the transmission to Congress of such annual reports on internal commerce at the beginning of each regular session.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that lie over, Mr. President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It should be printed, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over and be printed.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 286, reported by me yesterday and laid over under objection by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to enlist annually seven hundred and fifty boys in the Navy. The bill passed the House and is now on the Calendar. I should like to get the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it at this time.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to the bill except the possibility and the fear that when these seven hundred and fifty boys grow up they may be used to intimidate voters at the polls. If the Senator has considered that subject and is willing to risk it, I shall not object.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not think it will be necessary to consider that point.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 286) to amend sections 1417, 1418, 1419, 1420, and 1624 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the Navy.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps it is not exactly in order at this moment, but I ask the attention of the Senator from Florida to the title of the bill. No mortal man can tell from the title to what the bill relates. I suggest to him some amendment of the title. Although it does not come in just now, I hope he will at the proper time suggest some amendment to the title indicating the matter of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be in order after the bill is passed, if it should pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to amend the title is now in order.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that he put in an addition to the title indicating that it authorizes the appointment of boys in the naval service, or something of that kind.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It changes the phraseology of the sections relating to enlistments.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator that he add "in relation to enlistments in the Navy." I submit that amendment to the title.

Mr. WHYTE. The bill simply changes the sections referred to in that it specifies the number of boys that can be taken as apprentices into the service, and it changes the ages of the boys received now from sixteen to eighteen, and makes it from fifteen to eighteen years of age. That is the difference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Massachusetts please send his amendment to the desk so that it can be stated?

Mr. DAWES. I submit this amendment: After the words "relating to" insert "enlistment of boys in," so as to read: "A bill to amend sections 1417, 1418, 1419, 1420, and 1624 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the enlistment of boys in the Navy."

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that inasmuch as an amendment would make it necessary to send the bill back to the House, I do not think it should be made.

Mr. DAWES. I think it is a bad practice to pass such a bill with simply a reference to sections of the Revised Statutes; but if the Senator thinks there is any apprehension of the fate of the bill on going back I will not offer any amendment. I desire, however, to call attention to the fact that such titles to bills embarrass any one who undertakes to find out what amendments have been made to laws; but I withdraw the amendment at the suggestion of the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn, and if there is no objection the title will stand as reported.

ASSISTANTS IN THE LIBRARY.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to call up the bill which I reported yesterday in regard to an increase in the force of the Library, and put it on its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three additional assistants in the Library of Congress.

Mr. KERNAN. I simply want to inquire why is it that these assistants are necessary at this particular time? I do not understand the subject at all.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will explain. The Librarian of Congress came before the meeting of the Joint Committee of the two Houses on the Library yesterday, and made such a showing of the total insufficiency of the force there, that the committee unanimously and very promptly authorized me to report a bill giving him three additional assistants, at $1,200 a year each, and desired me to ask its consideration at once without the usual postponement of one day. I did so yesterday morning, but the bill went over until this morning. I can only say to the Senator from New York that the showing was such by the Librarian, who is considered a very careful and very competent man by us all, that the sentiment of the committee was unanimous that he ought to have these three additional clerks. He is managing the greatest library in the United States with about one-fourth of the force which is given to libraries of less magnitude than this, and really he ought to have more assistants than other libraries instead of less.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator from Indiana if these three assistant librarians are not already provided for in the legislative appropriation bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. Some two years ago, owing to an emergency in the office, there were three assistants allowed the Librarian, but he says that in addition to that force he is under the necessity of asking for three more.

Mr. ALLISON. He desires three in addition to those that are provided for in the legislative appropriation bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir; and that met the approbation of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to the bill. I am quite willing to give him the necessary number that he requires.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SPRUILLE BRADEN.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. No. 125) to appoint Spruille Braden an ensign in the United States Navy. It is a bill that passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, but failed to pass in the House because it was not reached there. It has been introduced again at this session and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and by them reported back, recommending its passage. It will take but a moment, I think.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be reported for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to the present consideration of the bill, but I shall object seriously to the passage of the bill. When it may be considered is of no consequence to me. The truth is that there are more graduates from our naval school than are required for the naval service. I have no doubt that this is a most deserving young man, but he is not needed as an officer in the Navy. The President now has the right to nominate him if he sees fit.

Mr. McDONALD. Oh, no.

Mr. CHANDLER. No matter; he has the right to nominate him to some other position.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall not object to its present consideration; but if it comes up for consideration I shall oppose the passage of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 125) to appoint Spruille Braden an ensign in the United States Navy.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask that the report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs at the last session, and which has been adopted by the committee at this session, be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. Sargent February 12, 1879:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1638) to appoint Spruille Braden an ensign in the United States Navy, report:

That the facts in the case of Spruille Braden are set forth at length in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Navy. It would seem from this state of facts that Mr. Braden would make an excellent officer of the United States Navy, and has the qualifications and characteristics to distinguish himself in the service. We therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 6, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the request of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, communicated on the 24th ultimo, that the Department would lay before them such information as it may be in its power to furnish in reference to the appointment of Spruille Braden as an ensign in the Navy, with such recommendation as it may think proper to make.

The Department has no official information on the subject, but there is no reason to believe that the following statement of facts is not reliable:

Young Braden was not long since a pupil in a naval college in England, where he passed through a course of professional study; and is supposed to have been the first American youth who was ever admitted to a like privilege. At the close of his term he passed the customary examination, graduated at the head of his class, which, besides himself, was composed entirely of young men of England, and won the annual prize, valued at $500, which is conferred by the Queen upon "the boy who shows the qualities likely to make the finest sailor." He seems to have achieved the triumph not only because in the opinion of officers and professors he had fairly won it, but with the unanimous assent of his classmates, who were magnanimous enough to concede it. Several other prizes were also awarded to him under like circumstances.

After his graduation, young Braden was offered a midshipman's warrant in the royal navy upon the condition that he would renounce allegiance to the Government of the United States and become a citizen of Great Britain. The temptation was great to a young man just entering life, but he declined it upon the express ground that he owed a higher duty to the country of his nativity, from which nothing could release him—not even the prospect of honorable service and promotion in the British navy.

Under these circumstances, it would seem that to place him "at the foot of the list of ensigns on the active list" of the Navy, which is proposed by Senate bill No. 1638, would be an act of generosity on the part of his own Government which throughout his life he would not be likely to forget. He would not, in that position, interfere with the promotion of any of the ensigns now in the Navy; but, taking his place at the foot of the list, would realize that his future official success would depend upon his own personal merit. The Department, therefore, can see no objection to the passage of the bill laid before it by the committee.

Very respectfully,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. A. A. SARGENT,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no doubt that this is a very deserving young man; no doubt he made a very fine record; but if our Naval Academy does not produce officers fully qualified to occupy the positions that are at the disposal of the Government, we had better abolish the Naval Academy. As I am informed, we produce yearly more midshipmen, who soon become ensigns, than the requirements of the Navy can absorb. Therefore, I see no reason why we should go outside of our present Naval Academy to put a man in the line of promotion. He is to be, of course, but an ensign, but he may rise until he becomes a rear-admiral, and it is giving not the compensation for to-day or to-morrow, or this year or next year, but a life compensation which may amount to a great many thousands of dollars in the whole. I have no objection to the young man, but I object to the principle of the bill.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not expect to add anything to what is said by the Secretary of the Navy in the letter he addressed to the Committee on Naval Affairs. This young man is a native of my State and of my town. I have known him from his infancy, and I know that he merits everything that is said in regard to him in the letter which has been read. It is an exceptional case, one not likely to be presented again in very many years; and certainly it cannot very seriously disturb the United States Navy to put a young man in that position on account of his personal merit.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Indiana answer me if the effect of the bill is not to place him above all the others of that grade?

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir, it puts him at the foot of the ensigns, the lowest commissioned officers.

Mr. ALLISON. It places him above the midshipmen?

Mr. McDONALD. It puts him above midshipmen.

Mr. COCKRELL. It puts him above all midshipmen?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. How long have some of those midshipmen been in the service, above whom he will be placed?

Mr. McDONALD. I have no means of stating that. They have, of course, gone through the course of studies at the Academy. How long they must be out of that school before they receive their commissions I am unable to state.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is this young man a graduate of the Naval Academy?

Mr. McDONALD. He is a graduate of a naval school in England, and took the highest prizes.

Mr. COCKRELL. And we are to reward him by an act of Congress for leaving his own country and going to a foreign country and graduating in one of her institutions?

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir; it was altogether a matter of accident so far as going to school there was concerned; and after he got through he had the offer of a commission in the navy of England if he would become a subject of that country. It was of course a matter that he was at liberty to accept or decline, and he preferred to come home and seek to enter our service.

Mr. VOORHEES. A single word in response to the remark made by the Senator from Missouri. The remark was made in a tone of reproach to this young man for having graduated in a naval school of England. With that inflection of voice in its tone which bears a reproach the Senator wanted to know whether we were to reward him for that. Mr. President, whenever an American boy can go into one of the oldest schools of one of the oldest and proudest and most intellectual countries of Europe, and not merely stand in the front of his class and graduate with the highest honors, but take the Queen's special medal for high scholarship and bring it home with him, I feel like rewarding him for having done honor to his country. I feel like rewarding him for having shown the people of England that boys from this country are not only their equals but their superiors, and I am glad that it happens in this case that it was an Indiana boy who went there and outstripped the youths of the proudest houses of England and brought back to his home at Indianapolis the Queen's medal of gold for high scholarship; and that education did not cost the United States a single dollar. His education shed luster upon the American name, at no expense to this Government at all; and it does seem to me that it is a very small recognition for such an exploit by one as young as he to give him the lowest ensigncy in the Navy. I really hope that there will be no serious objection to the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I agree with the Senator from Indiana that no great injury would happen to the American Navy from this instance, but great injury may happen from the precedent. I am opposed to putting officers in the Army and Navy by act of Congress. There is a mode provided for the young men of the country to rise to those posts, and that is to go through the schools at West Point and Annapolis. If we put this man at the foot of the ensigns we put him over all the midshipmen. His promotion is their degradation. In all that is said in the praise of this young man I fully concur. I understand that he graduated at a private school in England; I think it is not a public school. The Senator from Indiana will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. McDONALD. It is not a government school. In a moment I will present the letter from the commander of the training-ship.

Mr. WHYTE. It is the training-ship Worcester.

Mr. ANTHONY. If a young man had graduated with the highest honors at a private naval school in this country would we put him in the Navy; and shall we render to this person a favor for graduating at a foreign school which we would not render to him if he had graduated at a school in our own country? I am exceedingly reluctant to oppose this bill, but I think in the interest of the Navy and for the good of the service the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I quite agree with my colleague. I think the precedent would be a very bad one indeed. We have proper methods by which the young men of our country may enter the Army and the Navy, and I think the course which we have resorted to at times of legislating officers into the Army and the Navy is a very wrong one. Here is a case in point: I have been trying for two years myself to get a young lad appointed as a midshipman at Annapolis whose father I saw fall in action myself. I put him in action and saw him fall. He is as bright a young man as this young man no doubt. He deserves recognition of that kind at the hands of his country; and yet the law which has stopped the President of the United States from making the ten annual appointments at large prevents the President of the United States making an appointment of this young man; and yet we sit here and legislate one who was educated abroad at a private school right into the places to which such young men as I speak of are entitled. It is unfair in any way you look at it. I will not say anything against this young man, and it is certainly with great reluctance that I oppose this action, but I do oppose it and hope that the bill will not pass.

Mr. CHANDLER. As I understand it, Mr. President, it requires eight years on the part of our naval students at Annapolis to attain the position that it is proposed to give to this young man now. After they graduate from that institution they serve as midshipmen, and it requires eight years' service altogether before they become ensigns. Now, sir, you are degrading all the midshipmen that will soon have passed eight years by the appointment of a man who did not pass through your own Naval Academy. I really hope that such a precedent as this will not be set. His being educated abroad I do not look upon as any special qualification for an appointment in our Navy. I think we produce men of equal ability, of equal learning, of equal merit, to those educated abroad, and I hope our own officers will not thus be prevented from obtaining the positions to which they are entitled. I believe the precedent would be bad in every respect. It is a discrimination against our own students in our own country. As I understand, this rank is equivalent to that of first lieutenant in the Army.

Mr. McDONALD. I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read a correspondence relating to this subject.

Mr. TELLER. Before that is read, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Indiana if there is any evidence that this school is a school which exceeds in its scholarship any other private school?

Mr. McDONALD. That is just what I propose to show.

Mr. TELLER. Is there any evidence that this young man has shown ability and scholarship that our own students at the Naval Academy have not attained?

Mr. COCKRELL. Over those of our own school who graduate with the first honors?

Mr. TELLER. It is barely possible that those who graduate away down in the class may be equal in scholarship to this young man.

Mr. McDONALD. I have a copy of a letter addressed to the commandant of the Worcester, the training-ship in which this young man was a student, and also the reply to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that the correspondence he sends to the desk be read. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Copy—Private.]

DEAR SIR: I am requested by a friend in America to make inquiry regarding a certain Spruille Braden, who has been representing himself as a graduate of the training-ship Worcester. This Braden has interested some persons of political influence in the United States by a story that he was offered on leaving the Worcester an appointment as midshipman in the royal navy, but that he declined on the ground of patriotism, and so on, he being an American. He is now attempting to get an appointment in the United States service.

I believe I am correct in saying no such position is ever open to boys from the Worcester, which, as I understand it, is a training school for the merchant service.

I should be very pleased if you could let me know something of this youth's real status, how long he was in the Worcester, his conduct there, and anything else which might go toward putting him in the proper light.

I hope to call on board later myself, but just now I cannot, and as I am anxious to get this information as soon as possible I am forced to write.

And am, very truly yours,

———— — ————.

To the COMMANDING OFFICER of H. M. S. Worcester.

Mr. WHYTE. Who signs the letter?

Mr. McDONALD. That letter has no signature. The answer to that is from the commandant. The letter you will see is an unfriendly one, and I apprehend that the party who sent it was not willing to publish the answer.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Copy—Private.]

H. M. S. WORCESTER, OFF GREENHITHE.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter of the 30th of March, I have much pleasure in giving you the information you desire.

Mr. S. Braden joined the Worcester as a cadet on the 25th of January, 1876, and left on the 15th of August, 1878, taking with him the highest honor that could be obtained from the college, namely, the gold medal given by Her Majesty the Queen. I send you by same post one of annual reports, wherein you will see stated the qualities the boy must possess in order to entitle him to be recommended for it. The head master and myself select five boys who we consider the best in every respect. The names of the five boys who we have selected are put up, when all the cadets who have been on board over six months vote for any one of the five boys they think the best. The boy who obtains the highest number of votes takes the gold medal. You will also notice that her majesty grants to Worcester cadets appointments as midshipmen in the royal naval reserve every year. If you consult the navy list you will see the names of over seventy midshipmen who were trained on board the Worcester. I may add that only cadets from Worcester and Conway have this privilege.

Mr. S. Braden could have had an appointment had he become a naturalized Englishman. It affords me great pleasure to bear testimony to his uniform good conduct during the whole of the time he was with me. In my opinion the United States service will possess a first-rate fellow should they be fortunate enough to decide on giving him an appointment.

I may mention that among the cadets I have the sons of English noblemen, some of them titled and very many from the first English families, (indeed all are the sons of gentlemen,) intended for the merchant service.

I am, dear sir, yours, very truly,

J. H. SMITH, Commander.

Mr. LOGAN. I rise merely to say that I certainly think this is a very bad precedent to establish, and I will state a case myself similar to the one stated by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.]

A few days ago I received a letter from a boy, a very bright one too, in my State, of the name of Ozborn, son of a colonel in the late war who was murdered after returning home, asking to be appointed to the Naval Academy. Of course the same letter was received from the Secretary of the Navy that every one receives, that under the law the appointment could not be made, because recently a law has been passed restricting the power of the President to appoint to the Naval Academy as well as the Military Academy; hence no appointment could be made unless it were made by act of Congress, as is proposed in this bill.

Now, I do protest against this character of appointment in the Naval or Military Academy of the United States. It is not only unfair but it is entirely out of the line of precedents. It is entirely outside of the intention with which persons receive appointments in either of these academies or appointments in the Army or Navy.

Recently a law has been passed—I was very much surprised at it I confess—prohibiting any appointments of officers in the Army of the United States except from persons already in the Army. It prohibits every civilian, no matter what his qualifications may be, from being appointed by the President to the Military or Naval Academy. All civilians are excluded by law from receiving any appointment in the Army at all. This is the law as it stands now—I think a very unjust law, but still it is the law; and as long as that law remains on our statute-book I hope that the Congress of the United States will not by special act place persons that they may select in the Army or Navy. You keep the law as it is in order to prevent the appointments of any persons except those that may be selected by some Senator or Member of Congress to be complimented in this way by special act. The reason that has been given by Congress for prohibiting appointments in the Military and Naval Academy was that there were already too many persons employed in the Army, and too many to fill the lieutenancies necessary in the Army to be appointed; and so of the Navy. Let the law stand until the appointments are made from graduates both of the Military and Naval Academies, until future legislation shall reopen them. But while it so stands I hope we shall not by special act put individuals in the line either of the Army or the Navy.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like the Senator from Indiana to explain and let us know exactly what will be the effect of this bill. How many persons will this bill place Mr. Braden ahead of on the Navy list?

Mr. McDONALD. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that there are eight persons now waiting for vacancies. This authorizes the appointment of Mr. Braden at the foot of the list of ensigns, as an additional ensign.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the chairman of the Naval Com mittee to say that there are only eight midshipmen graduates of the Naval Academy that are waiting for appointments?

Mr. WHYTE. Waiting to be appointed.

Mr. ALLISON. That, I understand, appears from the last Naval Register; but since that time there have been two whole classes of midshipmen graduates, the class of 1877 and the class of 1878, and another class is just about to graduate. Now, these three classes will all be overriden by this ensign, and he will be placed above each and all of them.

Mr. TELLER. How many in the class?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know how many, probably one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty in the three classes.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Iowa will allow me to suggest that it affects every midshipman at the Naval Academy.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BURNSIDE. All that are there now, and all that have received appointments.

Mr. ALLISON. If we make this young man an ensign at the foot of the list of ensigns it places him above one hundred and fifty at least of our own graduates at the Naval Academy who are now in service in the Navy.

Mr. CHANDLER. I noticed by the reading of the letter sent to the desk that this young man has been at this English private school only two years, whereas it requires eight years of close study and careful supervision for a cadet in our Naval Academy to attain the position that you now propose to give this young man, who has spent only two years abroad. It would be, in my opinion, a gross injustice to the last three classes of students at the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

Mr. WHYTE. I will only call the attention of the Senate to the fact that at the very last session they made a man an ensign who had never been in the Naval Academy at all, but had been on an expedition to the Arctic Sea and had rendered himself particularly efficient to the officers of that expedition. He was put at the foot of the ensigns just as it is proposed to put this man. There are but eight persons who now can be appointed ensigns in the Navy. It will take two years of sea service before these other young gentlemen are entitled to stand in a position to be promoted to be ensigns. There are but eight now who could be put in that position if vacancies occurred. If a vacancy occurs to-morrow, the man at the head of the list will get his opportunity. This does not keep him at all from getting the opportunity which he is now awaiting. It only adds one more to the list of ensigns. Glass was appointed at the last session, and I am satisfied if I took the trouble I could find two or three other instances of men who were taken out of the volunteer service and put in the regular line just as this man is proposed to be. This is an extraordinary case, is an exception to the general rule, and a similar case will probably not occur in the life-time of any Senator here. He has been through all the departments of the English training school. He has had as much education and made as thoroughly competent as any young man who could have gone through the Naval Academy in this country. He has cost the Government nothing for his education; and he comes now a thoroughly educated young man and asks to be put at the foot of the list of ensigns, when he refused the honor of the English service because he was patriotic enough to prefer his own country. I think it is a peculiar case, and I shall esteem it an exception to a general rule and vote for it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the honorable chairman of the Naval Committee permit me to ask him the age of this young man? How old is he?

Mr. WHYTE. He is about twenty years of age, the Senator from Indiana says.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am informed that a person cannot enter our naval school until the age of sixteen, and it requires eight years to reach the position here proposed to be given to this young man; that is, at the age of twenty-four a man may become an ensign, which is equivalent to a first lieutenancy in the Army.

I suppose the case cited as a precedent for this was that of one of those men who went on an expedition organized by the Government in search of the North Pole. I think even in that case, although the men came so near death, the precedent was a bad one, and had I been aware of it I should have voted against that as I would against every other. It is a precedent that is bad in every respect; and if we have made one bad precedent under extreme circumstances I hope we shall not follow it and make another under less extreme circumstances.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the Senator from Michigan to say that it takes eight years' service?

Mr. CHANDLER. Eight years to become an ensign.

Mr. COCKRELL. My impression was that it required only six.

Mr. TELLER. Four years in the Academy and four years in service.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know it takes four years at the Naval Academy, but I did not know it required four years' actual service afterward.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator from Missouri will allow me to state that the last twenty on the list of officers in the Navy never served but six years.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand the statement of the Senator from Maryland, there are still eight graduates of 1876 who have not become ensigns.

Mr. WHYTE. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. So that it requires from six to eight years.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then this young man would be placed ahead of the graduates of 1877 who have served now nearly six years; and he would also go ahead of those who will graduate the coming June, and who have been engaged four years in the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

Mr. McDONALD. I cannot exactly understand why these young gentlemen, who are educated at the public expense and who are all very anxious to get these places, should be regarded as so badly treated if a young man on his own merits and without any expense to the Government is placed in a position where he may distinguish himself.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would ask the Senator from Indiana if this young man has seen any sea service?

Mr. McDONALD. He has just seen that service which the education in this training-ship has given him. I do not know that he has been upon any voyage.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same sea service that the cadets at Annapolis receive?

Mr. CHANDLER. Oh, no; they go to sea.

Mr. ANTHONY. But while they are at the Academy?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to have this matter disposed of now while it is up, if it can be. I think it will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent——

Mr. EATON. I think we ought to proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. WHYTE. We can vote now.

Mr. EATON. If there be any further discussion I shall call for the regular order, but I will yield for a vote.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to take any time; but——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair understand the matter. Does the Senator from Connecticut agree to lay aside the unfinished business informally?

Mr. EATON. I have no objection that the bill be laid aside informally for five or ten minutes; but if there is much discussion of this matter I shall call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill can only be proceeded with by unanimous consent or by postponing the regular order.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not wish to postpone it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the regular order will be considered as laid aside informally, and this bill will be proceeded with subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. TELLER. There is nothing in the letter which has been read, and there is nothing in any statement made to the Senate which shows that this man in point of scholarship exceeds any man who has graduated at our Naval Academy. Now, why put him away ahead of those? If he is entitled to anything make him a midshipman and let him take his chances with the rest. While you demand of our graduates service of four years before they get this rank you take him and put him right in it. It must be upon the assumption that the English school far exceeds ours in point of fitting men for this position. I think it is an exceedingly unfair thing to the men who have graduated at our own academy to put him in four years ahead of them.

Mr. COCKRELL. We had a letter written by some person whose name was unknown, which elicited an answer. Since this discussion has been proceeding a publication here in Washington City, known as the Army and Navy Gazette, has been sent to me, and I will ask the Clerk to read an article in that which seems to put in issue the facts stated in that letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A well-known naval officer of high rank in this city, has just received a letter from a lieutenant-commander in the Navy who is now in England, and who has been devoting considerable attention to a careful study of the British system of training-ships.

In this letter referred to he tells at some length of his examinations and inquiries, and the facilities afforded him by the British officers, and incidentally refers to the case of "Spruille Braden, of Indiana," who was heralded throughout the country recently as a fine specimen of an American patriotic youth, who had taken the first honors on board the British training-ship Worcester, and who would have been rewarded with an appointment as midshipman in the royal navy had he not "wrapped the American flag about him" and declined the honor "because he could not take the necessary oath" which severed him from the shelter of the "old flag." It will be remembered, also, that the country was so much thrilled with such an instance of patriotic self-denial that Secretary Thompson immediately provided him with an appointment in the Navy Department, and bills were introduced in Congress to appoint him outright as an ensign in our Navy—a rank which requires eight years of study and sea-service to attain by our own cadets. The bill to appoint Mr. Braden did not pass, which is, perhaps, just as well, viewed in the light of the following information given by Lieutenant-Commander C——:

"I am going down in a few days (London to Plymouth) to look at the Worcester, a training ship, from which, by the way, this young Braden came, who is desirous of an ensign's position. I inquired regarding his case the other day at the admiral's office, (the one who is inspector of the naval reserve,) and was told that three of the, Wooster's, were quarterly selected for appointment to the naval reserve, a purely honorary position, and having about as much to do with the navy as the Pinafore's crew. It was impossible, they impressed upon me, to get an appointment in the navy from the Worcester, which trains boys for the merchant service."

Mr. McDONALD. That article on its face contains an inference which ought not to be found in an article of that kind. It speaks about a communication from Commander C——. Of course Commander C——'s name is not given, but it states, as I heard it, that Commander C—— proposes to go down to Portsmouth to see the Worcester, a place where the Worcester has never been, and he might search around

Portsmouth for a long time before he would find this vessel or anything like it. This article is instigated by that degree of malice and jealousy that you might expect to meet an application of this kind. But as to the documents that I have presented there is no question about their genuineness, none whatever. The letter of the commander of the Worcester speaks for itself, and very clearly sets forth the merits upon which this application is made, and I do not suppose that the Senate will take anonymous communications and ignorant editorials in opposition to it.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not pretend to know much myself about training-ships, but I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Naval Committee whether in our service there is any such thing as a training-ship for officers?

Mr. WHYTE. There are training-ships for boys. The Monongahela is a training-ship; so is the Saratoga.

Mr. LOGAN. But have we any such thing as a training-ship for officers?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not suppose, applying that express language to those vessels that go out every summer, we have; but those vessels are just like the training-ships, precisely the same.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir. What I want to get at is this: we have a class of training-ships, it is true, but I will not say that I am entirely correct, but I think I am partially so at least, when I assert that if the Senator will examine the rules in reference to training-ships he will find that the phrase "training-ships" applies to the class of vessels that train boys to become sailors, and not officers. I think if the Senator will examine he will find that the same class of English training-ships train boys for sailors and not for officers. I examined this question a little once, but not enough to know all about it, hence I do not pretend to know, and I desire information; but I think if the Senator will examine the question he will find that the training-ships of the naval force of this country are training-ships for boys to make sailors and not to make officers of.

Mr. WHYTE. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that there are two classes of training-ships in this country; both of them are not called training-ships, but there are two or three vessels occupied in training boys for the service, not to be officers but to be sailors; and then there is the Constitution, which every year goes to the Naval Academy and is manned by the young cadets for the express purpose of teaching them and training them in seamanship. Every year this vessel goes to sea and takes these boys and they are trained and made sailors of. They act as sailors while they are on their cruise. So in truth it is a training-ship for the young men who are destined to become officers.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not questioning the fact that they get training on the ship; that is not the point; that is not the question; it is in reference to the description of the vessel. As I understand it the vessel that the Senator mentions is a vessel taking the cadets for the purpose of teaching them something about manning a vessel; but that is termed a cruise, which each cadet has to perform in order to qualify himself for being educated at the Academy, in order to qualify himself in reference to matters connected with the navigation of a vessel. But that is a cruise, a working-ship; a training-ship is a very different thing. A training-ship is a vessel kept for the purpose of training boys, and they are taken in our Navy at a certain age and trained for sailors. That is what a training-ship is in the Navy.

Mr. EATON. I think, in order that I may learn the difference between a training-ship and other ships, I had better call for the regular order.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state further in connection with this (and I only suggest it because I do not know that I am posted up entirely in this matter) that, in investigating this subject about training-ships very recently, a boy from Illinois enlisted on one of these training-ships and deserted. He enlisted, thinking and believing that he might after performing a certain number of years of service become an officer in the Navy. He wrote to me in reference to it and I stated to him that I thought he was mistaken. I went then, in order to be certainly correct, and consulted the Secretary of the Navy, and from him I got the information that no person on a training-ship ever became an officer or could be anything but a sailor. That is all the training-ships of our Navy qualify boys for. I got this information from the Navy Department. That is all this young man was.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think this matter had better lie over until to-morrow until we can examine all the papers which have been read. No serious injury will be done by that delay.

Mr. EATON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut calls for the regular order, which is House bill No. 1382.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 67) providing for a new propeller for the United States ship Alarm; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1376) making appropriations for constructing jetties and other works at South Pass, Mississippi River, reported it with an amendment.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary read the bill before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful to bring to, or employ at, any place where a general or special election is being held in a State, any part of the Army or Navy of the United States, unless such force be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to enforce section 4, article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, upon the application of the Legislature or the executive of the State where such force is to be used; and so much of all laws as is inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the measure under consideration this morning leads the discussion back to the subject of the constitutional view of a standing army in the United States and the use that may be made of an army. I think it has always been recognized that there is some distinction in the Constitution in reference to the use that may be made of the standing Army and the use that may be made of the militia of the United States, and that distinction rests upon very proper ground. The framers of the Constitution of the United States understood perfectly well, after having investigated this subject in the light of the history of their own affairs as presented at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, that there was a distinction proper to be made between the use of the standing Army of the United States and the use of the militia. That distinction ought not to be lost sight of. The people who framed the Constitution had some acquaintance with the subject of a standing army; they understood that there were reasons why they had a right to fear the use that might be made of mercenary troops, hirelings. The Hessians had been here, the hireling soldiers of the British Crown had been here, and their ravages through this country, not only during the period of the revolutionary war, but before that time, had taught the people of the colonies that that was a dangerous element in government, and something that ought to be controlled by strong and unmistakable provisions of constitutional law. So when they came to form their Government they very carefully and very diligently introduced into their Constitution those provisions which then and still draw a line of demarcation between the use of the militia and the use of the standing Army that we are not permitted to forget or overlook.

In the use of the powers of coercion or powers of redress, if you please to call them such, which we make of the armed forces of the United States, the distinction ought always to be carefully observed, and we ought not to inflict upon the people of the States that sort of coercive military power which has no responsibility whatever to the country. We should not attempt, whenever we have a case of necessity for the use of military power in this country, to enforce the laws of the country, to use hireling troops and men who are not responsible to the great body of society; but we should in that event, as we do in every other event, employ those forces which belong to the body of the people, men who have some sort of social responsibility. They should be not mercenaries or hirelings, but those who belong in the body of society and who acknowledge responsibility to the duties of citizenship.

The question which is presented upon the bill now before the Senate is the same in substance, though not in form, with that which passed the Senate a few days ago. The enactment that was then passed through the House of Representatives and through the Senate was destroyed by the President's veto. I say "destroyed," because the President exercised the power of repression against the legislation of the people of the United States, against the Congress of the United States, which broke down the measure that the people, through their representatives, saw proper to pass.

Mr. President, the measure which is presented to the Senate and which has passed the House of Representatives, is, in its effect upon the condition of this country and upon the power of the Executive to use the Army of the United States, precisely the same that was passed through both Houses of Congress and which has fallen under the disapproval of the President. I believe that it can be demonstrated from the arguments of Senators made on that occasion, and notably the argument of the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] that there was no difficulty worthy of attention in the form in which the question was then presented.

The real trouble then, as I suppose, the real trouble now is in the question itself, and not in the form of its presentation, the question being simply and plainly this: Has the President the right to have and provide troops at the polls at the time of election? Has the President of the United States the right beforehand to bring in troops of the standing army or the militia, and assemble them at the polls at the time of election? Shall he marshal them there, shall he assemble them there, shall he by way of anticipation order them to be there? Shall he so provide as that they shall be there? Can he in the exercise of his powers as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, bring the military force of the country at the polls upon an order made by him beforehand for the purpose, to do any thing, whether it be to keep the peace, whether it be to control elections, or whether it be for any other purpose? That is the question.

Is there no sanctity about this right of American freemen to exercise their suffrage; which is the great motive power of this Government, and without which this Government takes no step whatsoever? Is that power in the hands of the people subject to the control of the President of the United States?

All British history is at fault if this is a doctrine that the Government of the United States incorporated into our Constitution by adoption from that of England. There was no such doctrine in the British government after the people of that country once got their minds to acting and their hearts to beating and their arms to work for the purpose of controlling the prerogative of the King in that behalf; for they tore it up, root and branch, and they left not one vestige of it. The King did oftentimes attempt to encroach upon their rights in the exercise of his prerogative, or what he claimed to be his prerogative, but the people of Great Britain tore it down and trampled it in the dust. We surely have lived to very little purpose for more than a century since we declared our independence of that country if now we find ourselves embarrassed with a power in the hands of the President of the United States that more than two hundred years ago was taken out of the hands of the King of England. We are in a most lamentable condition of independence if we are to-day more subjected to the power of the President of the United States than the people of Great Britain are subject to the power of the Crown. We have not gained much by our independence if the President of the United States in command of the Army of the United States has more power than the King of Great Britain.

The President of the United States, in the veto message which he has recently sent to the House of Representatives, stood chiefly, as I understand, on the form in which the question came before him. We are informed in the message of the President that a measure which embodies such legislation as is found in this bill, if it is put as a rider on an appropriation bill, would not be permitted to become a law as it could under the Constitution without his express approval. The President of the United States thus assumes to be a part of the legislative power of the country. I have never been able so to consider his jurisdiction. Laws enacted by the Parliament of Great Britain, from which government we have derived in part our system of legislation, are enacted by and with the advice and consent of the King; and no law is passed in Great Britain that does not contain a petition to the King that he will consent that it shall become a law. All laws are enacted there by and with the advice and consent of the King. We here enact laws under the Constitution of the United States, not by and with the advice and consent of the President, but in the name of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled; and no law is passed here that either in its preamble or enacting clause, or anywhere else, contains the slightest trace of a petition to the President of the United States. All laws here are enacted under the Constitution by the people through their representatives in these two Houses.

I think it is worthy of attention that in framing the Constitution of the United States, in full view of the prerogative powers of the King of Great Britain, when we were transferring to the President of the United States such powers as our people thought he ought legitimately to exercise, we enabled him to decline to approve laws, we enabled him to say, "I will withhold my consent, not expressing approval or disapproval; I will keep this act under consideration for ten days, and when I have expressed no opinion upon it within that period it becomes a law." Who participates in that sort of legislation? Who can say that in that event the President of the United States is a part of the legislative power of this country? It was never intended that he should be a part of the legislative power of this country. It was intended that he should have a qualified right of prohibition on the passage of a law; but it was never intended that he should be a part of the legislative power of this land.

He sent to the House his veto of the Army bill for a reason to which I have adverted. And now we seek his pleasure! I am willing to advise with him and take his counsel. I do not deny his authority or his power or his right as far as it constitutionally extends, and I am willing to do all that we can do for the purpose of carrying on this Government under the control of the people of the United States, but I am not willing to break down their authority or the authority of their representatives. I acknowledge my responsibility to them, and the President of the United States is just as much responsible to them as I am; and when they in a constitutional way express their views about the proper policy to be observed in this country upon any question, and more especially in reference to the use of the standing Army of the United States, I cannot persuade myself that their judgment ought not to be the law of the land. If their judgment is prevented from becoming the law of the land in the form in which the Congress of the United States has constitutionally expressed it, it becomes the duty of Congress to express it in some other form which will be agreeable to the Chief Executive of this nation. We have no right to destroy the Government upon a mere question of comity between the executive department and the legislative department.

When the President says he cannot go with us in the form in which we present this legislation, it becomes a duty that we owe to ourselves, our constituents—not a duty that we owe to the Executive—that we should carry this Government along in the exercise of its legitimate and constitutional functions and powers.

I will say here now that whenever I get my mind made up that this Government ought to stop, that we ought to resort to a different system, and revolutionize it, I will vote against the appropriation of any money for the purpose of carrying on the Government. There are legitimate objects of government specified in the Constitution—the carrying on of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments. Those are the three great departments of this Government, and there are none others. When you come to the question of keeping a standing army that is a different matter, for in the Constitution there is no standing army provided for. On the contrary, there is a provision that there shall be no standing army unless the Congress of the United States shall at least once in every two years provide for its existence. The power of the Constitution in reference to the standing Army is precisely the reverse of the power in reference to the judiciary, the legislature, and the executive. The judicial, the legislative, and the executive departments are to be carried on, but when you come to consult the Constitution of the United States you find that the Army is not to be sustained, not to be provided for, unless Congress at least once in every two years shall renew its action for the purpose of keeping it alive. That is a position which I think the Senate should consider. It is one entirely in harmony with the purpose of this Government. It is one that entered into the consideration of the framers of the Constitution when they adopted it; one that has never been lost sight of from that moment to this.

I proceed to consider the veto message which has been sent to the House of Representatives. We have not receded from our course on that bill. We have not found occasion to abandon any position we have voluntarily taken on this subject. We felt that we were forced to the position we have recently occupied on this subject of putting this rider, as it is called by the President, on this appropriation bill by the action of the republican party in the Senate of the United States. They had determined and demanded that there should be no legislation for the purpose of relieving elections in the United States from the influence and control of the Army. That was our view of the situation, and it is our view yet. The President has availed himself of an objection for which we think there is no substantial foundation in fact to send the bill back to the House of Representatives, and when there was not power enough in the House to pass the bill notwithstanding his objections, we thought and we yet think that it is our duty to come forward and present to him the clear and distinct and unmistakable proposition that he has no right as President of the United States to use the Army at the polls unless it be under the Constitution of the United States and in obedience to the requirements of that instrument as is therein expressed.

The honorable Senator from New York has conceded our right to pass the bill in the form in which it was prepared without the slightest violation of our constitutional duty.

In his message vetoing the Army bill, the President, speaking of the Federal election laws, says:

> They should, if possible, be so non-partisan and fair in their operation that the minority—the party out of power—will have no just grounds to complain. The present laws have, in practice, unquestionably conduced to the prevention of fraud and violence at the elections. In several of the States, members of different political parties have applied for the safeguards which they furnish. It is the right and duty of the National Government to enact and enforce laws which will secure free and fair congressional elections. The laws now in force should not be repealed except in connection with the enactment of measures which will better accomplish that important end.

This declaration of the President of the United States reaches to the very bottom of this whole subject. First he declares that the laws which are now in existence, including the use of the Army, have been greatly beneficial to the security of free and fair elections in the different States of the Union. I have no personal experience on that subject except that which relates to the State of Alabama, and I say in reference to that State that these laws have been used both by a former President of the United States and by those acting under his authority for the purpose of preventing free, full, and fair elections.

But we in the South have outlived the fear of these laws, we have escaped from them. We have not done it by resisting the Army; we have not done it by attempting to interfere with the powers which have been exercised under the laws as they exist in controlling elections; but we have done it by an appeal to that sentiment in reference to free elections which to-day is the strongest, the most powerful sentiment among the people of the Northern States. We point the people to the Army and say, "Behold the men who control the elections! Observe your masters! See with what power they attempt to execute their will and pleasure upon the elections in this country!" The unification and solidity which is so much deprecated has resulted more from the use of the Army at the polls in the South than from any other cause. We have passed through our day of trial. You have solidified us. You have compelled us by this unconstitutional exercise of power to stand together like a phalanx in opposition to the power of the Army used at the polls.

This question comes now as a question for the North as well as for the South. This matter has not been urged by the democrats of the South. We have stood by and have witnessed the visitation of this wrong upon the people of the North, who now begin to cry out against it, and we say to them, "We will sustain you so far as the Constitution of the United States will sustain us. We will do whatever you think is necessary and proper to be done as far as we can see our way under the Constitution. These same wrongs have been done us, which we had the right to complain of, if indeed we had the right to complain of anything that we now hear you complaining of; we accept your statements, we acknowledge the justice of your complainings, and we mean to stand by you."

Mr. President, whether this line of executive action taken by the President of the United States in his veto message has been adopted from a new and sudden inspiration of duty on the part of the President or whether he has been driven into it by his party is a matter of not much consequence to the Senate. He declares his opposition to all legislation that deals with anything in the nature of reform of abuses when it is incorporated into appropriation bills. The doctrine has been asserted here that the people have no right in an appropriation bill to complain of abuses or to reform abuses. The doctrine is asserted that if abuses exist, whether in the unauthorized exercise of power by the Executive, or in the passage of unconstitutional laws by Congress, or whether they be in the improper exercise of the powers of command over the Army, these abuses must not be rectified on appropriation bills. You may pass other laws to rectify abuses. You can go into any subject that seems to inflict wrong upon the people of this country, but you must not put enactments relating to them on appropriation bills. If you do, some man will rise in the House or in the Senate and proclaim his opinion, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] did, that such matters could not be incorporated in an appropriation bill without an attempt to revolutionize the Government. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] informed the Senate, very correctly, too, that we had a perfect right, a right that had long been exercised, to put the redress of grievances or the repeal of unjust laws upon appropriation bills. The people of the United States, acting through their representatives in the two Houses, are not limited by the Constitution to a particular method for the redress of abuses. They have just as much right to say that abuses shall be redressed on appropriation bills as on any other kind of bills. After the honorable Senator from New York had conceded the proposition and argued it so ably before the Senate, I wonder the President of the United States should find himself at liberty to take a different ground.

The President puts his veto on the ground also that it is necessary for him to protect the Senate of the United States against the aggressions of the House. That is a new role for a President. He ought to come here and advise us on the floor. He ought to assemble his council in his chamber, which is here close to the Senate, and admonish us in regard to what our rights, duties, and privileges are, and tell us in advance, as he has done not only upon the Army appropriation bill which we passed, but with reference to another which is to come, that it is his duty to protect the Senate against the encroachments of the House. I say that is a new role for a President. I say that that is the dipping of his hand into matters of legislation that the Constitution forbids him to touch, and he should withhold it. The necessity of the protection which he offers to the Senate would have been much more obvious if this body had not voted down all amendments to the House bill and if it had not passed the bill with marked cheerfulness and alacrity.

After the Senate of the United States by a considerable majority concurred with the House in the passage of that measure, and after honorable Senators who have had years of experience here expressed themselves on this floor in favor of the proposition that it was legitimate legislation and in a constitutional form, for the President of the United States to say that he wants to protect the Senate against the House and must do it with his veto looks to me a little presumptuous.

Suppose that we in the Senate should undertake to protect the probity and honor of the presidential office by refusing to consent to nominations sent to us that have been made on the demand of republican leaders as rewards, promised in advance, for the felony that they were designed to procure in the corruption of elections by returning boards in different States. The Senate, perhaps, in that action could do a better service for the Chief Executive than that officer could do to the Senate by the proffered protection of his veto against the encroachments of the House. I do not say that we ought ever to be tempted to do a thing of that kind, but retributive justice would be most splendidly illustrated if we should say to him that you shall not, with our advice and consent, reward the men who have seated you in the presidential chair, when we know that the action of those men was deeply dyed with fraud, and when we are impressed with the conviction that the action of the President in appointing them was at least marked with suspicion.

The President states in his veto message that the practice of tacking to appropriation bills measures not pertinent to such bills did not prevail for more than forty years after the adoption of the Constitution. He further states that it has been a common practice since that time; that all parties when in power have adopted this practice. Not for forty years, the President says, was there any rider put upon an appropriation bill. But there have been a great many years besides forty that this Government has existed, and during the remainder of that time he said that all parties have united in putting these riders upon appropriation bills. He might have added that when he was a member of the House from Ohio he never raised his voice to object when his party desired to put a rider on an appropriation bill which this whole country understood had no other purpose than to advance the interests of a political party. If he ever cast a vote contrary or in opposition to such a bill, I have not been able to find it.

Upon the very bill which he vetoed several new and very important provisions are found. Among others there was a provision entirely novel in its character, the constitutionality of which is questionable and was very seriously debated in the Senate; in reference to the power of Congress to confer upon railroad companies corporate franchises as telegraph companies and, the right to make connections one with another; to have the power of transmitting messages throughout the country; and the power of Congress to impose upon these railroad companies rates of fare for the delivery of messages between private individuals. But this telegraph business and other new features of legislation did not have any immediate connection with the destinies of the republican party. The vigilant President of the United States discovered nothing in the bill that was new or irregular except that which related to the destiny of his party.

On the 18th of June, 1878, he approved an Army appropriation bill which contains the section which I am about to read, and which he boasts of as being a section that removes all difficulty from the entire subject of the use of the Army at elections, and on what ground does he put it? That the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States unanimously, or almost unanimously, passed the bill. If he found a constitutional objection to this last Army appropriation bill which he vetoed, he ought to have found the same constitutional objection to the Army bill of last year which he approved, and which contained a provision which he now says shuts off the use of the Army as a posse comitatus, and denies to the President of the United States the power, except under the express provisions of statutes or under the express provisions of the Constitution of the United States, to use the Army in a manner far less objectionable than he may do under the law that is sought to be repealed.

I read the provision in the Army appropriation bill of last year to which I refer:

SEC. 15. From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States, as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress; and no money appropriated by this act shall be used to pay any of the expenses incurred in the employment of any troops in violation of this section, and any person willfully violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The President of the United States approved that measure on an Army appropriation bill. I ask any Senator how the President can find a just ground of objection to the limitations against the use of the Army at the election polls, when he has approved a bill which prescribes that he shall not use it as a posse comitatus except in cases expressly authorized by law or the Constitution? The use of the Army of the United States at the election polls under the act sought to be repealed in the bill that he vetoed was a discretionary use. The use of the posse comitatus was equally under that law a discretionary use. Congress at its last session limited his discretion and confined it to those cases where the statute gave him express authority or where the Constitution gave him express authority to use the Army to keep the peace. Now, when we send him an appropriation bill for this same Army, and we curtail further his power to use the Army in this discretionary manner, he says he cannot find it in his conscience to approve it.

At that time the House of Representatives was democratic; the Senate was republican; both Houses now happen to be democratic; and we passed a bill that in its nature is identical, a bill which puts a restraint upon the power of the President to use the Army of the United States, and now that the two Houses are in accord he says that cannot be done. How are we to account for this? There is but one reason that can be assigned for it. Whereas the two Houses were formerly divided in opinion between the different parties in the country and now they are united, the President feels it incumbent upon himself to represent in the use of his veto not the wishes of the people, not the power of the people or the rights of the people, but to represent the republican party. If there is a man living who can account for it on different ground I would indeed be glad to hear him. There is not one man in the United States who will be able to say that if section 15, which I have just read, is not "altogether foreign to the purposes of an Army appropriation bill," to quote the language of the President, the sixth section of the appropriation bill which he returned to the House is altogether foreign to the purposes of an Army appropriation bill. Mr. President, this will not do. It will not do anywhere that men have got the power of thought and feel the responsibilities of action; for if the power was exercised in the one bill equally it was exercised in the other, and no man can deny it. I regret that the President of the United States ever found it necessary to cover himself with such a small patch of artifice as that.

The President in justice to himself, as a relief from the evident embarrassment in the logic of the situation, should have stated also that the party in power for the last twenty years, which he says has always done such things, is not now in power, and this long-needed reformation has been deferred until it should cease to make profit by this vicious course of legislation. As soon as his party which had used this power ad libitum found that it was no longer in power, it demanded and compelled obedience to its behests so as to change a course of practice which they have indulged in according to his own admission for twenty years without objection, for the purpose simply, as I allege, of obstructing the march of democratic power and influence in this country.

That is the situation. I deplore it, but still it is true. This country is not going to shut its eyes to the truth. There are millions of thinking men in this land outside of the House of Representatives, outside of the Senate, outside of the Executive Mansion who understand questions when they are presented and weigh facts when they are brought to their attention, who will exercise the power and right of passing judgment upon these things; and in their own way and in their own time they will rebuke this pretense.

It would have been in point and most apposite also in the veto message if the President had re-enforced his suggestions by reference to the case of the man who was advised to pluck the beam from his own eye that he might the better see how to remove the mote from his brother's eye. That would have been good authority, a high case in point, but it was overlooked.

If this point of the message means anything more than a blind to conceal the real point on which the veto was based, it is a pretentious assertion that the democratic party in Congress is not to be permitted to employ those methods of legislation that all parties have used for sixty years, and in which the President has participated both as President and at least tacitly as a member of Congress.

Mr. President, there is but one other point remaining in the veto message and that is based upon a misstatement of fact with reference to the purpose and effect of the words "or to keep the peace at the polls," in sections 2002 and 5528 of the Revised Statutes. The misstatement of fact in reference to this repeal is in the following language; that it "will deprive the civil authorities of the United States of all power to keep the peace at the congressional elections." That argument was made by the Senator from New York, as I will presently proceed to show. When I call it a misstatement of fact I refer to it as a misunderstanding of the effect of the statute. I am very sorry that the honorable Senator from New York got himself into an unfortunate position on this subject, and that per consequence the President was also misled. I am sorry that this great motive power of the republican party having switched on the wrong track dragged the Executive and everything else along with him. The misstatement of the purpose of the enactment is in these words:

> The intent and effect of the sixth section of this bill is to prohibit all the civil officers of the United States, under penalty of fine and imprisonment, from employing any adequate civil force for this purpose at the place where their enforcement is most necessary, namely, at the places where the congressional elections are held.

I think that it is impossible that there could be misunderstanding upon this question, but I will not delay at this point of my argument to discuss that; I will discuss it a little further on. But the imputation of improper motives to the members of the House of Representatives and the Senate I must say, with due deference to the President, is extremely indecorous. I do not remember an instance that has ever before occurred where a President of the United States imputed to the Congress of this country a disposition to break down the laws, a disposition to do wrong, a disposition to violate their constitutional obligations. We have come to a perilous pass when a President feels himself called upon to censure these two great bodies in reference to their motives in the passage of laws which they conceive to be essential to the preservation of the liberties of the people of this country. I will not advert to the peculiar position which the President occupies with a view to derogate from his utterances anything of the authority which properly belongs to any man, from Washington to the present day, who has filled the executive chair; and yet, when the people come to weigh the question between their representatives in the House and in the Senate and the President of the United States, probably it will not be possible to prevent them from a consideration of the question whether he is the man to impugn the motives of anybody. That is a matter for the President and the people. The people have a right quadrennially to speak to the President and of the President, to elect a President, and when they come to exercise their lofty powers and sovereignty in this regard perhaps they may find it necessary and convenient also to look deep down into this question and see whether or not this imputation comes from a source that it ought to come from, and whether there is the slightest ground for it in fact. I leave him and his imputations where they belong. He may urge them against the Senate of the United States, but if he were Andrew Jackson, or John Adams, or Thomas Jefferson, or George Washington, he could not get the people of the United States to believe it.

I object, Mr. President, and I think that every Senator on this floor would object, to the right of the President of the United States to say that the House of Representatives by the enactment of this law meant that they would tear down the guarantees which have been erected for the purpose of securing fair elections at the polls. If he believed it, if he could prove it, if he could establish it, it would be the most indecorous thing that a man ever said in the world to charge such motives upon a co-ordinate department of this Government in the enactment of a law.

Inasmuch as he has made this accusation against us, and inasmuch as it is now in our power to vindicate ourselves before the living world and posterity, I propose that we will pass this bill and leave him without the slightest ground to justify these imputations, and then we will see whether he will do the Senate and the House of Representatives the justice to say, "I was mistaken when I imputed to you a base motive in the passage of this law."

I would take from him every pretext for denying the people the right to have free elections, free from the interference of the Army under any circumstances, free from the interference of armed bands of men prepared beforehand and brought to the polls for any purposes whatsoever.

Why does the President demand that this power to use the Army shall be left in his hands? What use is he going to make of it? Why will he not give it up? Why will he hold to it with the tenacity of life? He says it has been several years since there was any necessity for using troops anywhere at elections in the States. He says that the law as it stood, which we are seeking now to repeal, was brutum fulmen; that it amounted to nothing; that there was actually no use for it; that it has been a long time since any use was made of it, and that he himself was the leader in the programme of withdrawing troops from all interference with elections and Legislatures in the States. There is no necessity, says the President, for it in actual practice. Then, I ask, why do you hold to it with such tenacity?

What use do you expect to make of it in the future? If there was no necessity for it in the past, if there is no necessity for it in the present, if it appears that the occasions which might once have justified its exercise have passed away, then why do you hold to it? That is a question that the people of the United States will require the President of the United States to answer. He must have a motive, a powerful motive, a motive that is so strong that he cannot resist the influence of it? Holding to the power of keeping the troops at the election polls means this, Mr. President: Troops were used in elections heretofore. Troops have been used advantageously in the decision of questions in the Congress of the United States as well as in different Legislatures of the States. Troops have been marshaled around this Capitol, guns have been placed where they could be trained upon it; and a time will come perhaps when the President may find it necessary to use them in order to seat his successor. He was seated by such influences, by the reversal of the judgment of the people expressed at the ballot-box, by the tearing down of the power of the electoral colleges, by the reversal of the power of two hundred and fifty thousand majority out of eight millions of votes. These troops have been used heretofore for purposes like this, and the President does not know but it may become necessary for him to use them again.

This bill, separated from all else, standing alone, containing every guard the Constitution of the United States has provided on this subject, will give the President of the United States a fair opportunity to say why it is that he intends to command the troops at the polls. Does he say in his veto message, while he is arguing against the power of Congress to pass the measures in the form in which they were presented, "I am willing to give up the use and control of these troops and my command over them at the polls?" No, never. There is not an intimation of that kind. While he admits that there is no necessity for them he never intimates that he intends to give them up. That point is not in the message. On the contrary, all that is in the message is directly to the reverse of that proposition. He intends to hold the troops at the polls, provided always that he can get his friends in his party to stand by him. He wants men who need not be citizens of the United States to be in the Army, men who are not required when they are sworn in under their enlistment even to take an oath that they will obey the Constitution of the United States but whose oath is to obey the commands of their superior officers. That is the oath they take. We take an oath to obey the Constitution of the United States.

The President of the United States holds to this military power to keep the peace at the polls. A most remarkable application of the executive power. In all the history of all the governments we know anything about, except those of thorough despotism, thorough absolutism, we have never yet found a record of the ruling of a court, a precedent of any kind through which the judiciary relied upon the army for the purpose of keeping the peace. Has the army of Great Britain, the standing army, the Queen's guards, the great regiments that have such high historical renown ever been used for such a purpose? If you were to tell an Englishman that a regiment or a soldier or an officer of the army of Great Britain, or of the navy of Great Britain was a peace officer, he would laugh at you. He would wonder what sort of an idea you had of the absolutism of that monarchy. Come to the United States and you find in this Government that boasts of its freedom the commanding-general of the United States Army, or a colonel of a regiment, a captain of a company, a sergeant of a guard, or the corporal of a squad made by law a peace officer! He is endowed, under our splendid system of free government, with the powers of a peace officer to keep the peace at the polls. To keep the peace by force of arms. I suppose there never before was heard such a proposition as that.

Mr. President, this is indeed the sword of Damocles suspended by a hair. In this case the hair is an attenuated suspicion of the President that in some circumstances there may be a possibility of a civil officer of the United States not being able to execute a peace warrant, for which there is no provision of law, at a polling place, if he were denied the use of armed force to be present in case of need. This feature is not in the bill, it is a misconstruction. Here are the American people through their representatives declaring against this, trying to forbid the use of troops at elections. Their representatives pass the law repealing this authority to use troops; the President of the United States says, "You shall not repeal it; you put the sword in my hands and I intend to use it at my will and pleasure whenever and wherever I consider it necessary to do so." The people of the United States know this truth, they feel it. It is burned into their hearts, and they will never consent that this power shall be retained in the hands of any President, it makes no difference who he may be, while they have the power to vote and by their votes to withdraw the sword from his hand for such purposes.

The President's message is more directed to a review of the democratic party than to the grave questions with which such a paper should deal. It attempts to commit the majority here by utterances extracted in terms from speeches of distinguished Senators in debate The other House is likewise cornered by like quotations. I refer to this as a novelty. It certainly is very curious that the President of the United States in order to justify a veto message should appeal to speeches made by his political opponents in the Senate and in the House, and should quote from those speeches in his message.

I shall expect hereafter that if some one in the House of Representatives or the Senate should sneeze, the presidential mansion and the executive Cabinet will be convulsed. I suppose the first utterance that is made hereafter by these very distinguished gentlemen, (and indeed they are very distinguished and very worthy of their distinction,) which shall have the slightest influence upon the presidential mind, we shall have the Army called in.

The President of the United States found in the great speech of the Senator from New York authority for the following expressions in his veto message:

> The various Departments of the Government, and the Army and Navy, are established by the Constitution, or by laws passed in pursuance thereof. Their duties are clearly defined, and their support is carefully provided for by law. The money required for this purpose has been collected from the people, and is now in the Treasury, ready to be paid out as soon as the appropriation bills are passed. Whether appropriations are made or not the collection of the taxes will go on. The public money will accumulate in the Treasury. It was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution that any single branch of the Government should have the power to dictate conditions upon which this treasure should be applied to the purpose for which it was collected. Any such intention, if it had been entertained, would have been plainly expressed in the Constitution.

The honorable Senator from New York advanced this doctrine in his speech on the Army appropriation bill, and I infer that the President of the United States, by some new inspiration which I think would be to his advantage on many occasions, has chosen to adopt the ideas of the Senator. But it is not correct in point of logic or of constitutional law to say that the moneys of the United States, collected under the laws thereof, were collected with reference to their being expended for any special purpose. There are some permanent appropriations fixed by law; very few indeed, because it has been the policy of our Government from its inauguration that the appropriations should not be made permanent, but that they should recur annually, and that the people should always have in their power the right to express their judgment upon the necessity of the appropriations. Is there a dollar in the Treasury of the United States that the Army can go with its bayonets and lay its hands upon? If the money was collected to support the Army, why cannot the Army get it? Ah, it is a statement that is not borne out by the fact or the law. The fact is the other way. The revenues of this country are collected from the people for the general purposes of government, but when you come to assert the proposition that the Army has an interest in the Treasury for the payment of its soldiery and its officers and the maintenance of its power, you run directly in the face of the Constitution of the United States. Our Constitution most wisely, most emphatically, provided just the reverse rule, that there is no money collected in this country for the purpose of sustaining the Army and no money can be collected to sustain the Army for more than two years at a time. A standing army was a subject upon which the framers of this Constitution had great doubt. They would not consent that there should be a standing army at all until a provision was put in the Constitution which required that the Congress of the United States should renew the Army once at least every two years. Here we are met with the declaration of the President of the United States that the money in the Treasury was collected for the purpose of sustaining the Army. I say that that is an unconstitutional declaration; I say that that is a declaration antagonistical to the whole theory of the Government in reference to a standing army. I say, when the President of the United States ventures on the assertion that the money in the Treasury of the United States was collected to sustain the Army and support the Army, he declares in his own favor, he being the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, a doctrine of absolutism, independent of constitutional restraint and restrictions, and makes himself the absolute arbiter of the destiny of this country. There cannot be anything plainer.

Here comes the pinch of the case; here comes the essence of the whole controversy; here is the great point where we divide; and the democrats stand on the side of the Constitution, the republicans on the other side. We say there is not a dollar of money in the Treasury collected for the purpose of paying a standing army; we announce that no standing army can be maintained in this country unless the people through their representatives once every two years renew its authority and reanimate it with life. The Army dies as certainly as a man does when he comes to the end of his appointed days unless the Congress of the United States shall keep up and revive it. In England it dies at the end of each year; it requires the mutiny act to be re-enacted at every session of Parliament or once every year to keep that army alive. We made an enormous concession when we came to make our Constitution and said it could live two years. But Mr. Madison, Mr. Hamilton, and all the great expounders of the Constitution, who were the contemporaries of the origination of that instrument and who had a hand in its making, claimed as one of the chief and essential virtues of the instrument that it forbade an army to be fastened upon the country unless the people should give it their assent expressly at least once every two years. There is the difference between us. That is very clear. The people of the United States are not going to misunderstand that. They will see in the veto message the claim by the President of the United States that unless the people vote the money to sustain the Army he will find some means to provide for it, he will do with it as he will at the polls, and when we come to offer him money to sustain it upon condition that he shall make no unconstitutional and improper use of it he says, "I will not have it; I will not take it; the money is in the Treasury; the people have put it there for the purpose." What else could he say except that "I may use it?" Ah, sir, there is the real point of that message. It is there; the money has been collected from the people for a prescribed purpose and is in the Treasury. One of the purposes is to sustain a standing army, says the President; one of the uses of the standing Army is to control elections. I mean to control the elections as far as I think in my discretion it is proper to do it by the agency and authority of this Army. The money is there to pay it, the people have paid it for that purpose, and if you do not choose to appropriate it I will see what else can be done. That is it.

I fear that the President of the United States has been greatly misled by the honorable Senator from New York; for his argument was very able and very ingenious, and was calculated to mislead almost any one. I felt very greatly gratified as one member of the Senate at the—shall I say reconciliation, restoration, pacification, it makes no difference what precise word may be used, between the distinguished Senator and the President.

This pleasing spectacle of this newly discovered relationship between the honorable Senator from New York and the President of the United States is touching, while it is instructive. Now, in very truth the Antipholus of Fremont may exclaim as the Dromio of Utica approaches:

> Here comes the almanac of my true date,—
> What now? How chance, thou art return'd so soon?

And Dromio of Utica respond:

> Return'd so soon! rather approach'd too late:
> The capon burns, the pig falls from the spit;
> The clock has strucken twelve upon the bell,
> My mistress made it one upon my cheek:
> She is so hot, because the meat is cold.

The republican party is, indeed, a cruel mistress to exact a service like this from her faithful Dromio of Utica. To bring the figure a little more closely to the fact, this Dromio of Utica knew full well that the true Antipholus, the husband of the house, had been bolted out, and that he of Fremont was a rank stranger to the honors and good cheer he is so ready to embrace; but the mistress was imperious, and in such emergency any Antipholus would answer. Poor Dromio gets all the buffeting:

> Fie, fie! how wayward is this foolish love,
> That, like a testy babe, will scratch the nurse,
> And presently, all humbled, kiss the rod!

The gently blending harmony of opinion and sentiment between the honorable Senator and the President are beautifully conveyed in the recent speech of the Senator and in its echo, the veto message.

To understand the veto message one must study the speech of the honorable Senator from New York. As the veto is the subject I wish chiefly to speak to, I will go to the speech of the Senator from New York and there seek its inspiration, its logic, and its rhetoric, faintly re-echoed in the veto.

I will start the inquiry at its fountain-spring and try to follow it through its dazzling, rushing, vaporous course until it loses all current in the muddy level of the presidential veto message. In the discussion of that bill the Senator from New York held that in its form and the manner of bringing it forth the bill was constitutional. Here is the difference between the President and the Senator. But after the Senator had said it was constitutional the President did not venture to say it was not, and I felt grieved that he had so embarrassed the Executive of the United States as that he did not leave him free to say that, for that is what he tried to say, and exactly what he meant. The Senator said:

> With somewhat of monotonous and ostentatious iteration we have been asked whether incorporating general legislation in appropriation bills is revolution, or revolutionary? No one in my hearing has ever so contended.
> Each House is empowered by the Constitution to make rules governing the modes of its own procedure. The rules permitting, I know of nothing except convenience, common sense, and the danger of log-rolling combinations, which forbids putting all the appropriations into one bill, and in the same bill, all the revenue laws, a provision admitting a State into the Union, another paying a pension to a widow, and another changing the name of a steamboat. The votes and the executive approval which would make one of these provisions a law, would make them all a law. The proceeding would be outlandish, but it would not violate the Constitution.

As to its being "outlandish," the criticism of that Senator is hard to answer; because I do not know how the Senate or House of Representatives could do an outlandish thing. I suppose it means out of fashion. That would not do, because it has been the fashion of the republican party, as the President tells us, for many, many years, and of the democratic party also. Well, is it scandalous? Perhaps it might be so treated. Still I think no Senator on the other side would venture to say it was that for fear he might scandalize himself, for they have all voted for just such measures and upon just such bills. Well, it is hardly worth while to spend any time on the question whether the measure be "outlandish" or not; it makes no difference whether it is outlandish or not. If that word has any signification in reference to the criticism of a law or an act of Congress, I do not understand it. Again:

A Senator might vote against such a huddle of incongruities, although separately he would approve each one of them. If, however, they passed both Houses in a bunch, and the Executive found no objection to any feature of the bill on its merits, and the only criticism should be that it would have been better legislative practice to divide it into separate enactments, it is not easy to see on what ground a veto could stand.

I cannot see it, and the honorable Senator from New York cannot see it, and what he cannot see is not visible to mortal eye. Now, this is a very important concession to the people of this country that they have passed a law which in form is constitutional, and that by a decided majority in both Houses they made a demand on the President of the United States that he withhold the sword from the control of elections, and we have the authority of the honorable Senator from New York that in this there is no unconstitutionality, and nothing but a little outlandishness. We are a sort of outlandish people, you know—democrats particularly. They are not particularly well gotten up, nicely arranged, or thoroughly perfumed, and sometimes the democrats in this country do outlandish things, but they do them in the name of the great enacting power of this land as the rightful agents under the Constitution for giving law to all the departments of this Government. Every year, every two years, every four years, and not longer than that, these "outlandish" people who do these "outlandish" things go to their places of voting and there they put in their ballot-box that power which moves this Government as the steam-power does a locomotive, and without which it cannot move at all. There is the exercise of the grand sovereignty of this country; there is where the power to move it starts; there is that which distinguishes it from all governments in the world, making it more sublime in its capacities and powers, more direct in its action, more free in its dealing with the people. The power of government of this country is absolute in the people under the Constitution because they are the sovereign rulers and controllers of the country. He who forgets that forgets what is the true distinguishing fact in reference to this Government that separates it from all others. He who never knew that never was and never can be a democrat.

We were admonished by the honorable Senator from New York that we were influenced by traitorous designs, not to use his exact words, in bringing forward this bill for the purpose of controlling the use of the Army at the polls. I have no objection to the honorable Senator characterizing my action or that of my colleagues on this floor as being treasonable or anything of that sort, because the world will not believe it. He cannot, with all his magnificent powers, persuade mankind to give credence for one moment to the thought that because we want to restrain the power of the Executive in the use of the Army we are plotting against the Government, or that because we put upon a bill, in a form which he himself said was constitutional, a restraint on the power to control the Army, therefore we are using a traitorous, treasonable, or otherwise improper means of coercing the Executive. It has been done so frequently that it would be hardly worth while for a man to argue now that it cannot reasonably be called treasonable, or a plot, or anything partaking of an improper design or purpose in any respect, that we should undertake to pass upon an appropriation bill a measure like this.

The President of the United States, echoing the Senator from New York, (while he does not come out and in the terms that were stated by the honorable Senator put it on the ground that the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber and on the democratic side of the House of Representatives are a set of traitors and plotters against the Government of the United States,) takes the ground that a majority of the people of the United States represented in both Houses by their lawful representatives are about to consent to the overthrow of the Government! Suppose a majority of this country, a majority of the people represented in these Houses intended to break up this Government; suppose that was their purpose, there would be very little in a veto message to stop them from it. Men bent on mischief like that would not stop at the check or chiding that might be put on them by a veto message. To those Senators who have indulged in this line of accusation I may be permitted to say that in my opinion they have extended their remarks very far beyond the fact, and they have undertaken to impute to men on this side, who have an earnest and an honest desire that this Government shall last and be constitutionally administered, motives and purposes unfounded and improper.

The real fact is that they deny the right of the people of the United States to express their opinions through their representatives in this House and in the other unless those opinions happen to coincide with the views of the republican party. They cannot give up their hold on power, they cannot submit to the will of the people, they are not willing to obey the mandates of this great sovereign power, the people of the United States, and they deny to us all right to be properly heard. Continually, hour by hour and day by day, this same idea is thrust into our faces; and though gentlemen do not put it in exact language, and do not acknowledge in their expressions the real fact, who that is on this side, who that is on the democratic side of the House, who that is a democrat in the United States, does not feel that all that is done and all that is said here is a virtual denial of the right of the people to control?

Sir, when we sent that bill to the President of the United States we did not ask him to give up prerogative. He has none. There is no such thing placed in the hands of the President of the United States by the Constitution. To call any power of his a prerogative is a thorough mistake. Prerogative is an outgrowth of the "divine right of kings," descended from on high, handed down through a special agency to a certain line of people. The President of the United States never had it; there is nothing like it in the Constitution of the United States, there is nothing like it in the office of President, but the reverse of that. The power, as I have already argued to some extent, of the President of the United States to veto a measure has no connection with prerogative, while in England the power of the king to withhold his assent from a measure has direct and immediate connection with prerogative. That is not a power derived from the constitution of England, and it is not a power derived from the statutes of England, the acts of Parliament; but it is a power checked and held in restraint by the constitution of England and by the Parliament of England, whereas the powers in the United States given to the President must be looked for in the body of the Constitution.

It was the intention, as I have already observed, of the framers of this instrument to give the President of the United States an opportunity to allow Congress to pass a law without his sanction or his disapprobation. We can pass laws here, and if he does not veto them within ten days but allows the time to pass, it requires neither his approval to make them laws nor his disapproval to unmake them. Here is a clear perfect power of legislation in this country separated from and distinguishable in every respect from any power of the President.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to inquire very briefly—and I feel that I am detaining the Senate very long—when and how and why "the few long-standing laws" got upon the statute-book to which the honorable Senator from New York referred in his recent speech? The Senator assumes that the power of Congress to require troops to be kept at the polls arises from the Constitution, and was exercised by Congress as early as 1795. He denounces the repeal of these statutes as follows:

Shorn of this absurdity, the bill as it now stands, should it become a law, will be the first enactment of its kind that ever found its way into the statutes of the United States. A century, with all its activities and party strifes, with all its passionate discords, with all its expedients for party advantage, with all its wisdom and its folly, with all its patriotism and its treason, has never till now produced a congressional majority which deemed such a statute fit to be enacted.

What statute was that? A statute, the repeal of which would prevent the President of the United States or any officer of the Army or Navy or any person from having armed men at the polls. The honorable Senator says that when that repeal is enacted it will be the first statute of the kind that ever found its way on the statute-book of the United States. Well, suppose he had stated the subject in this way, that after the time of George II in England and during all the colonial history of this country, and during all the history of all the States of this country there had never been a statute upon any law-book of the United States authorizing the President or any other executive power to have troops at the polls of any election, then we should have had the exact fact. The truth is that this would be a new statute, but it would be new only in the sense that it was a reaffirmation of that which had been always considered in this country as the common law of the land. There never has been, I venture to affirm, in any colony, in any State, or in the United States any enactment of any kind whatsoever before this authorizing the use of the Army at the polls. This enactment passed in February, 1865, was the first, and it became an affirmative law, affirmative in its power, affirmative in its action; because, while it sought to restrain the use of the Army at the polls, it gave that which had never before existed in any statute-book or under any view of the common law whatsoever, the power of using the troops at the polls for the purpose of keeping the peace. Therefore the astonishment which the honorable Senator from New York expressed should have been applied to the thought not that we were repealing a law which permitted the use of troops at the polls, but that any such law as that should ever have found its way upon the statute-book.

I meant to here read this statute, and also to read from some of the standard authorities on the English common law for the purpose of showing that the statute of 1865 was entirely novel in its nature, and that nothing of the sort has ever existed in England or in this country, treating it, as I think every man is bound to treat it, as an affirmative authorization on the part of the Government of the United States to keep troops at the polls. I feel that I have trespassed so long on the attention of the Senate that I have no right now to delay it by reading these authorities. I will refer, however, to the act of 1795, first statutes, page 424, and the act of March 3, 1807, second statutes, page 443.

I think the Senator from New York did himself and the Senate both some injustice in his quotations from those particular statutes, for instead of reading them he came down to a statute that was enacted in 1861, during the war, and found in that statute a direct provision authorizing the President of the United States, without a requirement from a governor or a Legislature, to enter a State for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the United States, a war measure designed for war times and war purposes, and the honorable Senator in the quoting of that statute undertook, as I understood, to make it clear that that law was identical with these statutes of 1795 and 1807 to which I have just referred. There can be nothing wider than that from the real fact, for the acts of 1795 and 1807, the first of them authorizing the use of the militia and the second authorizing the use of the Army and Navy of the United States, are predicated upon the distinct condition in each of these acts that troops shall not be used to enforce the laws within the States except upon the call of the governor or the Legislature as provided in the Constitution.

No, sir, the President of the United States, although he was Washington himself, although he was Adams the elder or the younger, although he was Jefferson, it made no difference how distinguished he was in patriotism and for the conservatism of his views and ideas of government—the President of the United States at that time was looked upon by the Congress of the United States with so much, I will not say of suspicion but of virtuous and honest caution, that they would not permit him to enter a State even with the militia unless it was on the call of the governor or the Legislature.

In 1861, when the time came in which we had war and open secession, the authority was given, by the law that the honorable Senator from New York read, to the President of the United States to enter a State with his Army for the purpose of enforcing the laws. But under that statute also there is a provision that the President shall have the requirement of an obvious necessity to control his action in the particular case, and that he shall first make a proclamation stating that there is such a condition of public affairs as justifies the employment of force; in other words—and here we approach the very point in controversy, here we come to the exact principle upon which we divide—that the President of the United States under the act of 1861 must ascertain by a proclamation first made within the State that there exists in that State such a condition of public affairs as that he may lawfully resort to the martial law to subdue or correct it. There is the difference, and all this argument comes to that. The law of 1865 which this appropriation bill sought to repeal in part, and which will be repealed in part when the bill we are now discussing is passed, is the first and the only law which authorized the President of the United States without proclamation, without the call of the governor or the Legislature, without the issue of civil process, without the necessity of having civil process executed, to go with his Army into a State and there to administer the affairs of that State in the vital matter of conducting elections.

Sir, the law that prevails in this country to-day is the civil law, the law of the Constitution, the enactments of Congress, with all the guards and prohibitions put upon those enactments in the Constitution itself, and in the provisions of the different statutes. Whoever removes that law must do it by military power, martial power. I think I might very well and without reserve challenge every Senator on that side of the Chamber—and surely there are many there who are very able—to find in this country a possible condition of things where the Army can be used at the will and pleasure of the President for any purpose whatsoever, except where invasion or rebellion or domestic violence exists, as defined in the Constitution—you might call it war. The power of the President to march an army into a State for the purpose of controlling the people of that State in the matter of the discharge of any duty is a power which displaces civil law and gives to the authority of the President of the United States the absolute force of military law and enables him to execute his will and purposes without responsibility.

In the case of Milligan that question was settled. I intended to have read from that case, and intended to have read extensive quotations from the decision, and particularly from the argument of the honorable member of the House of Representatives, [Mr. GARFIELD,] whose argument in that case was powerful and just, in which he took the ground that Milligan could not be tried by a court-martial in the State of Indiana although the offense of which he was accused occurred during the war; he could not be tried in the State of Indiana notwithstanding he was charged, and appears to have been justly charged with having attempted to raise companies against the Government, charged with treason against the United States, charged with opposing its armies. That man was condemned to death by a military court, and that case came before the Supreme Court of the United States and the question that arose in the case was: could martial law exist in the State of Indiana, a State that was not one of the belligerent or seceding or rebel States, notwithstanding war prevailed all over the country? Could martial law exist there so as to justify a court-martial in trying a man for treason, in trying a man for an attempt to break up and destroy the Army of the United States. The Supreme Court held that it could not be done. The argument upon that subject made by the honorable gentleman to whose name I have just referred was certainly very powerful and very conclusive, and I think it must be a source of great gratification to him to know that the Supreme Court of the United States in its opinion followed almost literally the course of his argument.

How can you present a stronger case? It would be impossible to do it. Milligan's case decides absolutely that there is under this Constitution of the United States no power to supplant civil law with martial law, except in time of war or in obedience to the requirements of the Constitution.

Now, take the State of Connecticut, which has been always loyal and true to the Government of the United States, (but I am not sure I might not qualify that remark by excepting out a small period of time during the last war with Great Britain,) but I will take Connecticut as a good example, because "by their fruits ye shall know them," and sure am I that there cannot be presented any better fruits than the State of Connecticut has afforded to this country in some respects. Can the President of the United States, without the requirement of the governor of Connecticut or its Legislature, or without the existence of a writ to be executed, and in the absence of all resistance to the laws, in the absence of any overt act of resistance or any threat of resistance, upon his own mere suspicion, his own forecast of what may occur hereafter, take the Army of the United States into the State of Connecticut for the purpose of preventing a disturbance of the peace at the polls? That is the proposition; and when he does it in the absence of all these requirements and all these legal prerequisites, what is he to do with his Army when he gets it there except to establish martial law in place of civil law? Is there any Senator who will say that the President of the United States, thus taking his Army into the State of Connecticut, does not establish martial law? If he does not, what power has he got to command it? He commands it to do a certain thing or not to do a certain thing. Against whom are these things to be done? Against the people of that State, not in their behalf, not for their protection, not to preserve them against invasion, sedition, domestic violence, or insurrection, but whatever is done by that Army must be done under the command of the President of the United States against the people of the State of Connecticut. What, then, is the President doing with his Army in Connecticut? He is commanding his Army there in virtue of his military power as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States for the purpose of controlling and compelling the people of Connecticut to do his will and pleasure, whatever that may be. You say it is only to preserve the peace. Be it so; I care not what it is to do. It makes no difference what may be the purpose he is to go there for, he must go there in obedience to and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, and when we say "You shall not use the Army at elections," we mean "You shall not use it unconstitutionally, shall not use it as an instrumentality in the hands of the President as a military commander to execute your own will and purposes without reference to the law, local, or general, or national." That is what we say.

This appropriation bill bestows many thousands of dollars, how many I am not now precisely prepared to state, but a great many thousands of dollars, upon the President of the United States, or rather upon the War Department of the United States for the purpose of providing for the expenses of the transmission of the Army back and forth under the command of the President. Now, I have this question to ask upon that subject: what restraint is there in the laws of the United States to prevent the President of the United States from expending this money or bringing his Secretary of War to do it in the transportation of the Army from the Territories to the State of New York? Who says that the President of the United States cannot, according to law, order all the regiments under his command from the places where they may be to the State of New York at his will and pleasure to meet an expected breach of the peace? Is there any restraint in these laws? Is there any provision in the statutes, either in the fifteenth section of the appropriation act from which I read or any preceding action of Congress, which prevents the President of the United States from taking his Army from its places of cantonment and bivouac wherever they may be in the West and carrying them to the State of New York to influence an election if he wants to do it? I am not aware of any provision of law of that sort. We make ample appropriations to him, or to the War Department, for the transportation of the Army. The President may say to himself, "I expect in the course of the next election that there is going to be a terrible uproar in the State of New York. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has risen on the floor of the Senate, and he has presented such a picture of the condition of those people as that one can believe almost anything about them. He presents terrible pictures of the capacity of the people of his own State to do wrong. They are horrible people. I never heard of such people this side of the Fiji Islands as the honorable Senator has described the people of New York to be; they are very wretched." The President would be apt to say, admonished by the remarks of the honorable Senator, which have gone out uncontradicted, and which are taken for true as a matter of course, as everybody must take what he says as being true, "I think at the next election there is going to be a tremendous uproar. I think there is going to be a necessity for having ten thousand men, twenty-five thousand men in the State of New York. I find myself possessed of the authority to carry the Army there under the law. There are ample appropriations for their transportation, and there is no check upon me. There is nobody controlling me about it. I think the best use I can make of this Army is to have it in New York for the purpose of keeping the peace." Ah, but asks some one, "Has the peace been violated in New York at any election?"

"No." "Has somebody threatened to violate it?" "No." "What authority have you got to take those troops into that State? Who has called upon you and asked you to do it? Has the governor done it?" "No." "The Legislature?" "Never." "What authority have you? There is no emergency which has arisen to require or even to justify you in doing that. What authority have you got to take that Army there?" "I have got the authority of my suspicions; I have the authority of the honorable Senator from New York who said they are terrible and bad people and need to be controlled by outside power; that there is nothing that can take care of the liberties of the people of New York but the Army of the United States. They have no power of self-government. So beset with sin and vice, so demoralized are they, so entirely have they become lost to a sense of duty, so lawless are they, that nothing will control them but the Army and Navy." "I want them," the Senator would say; "bring the Army here." So here it comes, and you cannot prevent it. If the honorable Senator from New York should wake up some morning and find the whole Army of the United States in the city of New York under the order of the President, what would he have to say? What objection could he make, particularly if it is just at the juncture when an election is approaching? What plea could he make with his people? Does he not say that they are a desperately bad set of people? Does he not argue that they cannot govern themselves? Does he not show that they are not worthy of the confidence of mankind, that they need an army to keep them in check and control them?

Mr. President, it is for the purpose of preventing the President of the United States, or any civil, military, or naval officer in the United States, from assembling people at the polls, armed people, troops or men, in anticipation of any supposed occurrence of any breach of the peace, that we object. It is a pretext that is too thin almost for serious discussion, that it shall rest in the conjecture of any man, whether he is John Davenport or whether he is President, when troops are necessary to conduct the election in a State. I do not care who it is, it makes no difference. I do not believe that Mr. Hayes, left to himself and without the screws of "stalwart" power being applied to him, would ever use the Army for such a purpose; but when these stalwart screws can coerce him into a veto message like that which he sent to the Congress of the United States, I do not know what he may not be induced to do, and I think we had better be a little cautious.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from New York set out in his argument the other day with the statement of a proposition which I think did both the people of New York and the people of the South great injustice. We have always had a great respect for New York. To that great metropolitan city our people have always resorted for trade; and I must say also that they have been treated always with hospitality, and kindness, and attention, and they have much permanent, well-founded affection and regard for the people of New York City. The commerce of New York City has so extended through the South that there is not a hamlet in my section of the country, where you do not find a New York merchant either through his drummer or in person, or else you find some man who is in the habit of visiting New York regularly for the purpose of exchanging the productions of his country for goods that are brought there. I must say in spite of all the denunciation that the honorable Senator has been able to bestow upon his great State, and especially that great city, we still have much respect for it. Perhaps it does not help New York that we have such respect for it, but it may help us somewhat that we still have some reverence and some respect for a people who have done for themselves and for this country so much as the people of New York have done.

I think that is a wonderful city, wonderful in its enterprise, powerful in its commercial forces, and beautiful in its example of government. Surely the people of the United States have no contempt of New York City; they have no right to disparage it; but when the Senator gets up and takes the license, the liberty which belongs to him as its representative, in presenting such scenes as he has brought to our attention, we begin to distrust whether we have not made some very improper calculations and come to some very unjust conclusions in regard to that great people. The honorable Senator, after showing that his people are not worthy to be trusted with a keg of powder; or a negro in their midst, lest he might be broiled, (as he represented the other day they were broiled in New York,) and as they have recently been broiled on the borders of Kansas—"Bleeding Kansas"—after showing that a negro had no chance in the world in the enlightened and splendid city of New York, and in fact that no other man had much of a chance there of life, liberty, or property, he went into a statement about the South in reference to which the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] undertook to ask him a question, but he would not give any time or breath for an explanation.

That statement was to the effect that the larger part of the revenue derived from foreign commerce in the United States was collected at the port of New York, and that that revenue thus collected was largely more than all the revenue collected from all the twelve Southern States. The honorable Senator from Georgia immediately rose and tried to ask a question which he was cut off from asking, and so we got no information, and now we are left upon the records of the Senate and of the country as being a people who by contrast with the State of New York pay only about $7,000,000 of revenue to the country, while New York pays, I think, $109,000,000.

Mr. President, the twelve States to which the Senator referred make $200,000,000 of money annually in their cotton crops. I should like for the honorable Senator to point out some industry in the State of New York that makes that amount. Almost all of that we make in one way or another goes to the city of New York. We do not begrudge it, but I wish to God we had changed the current of trade and that our money and produce had gone to Charleston, Baltimore, Galveston, New Orleans, and to the State of my honorable friend, [Mr. EATON,] the State of Connecticut, anywhere except to feast and fatten men who come here after growing rich upon our labor and taunt us with the reproach that we are not paying as much tax as they are, and therefore claim that they have a better right to serve the country.

We have twelve million people in the South, black and white, or thereabouts; and we make annually a profit of $12,000,000, that is the calculation, upon our cotton crops—a dollar annual profit to every human being. That is not much; it takes a whole year to do it. That $12,000,000 is probably spent, most of it if not all, in local improvements. Where does the balance of the $200,000,000 of money go? Who handles it? Who uses it? Who grows fat on it? New York! There is scarcely a bale of cotton produced in the South that does not in some way go to New York. Every dollar almost that is realized from these annual crops is spent in New York. New York has now more than two and one-half billion dollars of property, real and personal, and all of these twelve States have not as much. How did her people get so rich? Is it personal property they own that is so valuable? It is real estate! What made their real estate so valuable? Our traffic and our money. They have grown rich upon our labor and upon our industry. They have waxed fat and they kick. Let them kick. We are not going to return it with blows. But it may be after awhile that we shall get independent enough to handle our own crops, and then your State of New York and your city of New York that have grown so splendidly rich and so powerfully overbearing will want the sustenance upon which they have lived and grown fat; because but for that which has been extracted from us, but for that which we have yielded to New York, but for the contributions we have paid into her treasury, she to-day would be as poor as Alabama, and poorer, because she has no crop which yields money like cotton.

There is not a merchant in the South who would listen to me for a moment in casting a censure upon the city of New York, but there are many there who will feel wounded in spirit and outraged in their sensibilities when they read from the remarks of the honorable Senator from New York that they are a poor beggarly set who do not pay any taxes and therefore have no right to influence in this Government. Sir, if they had their earnings in their pockets that they have paid to New York City, real estate in that city to-day would not be worth any more by the square foot than it is worth in Charleston. Thrift, industry, enterprise, talent, ability, courtesy, magnanimity, the excellence, the exaltation, the splendor of the people of New York have entitled them to this encouragement. But after they have won it through these great and high methods from men who are their peers in all respects, let them not undertake to treat with disdain those who once were rich but now are poor and toiling, or fail to remember that much of your wealth in New York came from our commerce and our labor.

Even women in the South—not black, but white—toil in the cotton-fields from year's end to year's end to supply to the grandees of New York that power which not only gives them the domination of the commerce of this country, its financial arrangement and management, but gives to them that conspicuous condition of assumed authority which justifies their Senator in reproaching the people who toil so hard and work so honestly and so industriously for their country and for New York.

After the honorable Senator got through with berating us he undertook to tell us what we should do in the South. After having disburdened his remarks of all of that apparent condition of I will not say malice, but of harshness, of extreme harshness, by a disclaimer that he meant no harm, he turned graciously to us and he opened to us his great bosom, strutted out with the mother's milk of human kindness, and he bade us cluster around near to his heart and take a little advice. The first thing he told us was to go to work. He gave us a good deal of moral advice besides which I thought was quite out of place coming from a Senator who had accepted a position from a people so degraded as he said the people of New York were. So I will pass over his moral advice as coming not from a source that might properly commend it to notice; but the material advice, "go to work," is something that strikes in upon us.

The Senator from New York would make, I have no doubt, one of the best possible representatives the people of the South could have if he would only go down there and familiarize himself with us, if he could possibly bring his mind to fall in love with us, or even to have due respect for us or compassion upon us; and he could devise, as his party has been attempting for many years, quite a long series of experimental congressional legislative action here through which we would be greatly benefited. We are expected to transfer the power of legislation as well as the moral control of our people into the hands of gentlemen from the Northern States.

"Go to work!" We do not abstain from work. We live by work. We have no machinery to spin for us or weave for us. We have very little outside commerce on which we make profit. We have no great mines of wealth that turn out from their hidden sources of treasure enormous masses of gold and silver. What we gain down there we gain through agriculture.

The question is asked why we do not work? The answer is that there are more bales of cotton made now than were ever made before in the South, showing that we do work. Who makes it? The poor negro who has now run off up into Kansas? That will not do. Let me say to the Senator that the truth is that in the State of Alabama, which I believe is the second or third cotton-producing State in the American Union, there is more cotton made by white people than is made by the blacks, and a very considerable part of that which is made by the white people is made by the women, white women, who go into the fields and toil with the plough and the hoe, and who will answer the question or the admonition or the advice of the honorable Senator from New York, telling them to go to work, by saying to him, "Come, sir, and see how we labor; do not deceive yourself or your people with the idea that the Southern people are not a working people."

I will venture to make another statement, which I do after mature consideration of the subject, and that is that there are fewer unemployed men and women, white men and white women, in the State of Alabama, and I dare say it is true of other Southern States, than there are in any other given population on this continent. The crops that they make are hard to make. You commence preparations in February and are lucky if you close your crop-gathering the last of December. Through the hot burning suns of the summer and under the malarious influence of the autumn season, these people, men and women, white and black, work; and they work for a living, nothing more.

Where are your tramps in the South? What has occurred in this northern community that is advising other people to work, that squeezes thousands and tens of thousands of honest laboring-men out of house and home, and forces them as vagabonds and vagrants upon the world? What is it that makes it a requisite in the Northern States that we should have armies to quell the population that demands bread as the reward of their labor, and not only requires them to quell the people, but shoots them to death, because in the anguish of their despair they have risen against powerful combinations of men and corporate authorities with a view of trying to get bread for themselves and their starving little ones. Look at your Northern States where there is no road or path or mountain gorge, where there is no place a man can put his foot to travel that you do not find the poor wearied pilgrim called a "tramp," moving about from place to place in search of bread and labor. Cast your eyes to the South and answer me whether that is the case there? Every man, woman, and child in the South has bread, has a shelter, has clothing to wear, and they have nothing to do but to perform according to their own option and under their own contracts of employment such reasonable labor as they are willing to perform.

When they are looking at conditions and giving advice I trust that the honorable Senators on that side of the Chamber who live north of the Ohio River will pardon me if I should say to them that if I were going to give advice I would direct their attention at home, and I would ask them if they could not devise some plan for the relief of their own poor constituents who have to go from home and friends and wander through the world in search of bread, getting a stone when they ask for bread? I should like to know if the honorable Senators cannot find employment for their great intellects and their great powers of statesmanship in the alleviation of the condition of their people rather than to turn their kindly compassionate attention to those who have neither asked advice nor comfort from them.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York has suggested that we have needed a great many things in the South. We have got a great many; and in the getting of these things we have nearly got our destruction. But I return most devout thanks to the Ruler of the world that in His providence—for I do not think it is anything short of that—we have outlived a great many things which have been bestowed upon us. The honorable Senator from New York has given us a number of things, and doubtless with the best intentions. After we had gotten through with the war, that wicked rebellion of which the Senator from New York speaks with so much emphasis, as the bloodiest, most cruel, and most criminal rebellion that ever existed in the world"—after we had got through with all that we then had something else that we were required to accept. But when we were getting through with that war we were suffering terribly; and whatever the honorable Senator from New York may think about it we were suffering for and struggling in what we believed to be a just cause.

The honorable Senator from New York was an abolitionist. Was he? Let the records speak. No; he was no abolitionist. Never was he an abolitionist. What, then? He made us believe that he was? Senators on that side of the Chamber made us believe they were abolitionists, and yet they were not. There was not a Senator—perhaps with one or two exceptions—on that side who would have sacrificed a hundred men to have freed all the negroes in America. But we believed you were abolitionists. You said you were not, but we took it for granted. Notwithstanding that after the battle of Bull Run you passed resolutions in this Chamber in which you disavowed the idea that you were abolitionists, still we believed you were; and it was because we thought you were destroying a property worth to us three or four billions of money that we undertook by going outside of the Union and setting up for ourselves the protection of it. You would fight; you would secede or else you would rebel or do something equally monstrous if we or any other set of people should go to your factories and undertake to stop them, or deny your title to your lands, and try to rob you of any of your property, or even of your political privileges and rights. You would fight too. We did. We fought, and fought because we were trying to save our property and had a right to it. We were, it seems, wrong about it. We were not wise. We were deceived as to your intentions. Providence has adjudged this against us, and the Constitution of the United States has also expressed it in amendments. We were in the wrong, but we suffered. But we did not suffer as criminal men; we did not feel that we deserved to suffer as criminal men. We felt that we were suffering as men who were deprived of what we understood the Constitution of the United States to give us. But it seems we were wrong. The Constitution says so; the country all say so all around; but we got through with the war and we lost more property in the South than every dollar of real and personal property in New York is worth. We lost all.

The honorable Senator from New York says that there was no confiscation about the war. It was not intended confiscation, I grant you, but still it was the same thing. We lost all, and we make no claim for it now, we never will. It is in the Constitution that we cannot do it, and we fully approve that provision of the Constitution. It was a clean loss, a thorough confiscation. Now, it would be very hard indeed to take from the people of New York, or from the people north of the Ohio River, three billions of property of any kind and then expect them to pay as much taxes as an undisturbed section that had retained all of its property, and had got rich by the war. That would be very hard; but this is what we do without a murmur of complaint.

After we had passed through this war; after we had been conquered, after our arms had been surrendered and we had hauled down the banners of rebellion against the Government of the United States, then the honorable Senator from New York came to us and he said to us, "States! Alabama! Mississippi! Florida! Georgia! all of you States, component parts of this grand and splendid Republic, States like New York, States like New Hampshire and Vermont, we submit to you a question which upon your vote and upon your decision is to amend and alter the Constitution of the United States. Will you abolish slavery?" You did submit it. You submitted it to States, States that had governments legal enough to amend the Constitution of the United States, good, honest States, full States, complete States. Before you had submitted it to Alabama she had already abolished slavery; but you did submit it, and Alabama acquiesced, and she amended her constitution according to your demand upon us as States. Thereupon you got slavery abolished, Kentucky not consenting to it. If that was not done by States, by what was it done? How would the honorable Senator from Kentucky answer to his constituents for the loss of their slaves, which they never consented to give up, unless that provision had been put into the Constitution of the United States by States? That was all doing very well indeed, and we were getting along remarkably well, but then we needed something else. It was then affirmed by the honorable Senator from New York in a report which he himself signed that these State governments were not legal State governments. Oh, mark how it shames American statesmanship, that in one hour you should proclaim that these were States enough to alter the Constitution of the United States and in the next you should proclaim by act of Congress that they had no legal governments! There is another thing. It was a magnificent donation when we come to consider the Constitution of the United States and the estoppel, if there be such a thing as that, of conscience or statesmanship, when, after you had submitted the thirteenth amendment to us for our ratification as States, you also gave to us new State constitutions made to hand.

Not only did we in Alabama get a government decreed by Congress, but you made it a military government, military from head to foot, in every respect and in every capacity. We had then been at peace for a year or more—for two years indeed. Each State government was performing its own regular functions in its own regular way, and we had the indorsement of the Congress of the United States that we were States, when you passed an act of Congress by which you confided every department of the government of these States to the hands of the military. You did not even separate us into States, but organized military districts or divisions and crowded as many as three States, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida or Mississippi into one district, under the command of one military governor, who immediately commenced with the governors and removed them from office; then the Legislature and removed all of them; the judges of the supreme court all were expelled from office, the judges of the circuit courts, the chancery courts, the probate courts, the justices of the peace, the sheriffs, and the constables, and all officers in executive authority. All were swept clean by the board, and these military governors had the power there and exercised it completely and fully to substitute these officers with men of their own appointment. The States were broken down, the States were crushed under foot, the States were kicked in the dust, the States were destroyed. My countrymen, to understand it in all its outline we shall have to go over a history of years to see how much was done to destroy all the understanding of what is included in the provisions of this great body of our constitutional law. That was military government enacted by Congress.

But the power that did that is no stronger, no more restrained, no less terrible in its consequences, than that power which the act of Congress of February, 1865, provides that the President of the United States may employ when he uses the Army at the elections. Who cannot perpetuate his power with an army at his back? Sir, suppose that the democratic party of the United States should take this power and use it against you, now that it has authority, when do you think you would be restored to power? But we would not wield it. No; it is ours in principle and ours in duty to discard all military power, to deny ourselves authority to do that which we think the Constitution of the United States does not permit us to do. When you find an honest, sound, and true democrat you will always find a man who denies to himself, his colleagues, and his friends all power that is not found in the Constitution.

Then afterward we got still more of military government. After we had passed through this period of reformation and after a constitution had been voted by Congress for my State which the people had rejected at the ballot-box under your permission that they might reject it, what then?

It was necessary that we should have more of military control. Armies traversed that State after this constitution had been adopted by Congress and after our Senators and Representatives had been admitted here, armies traversed our State from end to end continually at all periods of elections; and the only reason why you were not successful in the use of the Army in converting Alabama from a democratic to a republican State was that the presence of your army there was an admonition to every man who understood the Constitution of the United States that he had better stand by the principles of that instrument rather than give it up, and that made him a democrat, and it made democrats of old whigs, democrats of many republicans. Almost every man who in good faith migrated to Alabama from the Northern States, though he came there a republican, became a democrat. They looked at the Army, they saw the influence that was being brought to bear to control elections, and they became democrats.

But there was another fact. You could not make the Irish and German soldiers mix with the negroes, notwithstanding they were representatives of the Government of the United States and paid by it so much a month and dressed in the uniform and supposed to be thoroughly under the control of its principles and influence in every respect. They would not mix with the negroes. You could not get a German or any other man who was in the regular Army of the United States to admit social equality with the negroes. We could not help that; we could not make the soldiers mix with them. It was very hard to do indeed. It is going to be very hard in Kansas, I will say to the honorable Senators across the way; and I will say another thing in that connection: if instead of sending eight or ten thousand negroes to Kansas from the South, you would send twenty thousand or thirty thousand, we should have a democratic Senator in place of the honorable Senator over there at the next election, and make a democratic State out of that. There is no doubt of it. Well, the Army was in Alabama and I have not complained of the use that was made of it in any State although every use was made of it that could be with a view of trying to deter us; the result was just the reverse. The result was the building up of the democratic party. The unification of all men in the South more depended on the fact of the presence of the Army than on any other fact. It is only since the Army was withdrawn that the people have commenced dividing on greenbacks and other like questions. With the South it was absolutely a one-sided thing beyond all peradventure as long as you kept the troops there.

My argument on this subject is addressed more to the people who reside north of the Ohio River and who, massed and aggregated as they are, have among them some of the most miserable, wretched people in the world living under the very shadows of the most princely and most magnificent mansions on earth. There beggary and enormous wealth are associated in joint control. Those are the people to be affected, and I would say to those poor wandering tramps and to the mechanics and hard-working men of the North and to the ill-fed and ill-clothed men and to the fathers of families whose daily occupation it is, not to labor, but to hunger for the want of it—I would say to them, all of them, if you still believe that you are men, if you still realize that you are American citizens, if you still think this Constitution protects you as well as it does the greatest and most distinguished man in the world, if you still have an abiding faith and hope in the power of this Government to do you justice in all coming time, do not ever by your votes consent that any man shall have power to send a body of armed troops to the polls for the purpose of serving you as the soldiers of the United States served the people of Alabama.

That is what I say, and in doing so I would not incite any man to wrong, to injustice; but I would say to him, rely on the powers of your Government under the Constitution of this country, in the justice of men who know what their rights under the Constitution are; rely on these to do for you all that men can by legislation for the protection of your individual constitutional rights.

The honorable Senator seemed to think that the Army was a matter of not much consequence; but it cannot be denied that in my State we had troops brought there by men in authority, men in authority in this Chamber, who had the powers of Senators, and they are very great powers. There is a man living in my State by the name of Robert Barber, who is chairman of the republican committee of the county of Montgomery to-day, and who has been secretary of the republican committee for the State of Alabama, a man always in authority among the republicans in that State. Mr. Barber was called before a committee of the General Assembly of Alabama for the purpose of giving testimony in a case which was referred to in debate yesterday, the case of Mr. Spencer, the predecessor of my colleague on this floor. I propose to read from his testimony something that will show a little bit of what was done with the Army in Alabama:

Question. Have you any written communication relating to the plans you have mentioned touching the use of troops in Alabama?

Answer. I have some letters, which I do not care to produce, as they are of a private character.

Q. Do you say you have them in your possession?

A. I do; but, wishing to violate nothing like confidence, will not produce them unless required to do so by the committee.

(The witness was permitted to consult with his attorney.)

Q. As it is improper to ask of the contents of the letters when you have them in your possession, we are put to the necessity of requiring you to produce them. Will you do so?

A. I produce the letters; here they are, [handing them to the chairman.] I ask that the committee have copies made, and allow me to retain the originals.

(A copy of these letters is hereto appended, marked Exhibits E and F, and are a part of this testimony.)

Q. Do you know these letters to be genuine?

A. I know Spencer's handwriting; they were written and signed by him, and bear the impress of his seal or motto used by him.

Q. I notice in the letter of October 22, 1872, the expression, "I wish Randolph, deputy United States marshal, would use the company at Opelika in making arrests in Tallapoosa, Randolph, and Cleburne, as —— suggests." Please explain the meaning of this expression?

A. I received a letter from Randolph County before the date of these letters, suggesting that if troops be sent into the counties named that enough voters would be run out of them, through fear of arrest, to secure the election of republican representatives from those counties; and the letter of October 22 was in reply to a letter written to Spencer, conveying to him this information.

Q. Was your connection with the republican party and Spencer of a character to enable you to understand their and his plans?

A. I was familiar with their and his plans all the way through. I was assistant secretary of the republican State executive committee.

Now for the letters:

DECATUR, ALABAMA, October 22, 1872.

MY DEAR BARBER: I have just returned from Louisville, where I have been to see General Terry about troops for Alabama.

I have had a company of cavalry sent to Livingston, a detachment to Pickens County, a company of infantry to Eutaw, and a company to Demopolis, and a company to Seal's Station, Russell County. Also, a squadron of cavalry to report to Marshal Thomas, at Huntsville.

I wish Randolph, deputy United States marshal, would use the company at Opelika in making arrests in Tallapoosa, Randolph, and Cleburne as —— —— suggests. I will be in Montgomery Thursday morning to attend the meeting of the State committee. I would go sooner, but cannot, as it is important I should stay here to-morrow. I wish you would go to Talladega and block that game. I must not, however, be known in the matter.

The troops mentioned above will all be in their respective places in two days from now. Some have already arrived.

In haste, truly yours,

GEORGE E. SPENCER.

"Who was George E. Spencer?" I am asked. I will let the Senate of the United States answer that. The record of the Senate of the United States shows who George E. Spencer was.

Mr. President, when this republican party was in power a Senator from Alabama at that time was one of its members and when he wrote a letter like this and got troops there for the purpose of running men out of Randolph and Tallapoosa Counties, and when that letter was proved by a man of his own party to-day in good fellowship and recognition of that party, is it to be asserted on the other side of this Chamber that there is no occasion to be alarmed about the power to use troops at the polls? I have not brought this subject to the attention of the Senate before, because it is in some sense a reflection upon my own State, or a man who represented it, and I have no remark to make about that. The letter itself is its own exponent, and does full justice to the author. But can it be affirmed that when a Senator of the United States of the republican party then occupying a seat on this floor used the power of having the troops at the polls in the way I have read—when these things are shown will the country say that the effort to repeal the authority is a dangerous plot and a traitorous conspiracy?

I feel, Mr. President, that the alarmed apprehensions of the honorable Senator from New York will be much quieted in reference to the repeal of this law when he has seen this letter written by a republican colleague. I dislike to make accusations; I dislike to bring disagreeable subjects to the attention of any one; it is not in my nature to do it; but the sacred right of self-defense is one that I cannot abdicate or abandon; and when the Senators claim here a power of keeping troops at the polls under the pretense of keeping the peace at the polls, then I think it is necessary to take some steps to prevent the exercise of it as this bill does, and does it in a way nobody can object to.

I hope and trust the President of the United States will find it within the purview of his duty to sign the bill. He may not. Perhaps I ought not to express that hope; I think rather I had better not have expressed it. I will not recall it, however, or take it out of the record, inasmuch as I have expressed it; I think that the independence of these different departments of the Government requires that each should act for itself, without advice, without constraint, without admonition, and certainly without compulsion from the other.

I had a number of authorities that I proposed to read, but I find that I have overstepped entirely the indulgence of the Senate, in the length of the argument which I have undertaken to make on this occasion. The subject, however, that is brought to my attention is one that seemed plainly to myself, as well as to other gentlemen of the South, to demand a sort of answer which would put us upon the proper ground and show that what we are contending for in this case is something that affects ourselves not so much as it does other people in a different part of the United States, but that we are contending above all things for the preservation of the constitutional rights of the people of this country, and being from the South, that country which has been dragged into the debate although we had no agency in bringing forward these laws, that country which seems to be the burden-bearer of every accusation that any man can devise in his imagination or otherwise, that country that must be always burdened, and never relieved—coming from that section of country I thought I might be indulged by the Senate, as I hope other gentlemen from the South will also be, in making some remarks on this occasion to set ourselves in a right attitude before the country.

The people will understand, as did their fathers, the truths that we express in this bill, which are but the echo, as I conceive, of truths expressed by a great British poet during our struggle in the revolutionary war. Then there were rebels in this country led by George Washington; now we are told that there are rebels in this country who were led by General Lee and other men like him. Looking back over the men who have figured in all these scenes, it seems to me that we ought to have, in reference to each other, some indulgence; and when we find that men have acted (even though they may have acted wrong) under the influence and inspiration of very high motives, we ought to be willing, after the occasion has passed and there is no longer anything to excite animosity, to overlook the past in a very kind and liberal spirit.

The honorable Senator from New York the other day, as I understood him, came down from the eminent height which he had occupied as the great ruler and leader of the republican party, the Jupiter Tonans of the republican party in the United States, and on the floor of the Senate nominated General Grant for the Presidency. I do not think that was a condescension, but I think it was a great mistake. I do not think the occasion was fitting. I do not think that when the honorable Senator was arguing for the right to control the Army at the polls and insisting that it should not be given up, he should have named that most distinguished of all the republicans in the United States, I believe, as a military man as the next candidate for the Presidency.

What did that mean? It meant that for the purpose of accomplishing a certain object through the mastership of a great general and the control of the Army, a certain man was needed. The honorable Senator from New York did not deem himself quite competent to accomplish this purpose even though he might be President, and he intended to use all the power he possessed to put the control of this Government in the hands of a man who would ride down the people of this country sword in hand and rule them with the same destructive power through which he once ruled and destroyed States. That was the purpose to which I ascribed this movement, and I believe it to be correct. He spoke of McGregor at the head of the table, and admonished gentlemen from the South that they had better not play McGregor and had better not take seats at the head of the table. The honorable Senator from New York himself does not take the position of McGregor at the head of the table. He seats another man there as McGregor. We are to furnish the wine for that feast prepared in the wine-press of affliction, in the very blood of our people. Will he drink of that potation? Never. He wants a libation poured out; he wants to sprinkle this blood upon his garments and exhibit himself on the forum as one baptized in the blood of rebellion. Who would deny to him this cheap glory? It will be of no account to the honorable Senator in the deep, dark future which is yet unrevealed. The honorable Senator makes a miscalculation if he expects to find that the American people will ever be willing to reward him with the Presidency because he seeks baptism in the blood of men with whom the whole country is at peace.

The great British poet to whom I have alluded, seemed as if he were inspired when he wrote of the people of England, as well as of this country, and put in verse this terse and powerful statement of the true purpose of government:

> Ill fares the land, to hast'ning ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay;
> Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made:
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroy'd can never be supplied.

I commend the philosophy of these lines to the attention of the Senators on the other side and I would have them remember as well as believe that the people of the United States, though poor, many of them,—there are myriads of poor among the people,—are nevertheless "a bold peasantry," a Constitution-loving peasantry, men who believe that their liberties are wrapped up in the Constitution of the United States, and whenever they get a fair chance and an open field they will stand by and sustain those men who are faithful and true to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS obtained the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Vermont to yield to me that I may move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for one moment.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. With the leave of my friend from Iowa, I desire simply to say that I shall be very glad to get a vote on this bill to-morrow. I do not say, as has sometimes been said, that I will press a vote to-morrow. I simply say that I shall be very glad, if it will be possible, to get a vote on this bill to-morrow.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to be excused from further service on the select committee of which Mr. WALLACE, of Pennsylvania, is chairman, to investigate certain alleged frauds in the elections, and further to ask that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] be appointed on the committee in my place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks to be excused from further service upon the special committee named by him, and that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] be substituted. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order will be made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 8, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENFORCEMENT OF EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at five minutes past twelve o'clock. The first business in order is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, being the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Education and Labor—joint resolution (H. R. No. 9) to provide for the enforcement of the eight-hour law.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the question involved in the resolution reported by the Committee on Education and Labor appears to me to have been thoroughly adjudicated. When the law was passed I thought it a mean evasion of responsibility by Congress, inasmuch as it fixed eight hours as a day's labor but did not determine the question as to whether the pay should be that for the ordinary day of ten hours, or but eight-tenths thereof. I felt that it was casting upon the executive department a responsibility which Congress ought to have assumed. Soon after its passage I was interrogated by many of my constituents on that point; and having considered the question I answered in an open letter through the papers, saying frankly that I thought Congress had left the matter in such a position that the decision could well be made that eight hours' work would produce but eight hours' pay. On the day on which that letter appeared, in the very papers in which it appeared, was a proclamation from the President of the United States declaring eight hours to be under that law a full day's work, and ordering the officers of the Government employing labor to so compensate it. There was the executive interpretation of the law.

The whole debate on the bill in the Senate, in which the late Senators Morton and Fessenden and their peers participated, went upon the theory that eight hours a day were all that an American citizen ought to be asked to labor, and upon the theory that employers would get as much work in the eight hours as they had been getting in ten or more.

But the act subsequently received a legislative construction. Hon. HENRY L. DAWES, now a Senator from Massachusetts, was then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and from that committee reported a bill appropriating a sufficient sum of money to pay the laborers in the Springfield arsenal and all other laborers for the United States from whom the pay for the two hours' reduced time had been withheld; and after ample discussion the bill passed both Houses and became a law. So that the legislative construction was consistent with that given to this law by the executive department. And until that statute is repealed every workingman who is forced by the Government to work ten hours for a day's wages is defrauded of his legal rights.

But, sir, since that time the question has assumed a much graver aspect than it then presented. In 1868 capital was actively employed and seeking ever new productive investments. Labor was in demand and wages rising. The case is very different now. Capital nowhere in Christendom can find safe and profitable investment in productive industry, and labor everywhere is suffering, if not absolutely, by contrast with its past condition. Indeed the condition of the laboring people of the civilized world is in this respect pitiable. Our country, more favored than any other, is suffering greatly, but less than others. Our broad, open, cheap lands are protecting us against the intense suffering others are enduring.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I would like my friend to answer a question.

Mr. KELLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I am discussing this joint resolution, and nothing else.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I would like to ask a question about the interpretation of this resolution. Its sole object seems to be not to enforce the execution of the law making eight hours a day's work in Government employment, but that laborers shall receive as much for eight hours' work as they would otherwise receive for ten. Now how is the rate of payment to be ascertained? Are you to take the amount of wages paid in 1868 at the time the eight-hour law was passed—are you to take the amount paid before that law, under the ten-hour system, for a day's labor, and pay the same amount now for eight hours' work as was then paid for ten?

Mr. KELLEY. I am not in charge of this joint resolution, nor am I a member of the committee that reported it; but if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] will permit me I will give his colleague my answer. There is a law providing how the wages of laborers in Government employ, especially in the cities, shall be determined. It provides that a board of officers shall each month ascertain the prevailing rate of wages in establishments doing the same kind of work that is done in the Government establishment, and that the wages of the laborer for the Government shall be the average of those paid in leading workshops of the city in which the Government establishment is. Thus we have declared by law the means of ascertaining what wages are to be paid. That is an old provision of law, and is not involved in any way in this resolution.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman understand that the intention of the original law was to make the pay of Government laborers the same as that of other laborers in the same neighborhood?

Mr. KELLEY. I beg leave to say that if I am speaking under a limitation of time, as I think I am not——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to ten minutes, the floor having been yielded to him by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE.]

Mr. KELLEY. Then, having a certain view to present, I must first present it, and after that, in whatever time may remain, I will undertake to answer questions of other gentlemen. To-day there is, as I was saying, throughout the world but little employment for labor, either skilled or unskilled, and gentlemen on both sides attribute this enforced idleness and consequent poverty and misery to "overproduction." They assert that the laboring people of the world are homeless because, as I have before said, they have built too many houses and made too much furniture! They are in rags or naked because they have spun and woven too much cloth, and converted it into garments! They tramp the country in pursuit of employment barefoot and foot-sore, because they have made too many boots and shoes! They are hungry and beggars or paupers, because they have raised too much grain and provisions! If this theory be true, which I deny, (but it prevails among doctrinaires and contractionists throughout the country,) I say it is the duty of statesmen and of every man of philanthropic impulses to do all he can to restrict and reduce production. If as the result of productive labor comes want and hunger; if from overproduction at ten hours to the day the laboring people of the world are reduced to want and destitution, is it not the duty alike of statesmanship and philanthropy to restrict production? If this theory be correct it is the duty of the National Government to set the example and to appeal with all the urgency it can to State governments, those of cities and counties and townships, to so apportion their work that every family may by the few hours required to supply the wants of nature enter into the consumption of the world and live as our laboring people once lived, upon their honest earnings in their own homes. Reduce the hours of labor so that every family may have a chance to get its share of work and wages.

I deny the doctrine of overproduction and say that a glut in the market is utterly inconsistent with the want of everything that makes life agreeable, by countless millions of laboring people, citizens of all civilized countries. But the absurd doctrine prevails; it controls the action of nations on currency; it is accepted largely on this floor. Whoever advocates demonetization of silver or the contraction of paper money gives you, in his judgment, a sufficient answer to any suggestion that may be offered when he says this comes from overproduction. The dogma is a horrible one. But if it be true I appeal to gentlemen, in the name of humanity, to do what they can to stop overproduction. If eight hours a day will not do it, bring the hours down to six. Why shall the toiling millions shrink, as they are doing in Berlin and throughout Germany, into damp cellars? Why shall British laborers suffer as they are doing? Why, sir, the people of my city, the working people whose pride it has been to have their families live under their own roof, are many of them huddling together three or four families in one such house and then are probably unable to pay their rent. Now we have a chance to do something to mitigate the curse of overproduction. Let us say that the United States Government, to the extent it can, will prohibit overproduction, and that it will prohibit over eight hours' work by any laborer in its employment, and so cast its influence, the influence of its wise statesmanship before the State governments and those of the cities, counties, and townships, and before humane private employers. Only one other choice remains to us, and that is that we shall fall back on the inhuman doctrine of Malthus, and by applying physical means to a given percentage of the men and women born throughout the world prevent the increase of the laboring population, and thus diminish the productive power of this and other countries. I am opposed to this terrible alternative. When God made man, among the rights He gave him was the right to live; and if two hours' toil will sustain his life, let him have it; if ten hours' toil will reduce him to poverty, want, and death, in the name of humanity diminish his laboring hours and avert the calamity of overproduction.

Mr. McMILLIN. I offer the following amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this act shall apply to future contracts and future labor only and shall not be held as authority to control past contracts or labor.

Mr. McMILLIN. Availing myself of the notice I gave to the committee from which this joint resolution comes, I offer this amendment, and shall briefly give my reasons for offering it.

There is a bill which has been introduced into this House to settle past wages claimed by Government employés to the extent of a quarter of a million of dollars or more; and while I am opposed to this bill, yet, if it should pass at all, I desire that it shall pass in the least objectionable form. I do not think that it should be passed as a "sapper and miner" of another bill for the payment of large amounts of money out of the Treasury. If this money is due, or if the law is as is claimed by the gentlemen who advocate the bill now before us, the laborer has his remedy by going before the courts of the country as any other man would do and making claim for past wages. If that be the law he can get his money in that way; if it is not the law I do not think we should enact it as a quasi-judicial construction and thereby make it law in an indirect way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the trouble with this measure is that it is not in the interest of the toiling masses, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] It is a proposition to tax the toiling and farming millions for the benefit of the few hundreds in the employment of the Government. There are nine hundred and ninety-nine men out of the employment of the Government where there is one in it. These men work by contract ten hours a day, and I state it as my firm conviction that all over this country there are men who are working ten hours a day and more. Lawyers, members of Congress, farmers, and people who pay the taxes have to work ten hours a day at least. Now, the proposition is to give the Government employés as much for eight hours' work as is given in some communities for ten hours' work in private establishments. I think it is all wrong. The Government ought to contract for labor according to the custom and prices prevailing where the labor is performed; and to say that we will give Government employés 25 per cent. more than is given employés in private works is wrong in principle, and is taxing the people in a way that ought not to be done, and that I hope will not be done, in favor of a favored class.

I am not the enemy of the laboring classes, I am their friend; but I am the friend of the masses, and not of the few individuals only who are so fortunate as to labor for the Government.

The proof before the committee was, that if the Government has to have ten hours' work performed a day, which is frequently the case, it has, in order to get those ten hours' work, to pay 25 per cent. more than is paid in private establishments for the same service, or, in other words, has to pay for a day and a quarter.

I ask any candid man if this is right? The law on the statute-book says that the Government shall pay for services rendered the same amount as is paid by private establishments for the same services; and if this act passes, and if we go into this legislative construction of the law which stands upon the statute-book, why the effect would be that when the Government wants to get more labor than eight hours a day, they will have to pay 25 per cent. more than is paid by private individuals.

These are my reasons for being opposed to the bill in toto and favoring specially the amendment I offer. Let the laborers all over the land be protected, but do not tax and oppress ninety-nine to bestow peculiar favor upon a few.

Mr. GOODE. I wish to say a word about the amendment, and then will yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I should like to have the amendment read.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GOODE. I hope the House will understand that amendment, and if they do, it will not be adopted. Now, what is the effect of it? The effect is to preclude and shut off the workingmen of the country from the assertion of any claim whatever for the extra work which they have been required to do over and above the hours of labor prescribed by law. These men have a valid claim or they have not. If they have not a valid claim the amendment of the gentleman is wholly unnecessary. If they have a valid claim for the extra number of hours which they have been required to work, I submit to the House that it is manifestly unjust to cut them off in this way from the assertion of that claim.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will my friend from Virginia permit me to suggest the amendment does not have that effect. It is designed to explain this bill and to demonstrate it is not in the way of sapping and mining for the payment of claims under a false color.

Mr. GOODE. The whole effect of the joint resolution reported by the committee is to put an interpretation upon this law, in answer to the memorials of workingmen throughout the country, by which in the future the enforcement of the eight-hour law will be required. The gentleman's amendment is leveled at another bill, which is now under consideration by the Committee on Education and Labor, and it is better to postpone action until that question shall come before the House.

Mr. REED. What is the amount involved in that other bill which the gentleman refers to?

Mr. GOODE. The Committee on Education and Labor have addressed a communication to the Treasury Department asking for that information, asking to be informed how much has been paid under the act of 1872, covering arrearages of pay due from the date of the passage of the law in 1868 down to the President's proclamation in 1869. That much has been paid; but since 1872 other claims have accrued, and we have addressed an inquiry to the proper Department of the Government to know how much money will be required to meet those claims if they should be audited hereafter. That matter is now under consideration by the committee. I understand, however, they will not amount to more than two or three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me to explain?

Mr. GOODE. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the Government owes for past services, does the gentleman say that any law passed now would prevent the settlement of that account?

Mr. GOODE. That is the very point I make, that if the Government owes the money the gentleman's amendment is entirely unnecessary, and it is equally unnecessary if the Government does not owe it. The whole effect of the amendment is to put an interpretation upon the law which will prevent its enforcement in the future.

Another word. I wish the House to understand the question before they are called to vote upon it. We have been told more than once that in 1868 the Congress of the United States passed a law providing from and after that time eight hours should constitute a day's work. It was not the object of the law to control employment by private individuals. Congress did not undertake to prescribe contracts between man and man for labor, or between corporations and individuals. Congress only undertook to do what it had a right to do, which was to say that so far as laborers employed by the Government are concerned the Government would exact only eight hours a day, and that when it came to make compensation the Government would treat eight hours as a full day's labor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the debate will show you that when this bill was passed in 1868 there was a difference of opinion in regard to it. It was contended by Senator Sherman, and Senator Fessenden, and other distinguished Senators, this matter ought to be left entirely as a matter of contract between the Government and the laborer, while, on the other hand, it was contended strongly by Senator Morton, by Senator Hendricks, by Senator Buckalew, by Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, and other distinguished Senators, that this experiment ought to be tried; that the experience of mankind showed in the long run man could accomplish as much work by constant labor in eight hours as in ten; that the additional strength imparted by the additional rest and recreation would enable the workman to do as much work in eight hours as he could in ten; that if the Government got as much work in eight hours as in ten, the Government ought to pay the same price; that the improvement in mechanics and material development was such that now when the aggregate steam-power in the world is equal to twenty-five millions of horse-power, the necessities of mankind do not require that a human being should be required to labor as long as he did before these wonderful achievements of science and steam-power which have so distinguished the age in which we live.

That was the argument. The argument prevailed. The law was enacted. These workingmen come now, and they know their rights; they are familiar with the legislation; they know all about it; they have read the debates which occurred at that time, and they know what Congress intended. They come to Congress and in respectful terms present their memorial, and ask Congress to declare what was meant by this law, and to enforce it. It seems to your committee that the demand is a just and reasonable one, and we have reported this joint resolution in answer to memorials which have come from workingmen from one end of the land to the other.

The joint resolution ought to pass. This is a Government of law and of order. We require the workingman to obey the law, and sometimes find it necessary to invoke the strong arm of power to enforce his obedience to the law. Now, I ask Congress to say whether they will set the example, the bad example, of permitting its own officers to disregard a plain law, a law written so clearly, so explicitly, that he who runs may read? Will Congress permit this disregard and violation of a plain statute, or will they say to the highest official in this land, we will have one law for the high and low alike; we require the workingman to obey the law, and we require you to obey this law, because it is so written? That is the whole of it.

Mr. COX rose.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia one question: whether these memorialists are not exclusively the employés of the United States Government?

Mr. GOODE. Entirely so, so far as I am informed. The Government in this matter does not control anybody else.

Mr. COX. I have the floor, and will answer the gentleman from Minnesota. I will give the gentleman an abundant answer. There are petitions here for the eight-hour system from workingmen outside of the navy-yards, not Government employés. From a list I have in my hand it appears that more than two thousand workingmen of twenty States and various cities and towns have petitioned for this humane and just object. There are petitions from many thousands more yet to come. They plead that their brother toilers may have this legal contract with the Government thoroughly understood. They ask that it may be enforced; because if it be enforced between them and the Government it will be a cogent example to other employers to do likewise as to the hours of labor.

But I rose, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of answering what fell from my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] on yesterday. May I ask him to honor me with his attention? He seemed to think that there had been no test of this matter as to the hours of labor; no investigation, no report, no experiment as to the increased value of the work during the year, when eight hours were substituted for ten. I stated there had been such an examination and report. The gentleman sought information from my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] and not from a more authentic source, to wit, myself.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I sought it directly from the gentleman himself, at my desk, after his speech was over, as well as from the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. COX. I do not quite catch the gentleman's statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the gentleman from New York to say that, instead of resorting to him for the sources of his information, I went to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I desire to say that I approached the gentleman himself at my desk and received his answer.

Mr. COX. But not until after your speech was made. What, then, was the result of the experiment in the State of Massachusetts which I alluded to? To answer this, is most pertinent. That examination was made in the Springfield arsenal for the purpose of testing whether more work could be done during the year at eight or at ten hours per day. The result was a report to the Ordnance department of the War Office. This has been printed. I wish I had it before me. I refer the gentleman from Georgia, if he desires information, to statements made by gentlemen from Massachusetts in the last Congress. General Butler, who is most thoroughly accomplished in this kind of literature and politics, said on the 10th of May, 1878:

> The question was agitated in the country whether eight hours were not as long as men could work tending machinery and keep health and spirit and strength to do the daily task. That experiment had not been tried and it was necessary that it should be tried. It could not be tried by any manufacturer because his rivals working ten hours and forcing the labor would undersell him. The Government having a given class of work in its navy-yards and in its arsenals, having exact accounts kept of all the work that had been done under the ten-hour system, could by working its force eight hours and keeping a like account, find whether it was practicable within any near percentage for a man to do by machinery in eight hours that which he had done in ten.

The result was the report that the same percentage or more work was done in eight hours than ten. This must have been so, for various reasons, into which I will not enter now, but the same reasons will apply to all kinds of labor, as well in arsenals and armories as in navy-yards.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him——

Mr. COX. My time is limited. I cannot yield to the gentleman at present.

On the same occasion General Banks uttered these words of wisdom, drawn from his large observation:

> But if the eight-hour law which the resolution is intended to enforce shall succeed as other efforts of this kind have succeeded, it will in the end extend its beneficent and happy influence to labor of every class in every part of the country. In 1840 the President of the United States without any law at all, issued an order upon his own authority that the labor in the navy-yards of the United States and their workshops should be limited to ten hours. That was carried out, and the influence of that order was such that in nearly all of the labor establishments of this country wherever it can be applied from the nature of the business the ten-hour system of labor has been adopted, and is applied to men, women, and children. It has been applied to all the corporations and manufacturing and mechanical establishments of Massachusetts, and in most of the other States. No one proposes the re-establishment of the old system of twelve, fourteen hours a day, and even sixteen hours a day, as men, women, and children were worked in England some years since. Now, if the existing eight-hour law when thoroughly tested shall be found to be advantageous to the industries of the Government and the hands engaged therein, the example of the Government will be accepted as it ought to be and applied to the labor of the country generally, wherever it is applicable.

The system in England to which General Banks refers, which was reformed after a great struggle, aptly illustrates the need of this bill. The reasons which such statesmen as Macaulay used in the British Parliament, for the reduction of the hours of labor, there in the mines and factories, apply with more force, now that machinery has added to the number of the unemployed and lessened the hours necessary to produce the same commodities and articles.

Besides, if the hours of labor are lessened from ten to eight, there will be one-fifth more employés, and a better and wider distribution of the wages and benefits of labor.

In further corroboration of my statement, allow me to quote from Senator HOAR, of Massachusetts, on the 13th June, 1878:

That system of legislation was introduced in England, the hours of the day's work in the factory and in the mines and in many other employments being fifteen, sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen hours in some cases, until gradually nearly over the entire Christendom where manufacturing or mechanical labor is employed, the length of the workingman's day's work has been reduced to ten hours, and the remainder of the day has been his for self-improvement, for education, for labor, for comfort. That has been accompanied in the main (I do not speak of the changes which have taken place in hard times as compared with good times) with a steady increase during all the time of the rate of labor and a steady increase also of the amount of production.

The workingmen of this country desire of the Government, not legislation of the same stringency as has been resorted to in England in the case of females and of factory operatives, but simply that the Government will give its aid in trying the experiment. They claim that it can be demonstrated that, as a rule, as much can be accomplished in manufacturing and mechanical labor by a contract of eight hours' work as can be accomplished by requiring ten hours' work to be rendered.

Some experiments were made and some reports required in the Springfield armory, and with great reluctance, after repeated and peremptory calls by the House of Representatives upon the War Department, the very interesting result of those experiments was communicated to Congress and to the public.

So that my statement made upon yesterday is confirmed as to our own experiment; but it receives added strength by the experience of England. Why should we not in dealing with this subject treat it fairly? Why is it that corporations and monopolies can engage our legislative mind and flood our House with their schemes and make their riders at pleasure mount our appropriation and other bills, and this unselfish and benevolent legislation receive so cold a welcome or so harsh a repulse?

That English experiment of reducing the hours of labor has been tried in our country outside of Government employment. It was found to work well. Where the hours had been reduced in the old countries from sixteen to twelve and from twelve to ten there was bodily relief and mental cheer. There was more. There was moral and intellectual growth. Why not at least enforce this law made for this purpose and thus ascertain definitely whether this good result may not be obtained? If it be no more than a mere experiment is it not worth while for the Government to try it? Where else can it be tried so well? Is not the Government in a position to do it? Who else is in so good a position?

But, sir, there is another reason why we should interpret and enforce this law. To execute a law is a test of its merit. Does any one here ask for its repeal? You who oppose this bill dare not ask for its repeal in the face of the voters of this country, yet you ask or permit it to remain on the statute without enforcement. You make it a dead letter. Why not issue your mandamus or prescript to our heads of Departments and to our officers to execute it.

Another reason for this bill is that there is a diverse interpretation and a manifold conduct about this eight-hour law. What we want is uniformity, not variety and collision, in its interpretation and execution. The Navy Department, in October, 1877, at the request of myself and others, issued an order to equalize the work for the year at about eight hours. I insert this order:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., October, 1877.

GENTLEMEN: The working hours in navy-yards will be as follows:

From March 21 to September 21, 7 a. m. to 6 p. m.; from September 22 to March 20, 7.40 a. m. to 4.30 p. m., with the usual intermission of one hour for dinner.

This regulation is not designed to carry with it any present reduction of pay.

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

At present, in the navy-yards, the order is, for six months eight hours a day and for the other six months ten hours, and no reduction of pay. In the Philadelphia arsenal eight hours was the time all the year round, and in all other arsenals ten hours a day. In the fort on Staten Island it is nine hours in winter and eleven in summer. In moving the War Department into the new building the pay was for ten hours, if they worked ten; while, alongside, Colonel Casey paid his employés on another plan.

Where labor is employed in the Mint, Treasury, Printing Office, custom-house, and Post-Office eight hours a day is the time for all, while in other departments of Government labor, the time paid for is different. Why this ridiculous inconsistency in the execution of a law whose intent was clearly expressed at the time of its enactment? Why should there not be uniformity in its execution? Oh, yes; our Department clerks, when not at home voting or canvassing or having their vacations, work from six to seven hours a day only—from nine a. m. to three or four p. m.—and we pay them abundantly, pay them more than they earn, if it were well considered. They do not work more than half the time which they are required to work; at least that is my opinion as to a large number of them. In stating this I make a conspicuous exception of the lower class of clerks and the women.

Let any member go through the corridors of the Departments and look in the open doors; and, except the women who work faithfully, he will find a good many clerks, when not engaged in reading newspapers, talking politics and spitting tobacco-juice. There is no man in all the world like an American clerk for splendid spitting. There never were clerks or persons who could excel them in the flux of their salivary glands! [Laughter.] No country, sir, rejoices in such great prairies, wonderful rivers, large lakes, high mountains, and such a great people as our own beloved land; but in one thing, sir, we surpass the world and ourselves. Our American clerks can spit higher, spit farther, and spit more than any other people on the face of the earth—and get more pay for the performance! I still except the women clerks as to this salivary performance. Gentlemen who favor an increase of clerks' salaries upon appropriation bills, do it while opposing this bill to reduce the hours of fair labor for workingmen.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who spoke so eloquently on the greenback question had nothing to say upon this part of this subject. I wish he had brought his analytic ability to bear on it. I find that very few greenback men have joined us in this debate. They love to talk upon the subject of labor, and I should like to have heard from others of them besides the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. MURCH.] Why did not my reverend brother from Indiana [Mr. DE LA MATYR] say something to help us? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who made a powerful speech for greenbacks made the curious argument yesterday on this bill that we produced five billions of values or commodities in this country per annum and that it ought to be distributed equally among the people. I read what he says:

If we produce in the United States five billion dollars' worth of commodities in a year (and that is all we do produce, and probably more than we are producing now) then that $5,000,000,000 is all that there is to divide among the people of the whole country. That is not more than about $100 per capita. Now, it is a plain proposition to me that if we vote to give the workingmen who are employed by the Government more, we vote at the same time that the rest of the workingmen and producers of the country shall have less.

A marvelous argument! The Government employs or pays out about two and a half millions of the five billions referred to by the gentleman from Ohio to the Government employés, and yet to withhold this little two hours' rest and to save some pittance to the Government, and in spite of the law of 1862, which fixes the day's wages at the rate of the vicinage, he is ready to forget the pleadings of labor for this respite and relief. In spite of that law which is as yet unrepealed, in spite of the contracts made with the laborers under the law, in defiance of its interpretation by Congress itself on an appropriation bill, which I quoted yesterday, we find the gentleman from Ohio grudging to the workingmen this little amount of $\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. of his five billions, which is itself the product of honest toil!

My friend from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] well said that the workingmen are required, ay, and he might have added, at the point of the bayonet to observe the law. Let us set them the example. When we enforce the existing law it will be time to present to them the point of the bayonet for their lawlessness. If we would give them excuse for revolt in any direction, let us taunt and mock them by such non-executed laws as this eight-hour law.

Gentlemen forget that the last fifty years have inaugurated a new era of progress in mechanical science. We have improved machinery to such an extent that more work is done now in eight hours than was formerly done in thirteen or fifteen hours. By the machines in our ship-yards we do more work with one man than was done five years ago with ten. Our planing-machines and mill-saws with three men can now do the work of twenty men in the same time in which it used to be done. One machine will side more timber to-day with three men than twenty men formerly could do with the adz. Some advantage should inure to the workingmen, who are the inventors of these labor and time saving machines.

Do gentlemen consider, do they know the effect of improved machinery with which these workingmen compete? Do they remember that these workingmen are the very men that have saved labor and time by the invention of machines which have thrown many of them out of work? Is there no thought that they are the benefactors of our race, and yet suffer at first from their own benefactions; and will not members reflect upon this relation to the hours of labor?

Gentlemen tell us that the same rule as to hours of labor ought to be extended to workingmen outside of the Government employ. This was hinted by the gentleman from Ohio.

How can we make contracts with, or by Federal legislation affect, other than our own employés? Let us set the example of a fair day's work and wages, and as General Banks and General Butler argued last session, the manufacturers and other employers besides the Government will follow in the wake. I know from my own observation in my own district—although it is not a navy-yard district—that a great many of the workingmen live out of town, or in the suburbs; and if they are required to work ten hours a day, they have a tedious and weary walk after the sweat and labor of the day; or they must live in the city. If they have to work only eight hours a day, they have leisure to go to their homes outside of the city; and thus they are removed from the temptations to idle, carouse, and spend their wages. It is the universal experience that wherever the eight-hour rule has been adopted there is more sobriety and frugality, more mental and moral discipline. That is the experience both here and in England. It is the direct result of the reduction of the hours of labor.

It is not for Congressmen who sit here not more than one-half the months of the year and one-half the number of hours proposed in this bill, and who draw some $14 per day—it is not for us to call the workingmen to account because they are anxious to lessen their work from ten hours a day to eight.

It has been demonstrated in the discussion and in our reports that not only is there better and more work done under the eight-hour rule, but that there is more economy, decency, and morality as a consequence among the workingmen in the employ of the Government.

This, if true, should lift this bill above all frivolous discussion and commend it to good men in the interest of our Republic, that all just advantages should be given to the working class.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] which contemplates cutting off the laborers from their past earnings is unjust to that class. Why should they be cut off from that which they have honestly earned under the existing law? Suppose it has had varied interpretations; should that militate against their vested rights? These rights remain as long as they labor and the law is unrepealed. I made an appeal for this pay and this relief two years ago. I renewed it last year when the House passed our bill. I urged it yesterday with all earnestness for my constituents, who are industrious and skilled and should be beneficiaries of this law. I repeat, why not bring in your bill to repeal the law altogether? If not, why not enforce it?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. How much time have I?

Mr. MCMILLIN. You seem to have unlimited time.

Mr. COX. Then with the permission of the Chair I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. MCMILLIN. You say that experience has shown that the Government gets more real service performed in eight hours than in ten hours. Why, then, does the Government pay 25 per cent. more when it has to get extra labor done than it pays to its ordinary employés?

Mr. COX. The Supreme Court in deciding the case often referred to, said that eight hours was a legal day's labor, and we propose to pay for that labor the rates of the neighborhood per diem.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But if the Government can get as much labor as it wants under the eight-hour rule why does it pay 25 per cent. more when it needs extra labor?

Mr. COX. I have before shown that the officers of the Government construe the law differently in different places. I would rather have the pay uniform. It is but fair to the workingman——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, if it were not that I am a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, which introduced this resolution, I should not open my mouth, but I differ with the majority and must speak out. The legislation of this body has to be under the care of its committees, and each member of a committee is charged with the special duty of getting the facts and merits of a matter submitted to it, so that he can give those facts and reasons for his opinions on the merits which he is in honor bound to present to the House for their action.

Mr. Speaker, I must say in all candor that I cordially indorse the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MCMILLIN,] and not only do I indorse that amendment, but I think it ought to go further and provide that whenever a Government superintendent has charge of laborers on public works he shall see to it as soon as the eight hours have expired that those laborers shall be compelled to suspend work.

Now, the purpose of this resolution is to declare the legislative will, in other words what was the intention of Congress when it passed that act authorizing eight hours to be regarded as a day's labor, and entitled to a day's pay? If this resolution pass it will leave the construction of the law to the different departments of the Government and to the Court of Claims, so that they shall pay all these claims against the Government for past services, and, Mr. Speaker, instead of three or four hundred thousand dollars being taken out of the Treasury, the amount is more likely to be three or four millions if the resolution shall pass unamended.

It came out before the committee that at present in all the arsenals and armories and at public buildings now erecting all over the country, court-houses, custom-houses, &c., the rule is to have eight hours regarded as a day's work in winter and ten hours in summer.

It is beyond a question that the ten hundred and one claim agents in this city who have got these claims in their hands will be clamoring at the doors of the Treasury if this body places the construction on the acts of 1868 and 1872 proposed by the resolution as it came from the committee.

Sir, it was one of the reconstruction acts adopted by the republican party to control the presidential election in 1868, which, like some of their other carefully hatched chickens intended to prey on their neighbors, are now coming home to roost. The law was passed in 1868 to insure the votes of many thousand Government employés in order to carry the election, and in 1872 a reaffirmation was made by this House to control President Grant's second election by giving employment to tens of thousands of voters with the privilege on the part of the superintendent at the Government works to make eight hours a day's work for republican partisans and ten hours a day's work for the enemies of the republican party.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOODE. I now yield——

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish I had five minutes more.

Mr. GOODE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and then I will call for a vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. Some allusion has been made in this discussion to the work that has been done in the Springfield armory in Massachusetts, to the amount of labor performed there under the two different systems. As that armory is in my district, I think perhaps I may be able to state some facts that will be pertinent to this discussion.

In 1872 the Senate of the United States called for a report from the officers of the armory at Springfield, Massachusetts, and also from the officers of the arsenal at Rock Island, Illinois, in regard to the operation of this eight-hour law for the three years previous to that time. From the Rock Island arsenal came a report which applied entirely to the services and wages of out-door laborers, and therefore it did not furnish a test of the application of this system to day's work.

By examining Executive Document No. 72 of the second session of the Forty-second Congress gentlemen will find that the commandant at the Springfield armory gave a tabulated statement of the work done in the several shops there. He states in the outset that it will be necessary to remember that the processes of manufacturing in many of the departments have been changed and that it was not possible to make a statement covering the entire work. But he takes the several processes not changed and puts them in tabulated form. In that table he shows that under the ten-hour system men earned by day's work in one case $2.81 per day and under the eight-hour system $2.77. But the price per piece was reduced five mills each. Then, again, take another class of work. Under the ten-hour system $3.09 a day was earned and under the eight-hour system $3.13, with a reduction of four and one-half mills on each piece. Again, in ten hours $3.39 was earned, and in eight hours $3 was earned; but there was a dropping of one mill on each piece. The reduction in price was from the ten-hour time down to the eight-hour time, explaining in part perhaps, though not in whole, the less amount of compensation received. I have given only a few of the facts; there are many more. I will say, also, in fairness that some of the statements are the other way; but the bulk are as I have stated.

Now, the resolution before the House will not apply generally to the workingmen at Springfield, because they are employed by the piece. I think it will be seen that when the eight-hour system was adopted men who were employed under the new system set out to work so as to obtain just as much wages for eight hours as they had earned under the former system. Having earned $3 under the ten-hour system they wanted to keep up to the old rates, and to do so they worked all the harder.

I do not favor the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MCMILLIN,] because, as said by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] this joint resolution does not apply to past contracts. When we have before us a bill relating to past contracts it will then be time to discuss the merits and to attach to that bill such an amendment as may be desired. But such an amendment would be out of place on this joint resolution.

In the Forty-fourth Congress this question of arrears of pay was referred to the Committee of Claims. It was found by that committee that the Government had paid part of the arrears during a portion of the time in certain portions of the country. It may be fairly claimed that the other workmen are also entitled to arrears of pay; but they did not receive them because the act of Congress did not apply to and cover the whole time. I understand that a bill will be reported from the committee covering the surplus time. It is a fair claim, and will receive the just consideration of the House, I have no doubt.

Something was said yesterday by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MURCH] about Massachusetts having a ten-hour law which was violated. The gentleman is very much misinformed.

Mr. MURCH. I still say that the ten-hour law is violated in Massachusetts.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman renews his assertion and I renew my denial.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GOODE. I now ask for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts on the left of the Chair [Mr. RICE] desires a few minutes.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman was heard yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia desires to test the sense of the House before the expiration of the morning hour upon calling the previous question. By agreement he could yield thereafter to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to make a motion which will take precedence of that; it is to lay the joint resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order either before or after the previous question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would inquire if the previous question will operate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MCMILLIN?]

The SPEAKER. It will operate on the joint resolution and the amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The previous question would operate on both?

The SPEAKER. It would. There is but one amendment pending, the one presented by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MCMILLIN.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] to yield to me for a moment, in order that I may reply to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. MURCH.]

Mr. GOODE. I will do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MURCH] says that there are violations of the ten-hour law in Massachusetts. I have no doubt there are, as I also have no doubt that there are violations of several other laws. That ten-hour law was passed in Massachusetts in 1874, and applied to minors under eighteen years of age and to women employed in manufacturing establishments. Some of the employers have undertaken to evade and violate the law. But the gentleman ought to know that under a late decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts sustaining the finding of the superior court the Hamilton Manufacturing Company of Lowell has been fined for violating that law. That law is in force in the State of Massachusetts. I know it well because I live in a manufacturing community and have had daily opportunity to observe the working of the law.

Mr. MURCH. The gentleman admits that my assertion is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. I admit that there may be some violations of the law in Massachusetts. No doubt in Maine the law is sometimes violated.

Mr. MURCH. The Maine liquor law is violated.

Mr. ROBINSON. But in Massachusetts we punish people when they violate the law.

Mr. GOODE. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move that the joint resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. GOODE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 20, noes 112; less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. GOODE. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, to lay the joint resolution on the table, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 103, noes 52.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. COX called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being—ayes 38, noes 126.

Mr. RICE. I would like the Chair to state the question on which we are about to vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon laying on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution and amendment were laid on the table.

Mr. COX. Those in favor of the joint resolution will vote "no."

The SPEAKER. And those who want to kill the proposition will vote "ay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 127, nays 90, not voting 68; as follows:

Mr. WAIT. I am paired with Mr. ROSS. My colleague, Mr. PHELPS, is absent by leave of the House, on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My colleague, Mr. SIMONTON, is absent by leave of the House. As this is a non-political question, I suppose it is not necessary to announce his pair.

Mr. ARMFIELD. My colleague, Mr. DAVIS, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BAKER. If he were here, I would vote "ay."

Mr. COX moved by unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. MONROE objected.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 67) providing for a new propeller for the United States ship Alarm.

SPECIAL POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. JONES. I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider, the bill (S. No. 516) to extend the time of special postal service until service can be obtained by advertisement.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 286) to amend sections 1417, 1418, 1419, 1420, and 1624 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the Navy.

It further announced the passage of a bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three additional assistants in the Library of Congress; in which concurrence was requested.

SAILING DIRECTIONS.

On motion by Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) authorizing the Public Printer to bind in cloth two volumes of Sailing Directions for the United States Hydrographic Office was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

INDIAN PROTEST.

Mr. NEAL, by unanimous consent, presented the protest of Indian delegates against the establishment of a United States territorial government over the Indian governments of the Indian country; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTS.

Mr. NEAL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1839) to provide for the discharge of voluntary bankrupts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

FRED. CARLISLE

Mr. NEWBERRY, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution directing the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Fred. Carlisle $234, for services rendered as expert to the Committee on Public Expenditures; which, with the certified account, was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the bill known as the coinage bill; a bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, with amendments. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FISHER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FISHER. I yield the floor for a moment to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] that he may offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. KIMMEL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2, line 8, by striking out "412½" and inserting "460;" so that it will read: "and the weight of the dollar shall be 460 grains Troy." And in section 3, lines 6 and 7, strike out "412½" and insert "460;" so that it will read "into standard dollars of the weight of 460 grains Troy."

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, the first section of the bill which we have under consideration declares that the gold dollar shall be a unit. The second section declares that the silver dollar shall be a unit. And the third authorizes unlimited coinage. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] in his remarks upon the bill sought to commit, unequivocally, Mr. Hamilton to the idea of a unit of gold and a unit of silver. He quoted Mr. Hamilton as saying, in 1792:

Upon the whole, it seems to be most advisable, as has been observed, not to attach the unit exclusively to either of the metals, because this cannot be done effectually without destroying the office and character of one of them as money and reducing it to the situation of a mere merchandise—

Now, the gentleman from Ohio stops Mr. Hamilton just in the middle of a sentence, at a semicolon. Let us see what Mr. Hamilton says before he reaches the conclusion of the sentence—which accordingly at different times has been proposed from different and very respectable quarters; but which would probably be a greater evil than occasional variations in the unit, from the fluctuations in the relative value of the metals, especially if care be taken to regulate the proportion between them with an eye to their average commercial value.

That is what Mr. Hamilton said; and it did not suit the purpose of this bill for its author to quote Mr. Hamilton's sentence in full.

Now, sir, I favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] because it makes the legal value of the silver dollar approximate its bullion value. Mr. Hamilton wrote in 1792 prior to the erection of a mint in this country; and I want gentlemen to bear in mind that the specie of this country was to a large extent silver and not gold, because we were not a specie-producing country at that time. This fact is borne out by the statistics which the Director of the Mint furnishes in his report, because during the first twenty-five years after the erection of a mint in this country the value of the silver coined by this Government exceeded the value of the gold; and since that time to the present day the value of the gold coinage has exceeded silver more than five times.

Now, what was Mr. Hamilton discussing in this article from which the gentleman from Ohio quotes? The proposition was twofold:

First. What ought to be the nature of the money unit of the United States?
Second. What the proportion between gold and silver, if coins of both metals are to be established?

Now, Mr. Hamilton says on this point:

Contrary to the ideas which have heretofore prevailed in the suggestions concerning a coinage for the United States, though not without much hesitation arising from a deference for those ideas, the Secretary is, upon the whole, strongly inclined to the opinion that a preference ought to be given to neither of the metals for the money unit. Perhaps if either were to be preferred it ought to be gold rather than silver.

The reasons are these:

The inducement to such a preference is to render the unit as little variable as possible, because on this depends the steady value of all contracts and, in a certain sense, of all other property. And it is truly observed that if the unit belong indiscriminately to both the metals it is subject to all the fluctuations that happen in the relative value which they bear to each other. But the same reason would lead to annexing it to that particular one which is itself the least liable to variation if there be in this respect any discernible difference between the two.

Gold may, perhaps, in certain senses be said to have greater stability than silver, as, being of superior value, less liberties have been taken with it in the regulations of different countries. Its standard has remained more uniform and it has in other respects undergone fewer changes. As being not so much an article of merchandise, owing to the use made of silver in the trade with the East Indies and China, it is less liable to be influenced by circumstances of commercial demand. And if, reasoning by analogy, it could be affirmed that there is a physical probability of greater proportional increase in the quantity of silver than in that of gold it would afford an additional reason for calculating on greater steadiness in the value of the latter.

As long as gold, either from its intrinsic superiority as a metal, from its greater rarity, or from the prejudices of mankind, retains so considerable a pre-eminence in value over silver as it has hitherto had, a natural consequence of this seems to be that its condition will be more stationary. The revolutions, therefore, which may take place in the comparative value of gold and silver will be changes in the state of the latter rather than in that of the former.

That is what Mr. Hamilton said in the same article. But he says further:

A third ill consequence resulting from it is a greater and more frequent disturbance of the state of the money unit by a greater and more frequent diversity between the legal and market proportions of the metals. This has not hitherto been experienced in the United States.

Why? Because we were not a specie-producing country at that time. But Mr. Hamilton foresaw it, and what does he say?

But it has been experienced elsewhere; and from its not having been felt by us hitherto, it does not follow that this will not be the case hereafter—

The contingency Mr. Hamilton foresaw has just come upon us now—when our commerce shall have attained a maturity which will place it under the influence of more fixed principles.

Again:

There can hardly be a better rule in any country for the legal than the market proportion, if this can be supposed to have been produced by the free and steady course of commercial principles. The presumption in such case is that each metal finds its true level according to its intrinsic utility in the general system of money operations.

Further:

The only question seems to be whether the value of gold ought not to be a little lowered to bring it to a more exact level with the two markets which have been mentioned. But as the ratio of 1 to 15 is so nearly conformable to the state of those markets, and best agrees with that of our own, it will probably be found the most eligible.

Again:

There is scarcely any point in the economy of national affairs of greater moment than the uniform preservation of the intrinsic value of the money unit. On this the security and steady value of property essentially depend.

I favor this amendment because it makes the legal value of the silver dollar approximate its bullion value. Mr. Hamilton used the term "commercial value;" we say "relative bullion value in the two metals." Now, the point I make here is this: that the legal value has always been held subordinate to the bullion value, and it must conform to that standard.

Mr. WARNER. What is to determine the market value?

Mr. FISHER. I will explain that in a moment. It is to be regulated by the law of supply and demand. I will explain it if the gentleman will allow me to proceed. Now, if I misrepresent the gentleman from Ohio I will yield to him. He allowed me one interruption when he was on the floor, when I asked him the question whether his cotton valuation was based on gold or the currency of the country. I got that one question in after some trouble, and that was the only concession the gentleman made to me. Now, if in the course of my remarks I misrepresent the gentleman from Ohio I am willing to be interrupted, but otherwise I do not wish to be interfered with during my argument.

I say, in the second place, that it is impossible to maintain two units differing in intrinsic value, one being gold and the other silver.

Now, in the debate in this House on the coinage bill, in 1872, Mr. Stoughton, a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, made these remarks:

The silver coins provided for are the dollar, 384 grains troy, the half dollar, quarter dollar, and dime, of the value and weight of one-half, one-fourth, and one-tenth of the dollar, respectively; and they are made a legal tender for all sums not exceeding $5 at any one payment. The silver dollar, as now issued, is worth for bullion three and one-fourth cents more than the gold dollar and seven and one-fourth cents more than two half dollars; having a greater intrinsic and nominal value it is certain to be withdrawn from circulation whenever we return to specie payment, and to be used only for manufacture and exportation as bullion.

Mr. Potter said:

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill of importance. When it was before the House in the early part of this session I took some objections to it, which I am inclined now to think, in view of all the circumstances, were not entirely well-founded, but after further reflection I am still convinced that it is a measure which it is hardly worth while for us to adopt at this time. * * * This bill provides for the making of changes in the legal-tender coin of the country and for substituting as legal-tender coin of only one metal as heretofore of two. I think myself this would be a wise provision and that legal-tender coins, except subsidiary coin, should be of gold alone.

My distinguished colleague [Mr. KELLEY] said:

It is impossible to retain the double standard. The values of gold and silver continually fluctuate. You cannot determine this year what will be the relative values of gold and silver next year. They were 15 to 1 a short time ago; they are 16 to 1 now.

Hence all experience has shown that you must have one standard coin which shall be a legal tender for all others, and then you may promote your domestic convenience by having a subsidiary coinage of silver which shall circulate in all parts of your country as legal tender for a limited amount and be redeemable at its face value by your Government. But, sir, I again call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentlemen who oppose this bill insist upon maintaining a silver dollar worth three and a half cents more than the gold dollar and worth seven cents more than two half dollars, and that so long as those provisions remain you cannot keep silver coin in the country.

Now, I ask my colleague whether if this bill passes you can keep gold coin in the country when the difference is fifteen cents on the dollar?

Mr. KELLEY. With the leave of the gentleman I will return his question by asking him whether he can make a standard of that which fluctuates so much? As I then said, gold and silver fluctuate; and next I would say that I would keep both gold and silver coins in the country, but putting them, not at 15 to 1, which would expel gold, or at 16 to 1, which would expel silver, but at 15½ to 1, which would enable France and the Latin union to use both metals incidentally and indiscriminately and enable us to avail ourselves of both.

Mr. FISHER. Am I, then, to understand the gentleman to say that he does not hold to the same views which he expressed in 1872? Am I correct?

Mr. KELLEY. I humbly confess to the gentleman that I have learned something since 1872. [Laughter.]

Mr. FISHER. Then the gentleman, as I understand it, says to-day that what he said in 1872 was not correct. But I deny the gentleman his reasons. He says he has learned something. Now, that reminds me of a passage in Scripture: There was a young man who was born blind. His eyes were touched and his sight restored. The people were incredulous as to the fact, and when referred by the parents to the young man saying, "He is of age, ask him," the young man satisfied these incredulous people with this convincing reply: "This I know, that whereas I was once blind, now I see."

Now, I suggest to the gentleman that it would be a better excuse if he would rise here to-day and say that once he did see this thing clearly, but now he is stone-blind.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FISHER. I do not like to be interrupted.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, I dare say I shall find a time to reply.

Mr. FISHER. Certainly; I hope the gentleman will. In the next place, it has been customary to follow the bullion ratio of the two metals, and the laws have been changed to make the legal-tender value conform to the bullion value. I have here the law of 1793, the ninth section of which says:

Eagles each to be the value of $10 or units, and to contain 247½ grains of pure and 270 grains of standard gold.

That was found to be too high a valuation, and the result was that we had nothing but silver in circulation. The law of June, 1834, provides:

That the gold coinage of the United States shall contain the following quantities of metal, that is to say, each eagle shall contain 232 grains of pure gold and 258 grains of standard gold.

By this act the standard was reduced from 270 grains to 258 grains of standard gold. The same thing was done with silver coins at a later period. By the law of 1853 the weight of the silver half dollar was reduced from 206¼ grains to 192 grains. Why? Because during the period after 1834 silver became more valuable in proportion than gold, and the result was that all our silver was exported. Hence to retain it in the country the silver half dollar and smaller silver coins were decreased in weight.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] agrees with me upon this point. He says the honest way is to increase the value of a coin by adding to the weight of the metal in it. That is just what is contemplated by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL.] The gentleman from Ohio and myself agree that that would be better than cutting off eight grains from the gold dollar.

Mr. WARNER. Does the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. FISHER. I do; I thought I caught the gentleman's idea.

Mr. WARNER. I had not intended to convey that idea.

Mr. FISHER. That is what I understood the gentleman to say. But it does not affect the argument; that is the honest way of doing it.

In the next place, you cannot maintain a bimetallic currency or double standard unless the bullion ratio of value is preserved. From 1793, the date of the first issue of silver coin by the United States, to 1834, the silver dollar and the gold dollar were alike authorized to be received as legal tender in payment of debts; but silver alone circulated, as I before said. Subsequently, however, silver was not used except in fractional payments, or, since 1853, as a subsidiary coin. The silver dollar as a coin of circulation had become obsolete.

For thirty-one years there was not a silver dollar coined by the Government of the United States. Yet it is said here that these two metals were circulating together. It was an alternative standard, and not, strictly speaking, a double standard with two metals circulating side by side.

It will be observed that the act of 1857 did not touch the value of the silver dollar. Why? Because it was worth 3 or 4 per cent. above par and was practically out of the market. And from 1860 to 1870 the average annual coinage of these silver dollars was less than twenty thousand pieces.

The reason why prior to 1834 payments were made exclusively in silver, and subsequently to that date in gold, is found in the fact that prior to the legislation of 1834 the weight of fine silver in the silver dollar was fixed at fifteen times the weight of fine gold in the gold dollar. After that date, owing to a contraction in the weight of gold required for the standard gold dollar, the silver dollar was made to contain of fine metal almost precisely sixteen times that of the new gold dollar.

The actual market value of gold during the entire period had been greater than fifteen and less than sixteen times the value of silver of equal weight.

Therefore during the earlier period the standard silver coins were relatively the cheaper, and consequently circulated to the exclusion of the gold. During the later period the standard gold coins were the cheaper and circulated to the exclusion of silver, showing plainly that we did have an alternative standard.

Now, the cause of the depreciation of silver I hold was twofold. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] if I properly understood him, favors the idea of the English financier, Ernest Seyd, that the loss of value of silver is owing exclusively to what he terms the demonetization of silver by Germany. Of course silver was not demonetized by Germany, but gold was monetized. The fact that two hundred and fifty millions of silver was thrown upon the market by the German Empire is alleged by those gentlemen to be the sole reason why silver declined from sixty-six pence per ounce in the London market to fifty pence per ounce.

Now, I hold, as the French minister of finance, Leon Saye, did. I do not go as far as he, for he gave three reasons. Probably the third had some effect on the market.

The first reason was the lack of the demand, by the German Empire being no longer a purchaser. The second reason was the increased production by this country, because, you will recollect that prior to 1860 this country never in any one year produced as much as $5,000,000 of silver; yet within the last two or three years the production has been between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 annually. The third reason assigned by M. Leon Saye was the falling off of the demand from India, ascribed principally to the fact that she does not send as much cotton to England now since our rebellion terminated, by reason of the increased supply of cotton received from America.

Now, if we had one hundred and fifty million bushels of wheat as our surplus, and if we could sell one hundred million bushels to England and fifty million bushels to Germany that would just absorb our product. But if we have two hundred million bushels of wheat as a surplus this year, and if Germany has wheat enough of her own and does not come into the market for any, then, if we have England as a customer for one hundred million bushels, what is the result? We go into the market, we force our surplus product upon it; and, according to the law of supply and demand, we have a decrease in price. This is just what happened as to silver. Germany would take no more, and we would have more to sell than we have customers to absorb it; so the bullion price declines inevitably.

But it is argued that the supply of silver is inadequate to the wants of trade. Now, there were $137,000,000 coined from 1793 to 1873—a period of eighty years. Since 1873 we have coined nearly as much; $100,000,000 have been coined within the last six years. More than that, we coined last year more standard silver dollars of 412½ grains than were coined by the mint from 1793 to the close of 1877; in this calculation I do not count a single trade-dollar; I am speaking of standard silver dollars. There were only $70,000,000 of full legal tender silver ever coined in this country in dollars, quarters, halves, and dimes. Nineteen-twentieths of all this silver of full legal-tender value was exported prior to the act of 1853, and was not in the country. You say this law will give us silver. Certainly it will give us silver. Why? Because you propose to make a silver dollar of 412½ grains a full legal tender. Now, you can in the London market buy for a gold dollar 480 grains of silver; yet you propose that this Government shall make 412½ grains a full legal tender, equal to the gold dollar.

Why will this country be filled with silver if you pass this bill? I will explain. If there should be sent to this country from Belfast a cargo of linen goods, there would be sent along with it silver bullion to pay the duties; and as I hold under this bill, if the bullion is taken to the mint it is there to be stamped if not coined; and the person bringing it there is entitled to $1 for every 412½ grains of standard silver in the bar. He gets a silver certificate for the amount; he goes to the custom-house and pays his duty with this silver certificate. Thus the importer or foreign manufacturer has as profit the difference between 412½ grains and 480 grains on each dollar. Who loses? The American people lose.

This bill is a fraud and a cheat. It will rob the people of America; and it is in some respects a free-trade measure calculated to enrich the coin speculators and foreign manufacturers at the expense of the people. I commend this consideration to the attention of my distinguished colleague and teacher in protective-tariff principles—Judge KELLEY.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the gentleman will demonstrate his proposition.

Mr. FISHER. I have already tried to do so.

Mr. WARNER. There are several of us who would like to hear that demonstration.

Mr. FISHER. You might just as well entertain a proposition from my State that as pig-iron is too low in price we want you to give us the aid of the General Government in controlling the market so as to put the price up to $20 a ton. The farmers of the West have just as much right to come here and say "We, like the silver-producers, have raised an increased quantity of our product, and the price of wheat in the market has declined fifteen cents from what it was a year ago; we ask the aid of the Government to keep up the price of our products." If we undertake the unlimited coinage of silver dollars of 412½ grains, making them a full legal tender, and if we do this before other commercial nations are prepared to co-operate in fixing the relative values of the two money metals, and adopting the so-called bimetallic standard, how can we expect to maintain it? We shall signally fail; and it will practically result in forcing upon us a monometallic currency. We shall have only the silver dollar, which is the cheaper metal. We shall lose our gold year by year because the balance we owe we must remit in gold, while what will be due us will be remitted in silver. You cannot take passage on a British line of steamers and pay in dollars of 412½ grains. Every person going abroad must take gold or gold exchange. Silver is not recognized.

Mr. KELLEY. Is not the gentleman mistaken in saying that we cannot pay legal-tender dollars in the United States?

Mr. FISHER. To British lines I mean, if I did not say so.

Mr. KELLEY. I think that for every dollar you owe a British line you can pay a legal-tender dollar of 412½ grains of silver; if the company refuses the payment, it loses interest until it comes forward and accepts the tender. That is the law of the land.

Mr. FISHER. Letters of credit must be taken in gold. No person will go abroad armed with silver certificates. They cannot travel on them, as the gentleman knows just as well as I do.

Mr. KELLEY. The standard silver dollar is accepted in Paris and London at the same rate as the greenback.

Mr. FISHER. But the gentleman said by the act of 1873 values were reduced from eight thousand millions to forty-five hundred millions.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, if I have misquoted the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER. I did not say values had shrunk to that extent now. I did say that by that act it was proposed to reduce the money—the valuation from eight thousand millions of money to a valuation based upon forty-five hundred millions.

Mr. FISHER. Then the gentleman means that the act demonetizing silver reduced the value. What control have we over silver not in this country? Absolutely none. We do not affect the commercial or bullion value, not a particle. Do you question the statement? How much did we affect it? I will read from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency of 1876:

> The total coinage from 1792 to 1873 of the silver-dollar pieces, the demonetization of which was commenced by the act of 1834 and completed by that of 1873, was only $8,045,838, or a little more than $100,000 per year, while the coinage of silver pieces of a less denomination than one dollar was for the same period $137,106,046. It is not probable that there were more than $50,000 in silver-dollar pieces in existence in this country at the time of the passage of the act of 1873. From the discussion which has taken place since that time, it is evident that the repeal of the provision authorizing the issue of the silver dollar was most opportune and fortunate; otherwise the late extraordinary and unprecedented decline in the relative value of silver, due to increased production at home and demonetization abroad, would have completely driven our thus undervalued gold coinage from the country, leaving the overvalued silver as the sole specie basis of account.

The gentleman said that money is the wheel of commerce. He likened it to the oxygen of the air, the very life-giving property, but he forgot to tell us how much of this wheel was composed of silver. This nation does not do its business as either the French or the German. We have in every small town throughout the United States a bank, and our people are educated to bank paper. We always will use less gold and silver as a currency than any other nation in proportion to our population. I say to the gentlemen that but 2½ per cent. of the whole trade in this country is carried on by gold, silver, and bank-notes combined. I would further say that if we had all the silver of France and Germany thrown upon us to-day not one-hundredth part of 1 per cent. of the transactions of this country would be carried on with that metal.

Mr. WARNER. Then it will not come here under this law.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, you will bring it in under this law and it will be a dead weight. Why, sir, I know a firm in Pennsylvania that last year did a business of $600,000, and they received $10 in greenbacks, and fifty cents in silver, the balance in checks, drafts, and notes. Our people will not carry on large transactions with silver. If the gentleman should go West and ask the farmers upon the broad prairies to return to the old sickle for cutting their grain or to thresh it with the old flail they would think he had escaped from a lunatic asylum. We are just that much ahead of nations that use gold and silver in large transactions. If a man brings to another in the North a freight bill for $3,000 he does not spend three hours counting out coin, but draws a check for it in thirty seconds. Time is money with business men. We recognize it.

Mr. WARNER. Are checks money?

Mr. FISHER. They represent money just as much as your silver certificates represent money.

Mr. KELLEY. Would not silver dollars be a sufficient deposit upon which to draw checks?

Mr. FISHER. Oh, I grant that.

Mr. KELLEY. Then you grant away your whole case.

Mr. FISHER. No, there will be still enough to lie in the Treasury as a reserve.

Mr. KELLEY. To be drawn upon by checks?

Mr. FISHER. Now I wish to say a word to the gentleman on that point. I found last Saturday upon my desk a pamphlet, from which I will read a paragraph:

> The superior safety of silver is constantly receiving illustrations in current events. In the summer of 1877, according to newspaper reports, a train on the Union Pacific Railroad, temporarily in the possession of robbers, was carrying Government treasure in silver to the amount of $250,000, which the robbers let alone, from the impossibility of moving and secreting it. More recently, in August, 1878, a band of adventurers who had succeeded in getting possession, at midday, of the vault of a bank at Sedalia, Missouri, took all the money they found except the silver, of which there was $3,000. Under the necessity of an unincumbered flight from a pursuit which was certain to be immediate, they left that untouched.

Now, this writer might as well have gone one step further and advocated the substitution of iron because it would then be a physical impossibility for the robber to steal $5, which would be represented by six hundred and fifty pounds of pig metal. [Laughter.] Further, he makes a pointed argument against this bill because he shows that a robber who was hunting for valuables would not even touch the silver which these gentlemen say everybody wants.

There has sprung up in the course of the last few years a large number of these writers on political economy. Every one of them, I think in his own opinion, actually believes he is more capable of writing on this subject than Dr. Adam Smith, the author of The Wealth of Nations. They do not all come forth as authors. Some of them crop out here and force their financial theories upon us in the shape of petitions and bills asking for large grants of money. We have bills here asking for large appropriations for ship-canals and other great improvements. Now you always find in some communities, in fact in nearly every community, some men, a number of whom are possibly bankrupts, men that have never been able to manage their own little financial affairs, but who have industrious wives that are able to take in washing and do plain sewing and thereby support their families, while these lazy hounds have leisure time to discuss the financial affairs of this great nation. [Laughter.] They think that they know all about this great financial question. I have some of their productions, setting forth their financial ideas, in my desk. The gentleman from Indiana introduced a bill here asking for $1,000,000,000. I have a petition from my district saying "we want a thousand millions of dollars too;" it is not for the purpose of constructing ship-canals, not for large expenditures for slack-water navigation. They are more ambitious. They do not confine themselves to this terrestrial sphere but they propose to go out into the realms of space——

Mr. DE LA MATYR. If the gentleman referred to me as the gentleman from Indiana whom he associated with the class of people he was describing, I have only to say that his remark is contemptible.

Mr. FISHER. I am not speaking against the gentleman's bill; but when the Committee on Appropriations bring it to this House I want to amend it. I want a thousand millions, as I just remarked, for a few of my constituents who petition for it, for the laudable purpose of constructing a narrow-guage air-line railway to the moon, to ascertain whether or not that luminary is made of green cheese. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER. Is that because your party is going up? [Laughter.]

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I would like the gentleman to say whether he meant to associate me——

Mr. WILBER. Let one speak at a time.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. The gentleman spoke of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FISHER. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I will find an opportunity to answer him.

Mr. FISHER. I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] that I came here elected by my constituents upon this platform, and I carried my district the first time it was ever carried by the republicans.

Mr. WEAVER. That is good for you. I carried mine the other way for the first time.

Mr. FISHER. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] as I understood, spoke of the prosperity and the enormous profits of the year 1869. Now, I propose to show that this was entirely deceptive. The fluctuations of gold that year were from 1.20 to 1.65. How did that affect the price of commodities? In the year that the gentleman speaks of, 1869, as a year of prosperity mess pork fluctuated in price from $5 to $16.50 a barrel. We were on no stable basis.

Mr. WARNER. Compared with what?

Mr. FISHER. I am talking of the fluctuations during the year. I am not comparing. The prices of anthracite coal fluctuated that year from $6.50 to $10.50 a ton. If the gentleman wants to make a comparison with the year 1877 I would say that although the price was lower, coal fluctuated only fifty cents a ton throughout the whole of the year 1877, and mess pork fluctuated from $9.59 to $11.25, the natural consequence of our having approached nearer the specie basis. And you can take other items here in this statistical record, and they show the same thing. Now, I will not refer further to the gentleman's speech. How much time, Mr. Speaker, have I used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, in the chair.) The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. FISHER. I want to say that profit is the net earning. If a man earns $1,000 and expends $800 he has netted $200. If he is more fortunate the next year and earns $1,500, and becomes extravagant and expends $2,000 he is worse off, notwithstanding he has earned more. Now, nations are just like individuals. And when we come to the earnings of this country I want to see the balance-sheet. I propose to look at the balance-sheet of this nation in 1869 and 1877. But before I do so I desire to call your attention to a statement of the imports and exports of this country in some of the principal items of commerce, showing how much better our financial condition was at the close of the year 1878 than it was in 1869.

The imports of the two years were as follows:

Articles.	1869.	1878.
Woolens	$40,637,389	$24,724,047
Cottons	19,088,786	14,398,791
Hemp	5,785,762	2,314,290
Iron and steel	28,077,471	9,057,633
Linens	16,552,887	11,490,758
Silk	22,288,660	19,701,731

Thus showing a large falling off of our purchases abroad in all classes of merchandise and evidencing a spirit of economy rather than extravagance as controlling our people.

Again, look for a moment at the gratifying increase in the value of our exports. We sold to foreign nations in the two years as follows:

Articles.	1869.	1878.
Cotton	$162,633,052	$179,031,484
Cotton goods	5,874,222	11,435,628
Iron and steel	10,873,948	15,844,264
Corn	6,820,719	48,630,358
Flour	18,813,865	25,092,826
Wheat	24,383,359	96,872,016
Bacon	7,482,062	51,750,205
Lard	7,443,948	30,014,023

In 1869 this nation imported $417,000,000 of merchandise, and we exported $286,000,000. In 1878 we imported only $437,000,000 and exported $694,000,000. We sent abroad in 1869 $37,000,000 of our coin. Last year there was an exportation of only $3,900,000. The difference in favor of the United States between 1869 and 1878 was $495,000,000 on the right side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended. That courtesy was extended to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] the other day.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] who proposes to address the House upon this question I understand desires to leave this evening. Is he willing to extend the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FISHER. I do not wish more than twenty minutes.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. My case is a peculiar one. I have to leave to-morrow morning and will have to be absent a week. I do not, however, object to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

There was no objection, and Mr. FISHER's time was extended.

Mr. FISHER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] said it might be alleged that the cause of the increased burden was the shrinkage in values of commodities; he asked if the acres had grown smaller or the houses had shrunk, &c. I wish to say to the gentleman, in reply to that, that the houses and the acres have not shrunk, but the inflation of the value of property and acres has shrunk.

Now, I recall a property that cost $2,400 to build it, representing that much labor, &c., in value; it was sold three times prior to the war at varying amounts, from $2,400 to $2,800, and was sold in 1869, the very year the gentleman quotes for values, for $10,000, is worth to-day only $6,500, and yet it has not shrunk in value from $10,000 to $6,500. It would take as many ounces of gold to buy this property to-day as it did in 1869.

Mr. WARNER. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FISHER. I cannot yield to the gentleman now.

What has been the cause of our difficulties? Why, sir, it is extravagance and inflation which have led us into our troubles. From 1868 to 1875 the railroad debt of this country increased over two thousand million dollars, more than the national debt. I have a tabulated statement of the indebtedness of one hundred and thirty cities of the United States, showing the difference between 1860 and 1870, and the increase was from $221,000,000 to $664,000,000. Every city, town, and county was borrowing money to carry on improvements upon high-pressure principles, and we were not paying our debts, but piling them up higher.

Mr. Tilden never said a truer thing than when he said in 1876 that if we want permanent prosperity we must as a nation live within our income; that we violated the laws of supply and demand, and that was the reason why now the revulsion had come which was ruin to many men.

A word now as to the trade-dollar. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] asserted that the trade-dollar was a trick. Now, sir, when the gentleman said that, he knew that when the trade-dollar was coined, under act of February 12, 1873, it was made a legal tender. He knew that a bill was introduced by the honorable Speaker of the House in the month of May, 1876, and was brought in by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in June of that year, which provided that the trade-dollar should not have the legal-tender quality. The trade-dollar never became worth less than one hundred cents until in December, 1877, by greenbacks appreciating and becoming of more value than the trade-dollar. If fraud was intended, why not coin the standard dollar of 412½ grains? Twenty-five million trade-dollars were coined, when they were above par, prior to December, 1877. They were all exported, as they were too valuable to circulate. Coinage of them ceased in April, 1878, and they were coined only in 1878 for exportation. Had the legal-tender quality not been taken away from the trade-dollar by the bill introduced by Mr. RANDALL and reported by Mr. COX, and voted for by some here who denounce this dollar, we never would have had any trouble with this coin owing to California bullion speculators shipping them to the Eastern States.

Now, I am in favor of taking up the trade-dollars we have in this country, exchanging legal-tender silver dollars for them. Some are coming back to us, it is true, but they have not all come, nor will they—the larger portion have been melted in China—but some of them have. I have one in my hand that has come here from China, stamped with the Chinese characters of indorsement, and I will hand it to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] and ask him to read the inscription upon it.

Inasmuch as we declare in section 3513 of the Revised Statutes that it shall be a coin of the United States, we should take up these trade-dollars; but, like the gentleman from Colorado, I am in favor of dressing up silver as we do merchandise, in any form or shape that foreigners want. We manufacture prints of certain kinds and patterns to suit the South American trade. We gave the Chinese a silver dollar which they wanted, but we do not want to circulate it at home. But why, I ask, go to the unnecessary expense of this unlimited coinage? Every gentleman upon this floor knows that no international Congress would ever agree to overvalue silver as you do by this bill. I ask how, if you get two hundred millions of these silver dollars of 412½ grains, as you can and will do from customs, which you will keep in your Treasury, you propose to avoid the trouble and loss entailed upon the people if France, by following the example of Germany, forces the price of silver down from fifty pence an ounce to forty pence an ounce, and thereby entails a direct loss upon the Treasury of $40,000,000?

That is the effect of the bill. Do you propose to go on and be still a purchaser saying that silver must be worth $1.20 or $1.25 an ounce while the world says that it is only worth $1 to $1.10 an ounce? I do not claim for this amendment that it will correct all the evil contained in this bill, but it will lessen the evil and measurably provide an honest dollar, and then when England and other nations assent to fixing the ratio at which the two money metals may circulate freely, we may hope to have a common coinage of gold and silver for the entire world of the same value in every country, but I will never consent to be so unjust to our own people as to favor any attempt to fix an arbitrary value on any commodity whatever in defiance of the principles of the great law of supply and demand. I believe my position and argument can neither be questioned nor controverted.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I shall support the bill reported by the committee, but I shall make an effort at the proper time to have some amendments placed upon it in order to make it meet the views of the people as I understand them. I do not think it proposes an adequate measure of relief for the distress which they are suffering, nor do I deem it a full response to the demand they have made upon their Representatives, a demand, as I understand it, for the full restoration of silver to Government coinage, and its full investiture with all the functions of money.

In legislating upon this question the statesman will fall far short of the object sought to be obtained by the people, if he loses sight of one great fact, and that is, that the country is overwhelmed with indebtedness; that it groans under an enormous national debt; that all the States are indebted; the counties are indebted; cities are indebted; corporations are indebted, and the vast body of the people are confronted day by day with individual indebtedness. The great occupation of our people is tax-paying. They live to be taxed. The tax collector, like the poor, they always have with them. When they have paid their taxes to the town or city collector to meet the demands of its creditors, scarcely has his footfalls ceased to resound upon their threshold until the county collector comes with the demand of the county's creditors; as he departs he meets another coming to exact taxes to meet the bonds of the State's creditors; and when he goes the last, but not the least, comes and says "pay that thou owest" to the nation's creditors. It is taxation, taxation, the only message that comes to the toil-ridden people from the interest-bearing but not tax-paying bonds of the public creditor. What is the volume of this vast debt that is now resting upon the shoulders of the people? Have you thought of it? The silver commission estimate it at about twenty thousand millions. I hold in my hand a book recently published by Mr. Jones, who shows great familiarity with statistics, and in summing up the figures which he presents he says:

> We put the aggregate indebtedness of all kinds and of all classes of people in the United States at not less than $25,000,000,000.

How did we get into this unhappy condition? How did the people become so overwhelmed with debt in all their city, county, State, national, and private affairs. It was done during the war and after the war when we had eighteen hundred millions of currency in circulation. It was done when we had a paper money greatly depreciated under the metal currency. Whenever there are two or more currencies in a country, by what is known as Gresham's law, the cheaper drives out the dearer money, and itself becomes the only money in which accounts and contracts are expressed and by which values are denominated and exchanged. The constant increase of the volume of money caused it constantly to depreciate from the gold standard. Coin left the country or hid itself in strong boxes. All the prices of property everywhere in the land were increased just in proportion as paper money increased. All the property of the country took its value by the paper standard, and all the debts of the people were contracted to be paid with the same money.

Let us see how the country was affected by this condition of things. From the value of all the property in the United States in 1860 and 1870, as given by the census, it will be fair to estimate the national wealth in 1865 at twenty-five billions in gold. At that time the paper money, the cheaper money, the standard of value and exchange, was at 50 per cent. discount as compared with gold. If the value of all the national wealth in 1865 was twenty-five billions in gold, and one gold dollar was worth one and a half dollars in paper, then the national wealth in paper money was thirty-seven and one-half billions. The people who owned this property owed a debt, as we have seen, of $25,000,000,000 of paper money, worth, at the same discount, sixteen and two-thirds billions in gold. The property was mortgaged by either standard for two-thirds of its value, and even to maintain the situation at what it was the prospect of the people was indeed a very gloomy one. But eastern capitalists, who are the bankers of the nation and who have managed to keep the working people enslaved to them, soon discovered that the rag-baby must be exiled and we must return to the metallic standard—the money of commerce.

They knew that every dollar of paper that was withdrawn from circulation would increase the remaining amount in value just in proportion to the amount withdrawn, and so they induced Congress to take the surplus and pay them interest on it, and thus the money left in circulation was as valuable in the purchase of property as the whole had been. Under their influence Congress began the work of contraction and embarked on the wild hunt for "honest money." As the supply of money in the market grew scarcer, it became more and more valuable and its purchasing power increased day by day. All property and all the products of labor were depreciating in value in the same proportion. Day by day labor became more and more unprofitable. Exchanges and investments were stopped; enterprises were abandoned. Capitalists refused to invest their money in any kind of property when all was sinking lower and lower with every swing of the pendulum. Money was withdrawn from all the channels of industry and locked securely in the vaults, where it was idle, yet growing more valuable every hour.

On the 1st day of January, 1879, paper came to par with gold, and all the property in the land came to be measured by the same standard. The same property that was worth thirty-seven thousand five hundred millions in paper was then worth only twenty-five hundred millions in paper or in gold, for they were then at par. But did the debts shrink in the same proportion? The twenty-five billions of debt in paper was worth only sixteen and two-thirds billions in gold. When the paper dollar came to par with gold the twenty-five billions of paper indebtedness became the same amount in gold. Therefore, while the property of the people was being deprived of its value and reduced from $37,500,000,000 to $25,000,000,000, the debt rolled up to meet it; and while Congress took from the people's property twelve and a half billions of dollars they added to the burden of their indebtedness eight and one-third billions more. And this is the condition of the country to-day. Vast wealth has grown up in the hands of a few and general indebtedness and financial distress has been left to the whole people. All this thing has been done by decreasing the amount of money in circulation, giving interest-bearing bonds for non-interest-bearing notes, aided by an unjust system of taxation. Some of the same persons who aided in the accomplishment of this great victory now deny that the decrease of the money in circulation had anything to do with the prices of property. Were it not for this position now taken by some of the contractionists I should not think it necessary to cite an authority to sustain it. Ricardo says:

> That commodities would rise or fall in proportion to the increase or diminution of money, I assume as a fact which is incontrovertible.

Mill says:

> If the whole money in circulation was doubled, prices would be doubled. If it was only increased one-fourth prices would rise one-fourth.

Mr. Calhoun says an increase in the volume of currency—

> Increases the nominal value of the aggregate property of the country in the same proportion that the increase bears to the whole amount of currency, so that if the currency be doubled the nominal value of the property will also be doubled.

I take it to be "incontrovertible" that property does increase or decrease in value in proportion to the increase or decrease of money in circulation. To control prices the money must be in market to respond to demand, not hoarded with misers. Money like blood must circulate through the entire system to preserve the life and health of the body-politic. When locked up in bank or piled up in the public Treasury it has no more influence over prices than if it were still locked in the vaults of the mountains where nature hid it. It regulates prices only when it is found in the markets seeking exchanges of commodities. Mr. Mill says:

> Whatever may be the quantity of money in the country, only that part of it will affect prices which goes into the markets for commodities and is there actively exchanged against goods. * * * Money hoarded does not act on prices.

The financial policy adopted by Congress since the war not only reduced the volume of money and effected a reduction of the value of property by that means, but by a vicious system of taxation imposed upon consumption congested the circulation in the industrial system and forced more than half the entire circulation into money centers in the East, where it has no more influence upon prices than if it had never been dug out of the mines, but when removed from circulation it aided most effectually in reducing prices of property and making money, stocks, and public securities more valuable.

In pursuance of the same object, to make money as valuable as possible and property as much less valuable, the next thing to be done was to wage war on silver and strike it from our money of account. A few years ago the money-changers were constantly singing the praises of the money of commerce, of civilization. Silver and gold were declared to be the money of our fathers and all their righteous indignation was kindled against paper inflation, and the greenback dollar, though in the dark days of civil strife it had been christened "bloodstained" and "battle-born," was condemned like a heretic to expire in flames. The war was to be waged for the extermination of silver and they moved toward their purpose like sappers and miners underneath the feet of the people, where they could not be seen, and so adroitly was it dispatched that no one knew when the deed was done. The capitalists and money-kings of Europe joined in league with their transatlantic kinsmen and silver was destroyed in both continents. In that act was committed the most gigantic crime that has ever been committed against the toiling and moneyless millions of the world. All the silver money in this country and in Europe was destroyed and gold was left sole monarch of the situation.

All silver—about one-half of the circulation of the civilized world—was demonetized and gold alone was made the measure of value of all property, and that property lost value in exact proportion to the amount of silver money taken out of circulation. Property is still depreciating, and must continue to depreciate as long as gold is left as the only money by which its value is measured; and the ratio of that depreciation will be the ratio in which the products of labor shall increase faster than gold. Last year I read with a shudder an address delivered before the Social Science Association of New York by Mr. J. S. Moore on the subject of the indebtedness of our cities. He showed that one hundred and thirty cities had increased their debts since 1860 faster than the aggregate of all the property contained in them. The debts were growing larger by accruing interest, and the property was falling behind. What an alarming condition of things! If it is true of these cities, is it not also true of all other cities and of the people of all the rural districts? Is not all the indebtedness of the people increasing at a greater ratio than their property is increasing in value? The price of all the products of labor is still sinking like a lead-line sounding for some lower deep upon which to rest. While the whole country is in utter prostration, labor seeking employment in vain; while thousands of people in Pennsylvania, through one of their Representatives, are urging us to give them the means of flying from their homes to hunt labor and bread under other skies, another Representative from the same State, in the face of this deplorable condition of things, forgetting the strikes that made his State tremble through all her borders, forgetting that the military had been summoned to shoot down the people in the streets to make them suffer patiently the pangs of starvation, rises upon the floor and demands that the shrinkage shall still continue and the suffering be still further increased, and this to satisfy the greed of the few capitalists and holders of stocks and bonds in the United States.

It is time, sir, that we should turn and make an effort to extricate the people from the peril of their position. We should diligently inquire if there be any remedy for the malady that afflicts the nation. When I look at the situation it seems to me that the Almighty in His kind providence toward us has through the unwise statesmanship of Europe provided a way by which we may escape from this "valley of the shadow of death." They, too, in obedience to the will of the money-changers, struck silver from their monetary systems, and took from it the value that money function gave it and left it a commodity with only its commodity value. They decreased its value from par with gold to 16 per cent. discount, and it is on the market to-day seeking some one to purchase it. Our own mines are turning out forty to fifty millions every year that is in market at the same price. Our greenback Treasury note is at par with gold, and consequently worth in the dollar sixteen cents more than silver not made legal tender. We owe a debt of $1,800,000,000 that may be paid at the option of the Government in either gold or silver. A great many people believe that we may pay it legally and morally in legal-tender Treasury notes, and I among them; but all agree that we may pay in silver. Of the two thousand millions of our national indebtedness, eighteen hundred millions were originally payable in greenbacks or legal-tender Treasury notes. The bondholders claimed that they were entitled to coin and demanded, like Shylock, the pound of flesh that covered the heart.

In March, 1869, they induced Congress to pledge the public faith of the Government that all its indebtedness should be paid in coin, dollar for dollar, and, by that act of compliance, added to the burden the people were bearing six hundred and seventy-eight millions, for which the people never received one farthing of consideration. That debt in all its huge proportions now stands before us to be paid in coin. Capitalists, bondholders, and bankers do not want it paid. It is a basis for national banks to stand upon, and to take up their bonds is to terminate their existence. To them "the public debt is a public blessing." Manufacturing corporations do not want it paid, because the hundred millions of interest we have to pay annually is a plea for high tariffs that give them large bounties. Capitalists do not want it paid, because the interest-bearing bonds of the Government are the best investments for their huge piles of wealth. To all these the public debt is a great blessing, and consequently they contend for its payment in gold, because that is impossible; they oppose payment in silver, because that is possible and can be performed within a few years. To all the millions who live by labor the public debt is an unmixed evil. It is a huge obstruction in the path of their prosperity, and an obstruction it is imperatively necessary that they should remove, and remove as speedily as possible. Whom are we here to serve? If the people, it is our duty to purchase the silver bullion with gold, or Treasury notes, or legal-tender silver; coin it and pay the debt as fast as possible. If we are here to serve those who make money with money, capitalists, bondholders, and national bankers, if they, and they alone, are to be consulted, then we will refuse to coin silver, refuse to pay the public debt, refuse to reduce taxation, but amuse ourselves in singing the praises of "honest money."

Sir, we are sent here by the toiling masses who work in the great hive of American industry charged to promote the general welfare, and we should in their interests utilize all the silver we can obtain in discharging the public debt and in affording the people an opportunity to liberate themselves from private indebtedness that threatens them with so much of distress and suffering; for of all the tyranny that ever oppressed a people fiscal tyranny is the most cruel and remorseless. To-day the greenback dollar and the gold dollar are at par; each is worth sixteen cents more than the demonetized silver dollar. We have the right, "so nominated in the bond," to pay the public creditor in silver. Having the right to pay in either of the two metals, why should we not pay in that which makes the burden easiest on the people? In any individual transaction would not any man be deemed a lunatic who would pay a debt in gold, at a premium of sixteen cents on the dollar, when he had the legal and moral right to pay in silver? If one of you held my note for a hundred dollars, payable at my pleasure in either gold or silver, do you suppose I would pay you gold when a silver dollar was worth sixteen cents less? Is there a gentleman on the floor who would do it? Not one. If you would not do this in your own private business, what right have you, as the trustees of the people, to pay their debt in gold when their interest requires and their rights demand that it should be paid in silver?

I am, therefore, in favor of unlimited coinage of silver by the Government for itself, and not free coinage for the bullion-holder. The mints should be operated to their utmost capacity to coin silver bullion purchased by the Government into legal-tender money. Every denomination of coin should be full legal tender and belong to the Government, and should be applied as fast as coined in the payment of the public debt. The bill of the committee authorizes the mints to be operated in the interest of the bullion-holder instead of the Government. The Government is to coin the money free of charge to the bullion-holder, and all the benefit of coinage is to accrue to him except such benefit as the people derive from an increased circulation. This, it is true, is an advantage to them, but they would derive the same advantage by the Government purchasing the silver and coining for itself. In both cases the coins will go into circulation. The people will get the benefit in an increase of prices of their products under both plans, but the Government will only get the benefit of the money by purchasing the silver, coining it, and applying it to her debt. It is no very insignificant item that the Government makes a profit of over ten millions in every hundred millions of silver coined by purchase, and the bullion-holder would make that amount with free coinage.

The Director of the Mint tells us in his report for 1878 that with $21,057,369 he purchased silver enough to coin $23,176,665, showing a profit of over two millions on the purchase—a profit that would exceed ten millions in every hundred millions purchased and coined. One of the significant facts connected with the transaction is that thirteen millions of the purchase was paid for in legal-tender silver dollars. How did thirteen millions of silver dollars exchange for fourteen and a quarter millions of silver dollars? Is not one silver dollar equal to another silver dollar? Not necessarily so. Our standard silver dollar has 412½ grains of standard silver, and is worth in gold one hundred cents. The Mexican dollar has 417¾ grains of standard silver; it is worth in gold eighty-five and a half cents. The trade-dollar has 420 grains standard silver, and is worth eighty-six and a half cents in gold. How is this that the Mexican dollar and the trade-dollar each have more silver than our standard dollar, and each is worth less? The answer is that everything that has value takes it in proportion to the uses to which it may be applied, and the silver dollar of 412½ grains is a legal tender in payment of all sums, and neither of the others is. Each of the others has its commodity value. The standard dollar has its commodity value plus its money value, which makes it equal to the gold dollar, which, at 25.8 grains, is the unit of value. The trade-dollar and Mexican dollar are coined silver, but not money.

The Government confers a great value on the coin when she coins it and makes it a legal tender, and that advantage she ought to retain for the people, and not bestow it on the bullion-holder. The Government ought to continue to purchase silver as long as it remains under par or at par, and I apprehend it will remain in that condition for some time yet. Unless the mines of silver become exhausted, and that we know is impossible for generations, for the mines of Chihuahua, the richest in the world, are only touched upon the surface; or unless there should be some new discoveries of gold in vast quantities, which is wholly improbable; or that silver should be remonetized by the commercial powers of Europe, which it will take years to accomplish. There can be no improvement in the condition of silver except such as our demand may make if we continue to purchase, and purchase in larger quantities. The purchases we have made had no effect whatever in arresting the depreciation of silver; the last purchase was cheaper than the first. Silver is but a commodity in the commercial world, and, like cotton, wheat, and corn, has only its commodity value. Gold is the money metal, and all values are measured by it. Therefore, just in proportion as all products of labor, silver included, increase faster than the money that measures them, just in that proportion will they depreciate in value, for the appreciation of money is the depreciation of all commodities, all other things being equal.

The measures proposed by the committee do not go far enough. Their faces are in the right direction, but they are too timid and halting. We should, either with the gold in the Treasury or by a new issue of legal-tender Treasury notes, or with both, purchase three hundred or four hundred millions of silver bullion, coin it into legal-tender silver, and pay that amount of the bonds that are now due or to become due in 1881. If we should purchase three hundred and fifty millions of silver with Treasury notes, and apply it in payment of the public debt, we would increase the volume of our money seven hundred millions, reduce the debt to fourteen hundred and fifty millions, and save annually twenty millions of taxes. Under the plan proposed by the committee the volume of money will be increased three hundred and fifty millions, but there will be no reduction of either the debt or taxation. Would our coin circulation be too large with that amount added to the present volume? On the 30th of June, 1878, the Director of the Mint estimated the gold and silver, coin and bullion, in the United States at three hundred and thirty-two millions, of which three hundred and seven millions, as I am informed, was coin. Of this amount about two-thirds is hoarded in the vaults of the Treasury. There is not more than one hundred and twenty-five millions of coin, nearly all gold, in the United States outside the Treasury, and that is kept within the little circle of importers, bondholders, and custom-house collectors. Gold must be paid on imports, and is bought by the importer from the bondholder and paid to the collector of customs and he pays it to the Treasury, from which it is paid again as interest to the bondholder and takes again the same circuit.

There is very little coin in circulation among the people of the United States, and when we get three hundred and fifty millions we will not have as much in circulation as France has. With only about thirty million people living in a country not as large as Texas, she has over four hundred million of coin in circulation. The coin in the United States does not enter into the general market and influence prices; it is in the Treasury, the banks, and the vaults of the capitalist. A large amount of the paper is in the same keeping and has little influence upon prices; so that I can see no danger to be apprehended from "flooding the country with silver." The plan of the committee is to receive silver bullion on deposit in trust and issue silver certificates for its value, the silver to be retained and exchanged again when demanded by the holder of the certificate. Under this contract the Government can never coin the silver or get rid of it. The certificates being more convenient to handle than the bullion and equally valuble, it will never be demanded, but the Treasury will have to hold it in its crude and worthless state waiting for a contingency that will never happen. Why do they introduce a new kind of money into our system? Why not issue, instead of a silver certificate that is to be received in payment of taxes, the legal-tender greenback, the most popular money that ever circulated in the United States? We keep our people confused with so many different kinds of money, and all having different functions to perform. We should only have gold, silver, and Treasury notes; and all the denominations of each a legal tender for all sums. Instead of this, we have the gold dollar with unlimited function; the Treasury note with limited function; silver still more so; the national-bank note with certain limited powers different from the others; then the gold certificate; now the silver certificate; and coming close behind is the "goloid" dollar. All this catalogue of different kinds of money is not demanded by the common welfare. There are classes to be served by these distinctions, and Congress ought not to give the Government power to make any but money that is to be honored in every transaction. An intelligent American author very appropriately says:

> One kind of paper of various denominations, a full legal tender, in sufficient volume to meet the commercial needs of the country, is immeasurably better than the variety we now have. It is the one thing needful in finance.

There is another provision of the bill that should be amended. It provides for the unlimited coinage of silver and at the same time demonetizes it. I cannot see what use there is in coining the silver if it is not to be used as money. There are three functions that money must possess, it matters not out of what it is made. It must be a measure of values, it must be a medium of exchanging value, and it must pay debts. To coin money and deprive it of either function is to take from it that which makes it money. To take from it its compulsory debt-paying power is to deceive the man who holds it. By your coinage and stamp and the impress of your sovereign symbols and mottoes you say it is your national money, while by law you say it is not and shall not be.

Money without compulsory debt-paying power is like a king without either throne or scepter, a mere pretender. Money that is not a legal tender cannot be a correct measure of value, because the legal tender money is the correct measure of value and that which has not that function is less valuable. Neither is it a perfect medium of exchange. It creates obstructions instead of facilitating exchange. If a man owes a debt of $200 and places five bales of cotton on his wagon and takes it to town to sell to obtain the money he is met by a purchaser and offered his price, and counts it out in silver half dollars. But the seller says, "The man whom I owe says he will not take silver; it is only a legal tender for $5 and my debt is two hundred; I must have gold or Treasury notes." But gold is not in circulation, and if it was it and the Treasury note are worth more than the silver because they are both legal tender. Here is an interruption and a chance for a misunderstanding. The seller or buyer must lose the difference, or the trade must be broken off. If the seller loses he must sell more cotton to obtain the requisite sum. These vexations are occurring all the time. The merchant is taking in the fractional silver coins through the day or through several days, in small purchases; he cannot refuse them without injuring his trade. Very soon he gets so much that it is in his way and he desires to purchase a check and remit to his creditor but the banker does not want it and he is discounted. The same thing occurs with railroads. The defect in the money is that you cannot compel it to go. The remedy is simple: make it a legal tender and then it keeps going. Every one will take it without hesitation when he knows he can compel his creditor to take it. When all our money is full legal tender, then it flows along without hinderance or interruption. Mr. Macauley in his history, speaking of the same want of uniformity in the English money and the trouble that ensued from it, says:

> Nothing could be purchased without a dispute. Over every counter there was wrangling from morning till night. The workman and his employer had a quarrel as regularly as the Saturday came round. On a fair-day or a market day the clamors, the reproaches, the taunts, the curses were incessant, and it was well if no booth was overturned and no head broken.

This was the result of the Government demonetizing her old coins that were worn or clipped or filed. It could all have been prevented by the Government honoring its own coin and making it good for its nominal value as long as it remained in circulation.

Professor Sumner, in his work on American Currency, tells us of the same condition of things in the United States after silver became more valuable than gold and the new silver coins were exported and old worn Spanish coins come to take their places. He says:

> All the worn-down Spanish pillar-pieces came here because they had a value here higher than anywhere else in the world. While the mint was coining fine American pieces, scarcely one was to be seen in circulation. The people were obliged to use the smooth shillings, which produced a quarrel at almost every exchange, as to whether you could "see the pillars," until some one crossed them and they sank into unquestionable dimes.

To these objections the committee answer, we are coining the standard dollar and making it a legal tender. But I answer there are but few of them coined. There were only eight million coined from the foundation of the Government to 1878, while two hundred and thirty-seven millions of the fractional coins had been struck. The half dollar has always been the popular silver coin, and always will be, simply because of its convenience. The great body of our coinage now is fractional silver that the bill says shall not be legal tender. The only legal-tender silver coin we are permitted to have is the dollar, and the Government is to be prohibited from coining it unless somebody having silver directs it to be coined into dollars. The only coin the Government retains the right to make is that which the bill says shall not be money. These strange provisions in this bill I cannot understand. I cannot see any reason whatever for demonetizing the great body of our subsidiary silver coin.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman means fractional.

Mr. MILLS. Well, fractional.

Mr. STEPHENS. We made it subsidiary in 1873.

Mr. MILLS. I speak of it as a class of coin, whether it be called subsidiary or fractional.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is the gentleman aware that while we were not coining the standard dollars under the law the Mexican dollar was a legal tender here and answered all the purposes of our own coinage?

Mr. MILLS. There was hardly any of it in circulation.

Mr. BUCKNER. It was the entire circulation in the West.

Mr. BRIGHT. It was not a legal-tender.

Mr. MILLS. What I wish to impress upon the House is that the fractional silver money of the United States has always been the popular silver money, and from 1792 up to 1853 the half dollars, quarter dollars, dimes, and half dimes were all legal tender for all amounts whatever. There was no limit put upon their debt-paying power.

Mr. STEPHENS. They were full standard.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the gentleman permit a question at this point?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understood the gentleman to say that down to 1853 the subsidiary or fractional silver coins were all unlimited legal tender.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, subsequently they were not.

Mr. MILLS. Subsequently they were not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the gentleman whether at that time there was not a change in the standard?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, yes. I am coming to that right now. In 1853 I was going to say, if my attention had not been called to it, the fractional silver coins were debased, the standard of silver was lowered. And why did they debase the fractional silver coins and not the dollar? It was for the simplest of reasons. It was because there were no dollars to debase; they did not constitute any element in our money; they had all gone out of the country, what few there were, and the fractional coins were going after them. They debased the fractional coinage because it was the only silver money they were issuing and they had to undervalue it to keep it at home. The discovery of the gold mines in California in 1848 threw upon the country a vast amount of gold, and the disproportion of increase between the two metals made silver the dearer and gold the cheaper; and in the relative proportions in value in which they had been established the silver dollar was worth four and a half cents more than the gold dollar.

The fractional coins being of full standard were of the same relative value. The silver, therefore, was exported as fast as coined. Gold was the cheap money. The country was full of it. But the fractional silver coins so necessary in small transactions and in making change were all disappearing from the country. Congress, to save the whole body of our silver coinage, reduced the amount of silver and brought it under the bullion value of silver in Europe for the purpose of making it stay at home. They lowered the half dollar from 206¼ grains to 192, the quarter dollar from 103⅛ to 96, and smaller coins in proportion. The silver in two halves or four quarters, instead of being 412½ grains, was 384. The dollar of the lesser weight had the same nominal value here, but its commodity value fell with its weight when beyond the boundary of the United States. They did not reduce the weight of the dollar because they were not using it or coining it. It had its existence upon the statute-books, but scarcely anywhere else. It never was a popular coin; the halves, the quarters, dimes, and half dimes were the silver coins of the people.

Mr. GIBSON. Does the gentleman mean to say that the silver dollar was not coined because there was any prohibition of its coinage by law?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, no. There was only a prohibition by the law of inconvenience. That is all. Here are the official returns: The amount of silver dollars coined up to 1878 was 8,573,500. In 1851 there were coined only thirteen hundred, and in 1852 eleven hundred. In 1853, while there were only 46,110 coined, the same year they coined of halves a value of $2,430,534; of quarters, $4,446,555, and about two millions in dimes and half dimes. And that disproportion has been kept up through all the years of our coinage, showing very conclusively that the fractional silver coins were the favorites of the people. The bullion value of silver in Europe was greater than its money value here, and like cotton or wheat, or any other commodity, it went where profit was to be made by its export. I propose to make all the coins full standard, but the committee say that will not do, for they will be exported again. I am not at all concerned about the amount of silver in the fractional pieces. It is legal-tender quality, money quality, that I am after. If the gentlemen will concede it by making the pieces full weight, then I say I am for full weight. If they oppose making the pieces full weight, then I say confer the legal-tender quality on them at their present standard. Without the legal-tender quality they have none of the functions of money except such as the consent of the people shall confer upon them. If raised to full standard they will never leave the country till their bullion value is greater from home than their bullion value plus their money value is at home, and they are a long way from that point now, and no prospect of reaching it, as I have shown, for years to come.

But it is argued by gentlemen that it is wrong to make the fractional coins legal tender while under weight and make 384 grains of silver in the fractional pieces equal to 412½ grains in the dollar. Does it not look as if we were perpetrating a great wrong upon creditors and upon our people if the Government should compel them to take these coins of different weight at the same value? Political economists say there is no wrong, and I fully agree with them. Whatever may be the commodity value of each, the Government establishes the equation when it confers the full money function. A gold dollar of 25.8 grains being the standard of value, the Government can take a piece of silver of 100 grains or 200 or 400 grains and give it the full function of money and raise it to the gold standard. It is a matter of no consequence what may be the commodity value of the article. If I owe a man $100 and pay him in half dollars under weight he also pays the man whom he owes in the same way, and if the money I paid goes on and solves a thousand similar transactions and returns to me, has any one lost or gained a cent by the short weight of the silver? Certainly not. The fallacy arises in the fact that gentlemen think that it is the commodity value, instead of the money value, that is involved in the solution of the problem.

Take the paper dollars of the Treasury and you do not find a single grain of silver in one of them, and yet each paper dollar to-day is worth sixteen cents more than a demonetized silver dollar. There is no intrinsic value in paper. All its value is derived from the full money function which government confers. Whenever the Government establishes a unit of value, as it has done with gold, making 25.8 grains a dollar and its standard, and it makes other dollars and fractions of dollars and confers upon them full money functions, it imparts to each dollar the full value of its unit, it makes no difference out of what material it is made, and this will hold good till the volume in circulation reaches the limit of its usefulness. If the supply should exceed the demand, like all other things it will depreciate. There can therefore be no reason why all our fractional coins should not have conferred on them full legal-tender quality. Ricardo says:

However debased a coinage may become it will preserve its mint value; that is to say, it will pass in circulation for the intrinsic value of the bullion which it ought to contain.

Another English economist says:

The shilling now circulating derives its purchasing power not from the silver it contains, but from its being by law a twentieth part of a pound—the golden standard.

And this same doctrine is held by our own distinguished citizen, Professor F. A. Walker, in his recently published work on money. It is not the intrinsic value of the material out of which money is made that gives it its value as money; it is the value that law confers. Whatever possesses the three functions is money regardless of its intrinsic value. It must, as I have said before, measure values, exchange values, and pay values. Anything that will perform all three of these is money. That is all there is in money. Debase it as much as you will with these three powers conferred on it, it will continue by authority of law to be money. It is a familiar doctrine that values are created by labor and only by labor; but law creates values as well as labor. If the law required all the passengers and freight from Saint Louis to New York to pass over one railroad line, it would certainly make the property in that road more valuable than before. When Congress imposes high duties on the products of foreign manufactures for the purpose of protecting home manufactures it makes them more valuable than before. When the Government says that certain things bearing its stamp shall perform the functions of money and nothing else shall, it gives value to the thing it designates for that purpose. Therefore I say the power to create value by the stamping of a coin of the United States as a dollar or half dollar and making it legal tender is just the same as to give additional value to the products of American manufacture by imposing high duties on competing articles from foreign countries.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I would inquire if it would not be a better process to reduce the value and weight of the five-dollar gold piece, of the three-dollar gold piece, of the one-dollar gold piece a certain percentage? Would not that accomplish the purpose as well?

Mr. MILLS. That would not do, because you have made the gold dollar of 25.8 grains the standard and unit of value.

Mr. CLAFLIN. But have we not made the silver dollar a standard of value?

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; you have not.

Mr. CLAFLIN. The law is the same in the one case as in the other.

Mr. MILLS. There is no such thing as a double standard, accurately speaking. The standard will be the cheaper metal. Sometimes it is one and sometimes the other.

Mr. CLAFLIN. If they are of the same value, what is the difference?

Mr. MILLS. If they were of the same value there would be none, but they are not of the same value. There is a difference of sixteen cents to-day between them, and rather than see them come to par I prefer they should separate further. In their separation I see presented a great opportunity to rescue the country from the burden of a huge national debt.

From the office of the Director of the Mint I find that the bullion value of a silver dollar is in London to-day eighty-four and nine-tenths cents, and its bullion value in New York eighty-four and three-tenths cents. Practically the metal value is the same in both countries. But in the United States it has another value which law confers on it; the two together make the dollar worth here one hundred cents in gold. It has in England none of that money value.

Now, do you suppose that silver is going to be taken out of a country where it is worth one hundred cents on a dollar and sent to Europe where it is worth only eighty-four and nine-tenths cents as bullion? The half-dollar is worth in bullion thirty-nine and seven-tenths cents, or two half dollars are worth in bullion seventy-nine and four-tenths cents. But the value of those two half dollars in the United States is one hundred cents. Do you think that those two half dollars or that two hundred million half dollars will be taken to Europe and sold at seventy-nine cents on the dollar when they are worth here one hundred cents to the dollar?

There is therefore no danger either in raising the subsidiary silver coinage to a value proportionate to the silver dollar, or allowing it to remain as it now is. As I said awhile ago, silver in Europe is a commodity. It has been demonetized by all the commercial powers of Europe. Its coinage has been stopped. The war on silver is progressing. It has reached Russia. All the great powers of Europe are making war upon it. It is shown by the record to be sinking day by day, getting cheaper and cheaper. With these facts standing before the people of the United States, oppressed as they are with fearful taxation, is it not our duty to utilize this money as far as we can to discharge the debts that we owe as a government and those that our people owe to each other? It is most fortunate for us that silver is so cheap that we may buy it in large quantities with Treasury notes. If gold and silver were at par it would be the death knell to our hope of an early payment of our vast debt. We would be condemned to hopeless bankruptcy, and would transmit it as the only legacy we had to our children for generations to come. Our debt would be like the debt of Great Britain that has been handed down from one generation to another for two hundred years, and while the people have paid as interest five times as much as the principal, it is still three and a half billions of dollars and as great as it was forty or fifty years ago. But it may be asked, if gold and silver are not to be at par will not gold, the dearer metal, leave the country? If it were in circulation it would unquestionably. I meet this question boldly and fairly. But there is no gold of consequence in circulation. As long as the Government requires duties on imports to be paid in gold and interest to the bondholder to be paid in the same coin, that amount of gold will remain in the country to perform that specific duty, and that is all that it does now. The great mass of our business exchanges that are carried on by money are carried on by paper money. Neither of the metals constitutes any considerable part of our circulation. But if we had both gold and silver in full circulation, if such a thing could be, and silver at 16 per cent. discount, I say it would be to the interest of the United States to maintain a silver standard, or rather silver circulation, until they have emancipated themselves from the bondage of debt. Having a large stock of gold in the Treasury and their Treasury notes at par with it, and both at a premium of sixteen cents above silver, then our well-being demands that they should use them in the purchase of the cheaper metal with which to pay their debts.

There is another point on which I wish to say a few words. The bill makes the last holder of worn coin, or coin that has suffered in weight by sweating, clipping, and filing, bear the loss instead of the Government. All the controversy about abrasion is a bugbear about nothing, as far as the intrinsic value of the metal lost is concerned. The far greater injury results from the demonetizing of the coin by the Government. The moment you withdraw the Government's protection, and the power it confers upon the coin by its stamp, you deprive it of its money function and take from it its power to measure, exchange, or pay values. Instead of facilitating exchanges, as it should do and as it would do if protected in its money function, the demonetization constitutes an obstruction. It is absolutely necessary to all the business of the country that the money which the Government establishes should be constantly invested with all the functions of money. As long as any coin remains in circulation it should circulate at its nominal value everywhere, and be honored in every transaction. Otherwise the great masses of the people, who are not informed about these things, will take them at their nominal value, because they accept their Government's word and confide in it, while brokers, speculators, and sharpers will take their money only at its bullion weight. It will inflict a wrong upon that part of our population that most needs our protection. In the Forty-third Congress the Committee of Coinage reported a bill unanimously requiring the Government to lose the abrasion, and it passed this House unanimously, but for some cause did not pass the Senate. Whenever abraded coins come to the Treasury they should be sent to the mint and recast into full standard coins before being put in circulation again.

But it is said the Government should not lose by the abrasion. Why not? By reason of the Government's stamp the money goes from hand to hand for years, becoming worn by the handling of millions, and the last man that presents it to the Treasury must lose the difference between the real and nominal weight. The Government is all the people, all the people used it, and by their handling wore it away, and they rather than one should bear the loss. But the loss is too trifling to compare to the annoyance in business that would ensue from demonetizing the coin, and I am a little astonished at the economy manifested when in the same bill the committee propose to give the bullion-holder ten millions in every hundred millions of silver coined, and yet would demonetize the few worn and clipped coins when the whole loss on twenty years would not amount to one million of dollars.

What Mr. Calhoun said of the country in 1837 is true to-day:

The distress of the country consists of its indebtedness, and can only be relieved by payment of its debts.

As I said in the beginning, we must keep that fact in view in all our deliberations. Our object should be to extinguish all our debts, national, State, local, and private. To effect that there is another measure we must adopt. We should retire the circulation of the national banks and supply it with legal-tender Treasury notes. Should we do that the three hundred and fifty millions of bonds they hold would have to be sold to the Government for the legal-tender notes required to redeem their circulation? By that means we should pay three hundred and fifty millions more of bonds in addition to those paid by three hundred and fifty millions of silver. The debt would then be reduced to eleven hundred millions, and twenty millions of taxes saved annually. The present system of national banking is a system of national spoliation of twenty millions every year. They hold $350,000,000 of Government bonds upon which there is an annual interest accruing of twenty millions, they deposit these bonds in the Treasury, and the Government makes a paper dollar equal to gold, and pays them 90 per cent. of the bonds, and still pays interest on the whole. When 90 per cent. of a debt is paid 90 per cent. of the interest ought to be extinguished, and that is the law in all private transactions; but it is not so with the national bankers. A generous government taxes its poor laboring people to obtain money to bestow upon its favorites. Why should we not substitute the greenback for the national-bank notes? The bank-note is redeemable in the greenback, and that is redeemable in gold, and no better currency could circulate in the country, and in addition to that we would save the expenditure of twenty millions per annum, and reduce the debt three hundred and fifty millions.

The question arises, with the debt at eleven hundred millions can anything be done to place the remaining portion of it in process of extinguishment? Happily for the country, that is a question to which an easy reply can be made; and that reply is, that we can increase our revenues more than a hundred million annually by reducing taxation. If we would reduce our tariff on foreign goods to 25 per cent. ad valorem, instead of the prohibitory tariff we now have, we should double our imports the first year and the volume would rapidly increase every year, and with the increase of imports the revenues would of course increase. Mr. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Polk, who was master of the whole subject of finance and taxation, says that 20 per cent. is the revenue standard of taxation on foreign imports, and that at that sum the Government receives the largest revenue. The difficulty with us now is that we are prohibiting the introduction into the country of the very objects upon which we are relying for taxation, and if they do not come we get no revenues from them. In imposing duties there are two objects to be looked at. We must either look to revenue or to building up a monopoly of American manufactures at the expense of the revenue.

If it be the object of Government to build up American monopolies, then that can best be done by prohibiting the introduction of foreign imports, but if it be to obtain revenue, then only the largest amount of taxation should be imposed that will not restrict the consumption. That point Mr. Walker says is 20 per cent. There are two things that will control importation. The first is low duties, the second is a general distribution of money among the people affording them the means of purchasing and satisfying their wants. Neither of these conditions are present with our people to-day. Money is congested in the vaults of eastern capitalists, and the people have little with which to buy, and the duties on foreign goods are so high and of domestic goods the same, that consumption is greatly restricted and a large part of the poorer people are prohibited by Government interference from satisfying their wants by their labor.

Let us take a few articles and see the duty we are paying upon them, and they will give us a better idea of the enormities of our tariff. The duty on uncleaned rice is 104 per cent.; cleaned rice, 105; acetic acid, 120; chloroform, 100; acetate of soda, 208; chiccory root, 105; one species of cotton jeans, 109; croton oil, 118; ether, 109; fusel oil, 670; whiting and Paris white, 212; cassia, 114; clove stems, 135; ground spices, 160; rice starch, 118; one species of woolen hosiery, 105; one species of woolen manufactures, 106; woolen undershirts and drawers, 101; bunting, 117; castor oil, 100; wool hats, 84; flannels, 90; blankets, 89. These figures (for which I am indebted to the labors of Mr. J. S. Moore) show most plainly that these duties were imposed to prevent the importation of foreign goods, and of course at the great loss of the revenue and to the great detriment of the people who are forced to purchase the American article at these high figures. The entire importation of all these goods did not pay the Government a million and a half of revenue. Are we to abandon this prolific source of revenue, which would so soon redeem us from debt, and give our people over entirely to the greed of vast money corporations? See how our foreign importations are falling off under high duties and a contracted circulation. In 1873 we had $684,000,000 of imports; 1874, $595,000,000; 1875, $547,000,000; 1876, $480,000,000; 1877, $480,000,000; 1878, $468,000,000. During the same years the revenues collected from imports were as follows: in 1873, $184,000,000; 1874, $160,000,000; 1875, $154,000,000; 1876, $144,000,000; 1877, $128,000,000; 1878, $127,000,000. If instead of the prohibitory tariff we now have we should lay duties at 25 per cent. on all imports, they would amount in one year to eight hundred millions, with the silver bill passed as I propose, and that would give us two hundred millions instead of one hundred and twenty-seven as now. But it would continue to increase until our importation would exceed that of Great Britain, which is two thousand millions. Increase the circulation and lower the tariff, and the people will pay the debt faster than they did in the period between 1869 and 1873, when they reduced it at the rate of eighty millions a year, while they scarcely reach one-fourth of that now. In addition to that the tax on wealth, so hurriedly released after the war, should be restored and the vast incomes of eastern capitalists should be required to assist in reducing the public debt and bearing the public burdens of Government. We should exact at least fifty millions from incomes, and with these we should cancel the whole of our public debt in half a dozen years. Coin the silver and increase the circulation, depreciate money and appreciate labor and property, and, in the language of McCulloch, "the progressive depreciation of money will be like a fall of rain after a long drought, beneficial to incomparably the larger part of society and of great public and national advantage."

The history of this country and all other countries shows that just in proportion to the increase of the money that circulates among the people running along all the veins and arteries of the commercial body just in that proportion will they purchase and consume such commodities as their wants may require, and if taxation is levied upon such articles just in the same proportion will the revenues of the Government increase. Look at your imports after the war, when you had eighteen hundred millions in circulation, and see how they increased up to 1873, and since then see how, like the pulse of a dying man, they mark the gradations in which we are descending as step by step we go down the rounds of the dark ladder upon which the country is placed. Before we can ascend the laws of taxation must be changed, the debt must be paid, the tariff reduced, the tax on wealth reimposed, silver coined and all its coins made uniform in value, and whatever may be our dollar, whether of gold, silver, or paper, it must be good for all, the bondholder as well as the plowholder. Then labor will find employment everywhere at remunerative prices, and then a country long cursed by the dominion of moneyed corporations will rejoice in prosperity and peace.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I regard the bill under consideration, which provides for the free coinage of silver and the free issue of coin certificates, the latter to be circulated as money and employed by the national banks as a part of their reserve, as the most violent and inexcusable assault upon the integrity and welfare of the American people ever made in Congress. I propose, therefore, by an honest effort, to turn on the light and expose the covert idiocy and rascality of the measure. I do not intend to transgress the rules of the House, but if I chance to use the wrong word, I rely upon the Chair to rule as he did the other day, that "as a man thinketh so is he;" nor do I wish to be interrupted. When I get through I will accept battle, under the rules of the House, with all-comers, one at a time.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that when I shall have taken my seat fresh raids upon gold bugs will be in regular order. I have also observed that these manifestations have been more lively and interesting than usual in the Forty-sixth Congress. In other Congresses the leaders of the people against their oppressors have been men comparatively unworthy of notice, but in this the champion belt is deservedly worn by a recognized minister of the church of God. It will be conceded, I am sure, that the honorable and reverend gentleman from Indiana cuts a ludicrous figure here as a missionary of woe! woe! to the "money power," while laboring at the same time as the beloved apostle and high priest of the greenbackers. From the Clerk's desk he prayed the other day, with some reserve, that the good Lord would take us all to heaven, and straightway in a frantic effort from his own seat to make it warm for infamous and hell-bent bondholders he himself got red-hot and cried out in dreadful agony for—

> Men who have honor—men who will not lie;
> Tall men—sun-crowned—who live above the fog
> In public duty and private thinking;
> Men who can stand before a demagogue
> And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking.

At another time he is said to have prayed in secret through the petition-box for "a thousand million of greenbacks" in one grand swoop, ostensibly to resurrect some defunct western canal companies. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to see this unique quasi-divine in his seat. He belongs to a class who rarely hear preaching and who suffer severely for want of it. The average minister is Pope in his own pulpit. Not so here. The gentleman's gospel will not be accepted in this Hall without an occasional challenge. I would not discourage the gentleman. I have hopes of him. It is said already that he repents of his thousand million job; and if he owns a conscience we shall soon find him upon the anxious bench, and after that conviction and conversion to the religion of common sense may be looked for.

Mr. Speaker, I have but few words to say in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who opened this debate. His speech, though four days old, only come to the light this morning, and I do not know yet how he has fixed it. His answer to my question left a chasm between us too broad to bridge with argument. He declared that irredeemable legal-tender paper promises issued for a portion of the war debt are as good money as gold or silver. If that be true the United States owe no man anything to be paid. If he is right, fiat money, inflation, immoderate speculation, extravagant and riotous living, consequent bankruptcy, monstrous peculations, and repudiation are no longer to be regarded as the diseased attendants of a cruel civil war to be cured, but they are to be respected and exalted as the climax of prosperity, as the normal condition and true indices of American progress and civilization. If he is right, temperance, industry, frugal living, the payment of honest debt, tact for business, and accumulations of property are heresies and devices of thieves and robbers deserving of condemnation by all good men. But I take issue with the gentleman. His argument at best is that of all unfortunate, improvident, prodigal men, who demand that Government shall by some hocus-pocus currency legislation restore their broken fortunes. That is all there is of it. Debt is not money. He himself knows that it is not. He cannot stand on that ground to restore assured prosperity to this country any more than he can build a railway on the ice of a deep river in winter time and hope to operate it securely through the heats of summer.

I admit that I speak as a capitalist. Yes, I am a "robber," if the gentleman's doctrine is sound. I worked two full days, twenty-four hours, in my thirteenth year for the first dollar I ever called my own, and I have been a robber, on the gentleman's theory, from that time to this. Nevertheless, I assert my brotherhood with every man in the land who owns an honest hoe, horse, house, farm, bond, bank, railroad, or steamship, provided their capital, great or small, is the fruit of honest work and savings. Every industrious and temperate man in this country makes money; but it requires common sense and tact to save something and be a capitalist.

Congress does not and cannot properly make capitalists or bankrupts. The father of a family who teaches his sons to come late to breakfast, to study and work short hours, to spend habitually more money than they earn, to buy land and build houses and mortgage the same for more than they are worth in honest money, to run in debt without sense and without reflection, to take flyers at the stock exchange, to bet at the races and keep company with harlots, will raise a family of dead-beats who will need and clamor for fiat money, as the old feudal lords did, to conceal laziness, foolhardiness, and rascality.

On the other hand, take one of these pages who run at our bidding, the son of a widow perhaps; herself the daughter of affluence, gentle and cultivated, whose husband died for his country; that boy earns a dollar a day, more or less. If he is wise enough to spend less than he earns he is as truly a capitalist as I am, and he may stand thirty years hence where I now stand to deplore the folly of misguided and egotistical men, who by tampering with honest money in the Forty-sixth Congress threaten to mar their country's prosperity and glory with utopian dreams and schemes for half a century. "By the sweat of thy brow," Mr. Speaker, "shalt thou eat bread." Honest work, honest money, honest bread. That is the fiat of the unchangeable Jehovah, put in force when rogues first appeared in Paradise. Ceaseless cycles of time have established its wisdom and beneficence. It shall stand for ever and ever!

Against God's law the silver and greenback sinners of our time have brought back and set up in our country the Flaminian law of the old Roman Republic, passed, in the words of a recent French writer, "when Hannibal was already at the gates of Rome; when the disasters of Trebia and of Lake Trasimene had well-nigh exhausted the resources of the republic; when there was revolt on every hand, and thus the best sources of public revenue were dried up."

It is curiously instructive for us to note that the lex Flaminia of the Roman Republic, centuries before the Christian era and long before paper money was invented, reduced Roman silver coins precisely as the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States clipped the honest dollar of the United States in the year of grace 1878.

The history of these two acts is very interesting. Their analogy is close and searching, but not absolutely perfect. In the old case Hannibal was outside the gate when the deed was done. In our case Hannibal was inside, and assisted at the clipping. The precedent proved fatal to Rome. We still have room for repentance.

The Romans first reduced their denarius from one seventy-second to one eighty-fourth of a pound, then to one-ninetieth. Later on the Greeks and Romans descended to plated coin, and amid the greatest confusion they tried at length the "goloid," the very mixture which the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, now admires and recommends. The Roman laws being nowhere preserved textually, the fact can only be corroborated by the bare statement of historians as to the "scaling" of Roman silver coins, but it is a reasonable assumption that "electrum" (our goloid) was popular, for the convenient reason that it favored rascals and fostered fraud. No expert can tell to-day without chopping and melting up each individual coin what the thing is made of.

Cicero tells us that the value of the coinage at the time to which I refer became so dubious that no one knew what he was worth. A writer of less note observes:

> We might always judge of the character of the Roman emperors by the more or less sound ring of the coin struck during their reign.

This is not hyperbole, Mr. Speaker. Near the close of the nineteenth century, we stand here to-day the representatives of the freest, richest, happiest, and most prosperous people on the face of the earth; a people day by day proclaiming by some fresh exhibition of reserved power their sure destiny as the central force in the world's future advancement and triumphs; here we are, with our cables, railroads, and mines, blind to our real resources and opportunities, wildly croaking and wrangling like selfish, lazy, and spoiled children over the wrecks of foolish castles in the air, themselves the outcome of passion and civil war; here we are, in possession of matchless power, foolishly striving to repeat with startling exactness fatal currency devices which sapped and subverted the Roman Republic two thousand years ago, and, traveling down the ages, have impoverished or ruined every nation and people copying them. This is not argument, but it is the truth of history or it is falsehood. If true, it goes without argument, and admonishes every one of us, Representatives of the people, to persist no longer in this broad road to ruin.

What, then, Mr. Speaker, is the true import of the bill under consideration?

Let me premise explicitly that I am not opposed to bimetalism, but for it whenever practicable. I have never said a word against the coinage of honest silver dollars. But while the leading great nations with whom we trade adhere to the gold standard common sense and public policy force us, in my judgment, to stand with them unless we mean to adopt silver as our only standard. I hold, and think it easy to demonstrate, that our present coinage law, unless modified, will certainly force upon us an exclusive silver standard. I regard our dishonored and justly imprisoned silver dollar of 412½ grains as the most disgraceful form of political money. It is as corrupt and corrupting in principle as it would be if containing but the odd 12½ grains of silver. Its moral quality when compared with irredeemable greenbacks reflects the difference between a man born prodigal and reprobate, and a good character wrecked after an honorable career.

I repeat, there is no valid objection to coining honest silver dollars; but for Congress to say that 412½ grains of silver shall pass for a dollar now because in other days when the metal was less abundant that number of grains was worth a dollar is as ridiculous and impolitic as it would be for farmers to insist upon war prices for cotton, wheat, and meat in this time of superabundance. The proof of this proposition is at hand if we will but look at it. It will be admitted that beyond narrow limits our silver dollars are now locked up in dark vaults, useless and a burden, practically outlawed precisely as any other product of our soil or mines would be outlawed in commerce if overvalued and only vendible by short weights and measures.

If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] should arbitrarily say that he would give only eighteen hundred weight of rails for a ton would the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] buy the other gentleman's rails? What will become of Mr. CLYMER'S rails in such case? They will be stacked up unemployed, at great loss to Mr. CLYMER, precisely as our silver dollars are locked up at great loss to Government. But you say Mr. CLYMER can issue certificates and borrow money on his rails. True, but he knows that will ruin him double-quick, because he as an individual has no power to make his certificates go without interest; he will therefore lose the interest upon his capital and his notes as well.

If the State of Pennsylvania should make eighteen hundred weight of iron legal tender for a ton in all transactions between her own citizens, would not such idiocy manifestly tend to cripple and destroy the Keystone State's commerce with other States? Why, then, shall the Government of the United States arbitrarily convert the product of its precious silver mines into a standard of coin unknown beyond our borders, useless and rejected at home, tending only to dwarf, cripple, and disturb our great commerce with the world?

And what shall be said of free coinage? The free coinage bill which passed the House of Representatives on the 4th of November, 1877, without a word of debate, 164 to 34, originated in a committee of which I was a member.

It is an open secret that its authors aimed by it to drive all the gold out of the country. They opposed resumption with all their power, and did not believe there was any gold in the country worth talking about. They distrusted the Treasury statement of gold coin held by the sub-treasury in New York, and on my motion we obtained authority to see it counted, and did so to our entire satisfaction. The free coinage bill failed and resumption came, according to the law of January 14, 1875, to the great and manifest advantage of the whole people. Why shall we remorselessly break down resumption now? What is the true meaning of free coinage? I only have time to answer the last question.

Free coinage means that whoever owns 412½ grains of silver, and multiples thereof, whether in old coin, furniture, or bullion, can sell the same to the Government of the United States for the equivalent of gold dollars, and be paid therefor in three or four days after depositing the silver in any assay office or mint in our country. This proposal to buy by the Government is not confined to our own citizens, but extends to the silver hoards of all countries and all mankind. The authors and promoters of this monstrous proposition claim that it is in the interest of the people. What people? I affirm deliberately that it is in the interest of bullionists and capitalists exclusively, and will demonstrate it.

We have already coined and locked up for the most part thirty-one millions of the silver dollar of 412½ grains. For what end? For whose benefit? Is there one farmer, mechanic, or day laborer, save only those employed at the mints, who has made a cent out of this coinage? Not one. Who, then? The first seven millions of bullion coined into these dishonest dollars was purchased in London because the bullionists of the Pacific coast rudely proposed to "corner" the market. So far, and to the extent of seven millions, the coinage was for the sole benefit of foreign bullionists. Subsequently the supplies have been purchased at home for the exclusive benefit of home producers.

Now let us see how other capitalists than bullionists are interested in this bill. I ask the honorable gentlemen reporting it to give me their attention while I explain how it will work in practice. The railroad king, Mr. Vanderbilt, is said to have bought lately twelve thousand tons of steel rails in England, which, for convenience, I assume will cost him, duty paid, in New York the round sum of $500,000. To bring the argument home, I will further assume that Mr. Vanderbilt's note for $500,000 is held and due to the honorable chairman of the committee reporting this bill, [Mr. STEPHENS,] payable by contract on the 1st day of June next. Let this bill become a law by the 15th of May, and under its operation Mr. Vanderbilt can and will step into the cable office, direct his agent in London to purchase for him silver bullion, which, at the present market value, cannot cost to exceed $430,000, freight paid, and which by the ordinary conveyance will reach the assay office in New York in time to pay in full Mr. Vanderbilt's note to Mr. STEPHENS for $500,000 at a saving to Mr. Vanderbilt of $70,000?

Again, this law is, on its face, the most gigantic job in the interest of great capitalists ever proposed in Congress since the foundation of the Government. It is a plain, direct stimulant to speculation in the hoards of depreciated silver in Europe, and if our surplus gold income were two millions per day instead of one, as the accounts show it to have been last year, it would all be invested in silver so long as any margin of profit remained, however small. At the price of silver in London to-day the profit in importing it would, under this bill, be about 17 per cent. It is especially noteworthy that the bill as it stands bids nearly 2 per cent. premium on thirty-six million of our so-called trade-dollars, nearly all of which are hidden at the present moment in China, Japan, or elsewhere! Whose wool is that? Bullion value eighty-five cents. Political value one hundred and two cents! Difference, $6,120,000! Who is to get that?

Again, it is made absolutely certain, by laws as immutable as the set of the tides of the ocean, that under the operation of this bill, Germany, in the hands of the "vacant-minded and weak-willed Bismarck," will directly or indirectly convert her demonetized silver into our gold! Such is the climax of its sublime impolicy; such the inevitable result of all measures for the establishment of a double standard unsupported by other nations.

It is easy to show how this bill will oppress and rob the people of our own country, in whose name it is ostentatiously brought forward. The value of our cotton, wheat, petroleum, and all other products of labor at home depends upon their gold value abroad. We cannot if we try sell our surplus by any other than a gold standard. Is there any reason why hard-handed men in Ohio and Georgia shall be forced to receive for their labor debased political currency? Why should the cotton and grain grown in these great States be paid for in dollars worth but eighty-five cents, while the merchant to whom these products are sold is paid in dollars worth one hundred cents as soon as his ship touches a foreign port?

The men who own and drive carts in Brooklyn and New York, in sight of ships engaged in foreign trade, understand my argument. I can summon hundreds of them here who will tell you with feeling how your coinage act of last year will oppress them if persisted in, and that this bill for free coinage is in the interest of genuine "gold bugs" and political dead-beats only, and no better than highway robbery of labor.

I conclude my comments on silver coinage as I began. Make your silver dollar honest weight, and I make no objection to free coinage—not a word of objection!

I have not overlooked that vicious section of the bill which provides for the issue of a new variety of paper money equal in amount to all the coin and bullion (hundreds of millions) which may flow into the Treasury under its operation, but have no time to speak of it.

Let me, in concluding, Mr. Speaker, ask the House to look back with candor for a moment to the beginning of the currency struggle. Eighteen years ago there was not a man of influence, in Congress or out of Congress, to be found advocating legal-tender greenbacks except as a temporary war measure. Not one! What means this? Were our merchants, bankers, economists, lawyers, statesmen, and jurists all mistaken then? Or has the greenback poison already driven this great nation to the brink of ruin? Consider now some of the bills before this Congress.

Here comes one brought in by a minister of the Gospel asking for a thousand millions of legal-tenders in one lot. Here is another from the genial gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] who modestly asks for six hundred millions. There is my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] who, having passed three score and ten, is more modest still; he demands only four hundred millions. That makes two thousand millions thus far asked for by three members of "the party of the future," which boldly claims the democracy for its tail.

It is understood that the "national" party of this House is for the present limited to fourteen or fifteen members. If three members require two thousand millions it will require ten thousand millions to go round, without providing for the appendix.

Moreover, we have a daring and belligerent member from Alabama speaking through the newspapers for legal-tenders enough to pay off the interest-bearing portion of the national debt immediately; and it is understood that a number of less warlike advanced thinkers in the House favor that idea. Finally, and to cap the column, I myself have been requested by a New York greenbacker to push a bill through the House providing that every father of a family who will take the trouble to register his name at the United States Treasury shall have, in monthly installments, all he requires (under oath) to support his family respectably.

Admit that these propositions are all alike ridiculous, what then? Are they not danger signals? What would have been said eighteen years ago of any man standing in this Hall to offer such bills as those which have already been offered? Are they not the result, the logical and inevitable result, of tampering with our standard of money in Congress? Where will we be if these debates go on ten years more? Go to the river and harbor bills of the last two Congresses, passed without consideration or debate, for my answer to that question. I firmly believe that if the war loan represented by legal-tenders be dallied with longer in Congress bills for fresh issues of greenbacks will be log-rolled and run in parallel lines with river and harbor bills, gathering as they go every scheme of folly and wickedness, on and on together, year after year, from bad to worse, from hundreds to thousands of millions, until our Government shall topple and crumble in ruins!

Said one of the most influential of democrats, once, and not long ago, a member of this body, to me the other day:

The legal-tender question is greater than the currency. It will destroy our form of government in the end if they are issuable in time of peace.

How shall we escape? For nearly twenty years our country has been the theater and victim of passion, panic, and war, with a continuous procession of commercial and social disasters of remarkable significance. That we exist to-day as a free, united, and prosperous people is the grand marvel of human history. The worst, thanks to God, is over if we are but true to our traditions.

We know that the situation is essentially changed; confidence is in large measures restored. We are gaining in all directions. Enterprise if hesitant is wakeful and waiting for a just public sentiment in respect to the currency. Our matchless natural resources North and South become daily more and more visible and impressive to the whole world. We have three hundred millions of gold in sight to-day, according to a very late estimate of the Chamber of Commerce of New York. Some faithful and industrious men in our large towns are without work and without money, but the number steadily diminishes and is not now formidable, the assertion of all demagogues to the contrary notwithstanding. A large number of visionary speculators scattered all over the country, for whom Congress has been speaking for ten years, are hopelessly ruined and beyond the reach of legislation. What, then, can Congress do? It can stop tinkering the currency and leave it alone.

I think that it is abundantly apparent that the commerce of our country can never enjoy a healthy equilibrium while Congress continues to debate political schemes for financial renovation which are opposed to experience and the commercial sense. We have tried it for a dozen years, and find, for example, that resumption of specie payments has come against the will of Congress and in spite of adverse legislation. We find, also, at this very moment and in the Forty-sixth Congress, more discordant currency theories and greater confusion of extravagant ideas than has existed in any previous Congress since greenbacks were first issued. It is our duty to look this fact square in the face. I am confident that there is not one candid and thoughtful member of the House of Representatives to dispute this proposition. Consider now that the unity of sentiment among the jurists and statesmen of the whole country, including both of the great political parties, was equally pronounced in respect to the danger of such issues when first resorted to, and we are in a position to see the drift of affairs and the perils which confront us. Have we not at length reached a crisis? Must not currency agitation be wrested from the Halls of Congress, or our country given over to the wildest epoch of irredeemable paper money in human history? Has not the greenback poison penetrated politics? Has it not divided and demoralized the democratic party? Is there not enough of silence and hesitation among republicans, who want high office, to show that the country's salvation depends upon the judiciary? Having myself watched the currents and eddies of this great struggle in Congress for five years, I am thoroughly convinced that if it be lawful, under our Constitution, to issue legal-tender greenbacks in time of peace, the minister from Indiana [Mr. DE LA MATYR] leads the winning party. He will in such case get his thousand millions, and others coming later will get perhaps a hundred thousand millions. For the present the people will countenance nothing to break down resumption, but in the first exigency, which may not be far off, they will be found consenting to new issues of legal-tenders, if authority for such issues be found in the Constitution.

My prayer to Congress, in the name of the people, is, please let the currency alone. Give us peace, rest, and liberty to prosper. [Applause.]

Mr. WEAVER obtained the floor.

Mr. WARNER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. WEAVER. I will do so if it does not come out of my time and I shall be recognized as holding the floor to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] who has just taken his seat, when I was on the floor on Saturday last, asked me this question:

I would like to ask the gentleman what would become of his argument and what would become of the quotations he has made from the writings of distinguished men if he admits that the legal-tender debt of the United States was a forced loan and that it was never money?

To which I replied:

I do not admit any such thing. It was money as absolutely as though made of coin; but that I am not now arguing.

This is so important a question that I hope the House will bear with me a few minutes while I attempt to explain the principle which governs the value of inconvertible paper money. The theory that the greenback money of the United States is and has been mere debt and nothing else has lain at the root of all the mischievous monetary legislation since the war. If the $346,000,000 of greenback currency were simply so much debt to be paid as other debts are paid, then, of course, to take it all up or pay it off is simply a question of taxing the people to the extent of $350,000,000. Resumption would not have been a very difficult matter if the only thing involved was paying a debt. But grant for the sake of the argument that greenback money is debt; it is nevertheless something more than debt. Greenbacks were monetized upon their issue. The debt function or quality was suspended the moment they went out as money. It was by their money and not their debt function that they received currency.

But when you pay greenback notes you are doing a good deal more than paying a debt; you are taking up the very currency itself. Now I lay down this one principle respecting inconvertible paper—and I think my friend from New York will not controvert it—it is this: that if in any country the issue of inconvertible money be limited to no more than that country had or would have under the laws of international trade of metallic money, then the value of that paper, irrespective of any provision or promise to pay, would be precisely the same as the value of the metallic money it displaced. This would be true, however, only so long as its character as money continued.

If its money functions should be suspended from any cause, as the overthrow of the Government giving it currency, then of course it falls. But the point I make and the principle I aim to establish is that inconvertible paper or greenbacks are, as I said, as absolutely money as if made of metal. Every high authority that has written on this subject for a hundred years supports this view. Professor Jevons, in Money and the Mechanism of Exchange, says:

There is plenty of evidence to prove that an inconvertible paper money, if carefully limited in quantity, can retain its full value. Such was the case with the Bank of England notes for several years after the suspension of specie payments in 1797, and such is the case with the present notes of the Bank of France.

Mr. Macleod, whose merit as a writer on economic science nobody will question, says:

It [inconvertible paper] becomes in all respects equivalent to a new standard, just as much as gold or silver, and its value will be affected by the same principles as these two, namely, by the sole question of the quantity of it in circulation compared to the operations it represents.

Mr. Ricardo lays down the same principle. He says:

It is on this principle [that of limitations] that paper money circulates. * * * Though it has no intrinsic value, yet by limiting its quantity its value in exchange is as great as an equal denomination of coin. * * * On these principles it will be seen that it is not necessary that paper money should be payable in specie to secure its value.

And again:

A paper circulation differs in its effects in no respect from a metallic currency.

Mr. J. R. McCulloch, in his edition of the works of Ricardo, says:

This is a principle of great importance, for it shows that intrinsic worth is not necessary to a currency, and that, provided the supply of paper notes declared to be legal tender be sufficiently limited, their value may be maintained on a par with the value of gold, or raised to any higher level.

Alexander Baring said:

The reduction of paper would produce all those effects which arise from the reduction in the amount of money in any country.

Albert Gallatin uses this language:

It has been contended by distinguished writers * * * that an irredeemable paper currency, not exceeding in its nominal amount that in value which is actually wanted, might be altogether substituted for gold and silver, provided that government should always regulate the issues so as never to exceed or fall short of that amount.

J. B. Say said of Bank of England notes:

It must not be imagined that the paper money of that country derives its value from the promise of payment in specie which it purports to convey.

Mr. McLaren, in his History of the Currency Question, says:

Let us, then, suppose that at a time when we possessed our fair share of the gold of the world, government paper was issued until all the gold left the country, and the market price of that metal began to exceed its mint price, and that the issue was carefully and honestly limited to this amount. This paper would, according to all authority, supply the place of the gold, and no change would be made in prices or in the distribution of property by the substitution.

Authorities on this point might be quoted by the hour. No principle is better settled in political economy. It has been the established doctrine for the last hundred years, and it is the settled doctrine of economic science to-day among all respectable writers. All English statesmen have acted upon it in framing their currency laws since 1797; and no principle in monetary science has been more generally acknowledged in England than that principle. The "forced loan" doctrine and the debt theory are among the fallacies that retain their hold in spite of reason and fact.

But I was going to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] this question——

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from New York has gone out.

Mr. WARNER. What will bring silver bullion or silver in any form to this country if this bill passes? I see the gentleman from New York is not in his seat. But I hope the gentlemen on the other side before this debate is over will meet these two propositions, and meet them squarely: first, that the valuation of all property in this country has been already changed from a paper valuation to a metallic valuation of both the precious metals—silver and gold—and, second, that under existing monetary laws in this and other countries this valuation, based upon the two metals, is being changed to a valuation of gold alone. These are the questions to meet. Then, does not this change which is now going on necessarily involve lower prices or, which is the same thing, the prolonged appreciation of gold? Will you meet these propositions?

And I ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] whom I now see on the floor again, whether a gold dollar or an ounce of gold, with silver in use also as money, is the same thing or has the same value that it has, or will have, with silver demonetized? The gentleman from New York has assumed that the value of gold is fixed, like the yard measure or the pound weight. But the truth is the value of your gold dollar, your piece of gold, is one thing with silver constituting half the world's money, and it is a very different measure with silver left out, or demonetized. That embraces the whole problem before us. That is the question: shall we by refusing coinage to silver continue to increase the standard in this country?

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. WARNER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WILBER. It is not fair to ask so many questions and then immediately to move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WARNER. I understand that the gentleman from New York has gone out.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am here.

Mr. WARNER. Then I withdraw the motion to adjourn. I did not see the gentleman. Will he answer my question?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. The gentleman's question is mixed like his discussion of the subject. I do not see any beginning or end of it.

Mr. WARNER. I will ask another. Will an ounce of silver bullion after this bill passes, if it passes at all, buy any more gold or anything else here than it does now? That is my question now.

TESTIMONY, ETC., IN CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia.) The Chair lays before the House testimony and papers received by the Clerk in the following contested-election cases. They will be referred to the Committee of Elections:

Sebastian Duffy vs. Joseph Mason, twenty-fourth congressional district, New York;

E. W. M. Mackey vs. M. P. O'Connor, second congressional district, South Carolina;

Horatio Bisbee, jr., vs. Noble A. Hull, second congressional district, Florida;

A. G. Curtin vs. Seth H. Yocum, twentieth congressional district, Pennsylvania;

E. M. Boynton vs. George B. Loring, sixth congressional district, Massachusetts;

Jere Haralson vs. Charles M. Shelley, fourth congressional district, Alabama; and James E. O'Hara vs. W. H. Kitchin, second congressional district, North Carolina.

Mr. CONGER. My recollection is that there was some rule adopted by which papers in contested-election cases, when referred by the Clerk, were to be printed in accordance with the request of the parties.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was no such law or rule adopted as would authorize the printing of papers.

Mr. CONGER. I was under the impression that when the papers were presented, then the parties could apply for the printing of such portions as they deemed necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not unless the matter were acted upon by the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. A resolution was passed at this session authorizing the Committee of Elections to have printed such matters referred to them as they might deem necessary.

Mr. CONGER. I thought it was left to the parties to decide what portions of the papers should be printed. All I desired to say was, if that was the case I do not want any action the House may now take to preclude any right to select such portions of the papers as they desire to have printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All the papers are sent to the Clerk of the House and they cannot get before the committee except through him, and the Clerk reports them to the House through the Speaker.

Mr. CONGER. I so understand, but I thought now was the time when the parties must select what should be printed.

The papers were referred to the Committee of Elections.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. SPEER, for ten days;

To Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, for seven days; and

To Mr. WISE, until Wednesday next.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL AND RECORD.

Mr. ROBERTSON. My name does not appear upon the record on the final vote on what is known as the election bill. I did vote "ay," and I desire to have my vote so recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and Mr. ROBERTSON'S name was ordered to be recorded in the affirmative.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. MITCHELL to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Robert A. McMurray; no adverse report having been made thereon.

PIERRE BOTTINEAU.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Pierre Bottineau and others, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. WARNER. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the select committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, to which was recommitted the bill (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, with the proposed amendments, to report back a substitute for the bill and all the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, with the substitute, will go upon the Calendar and be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 573) to authorize payment of a balance of interest justly due to William Wheeler Hubbell, on a sum found due in the Court of Claims for the use of 865,214 of his time and impact burning fuses in the late war by the naval service; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 574) to make full satisfaction of the actual loss and damage ascertained by the Court of Claims in favor of William Wheeler Hubbell, for 528,661 of his percussion apparatus used in the late war by the military service; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I introduce both these bills simply by request, having no knowledge of the merits of either of them; and I do not commit myself to them at all.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 575) to amend pension laws, and punish claim agents for violations thereof; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 578) granting a pension to Samuel B. Davis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 579) to provide for the publication and distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to depositories of public documents; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 27) authorizing promotions in the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 28) to apply the amount appropriated by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, to pay certain mail contractors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMENDMENTS TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB and Mr. BAILEY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

STATISTICAL REPORTS ON INTERNAL COMMERCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no "concurrent and other resolutions" the first business in order is the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the Senate when the second and third annual reports on internal commerce will be submitted to Congress, why they have been delayed, &c. The question is, shall the resolution be adopted? Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the resolution be reported again.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, it is provided that—

"It shall be the duty of the officer in charge of the Bureau of Statistics to gather, collate, and annually report to the Secretary of the Treasury, for transmission to Congress, statistics and facts relating to commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, the railroad systems of this and other countries, the construction and operation of railroads, the actual cost of such construction and operation of railroads, the actual cost of transporting freights and passengers on railroads and on canals, rivers, and other navigable waters of the United States, the charges imposed for such transportation of freight and passengers, and the tonnage transported; and the reports now by law required to be prepared and published monthly in the said Bureau of Statistics shall hereafter be prepared and published quarterly, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

And the said law required that "the statistics and facts relating to commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," &c., should be reported annually to the Secretary, to be transmitted to Congress; and

Whereas, in November, 1876, the first annual report on commerce and navigation, made under said law, was transmitted to Congress, and did not contain the annual report on the domestic or internal commerce of the United States, and the first annual report on internal commerce, which should have been made in November, 1876, was not made until June 30, 1877, and the second and third annual reports on internal commerce, which should have accompanied the annual reports on commerce and navigation made in November, 1877, and November, 1878, have not yet been made, or, if made to the Secretary of the Treasury, have not been transmitted to Congress; and

Whereas the statistics and facts required to be gathered, collated, and annually reported to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmission to Congress are of great value, and should be regularly and promptly each year transmitted to Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required and directed to report to the Senate when said second and third annual reports on internal commerce will be transmitted to Congress, and why they have been delayed, and whether such annual reports on internal commerce can hereafter be transmitted to Congress at the beginning of each regular session in December of each year with the regular annual reports on commerce and navigation; and if not, then what additional legislation, if any, is necessary to secure the transmission to Congress of such annual reports on internal commerce at the beginning of each regular session.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it is very obvious from the reading of the preamble to the resolution that this is a requirement of the Secretary of the Treasury that it is almost impossible to comply with. There are no means, that I know of, by which the Secretary of the Treasury can obtain all this information, domestic and foreign, in order to communicate it to Congress. I should be glad to get the information, and I have no objection to the resolution; but I think it should go first to the Committee on Finance to be considered by that committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope there will be no reference of the resolution made. It is simply a resolution of inquiry under a plain statute of the country. The statute of March 3, 1875, requires annual reports on the foreign and internal commerce of the United States to be made by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmission to Congress annually. The reports on foreign commerce have been made in November of each year. The first report on internal commerce should have been made in November, 1876. It was made on the 30th of June, 1877. No report on internal commerce has been made since that time. The Senate of the United States and the Congress is entitled to know why it has not been made.

The direction is for the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress when the second and third annual reports on internal commerce can be made; why they have been delayed, and whether under the present law and the present provisions made by appropriations these reports on internal commerce cannot hereafter be made at the same time as the reports on foreign commerce, and if they cannot be made at the same time, what additional legislation, if, any, is necessary to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to make them all together, so that we can have them in time to be of service to the country. It is no reflection upon the Secretary of the Treasury; it is no reflection upon any of the officials of the Bureau of Statistics; but the object is to enable them to present to us the reasons which have, unavoidably I doubt not, caused delay, and to enable us, if we can, to remove the obstacles and get in those reports regularly.

The Finance Committee has nothing on earth to do with this matter, not a particle more than the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is simply a resolution for information. Congress ought to know it, we ought to know it now, in order to make provision on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, if any additional appropriation is necessary to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to make these reports promptly, annually, at the beginning of each regular session of Congress.

I hope, Mr. President, that the resolution will be adopted, and that the Secretary will very speedily furnish the information. I doubt not that there has been a valid reason for not submitting these reports. In fact, the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in the first report, which was submitted on the 30th of June, 1877, detailed a number of the difficulties surrounding him; but we have passed a law and we require him to comply with it. He has not complied with it, and he ought to be heard in his defense, without any reflection upon him.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to show the slightest hostility against obtaining this information, but I am of the opinion that it would be better that the proposition should be submitted to a committee to examine it before it shall receive the sanction of the Senate, in order, if possible, to obviate by legislation some of the difficulties under which the Department labors in respect to giving this information in detail, as seems to be required.

I know of no law that compels all the railroads of this country to furnish information as to the commerce that is going on from day to day. I think that we are asking of the Department information that it is impossible under existing law can be furnished by the Department. I therefore am of opinion that the resolution ought to be referred to some committee to investigate it and see what is necessary to be done. If we first refer this matter to the Department, we shall only get at the facts in relation to the difficulty, as they now exist.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? Is it better for a committee of this body to have this information furnished to it—a committee which has nothing to do with the appropriations—or is it better for the Senate of the United States to have this information furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury? That is the question direct.

Mr. MORRILL. I am very clear that a committee can handle this question better than the Senate of the United States can.

Mr. COCKRELL. A committee that has nothing to do with the appropriations or the legislation which affects the subject. Congress, on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of March 3, 1875, made a specific law which provides that—

It shall be the duty of the officer in charge of the Bureau of Statistics to gather, collate, and annually report to the Secretary of the Treasury, for transmission to Congress, statistics and facts relating to commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, the railroad systems of this and other countries, the construction and operation of railroads, the actual cost of such construction and operation of railroads, &c.

Here is a positive requirement of law.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me ask my friend from Missouri if he knows of any law which requires all of the canals of this country to report their daily transactions to the Treasury Department, or if there is any law which requires all the railroads of the country to report their doings to the Treasury Department?

Mr. COCKRELL. That information and question might have operated in regard to the passage of the law; it is of no force now. The Secretary of the Treasury is not required to present official reports from the canals, railroads, or anything of that kind, but he is required under the Bureau of Statistics to gather, collate, and annually report to Congress all those statistics and facts relating to foreign commerce and internal commerce among the States, the operation of railroads, cost of transportation, &c. The law has not pointed out the means by which he shall obtain these facts. The law may not have put in his power the facilities for complying strictly with it, and if not he will report that fact to Congress.

All the Government railroads make their reports. Other railroads have reports collated in the Railroad Manual and Guide, and there are various ways of obtaining those statistics. All that the Secretary is required to do is to obtain the facts in the most reliable form that he can and report them to Congress. The Department did obtain them once, in the first report on internal commerce, which has been submitted, and is a document of very great value and importance. Now we want to know why these other reports have not been furnished. I doubt not there is a good reason for it.

Now the Senator from Vermont wants the great Finance Committee of the Senate to take this resolution of inquiry and investigate it. For what purpose? Can they tell us any more whether we need this information than we now know? If it belonged to any committee, it would not belong to the Finance Committee. Does the Finance Committee possess the information which this resolution calls for? Why, as a matter of course they do not. Then they would have to refer to the Secretary of the Treasury to get the information and report it back second-hand to the Senate. Why not let the Secretary of the Treasury report it directly to Congress? There can be no valid objection to the passage of this resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no disposition to impose any labor upon the Finance Committee, but surely I know of no committee that can make the information available after it is obtained but the Finance Committee. They have more reason to ask for this information than any other committee. But I do not desire to contest the matter at all. If it is not obvious to the Senator from Missouri that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Finance or the Committee on Commerce, let it pass in the way the Senator chooses. I imagine, however, he will find that there will be much more delay in obtaining a remedy for what he seeks by passing the resolution now than would be incurred if he were to send it first to a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand the Senator from Vermont to have submitted any motion.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope not.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a preamble to the resolution. If there is no objection to the preamble it will be considered as adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw the preamble; because to my mind it certainly does imply censure, which he says he does not intend, to the Department; and he will get the information just the same. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not insist upon adopting the preamble.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have stated distinctly that I meant no reflection upon the Department. The only reason why the preamble should be retained is for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Treasury to comprehend the specific information which the resolution calls for:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required and directed to report to the Senate when said second and third annual reports on internal commerce will be transmitted to Congress, and why they have been delayed, and whether such annual reports on internal commerce can hereafter be transmitted to Congress at the beginning of each regular session in December of each year with the regular annual reports on commerce and navigation; and, if not, then what additional legislation, if any, is necessary to secure the transmission to Congress of such annual reports on internal commerce at the beginning of each regular session.

There is certainly no reflection, and it would only enable the Secretary to see distinctly the points that are made in the resolution itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is great force, and logically there is conclusive force, in what the Senator from Missouri has said, because it appears that the body of the resolution can only be correctly understood by referring to the preamble; and with his statement that the preamble, whatever may be its literal effect, is not intended to declare a censure of the Senate in advance,——

Mr. COCKRELL. None at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not make any objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the preamble will be considered as adopted.

SOUTH PASS OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. BECK. I ask the consent of the Senate to take from the Calendar for present consideration House bill No. 1376, reported back yesterday from the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1376) making appropriations for constructing jetties and other works at South Pass, Mississippi River. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Chair will put the question. There is a much more important appropriation bill on the Calendar of the Senate,—not more important locally to the mouth of the Mississippi or for the commerce of that great valley, but important for the general interests of the Government. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will give us the benefit of having that bill taken up and considered and passed, instead of this one.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow me a moment I will state the reasons why I have proposed that this bill shall take precedence. The legislative appropriation bill will be called up when we get through with the bill which was considered yesterday, and which is the unfinished business for to-day. The consideration of that bill is taking a longer time than I thought it would consume. My object in asking this bill to be taken up, if the Senator from Vermont will allow me a moment——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, I did not intend to interrupt the Senator; he has the floor.

Mr. BECK. The money which is now owing to Captain Eads and his associates for the work they have done——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator from Kentucky that he cannot discuss the merits of the bill on a motion to take it up.

Mr. BECK. I know; but I was about to state the reason why I ask for its present consideration. On the money said to be due we are obliged to pay 5 per cent. unless we make an appropriation. The report shows the money to be due. The House passed the bill simply appropriating the money. The Secretary of War thinks we ought to pay it and avoid all question about it such as we had once before. We have amended the bill so as to keep it entirely in the control of the Secretary of War, and we thought it was best to have it done now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I wish to know, because I cannot seem to understand it, is why we cannot take up the legislative appropriation bill and dispose of it. It is entitled to precedence; it has precedence on the Calendar of the bill which was under consideration yesterday and of this bill I believe. It is certainly entitled to the precedence of this bill, whether it has it or not. It is both entitled to and has precedence of the other bill. What I wish to know at this time is what is the reason why we cannot lay aside the bill to prohibit interference with elections and go on with the appropriation bill according to the universal usage and practice of the Senate and according to the propriety of things, and not keep the general appropriation bill not only slumbering but fettered on the table of this body and proceed to every other species of legislation before we can allow that to be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1376.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have called for the yeas and nays because I wish to have the Senate authoritatively decide whether we will keep back an appropriation bill to carry on the Government and proceed with special appropriation bills for particular objects, at times when we might go on with that bill and when we ought to go on with it against all other business.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on all political questions.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. This is not a political question.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I voted thinking that this was no political question, and not thinking of the pair either; but as it seems to take a little political turn, and after talking with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] the colleague of the absent Senator, I feel that it is proper for me to withdraw my vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (after having voted in the affirmative.) Mr. President, I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] I had no idea that this was a political question when I voted, and I have no idea of it now.

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] for to-day.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired on political questions with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] I do not understand that this bill is a political question, but the question of keeping back the general appropriation bill is a political question.

Mr. FARLEY. I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] on this question, I suppose, as it has assumed a political turn. If he were here, I should vote "yea;" as he is not here, I decline to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 18; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1376) making appropriations for constructing jetties and other works at South Pass, Mississippi River.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard with an amendment in line 4, after the word "appropriated," to strike out "to pay" and insert "to enable the Secretary of War to cause to be paid;" so as to read:

That the requisite amount is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of War to cause to be paid all money that may become due and owing to James B. Eads and his associates.

Mr. BECK. I shall endeavor to explain this bill in as few words as possible. By the act of March 3, 1879, which was the last amendment of the original law on this subject, Captain Eads is entitled to receive $500,000 when he obtained a channel twenty-five feet by two hundred feet in width; and he is entitled to receive $500,000 more when he obtains a channel of twenty-six feet in depth by two hundred feet in width, and $500,000 more when he obtains a channel thirty feet in depth without regard to width. The engineer in charge, Captain Brown, on the 23d of April made a report to the Secretary of War in these words:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Port Eads, South Pass, Louisiana, April 23, 1879.

SIR: The act of March 3, 1875, authorizing the improvement of South Pass by James B. Eads requires the Secretary of War "to embody in his annual reports the payments made from time to time under this act and the probable times when other payments will become due, and to report during the construction of the works herein authorized all important facts relating to the progress of the same."

As this provision seems to imply that due notice should be given to Congress whenever it is not unlikely that one or more payments may become due before the lapse of a considerable period, it seems proper that I should now communicate to the Secretary of War my opinion that a continuance of the present favorable conditions for a few weeks longer, combined with the work of the dredge-boat now nearly in full repair, will probably enable Mr. Eads to obtain a channel twenty-six feet deep for a width of at least two hundred feet from the South Pass light-house to the deep water of the Gulf of Mexico. Also that a further continuance of the same favorable conditions is likely to result in a channel having a central depth of thirty feet from the same light-house to the Gulf.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. R. BROWN,
Captain of Engineers, U. S. A.

Hon. G. W. McCRARY, Secretary of War.
(Through Lieutenant-Colonel H. G. Wright, Acting Chief of Engineers, Washington, D. C.)

[Indorsement.]

Respectfully forwarded to the honorable the Secretary of War.

H. G. WRIGHT,
Acting Chief of Engineers.

The amount due to Captain Eads when he obtained twenty-five feet is now payable according to the facts laid before us. The amount to be paid when he obtains twenty-six feet will very likely be payable in a few weeks, as Captain Brown reports. The act of 1875 provided, in substance, that wherever Congress had not made provision beforehand for the payment of the contract price as it became due to Captain Eads and his associates, they should be entitled to receive bonds of the United States bearing 5 per cent. interest. A part of the price to be paid can now be demanded. Some trouble grew out of that once before by the demand for bonds. He does not demand bonds now. All he desires is that money shall be placed by appropriation in the Treasury so that when the Secretary of War determines that he is entitled to the money it can be paid to him. The Senate committee have amended the bill by striking out the words "to pay all money that may become due to James B. Eads and his associates," and inserting "to enable the Secretary of War to cause to be paid," because by the original act of 1875 it was provided:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to carry into effect the provisions of this act on behalf of the United States, and, when the said Eads and his associates shall, from time to time, have fulfilled on their part the several foregoing conditions of this act, to draw his warrants upon the Treasurer.

Upon which it shall be paid on the report of the engineer in charge. The act of 1878 amending it made the same provision by section 2:

SEC. 2. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to draw his warrant upon the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in favor of James B. Eads, his assigns or legal representatives, for the sum of $500,000.

And such sums as may become due hereafter. And by the act of March 3, 1879, we again provided:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to draw his warrant upon the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in favor of said James B. Eads, or his legal representatives, for the sum of $750,000, which said sum is hereby appropriated; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to said Eads, or his legal representatives, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum for which said warrant is drawn.

When a channel shall have been obtained by the action of the jetties and auxiliary works authorized by said act twenty-five feet in depth, and not less than two hundred feet in width at the bottom, through the said jetties, there shall be paid $500,000.

When a channel shall have been obtained through the jetties twenty-six feet in depth, and not less than two hundred feet in width at the bottom, there shall be paid $500,000.

When a channel thirty feet in depth, without regard to width, shall have been obtained through the jetties, there shall be paid $500,000; and the $1,000,000 provided by the hereinbefore recited act to be paid by the United States in ten and twenty years shall be earned by said Eads and his associates, and the same, with interest, shall be paid to said Eads, or his legal representatives, at the times and in the manner provided by said act.

Therefore the committee thought, in conformity with the original act and all the acts amending it, that we should retain full authority and power in the Secretary of War and all the officers now managing this important national improvement to say whether the money was properly payable or not, and when and how it shall be paid. Instead of making a direct appropriation to pay Eads, we determined to make appropriation to enable the Secretary of War to cause to be paid the money when it becomes due. It is to avoid having any difficulty about bonds or any delay when the work is progressing so satisfactorily that this bill is necessary. The engineer officers have said to members of the Committee on Transportation Routes that as he is straightening and completing his work at the sea end the scouring force is becoming much greater, the sand is no longer drifting from the bay over the jetties, and the work is not only progressing very satisfactorily but is succeeding better than even the most sanguine could have anticipated. It seemed to the House and it seemed to the Transportation Committee of the Senate a very proper thing to pass the proposed bill. That is all I desire to say about it.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether he is quite satisfied that the contract is so far fulfilled as to require absolutely of the Secretary of the Treasury the tender of half a million of 5 per cent. bonds unless this money shall be appropriated?

Mr. BECK. I think it is, and such is the opinion of the engineer officers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The business of the morning hour has expired. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. EATON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If nothing more is moved in the morning hour, the Chair will declare the morning hour at an end and lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections.

Mr. EATON. Before the Senator from Vermont, who is entitled to the floor, proceeds, I simply desire to say, having this matter in charge, that I shall be very glad to get a vote upon the bill to-day, believing with my friend from Vermont, who is so anxious about the appropriation bill, that it is important and that there is great necessity of getting through with this bill so as to reach it. I further ought to say that I do not wish to force the Senate into a night session to pass this bill, but if a vote cannot be reached by five or six o'clock this afternoon I shall ask that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow, and then have an hour fixed to-morrow when the vote shall be taken upon this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it is of great importance to get at the appropriation bill, as the Senator from Connecticut says, and the simplest way of doing it as it ought to be done is to lay aside this bill for the purpose of taking up the appropriation bill. I cheerfully yield the floor for that purpose to any gentleman who wishes to make the motion.

Mr. EATON. We do not want to be deprived of the pleasure of hearing the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure no gentleman on the other side intends to make the motion or intends to allow it to be made with success. If I am wrong in that statement, I hope somebody will correct me.

Mr. EATON. I will correct the Senator from Vermont. He is wrong in part in the statement that we will not permit anybody to make that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "With success," I said.

Mr. EATON. Ah! I did not hear that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was the qualification.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I beg leave to have read in their connection sundry clauses of the Constitution of the United States, which is supposed in some quarters of the Union to be still in force, and certain laws, and certain writings of the fathers on the adoption of the Constitution, before I begin the observations thereon that I wish to address to the Senate. I read first, article 1, section 2, of the Constitution, clause 1:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Article 1, section 4, clause 1, of the Constitution:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Article 1, section 8, clause 12:

The Congress shall have power to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

Clause 13:

To provide and maintain a navy.

Clause 14:

To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces

Clause 15:

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Clause 18:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Article 1, section 10, clause 3:

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

Article 2, section 2, clause 1:

The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States.

I omit the residue of the clause which has no bearing upon the question in hand.

Article 2, section 3, and in this I omit parts not applicable to this question, and read it in its connection applied to this matter:

He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

Article 4, section 4:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

Article 14 of the amendments:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

And article 15 of the amendments:

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Now, Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary read certain statutes in their chronological order and connection: First the statute of 1789, (volume 1 of the Statutes, page 87,) section 27, that part of it which is marked, relating to the appointment of marshals and their powers.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That a marshal shall be appointed in and for each district for the term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure, whose duty it shall be to attend the district and circuit courts when sitting therein, and also the supreme court in the district in which that court shall sit, and to execute throughout the district all lawful precepts directed to him, and issued under the authority of the United States, and he shall have power to command all necessary assistance in the execution of his duty.

Then, from the same volume, page 264, I ask the Secretary to read sections 1, 2, and 9 of the act of 1792.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper; and in case of an insurrection in any State, against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, as may be applied for, or as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, the same being notified to the President of the United States by an associate justice or the district judge, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed. And if the militia of a State, where such combinations may happen, shall refuse, or be insufficient to suppress the same it shall be lawful for the President, if the Legislature of the United States be not in session, to call forth and employ such numbers of the militia of any other State or States most convenient thereto, as may be necessary, and the use of militia, so to be called forth, may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the ensuing session.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the marshals of the several districts and their deputies shall have the same powers in executing the laws of the United States as sheriffs and their deputies in the several States have by law in executing the laws of their respective States.

From the act of 1795, in the same volume, page 424, I ask the Secretary to read sections 1, 2, and 9.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger, or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper. And in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any State or States, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the marshals of the several districts, and their deputies, shall have the same powers in executing the laws of the United States as sheriffs and their deputies in the several States have by law in executing the laws of the respective States.

These three statutes, as everybody knows, were enacted in the administration of George Washington. I will now ask the Secretary to read the act of 1807, from volume 2 of the Statutes, page 443.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That in all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval force of the United States as shall be judged necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect.

That was in the administration of Thomas Jefferson. I will now ask the Secretary to read from the act of 1833, section 1 and section 5.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to execute the revenue laws and collect the duties on imports in the ordinary way in any collection district, it shall and may be lawful for the President to direct that the custom-house for such district be established and kept in any secure place within some port or harbor of such district, either upon land or on board any vessel; and, in that case, it shall be the of duty the collector to reside at such place and there to detain all vessels and cargoes arriving within the said district until the duties imposed on said cargoes by law be paid in cash, deducting interest according to existing laws; and in such cases it shall be unlawful to take the vessel or cargo from the custody of the proper officer of the customs unless by process from some court of the United States; and in case of any attempt otherwise to take such vessel or cargo by any force, or combination, or assemblage of persons too great to be overcome by the officers of the customs, it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person or persons as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces or militia of the United States as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of preventing the removal of such vessel or cargo and protecting the officers of the customs in retaining the custody thereof.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall be officially informed, by the authorities of any State, or by a judge of any circuit or district court of the United States, in the State, that, within the limits of such State, any law or laws of the United States, or the execution thereof, or of any process from the courts of the United States, is obstructed by the employment of military force, or by any other unlawful means, too great to be overcome by the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, or by the powers vested in the marshal by existing laws, it shall be lawful for him, the President of the United States, forthwith to issue his proclamation, declaring such fact or information, and requiring all such military and other force forthwith to disperse; and if at any time after issuing such proclamation, any such opposition or obstruction shall be made, in the manner or by the means aforesaid, the President shall be, and hereby is, authorized, promptly to employ such means to suppress the same, and to cause the said laws or process to be duly executed, as are authorized and provided in the cases therein mentioned by the act of the 28th of February, 1795, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for that purpose;" and also, by the act of the 3d of March, 1807, entitled "An act authorizing the employment of the land and naval forces of the United States in cases of insurrection."

That was in the administration of Andrew Jackson. I will now ask the Secretary to read the third section of the act of 13th of July, 1861, from volume 12 of the Statutes, page 256, section 3:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful to take any vessel or cargo detained as aforesaid from the custody of the proper officers of the customs, unless by process of some court of the United States; and in case of any attempt otherwise to take such vessel or cargo by any force, or combination, or assemblage of persons, too great to be overcome by the officers of the customs, it shall and may be lawful for the President, or such person or persons as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the Army or Navy, or militia of the United States, or such force of citizen volunteers as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of preventing the removal of such vessel or cargo, and protecting the officers of the customs in retaining the custody thereof.

That was in the administration of Abraham Lincoln, and, as the other sections of the same act show, was directed against the same state of things as the act of 1833 in the time of Andrew Jackson. I will now ask the Secretary to read from another act of 1861, to be found in the same volume, page 281, sections 1 and 7.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President of the United States, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States within any State or Territory of the United States, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of any or all the States of the Union, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the marshals of the several districts of the United States, and their deputies, shall have the same powers in executing the laws of the United States as sheriffs and their deputies in the several States have by law in executing the laws of the respective States.

That also was in the administration of President Abraham Lincoln. I will now ask the Secretary to read the act of 1865, volume 13, page 437.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful for any military or naval officer of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, to order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State of the United States of America, unless it shall be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls. And that it shall not be lawful for any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States to prescribe or fix, or attempt to prescribe or fix, by proclamation, order, or otherwise, the qualifications of voters in any State of the United States of America, or in any manner to interfere with the freedom of any election in any State, or with the exercise of the free right of suffrage in any State of the United States. Any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who violates this section of this act, shall, for every such offense, be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall pay a fine not exceeding $5,000, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than three months nor more than five years, at the discretion of the court trying the same; and any person convicted as aforesaid shall, moreover, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines from exercising the right of suffrage in any election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified, according to the laws of the State in which he shall offer to vote.

That also was in the administration of Abraham Lincoln. I now ask the Secretary to read the act of the 9th of April, 1866, sections 1 and 9.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States; and such citizens of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right in every State and Territory in the United States to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishments, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval force of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation and enforce the due execution of this act.

That was in the administration of Andrew Johnson but it was passed by a two-thirds vote, and upwards, of the two Houses, over the veto of President Johnson. I will now ask the Secretary to read from the act of 1870, volume 16, page 140, entitled "An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes," sections 18 and 19.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication, passed April 9, 1866, is hereby re-enacted; and sections 16 and 17 hereof shall be enforced according to the provisions of said act.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That if at any election for Representative or Delegate in the Congress of the United States any person shall knowingly personate and vote, or attempt to vote, in the name of any other person, whether living, dead, or fictitious; or vote more than once at the same election for any candidate for the same office; or vote at a place where he may not be lawfully entitled to vote; or vote without having a lawful right to vote; or do any unlawful act to secure a right or an opportunity to vote for himself or any other person; or by force, threat, menace, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer, or promise thereof, or otherwise unlawfully prevent any qualified voter of any State of the United States of America, or of any Territory thereof, from freely exercising the right of suffrage, or by any such means induce any voter to refuse to exercise such right; or compel or induce by any such means, or otherwise, any officer of an election in any such State or Territory to receive a vote from a person not legally qualified or entitled to vote; or interfere in any manner with any officer of said elections in the discharge of his duties; or by any of such means, or other unlawful means, induce any officer of an election, or officer whose duty it is to ascertain, announce, or declare the result of any such election, or give or make any certificate, document, or evidence in relation thereto, to violate or refuse to comply with his duty, or any law regulating the same; or knowingly and willfully receive the vote of any person not entitled to vote, or refuse to receive the vote of any person entitled to vote; or aid, counsel, procure, or advise any such voter, person, or officer to do any act hereby made a crime, or to omit to do any duty the omission of which is hereby made a crime, or attempt to do so, every such person shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and shall for such crime be liable to prosecution in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or both, in the discretion of the court, and shall pay the costs of prosecution.

The eighteenth section of the act just read was passed after the adoption of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and on account of doubts that had been raised in hostile quarters, of the constitutional validity of the act of 1866 protecting all persons in their civil rights, which had passed before that amendment of the Constitution.

I will now ask the Secretary to read from the act of the year 1871, in the same volume, page 437, section 12, entitled "An act to amend an act approved May 31, 1870, entitled 'An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes.'"

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the marshal, or his general deputies, or such special deputies as shall be thereto specially empowered by him, in writing, and under his hand and seal, whenever he or his said general deputies or his special deputies, or either or any of them, shall be forcibly resisted in executing their duties under this act, or the act hereby amended, or shall, by violence, threats, or menaces, be prevented from executing such duties, or from arresting any person or persons who shall commit any offense for which said marshal or his general or his special deputies are authorized to make such arrest, are, and each of them is hereby, empowered to summon and call to his or their aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of his district.

I will now ask the Secretary to read sections 2 and 3 of the act of the 20th of April, 1871. The applicable part of section 2 relates to the right of citizens to vote for a member of Congress, &c., but lest it might be thought that some other part of the section, which is rather long, should affect the construction of that, as a matter of prudence I will ask that the whole of section 2 and the whole of section 3 be read. The title of this act is "An act to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes."

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That if two or more persons within any State or Territory of the United States shall conspire together to overthrow, or to put down, or to destroy by force the Government of the United States, or to levy war against the United States, or to oppose by force the authority of the Government of the United States, or by force, intimidation, or threat to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States, or by force to seize, take, or possess any property of the United States contrary to the authority thereof, or by force, intimidation, or threat to prevent any person from accepting or holding any office or trust or place of confidence under the United States, or from discharging the duties thereof, or by force, intimidation, or threat to induce any officer of the United States to leave any State, district, or place where his duties as such officer might lawfully be performed, or to injure him in his person or property on account of his lawful discharge of the duties of his office, or to injure his person while engaged in the lawful discharge of the duties of his office, or to injure his property so as to molest, interrupt, hinder, or impede him in the discharge of his official duty, or by force, intimidation, or threat to deter any party or witness in any court of the United States from attending such court, or from testifying in any matter pending in such court fully, freely, and truthfully, or to injure any such party or witness in his person or property on account of his having so attended or testified, or by force, intimidation, or threat to influence the verdict, presentment, or indictment, of any juror or grand juror in any court of the United States, or to injure such juror in his person or property on account of any verdict, presentment, or indictment lawfully assented to by him, or on account of his being or having been such juror, or shall conspire together, or go in disguise upon the public highway or upon the premises of another for the purpose, either directly or indirectly, of depriving any person or any class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges or immunities under the laws, or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State from giving or securing to all persons within such State the equal protection of the laws, or shall conspire together for the purpose of in any manner impeding, hindering, obstructing, or defeating the due course of justice in any State or Territory, with intent to deny to any citizen of the United States the due and equal protection of the laws, or to injure any person in his person or his property for lawfully enforcing the right of any person or class of persons to the equal protection of the laws, or by force, intimidation, or threat to prevent any citizen of the United States lawfully entitled to vote from giving his support or advocacy in a lawful manner towards or in favor of the election of any lawfully qualified person as an elector of President or Vice-President of the United States, or as a member of the Congress of the United States, or to injure any such citizen in his person or property on account of such support or advocacy, each and every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high crime, and, upon conviction thereof in any district or circuit court of the United States or district or supreme court of any Territory of the United States having jurisdiction of similar offenses, shall be punished by a fine not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, as the court may determine, for a period of not less than six months nor more than six years, as the court may determine, or by both such fine and imprisonment as the court shall determine. And if any one or more persons engaged in any such conspiracy shall do, or cause to be done, any act in furtherance of the object of such conspiracy, whereby any person shall be injured in his person or property, or deprived of having and exercising any right or privilege of a citizen of the United States, the person so injured or deprived of such rights and privileges may have and maintain an action for the recovery of damages occasioned by such injury or deprivation of rights and privileges against any one or more of the persons engaged in such conspiracy, such action to be prosecuted in the proper district or circuit court of the United States, with and subject to the same rights of appeal, review upon error, and other remedies provided in like cases in such courts under the provisions of the act of April 9, 1866, entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means of their vindication."

SEC. 3. That in all cases where insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State shall so obstruct or hinder the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection, named in the Constitution and secured by this act, and the constituted authorities of such State shall either be unable to protect, or shall, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy shall oppose or obstruct the laws of the United States or the due execution thereof, or impede or obstruct the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations; and any person who shall be arrested under the provisions of this and the preceding section shall be delivered to the marshal of the proper district, to be dealt with according to law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. These three last-named acts of 1870 and 1871 were in the administration of President Ulysses S. Grant. I will read myself, as it is very short, the next act that bears upon this subject which is the act of 1878, section 15 of the Army appropriation bill, so much of it as is in relation to this topic:

From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States, as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by the act of Congress.

I have omitted from this summation of the chronological order of enactments on this subject at least three,—and probably a careful examination would show more,—statutes of the United States bearing upon the employment of its military power in subordination to and support of its laws on necessary occasions. One was the quarantine act, or rather I should say to speak accurately the act in assistance of the powers of the States to enforce quarantine regulations, which commanded the officers of the Army and Navy, &c., to render all military aid and support necessary in the execution of these then undoubted powers of the States, in enforcing their health and quarantine laws. Another was the act of 1818 called the neutrality act, where under a statute of the United States against setting on foot hostile expeditions or fitting out armed ships against powers with whom we are at peace, the President of the United States, in aid of the execution of the law and not as an exertion of the powers of war, was authorized to employ the land and naval forces to coerce obedience to the neutrality act. The other that I recall—and as I say there may be more—is the act now being executed, which authorizes the President of the United States to support and execute the laws against unlawful invasions of Indian territory by unauthorized persons, by force of the military power of the Government.

Mr. President, in the same connection, to bring it all together, I should like to have read some of the statements and arguments upon which the people of the United States were persuaded to adopt the Constitution as we now have it in its original form, excepting of course the articles of amendment, and for that purpose I invite the attention of the Senate to the following clause which I believe is fairly and fully cited from No. 15 of the Federalist, written by Alexander Hamilton, which I ask the Secretary to read; it is marked on page 94 of Dawson's edition of the Federalist.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The great and radical vice in the construction of the existing confederation is in the principle of legislation for states or governments, in their corporate or collective capacities, and as contradistinguished from the individuals of which they consist. Though this principle does not run through all the powers delegated to the Union, yet it pervades and governs those on which the efficacy of the rest depends. Except as to the rule of apportionment, the United States have an indefinite discretion to make requisitions for men and money; but they have no authority to raise either, by regulations extending to the individual citizens of America. The consequence of this is, that, though in theory their resolutions concerning those objects are laws, constitutionally binding on the members of the Union, yet in practice they are mere recommendations, which the States observe or disregard at their option.

It is a singular instance of the capriciousness of the human mind, that after all the admonitions we have had from experience on this head, there should still be found men, who object to the new Constitution, for deviating from a principle which has been found the bane of the old, and which is, in itself, evidently incompatible with the idea of government; a principle, in short, which, if it is to be executed at all, must substitute the violent and sanguinary agency of the sword to the mild influence of the magistracy.

I will ask, from the same number of the Federalist, the Secretary to read the paragraphs marked on page 96 of the same edition.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

But if we are unwilling to be placed in this perilous situation, if we still will adhere to the design of a national government or, which is the same thing, of a superintending power under the direction of a common council, we must resolve to incorporate into our plan those ingredients which may be considered as forming the characteristic difference between a league and a government; we must extend the authority of the Union to the persons of the citizens, the only proper objects of Government.

Government implies the power of making laws. It is essential to the idea of a law that it be attended with a sanction; or, in other words, a penalty or punishment for disobedience. If there be no penalty annexed to disobedience, the resolutions or commands which pretend to be laws will, in fact, amount to nothing more than advice or recommendation. This penalty, whatever it may be, can only be inflicted in two ways: by the agency of the courts and ministers of justice, or by military force; by the coercion of the magistracy, or by the coercion of arms. The first kind can evidently apply only to men: the last kind must, of necessity, be employed against bodies politic, or communities, or States. It is evident, that there is no process of a court by which the observance of the laws can, in the last resort, be enforced. Sentences may be denounced against them for violations of their duty; but these sentences can only be carried into execution by the sword. In an association where the general authority is confined to the collective bodies of the communities that compose it, every breach of the laws must involve a state of war; and military execution must become the only instrument of civil obedience. Such a state of things can certainly not deserve the name of government, nor would any prudent man choose to commit his happiness to it.

I ask the Secretary now to read the marked pages from No. 21 of the Federalist, written by James Madison, on pages 133, 134, and a small part of page 135 of the same edition.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The want of a mutual guarantee of the State governments is another capital imperfection in the federal plan. There is nothing of this kind declared in the articles that compose it; and to imply a tacit guarantee from consideration of utility would be a still more flagrant departure from the clause which has been mentioned than to imply a tacit power of coercion, from the like considerations. The want of a guarantee, though it might in its consequences endanger the Union, does not so immediately attack its existence, as the want of a constitutional sanction to its laws.

Without a guarantee, the assistance to be derived from the Union in repelling those domestic dangers which may sometimes threaten the existence of the State constitutions must be renounced. Usurpation may rear its crest in each State, and trample upon the liberties of the people; while the National Government could legally do nothing more than behold its encroachments with indignation and regret. A successful faction may erect a tyranny on the ruins of order and law; while no succor could constitutionally be afforded by the Union to the friends and supporters of the Government. The tempestuous situation from which Massachusetts has scarcely emerged evinces that dangers of this kind are not merely speculative. Who can determine what might have been the issue of her late convulsions if the malcontents had been headed by a Cæsar or by a Cromwell? Who can predict what effect a despotism established in Massachusetts would have upon the liberties of New Hampshire or Rhode Island, of Connecticut or New York?

The inordinate pride of State importance has suggested to some minds an objection to the principle of a guarantee in the Federal Government, as involving an officious interference in the domestic concerns of the members. A scruple of this kind would deprive us of one of the principal advantages to be expected from union; and can only flow from a misapprehension of the nature of the provision itself. It could be no impediment to reforms of the State constitutions by a majority of the people in a legal and peaceable mode. This right would remain undiminished. The guarantee could only operate against changes to be effected by violence. Toward the prevention of calamities of this kind too many checks cannot be provided. The peace of society and the stability of government depend absolutely on the efficacy of the precautions adopted on this head. Where the whole power of the Government is in the hands of the people, there is the less pretense for the use of violent remedies, in partial or occasional distempers of the State. The natural cure for an ill-administration, in a popular or representative constitution, is a change of men. A guarantee by the national authority would be as much leveled against the usurpations of rulers as against the ferments and outrages of faction and sedition in the community.

I now ask the Secretary to read from No. 26 of the Federalist, written by Alexander Hamilton, on pages 170 and 171, the marked paragraphs.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In England, for a long time after the Norman conquest, the authority of the monarch was almost unlimited. Inroads were gradually made upon the prerogative, in favor of liberty, first by the barons, and afterward by the people, till the greatest part of its most formidable pretensions became extinct. But it was not till the revolution in 1688, which elevated the Prince of Orange to the throne of Great Britain, that English liberty was completely triumphant. As incident to the undefined power of making war, an acknowledged perogative of the Crown, Charles II had, by his own authority, kept on foot in time of peace a body of five thousand regular troops. And this number James II increased to thirty thousand; who were paid out of his civil list. At the revolution, to abolish the exercise of so dangerous an authority, it became an article of the Bill of Rights then framed that "the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless with the consent of Parliament, was against law."

In that kingdom, when the pulse of liberty was at its highest pitch, no security against the danger of standing armies was thought requisite, beyond a prohibition of their being raised or kept up by the mere authority of the executive magistrate. The patriots, who effected that memorable revolution, were too temperate, and too well informed, to think of any restraint on the legislative discretion. They were aware that a certain number of troops for guards and garrisons were indispensable; that no precise bounds could be set to the national exigencies; that a power equal to every possible contingency must exist somewhere in the Government; and that when they referred the exercise of that power to the judgment of the legislature, they had arrived at the ultimate point of precaution, which was reconcilable with the safety of the community.

I now read a paragraph from No. 28 of the Federalist, written by Alexander Hamilton and the opening paragraph; and as to all these extracts, I believe I read enough to show the fairness of the citation:

That there may happen cases in which the National Government may be necessitated to resort to force, cannot be denied. Our own experience has corroborated the lessons taught by the examples of other nations; that emergencies of this sort will sometimes arise in all societies, however constituted; that seditions and insurrections are, unhappily, maladies as inseparable from the body-politic as tumors and eruptions from the natural body; that the idea of governing at all times by the simple force of law (which we have been told is the only admissible principle of republican government) has no place but in the reveries of those political doctors, whose sagacity disdains the admonitions of experimental instruction.

I will now read from No. 58 of the Federalist, written by James Madison, on the subject of the power of Congress over the election of members of the House of Representatives. He first quotes the existing paragraph of the Constitution which I have already read; and he then says:

This provision has not only been declaimed against by those who condemn the Constitution in the gross; but it has been censured by those who have objected with less latitude, and greater moderation; and, in one instance, it has been thought exceptionable by a gentleman who has declared himself the advocate of every other part of the system.

I am greatly mistaken, notwithstanding, if there be any article in the whole plan more completely defensible than this. Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

These words which I have last read are italicized by Mr. Madison:

Every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation. Every just reasoner will, at first sight, approve an adherence to this rule, in the work of the convention; and will disapprove every deviation from it which may not appear to have been dictated by the necessity of incorporating into the work some particular ingredient, with which a rigid conformity to the rule was incompatible. Even in this case, though he may acquiesce in the necessity, yet he will not cease to regard and to regret the departure from so fundamental a principle as a portion of imperfection in the system which may prove the seed of future weakness, and perhaps anarchy.

It will not be alleged that an election law could have been framed and inserted in the Constitution which would have been always applicable to every probable change in the situation of the country; and it will, therefore, not be denied that a discretionary power over elections ought to exist somewhere. It will, I presume, be as readily conceded that there were only three ways in which this power could have been reasonably modified and disposed: that it must either have been lodged wholly in the National Legislature, or wholly in the State Legislatures, or primarily in the latter—

That is the State Legislatures—and ultimately in the former—

That is Congress.

The last mode has with reason been preferred by the convention. They have submitted the regulation of elections for the Federal Government, in the first instance, to the local administrations; which, in ordinary cases, and when no improper views prevail, may be both more convenient and more satisfactory; but they have reserved to the national authority a right to interpose, whenever extraordinary circumstances might render that interposition necessary to its safety.

Nothing can be more evident, than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the National Government in the hands of the State Legislatures would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy.

* * * * * * *

And as it is more consonant to the rules of a just theory to intrust the Union with the care of its own existence than to transfer that care to any other hands, if abuses of power are to be hazarded on the one side or on the other, it is more rational to hazard them where the power would naturally be placed than where it would unnaturally be placed.

I should like now, Mr. President, to have read, as having a very obvious bearing upon the principles on which this Government and this legislation which I have read and the opposition to this proposed bill proceed, from the message of Andrew Jackson to Congress on the 16th of January, 1833, on the subject of obstructions to the execution of the laws of the United States in the State of South Carolina. I will ask the Secretary to read first from page 148 of the appendix to volume 9, part 2 of the Congressional Debates, 1832–'33, the passage marked, and then on page 149 and on page 150 also the passages marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

If these measures cannot be defeated and overcome by the power conferred by the Constitution on the Federal Government, the Constitution must be considered as incompetent to its own defense, the supremacy of the laws is at an end, and the rights and liberties of the citizens can no longer receive protection from the Government of the Union.

* * * * * * *

By these various proceedings, therefore, the State of South Carolina has forced the General Government, unavoidably, to decide the new and dangerous alternative of permitting a State to obstruct the execution of the laws within its limits, or seeing it attempt to execute a threat of withdrawing from the Union. That portion of the people at present exercising the authority of the State solemnly assert their right to do either, and as solemnly announce their determination to do one or the other.

* * * * * * *

These deductions plainly flow from the nature of the Federal compact, which is one of limitations, not only upon the powers originally possessed by the parties thereto, but also upon those conferred on the Government and every department thereof. It will be freely conceded that by the principles of our system all power is vested in the people; but to be exercised in the mode and subject to the checks which the people themselves have prescribed. These checks are undoubtedly only different modifications of the same great popular principle which lies at the foundation of the whole, but are not on that account to be less regarded or less obligatory.

Upon the power of Congress, the veto of the Executive and the authority of the judiciary, which is to extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, are the obvious checks; and the sound action of public opinion, with the ultimate power of amendment, is the salutary and only limitation upon the powers of the whole.

However it may be alleged that a violation of the compact by the measures of the Government can affect the obligations of the parties, it cannot even be pretended that such violation can be predicated of those measures until all the constitutional remedies shall have been fully tried.

If the Federal Government exercise powers not warranted by the Constitution, and immediately affecting individuals, it will scarcely be denied that the proper remedy is a recourse to the judiciary.

* * * * * *

The Constitution, which his oath of office obliges him to support, declares that the Executive "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and, in providing that he shall, from time to time, give to Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient, imposes the additional obligation of recommending to Congress such more efficient provision for executing the laws as may, from time to time, be found requisite.

The same instrument confers on Congress the power not merely to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare, but "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof;" and also to provide for calling forth the militia for executing the laws of the Union. In all cases similar to the present the duties of the Government become the measure of its powers; and whenever it fails to exercise a power necessary and proper to the discharge of the duty prescribed by the Constitution, it violates the public trusts not less than it would in transcending its proper limits. To refrain, therefore, from the high and solemn duties thus enjoined, however painful the performance may be, and thereby tacitly permit the rightful authority of the Government to be contemned, and its laws obstructed by a single State, would neither comport with its own safety nor the rights of the great body of the American people.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, in connection with the act of 1865 which I have had read, that speaks of keeping the peace at the polls, and the various and continuous acts of Congress which in one provision authorize the marshals of the United States to command all the necessary assistance in the discharge of their duty, and in another to exercise all the powers in their respective districts that the sheriffs in the States may by law be authorized to exercise, I ask that the Secretary may read, what I suppose nobody will dispute, the title "Peace," in Bouvier's Law Dictionary as the definition of the use of the word "peace" in the act of 1865, and the definition of the powers of the marshals measured by those of sheriffs in the respective States.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PEACE. The concord or final agreement in a fine of lands.—18 Edw. I, modus levandi finis.

The tranquillity enjoyed by a political society, internally by the good order which reigns among its members, and externally by the good understanding it has with all other nations. Applied to the internal regulations of a nation, peace imports, in a technical sense, not merely a state of repose and security as opposed to one of violence or warfare, but likewise a state of public order and decorum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg leave also to read in the same continuous connection sections 1490 and 1491, or the parts thereof that bear upon this question, of the commentaries of Mr. Justice Story upon the Constitution:

§ 1490. The first clause of the second section is, "The President shall be commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States."

Then I omit the other part of the section about requiring the opinions of the executive officers, &c.

§ 1491. The command and application of the public force, to execute the laws, to maintain peace, and to resist foreign invasion, are powers so obviously of an executive nature, and require the exercise of qualities so peculiarly adapted to this department, that a well-organized government can scarcely exist when they are taken away from it.

Let me read also from section 1564 of the same commentaries. Having spoken in the preceding sections of the power to convene Congress on extraordinary occasions, and the power to adjourn Congress, &c., Mr. Justice Story then proceeds in section 1564:

On the other hand, the duty imposed upon him to take care that the laws be faithfully executed follows out the strong injunctions of his oath of office, that he will "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution." The great object of the Executive Department is to accomplish this purpose; and without it, be the form of government whatever it may, it will be utterly worthless for offense or defense; for the redress of grievances or the protection of rights; for the happiness, or good order, or safety of the people.

I have thus, Mr. President, had read in their consecutive and chronological connection the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and of the series of laws which bear upon the power of the executive department of the Government, whether exerted by the Chief Magistrate of the Union by a direct act or order of his own, or by the subordinate officers, the marshals, by the special powers conferred upon them, in order to show that from the beginning of the Government, founded upon the principles that I have read from the Federalist, of a government of law, that wherever there is law and right there must be the power of carrying it into force, there has existed, and there does still exist the affirmative and express authority, first, in the President of the United States to exert the military power of the Government whenever the execution of the laws—that is all laws and every law on all occasions and everywhere—is obstructed by combinations too powerful for the ordinary means of the civil courts of justice, and that there has existed from the first by express authority under the Constitution and acts of Congress the power of the marshals in the performance of every duty that the law imposed upon or vested in them to command, by one provision, the fundamental one of 1789, all necessary assistance in the performance of their duties, and by the others, which you notice by a curious and proper coincidence and co-operation of forces existing in these force bills, as they may be called, from that of George Washington in 1792 and 1795, and Jefferson in 1807, and Jackson in 1833, and Lincoln in 1861, and Johnson in 1866, and Grant in 1870 and 1871, everywhere in connection with the exertion by a direct act of the Executive, also the express conferring upon the marshals of their several districts of every power that the sheriffs of the respective States had in the execution of their duties. By this it will be seen, as it appears to me, that neither was intended to supersede the other, and that neither did supersede the other, but in order that the due execution of the laws might be protected in every way and everywhere and at all times there should be the local course of the civil magistrate of the law, the marshal, whose authority was as wide as the territorial boundaries of his district, and there should exist also, superadded and in aid of it or independent of it if the marshal could not suitably execute his duties, and should always reside in the Chief Magistrate of the Union—not a military tyrant but a civil officer—the power to exert the whole force of the law to prevent any forcible obstruction to the execution of the laws of the United States too powerful for the ordinary means, and as to the acts of all of them, to cause the laws to be duly executed.

This from the fathers to this day has been the conferred right, if it did not exist in the President of the United States originally under his duty to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution, and so of course the laws made in pursuance of it, and to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. If in his civil character as Commander-in-Chief of the Army the military power of the United States, (without any special law,) where the execution of any law was forcibly obstructed, did not exist in him, it was conferred, and without opposition and without dispute, except as to mere methods of detail, by the fathers and by their successors whenever times of trouble and disturbance and discontent or obstruction to the laws made it necessary, following the same grant of power all the time to amplify and superadd to the methods and the details of the exertion of the power.

That is so clear that I suppose down to the year 1865, when the act which the vetoed bill proposed in part to repeal, was passed, (and by that peculiar kind of repeal which made the act more forcible than it was before, repealing the exceptive and restrictive clauses so far as related to the exertion of the power,) I take it that there never was any question, but once, that the President of the United States, and the officers of the United States, its peace officers, its marshals, were by express statute, because I am not on any implication whatever, invested with every power that the sheriffs of the States had; who by the common law and by the statutes of all the States are peace officers. There was to be exerted all the time against all combinations, under all circumstances, on days of election and on Sundays and on holidays, and in all places, the duty that the existence of the Government requires to be performed without exception, of preserving the peace of the United States against forcible disturbance.

You will have seen, Mr. President, from the definition I have had read, that the right to preserve the peace is not an arbitrary and discretionary right of definition or of application, but that the peace of the United States is that order and tranquillity which is found in the due execution of its laws without forcible and violent obstruction. That is peace; and the power of the marshal, therefore, as the peace officer, conferred not by implication but by expression in the statutes, referring only for a definition and a measure of his powers to the laws of the States, was this same power of preserving the peace of the United States; that is to say, of putting down by all means that the law had put at his command,—and it put them expressly, whatever they might be,—unlawful obstructions to the execution of its laws.

I said there was one exception. In 1833, as President Jackson most aptly expressed it, and expressed it apparently with a kind of prophecy of what has happened since, and what I believe exists now, when that portion of the people of South Carolina who then exercised dominion there, chose to set up their will and their power against the exertion of the national law, the same arguments, the same protests, the same defiances, the same assertions of what is miscalled State sovereignty and State rights, were made almost in exactly the same language. If you will look into the debates of Congress, you will see the eagerness, the energy, the astuteness, and the violence with which the representatives of that portion of the people of South Carolina that then exerted its powers, against another portion of the people of the same State, and their wishes and their rights as citizens of the United States, and against the execution of the laws of the United States, denounced what they called Federal and unconstitutional interference and invasion of the rights of States. Therefore, as the poet says,

> These new charmers, who keep serpents,
> Have not the antique sting resigned;

they have only followed either by blood or "tradition," which is referred to in the preamble of this extraordinary bill which we have before us, the same old contest, and presented a repetition of the same old heresy, that has been on all occasions, when it has been brought into actual contact with the authority of the nation, happily so far suppressed.

Now, let us see what the act of 1865 did. Let us look at the state and condition of the law and of the country when that act was passed. There was then no national statute which regulated the manner of electing members of Congress. The right still was left reposed in the authorities of the States. There were then no thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, the two last of which professed, (although I know it is denied in certain quarters,) one of them to secure the universality of equal rights, and the other to secure the universality and reality of a suffrage that should not be denied by reason of race, or color, or the previous condition of a certain portion of the people of the United States, now become freemen and citizens. What was the condition of things then in respect to actual transactions? The state of the law was what I have narrated. There had been going on for four years a rebellion, if I may use that phrase without offending the sensibilities of anybody. One of the States of this Union, that in her corporate capacity had not undertaken to break up the union of the States and to secede, Kentucky, but which, as I am informed,—I do not know how the fact is,—had sent, or allowed to go, into a warfare against the people and Government of the United States, a greater number of her citizens than she had furnished to support the Constitution and the laws of the people of the United States, was about to have an election. The armies of the United States, some of them, had place in that State, as they had a right to have, I suppose, and it was said that the forces of the rebellion were being sent back into that State on leave of absence and otherwise. In 1864, when the question was whether the war should be declared a failure, and an ignominious peace secured by the election of McClellan, or whether the war should be declared a success, to be made sure by the re-election of Abraham Lincoln, a sufficient body of confederate troops and enemies of the United States were to return to Kentucky to carry that State for the side of the enemy. Then it was that the officers of the United States in command of its troops there, in some places did interfere, in the language of the title of this bill, with a State election, if the election of electors of President of the United States be a State election; I do not stop to discuss whether it is or not. We may call it that, for the purposes of this case at least. Under that provocation and in that state of warfare, it is perhaps not too much to admit that in the mere legal sense, the officers of the Army of the United States violated the law and undertook to exclude, and did exclude by the power of their military arms, the enemies of the United States from taking part in its government. That led, in the year afterward, to the proposal and passage of the act of 1865, by which it was declared under proper penalties against all possible abuse, that no officer or other person should bring to or employ—I may not quote the exact language—at the place where any election was going on, any part of the armed forces of the United States, unless it were to repel its armed enemies, or to keep the peace at the polls.

Mr. CONKLING. And that they should not prescribe the qualifications of voters.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And, as the honorable Senator from New York very kindly suggests, that which was perhaps the gravamen of the act in view of the circumstances that had occurred, when they said that the enemies of the United States should not vote in the order of the year before, that the officers of the Army should not prescribe the qualifications of voters or undertake to interfere with the exercise of the right of voters.

Mr. President, that was the history of that act; that was the act itself, passed under those circumstances, and for those purposes. Now, I beg somebody to tell me how he can torture out of that act anything like a repeal or a modification of the previous statutes of the United States that I have referred to, which were only in support of the constitutional power and duty of the President of the United States to protect and defend and preserve it, and his power and duty to take care that the laws of the United States be faithfully executed. It recognizes and affirms on the face of it that there does exist, if it does not confer it if it did not exist before, as confessedly it did exist before, the power to keep the peace at the polls, even the peace of a State under certain possible circumstances. There was at that time no regulation of the power of Congress as to the "manner," although there was full power to prescribe the time and the manner of choosing members of Congress.

What was that "peace" in the State at State elections, to which I have referred but which I have not stated fully enough? As I have said before, it was not an arbitrary peace of the President's own definition, of his own judgment, but it was, as it will always be as long as this Government exists, the peace that Thomas Jefferson described in his message to Congress in the year 1806 or 1807, touching the efforts of Aaron Burr and his associates and confederates (for I am sure that is a popular phrase) to overturn the government in the southwestern part of the United States and the Territory of Louisiana; and that was, as Mr. Jefferson stated it in his message to Congress, "the peace and safety of the Union." How? In so far as there is to be a President of the United States at all, he is to exist and be produced under the Constitution of the United States and not under any reserved power of the States. There is nothing in their reserved powers which provides for or authorizes the existence of a President of the United States. He is the child of the Constitution and of no other power or producing cause. There is also, as it stood in 1865—I am now speaking of it solely then, without reference to later laws,—the express provision that the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, a duty of the highest character and of the highest import. Could it be said that the United States was exerting more than its duty and its powers under that clause in the Constitution, if it exerted the military power as well as the civil power of the United States to prevent the republican government of Kentucky, for instance, from being overthrown and carried into the rebellion, setting up for itself an independent confederacy by the invasion of returning enemies of the United States to take possession with their guns and their swords of the polls of that State, and to cast a majority of the votes, or to count them, so as to say that that State would no longer assist the United States in carrying on the war but would go to the other side? I think, sir, not only was the action justified under that clause, but it might have been also under another clause if a call had been made by the loyal governor of that State or by its Legislature if it were in session, as usually on election days it is not, for there was a case for the repression of domestic violence where the power of the United States could be exerted to prevent the intrusion of its enemies from a portion of the territory of its people that had set up itself as an independent government.

I say, then, that the "peace" which the statute of 1865 refers to is the peace of the acts of 1789 and of 1792 and of 1795 and of 1861, which conferred express power upon the marshals to keep the peace, not only at the polls, but everywhere else, the peace of the United States, by preventing obstructions to its laws, but it was also the peace such as I have described,—the peace that prevents any infraction and obstruction to the constitutional exercise of every function that the Constitution of the United States confers upon or authorizes by a State or by the exertion of its own laws for national purposes. It is "the peace" that the common-law writers speak of who define the duties of sheriffs, coming down to us from the remotest generations of the common law, speaking of the very subject of keeping the peace, that it is to be done according to the powers conferred by law, and in the ways authorized by law.

There is not, therefore, in that statute or in the others to which I have referred, what our learned friends on the other side seem to be so willing that the people of this country shall believe, a recognition or affirmation, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] stated it with great force, of the power of the United States to exercise a tyrannical discretion of saying what shall or shall not be done on the occasion of a State or other election, but it is only the power to preserve from violent interference and obstruction the Constitution and the laws of the United States and the peace which flows from the observance of them.

Is there any great danger in that? Are the liberties of the people to be largely put in hazard and jeopardy by the exertion of all the power of the Government, when it is needed to protect them in the rights that the laws of their own making confer upon them? That is what "the peace" was and is that was and is to be kept at the polls. It is quite unnecessary to maintain that the act of 1865 conferred authority upon the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, or upon the marshals in the exertion of the powers of sheriffs in the States, authority to keep the peace at the polls, of the kind I have described, because, as I think it has been demonstrated by the mere reading of the preceding statutes, that so far as this kind of peace is concerned (which is the whole of the peace of the United States) it existed before, by express authority of the ancient laws of this National Commonwealth. But suppose this had been the first act upon the subject of the exertion of the military power of the Government, which is not, as the Senator from Alabama stated yesterday, martial law by any means; it is the power of the magistrate, which does not necessarily mean a judge, let me tell my honorable friends over the way; it means any civil officer authorized by the Constitution or the law to execute it; that is the magistrate; it confers authority upon the magistrate to exert the power that the law gives to the magistrate, by taking the sword, not of the tyrant, but of the people, to protect them under the law. Suppose this had been the first act, as I say, then it would have read very much as sundry clauses in the Constitution do; take one that I happen to recall at this moment: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." Where do you get the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus by act of Congress? I am not on the question whether the President can do it under that clause. It was not a power that resided in Congress from the beginning as it did in the States, for there was not originally any Congress or any Union of the States. They are a creation of the Constitution. Where do you get the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus at all? You get it under that clause of the Constitution which says that you cannot suspend it unless a certain contingency exists.

Now, you have the statute of 1865 which says you shall not employ the military power of the United States at the place of an election unless it be required to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace of the United States, defined as I have endeavored to define it, at the polls. It is, therefore, a qualified grant of a power, or else you must hold under the Constitution in the clause that I have referred to as to habeas corpus, that there is no power to suspend the habeas corpus in the time of an invasion, for it did not exist before in the Congress of the United States, because that was the creation of the Constitution, and the Government of which it was the organ was the creation of the Constitution.

But it is quite unnecessary, as I have said, in my view, to go into any lengthened debate or illustration upon this point. There remains the undisputed and indisputable fact that by the laws, as they stood before, there was conferred upon the President of the United States in certain contingencies, and upon the marshals of the United States in other contingencies, the express authority to exert every force of which the Republic is capable under its Constitution and its laws to prevent the violent infraction of them; and there was no exception as to elections, or days, or places, or occasions.

That was the state of the law in 1865, when, as I have stated, Congress had not exerted the power that the Constitution by express terms grants to it to regulate the manner of the election of members of Congress; but since that time it has exerted that power, and it has proposed to the people of the States, and the people have agreed by the constitutional majority to the amendments to the Constitution which were meant to secure the universality of equal rights and the universality of the security of equal suffrage in the respects I have named.

What has Congress done since? It provided, in the first place, by the act of 1866, which has been read, that every citizen of the United States should have an equal right to the protection of the laws in the exertion of every faculty as a member of the political community that belonged to him. It said by express statement in one of its sections which stands unto this day, that the President of the United States should be authorized to employ all the power of this Government to protect him in the exertion of that right. Then it provided by the acts of 1870 and 1871 that the election of members of Congress, (for I will not refer to any other; if they are named that is enough for me,) should be conducted under certain supervision and control of the laws of the United States, by officers appointed under the authority of the laws of the United States; and that act provided in explicit terms in one of the sections which I have read that—

> Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State so obstructs or hinders the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection named in the Constitution and secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, or immunities, and the constituted authorities of such State are unable to protect, or, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy, opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States, or the due execution thereof, or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations.

That which I have just read from the Revised Statutes (and I should say that every other one of the statutes I have read is in the Revised Statutes by repetition through later acts or otherwise) is in the very act which provides for the regulation and supervision of the election of members of the Congress of the United States. Then I ask in all candor of my honorable friends on the other side, is there any ground, in an intellectual point of view, (I am not speaking whether this ought to be repealed or not, I am speaking now about the existing state of the law,) upon which the breadth of a hair of distinction in reasoning can be made against the proposition that that is an express authority to the President of the United States to exert all the power that the Constitution and the laws have given him in relation to the command of the Army, to prevent forcible obstruction to the exercise by supervisors and marshals, who are certainly performing a public duty, of their power to secure to those entitled to vote an opportunity to go and endeavor to vote, against whatever combination or opposition may exist, in the same sense and in the same way and upon the same principle of government as in respect of maintaining the authority of a court of justice, or the authority of your revenue laws, only it may be for a higher, a wider, and more sacred purpose, and that the President is authorized to exert the military force of the United States, not as martial law, but as the power of the law that has been put into his hands in his civil character to overcome violent opposition to the execution of the mandate of the law?

Mr. President, somebody will have to hunt a good while before he finds either statute or authority or reason to say that there is not by that section now standing in the Revised Statutes, passed in the election laws since the act of 1865 in respect to keeping the peace at the polls, the express authority and duty imposed upon the Chief Magistrate of the United States in his character as a civil magistrate, and for the great objects that Hamilton and Madison and Story say are essential to the existence of all governments, to protect every person in the exertion of an official or a public duty, in execution of the law against the violence that would oppose or overturn it.

It follows then, as it appears to me, beyond all question and beyond all dispute, that when the act of 1878 which I had read at the beginning was passed, there existed exactly the state of things that that act said might continue to exist, and that it did not undertake to interfere with. That is to say, there still existed untouched and unharmed the express authority of the Constitution and the acts of Congress to employ the Army either as a posse comitatus or otherwise in the execution of the law and in putting down forcible obstruction to it.

All these statutes are based upon the principles of justice and constitutional liberty. They are in substance precisely the provisions that every State from the beginning of this great nation to this day has found to be necessary, and has imbedded in her constitution and her laws for the protection of the existence of her own government and the republican freedom and order of her society.

There is no distinction in my opinion, and I think none can be stated by the most ingenious sophist, between the power and duty of a government, be it State or national, if it be a government, of upholding the execution of its laws with order, and with peace and liberty, as well on the day of an election in a State and on any other day. A multo fortiori would it not be more necessary on election-day, for if your election fails in the Republic, what has become of the existence of your Republic and of the liberty that has built it up and that it secures? Justice may fail; a mob or an armed band organized more permanently than a mob, may drive from the seat of power the Supreme Court of the United States for a year; but the Government exists, though justice is obstructed; and by and by, when the power of the law shall have overcome that opposition, the reign of justice will return; the cases will be taken up; nobody will have lost anything save by delay. But if you overturn constitutional liberty at elections, if you destroy the fountain out of which the life of the Republic and its whole frame-work springs, your Government is at an end.

If, therefore, there be any distinction between one part of the law and the Constitution and our duty and another, it is that every power that the supreme force of the nation, in its character either civil or military, can exert, should be exerted if needed on the occasion when every citizen of the Republic qualified by law to that end, is to perform his public trust as a part of the component organization of the Republic in freely, honestly, and fairly participating in the choice of a Representative in the House of Representatives of the nation, as it is in the choice of the members of Legislature of his State. Then, if we were to have distinctions in respect to the duty of executing the laws of the Republic, and if there were to be one occasion more than another when the extreme power that could be brought to bear should be exerted to the uttermost in the defense of liberty against violence, it would be on the very day on which these new lights of democracy say it shall not be executed.

Mr. President, you will have observed that the act of 1878, of which I am now speaking, had no special reference to elections or days of elections; they are not named in it. The new revelation of danger to the liberties of the country had not then been vouchsafed to the men who now at last compose a majority of the two Houses of Congress. It was general, not less express; it was universal; and if it had any force upon the power of the marshal, for instance, (which I do not think is material to this inquiry,) necessarily it also had force upon all the powers of the President of the United States. If it had any force in respect of the day of an election it had also the same force and by the same sign in respect of the day of the holding of a court of the United States. If it had any force in respect of the day of holding a court of the United States, it had equal force in respect of the day of the assemblage of this body. If the "Mother of Presidents" should have undertaken to secede and to capture the State of Maryland and the District of Columbia, and should have brought thousands of her gallant sons to besiege and environ the Capitol and prevent the representatives of the people from all the other States from coming here to take their seats on the first Monday in December, by the same law of 1878, if it had any force at all of this character, the President of the United States would have had no power whatever to exert the military power at his command to send those people away unless he had got it (and he would not have got it under the act of 1878 then) under the act of 1865 "to repel the armed enemies of the United States." But I am now speaking of the act of 1878; that is the one which our learned friends on the other side say has accomplished the undermining and the overthrow and the emasculation of the powers of Government which have been conferred by the Constitution and the statutes from the days of George Washington to 1878. By that, as I have suggested, if you say that it overthrows the power of the marshals on the day of an election conferred by the acts of 1870 and 1871 and now in the Revised Statutes, if you say it overthrows the power of the President of the United States on similar occasions, conferred by the same statutes, then you must say that by the same sign it overthrows every other power of the President of the United States conferred by former statutes and in respect to other officers, because it says that in no case and at no time shall the Army of the United States be used, not merely by a marshal, but by anybody, either as a posse comitatus or otherwise, unless the Constitution of the United States expressly, or an act of Congress expressly, authorizes it to be used. The consequence is, if there is anybody in this Republic, be he citizen or official, who is disposed to give away his case, disposed to give away the law and the Constitution and, in the long run, the liberty of this people on the day of an election, he must give it away on every other day as well. There will, to be sure, be little occasion for courts of justice, for the collection of revenues, for the preservation of neutrality, for the exertion of the power of the United States in support of the quarantine and health laws of the States, if you have no Congress except the mob that is elected by tyrants and by illegal violence. Your courts of justice will go down, the exertion of every one of your laws for the collection of revenue must go down, the exertion of your duty to foreign nations must cease, as well as the exertion of your highest duty to protect your own officers in the employment of the powers conferred by your own laws and your own citizens in the exercise of the duties that your laws have reposed in them and imposed upon them on the day of an election as well all the rest of the year; for, as you can see, there is neither exception nor qualification in this act of 1878; if it says it unto one, it speaks it unto all. It covers Presidents as well as marshals, and it covers the solemn halls of justice as well as the hustings. It covers neutrality as well as domestic tranquillity. It covers everything or it covers nothing, for all the powers that either President or marshal has in protecting, preserving, and defending the Constitution and executing the laws of the United States are conferred, if they exist at all, by the express provisions of that instrument and the express enactments of the statutes. There is no one of them that needs an implication to carry it out. Like the Ten Commandments they exist by affirmative declaration or they do not exist at all. But the act of 1878 does no such thing; it only excludes implied powers.

And so I say, sir, that if we are to surrender at this time this one thing that is said to be so small by some, and thought to be so great—and truly it is—by those who seek to carry it through, we surrender all. If you are willing to follow the mere red rag of an untruth in the title of the pending bill for fear that the people of the United States or some portion of them will think that you are opposed to the liberty and protection of elections, and therefore on such a title to prohibit interference with elections, proceed to abdicate all the powers that the people have conferred upon you to protect their liberties at elections and at all other times, then you will have been the victim of a great delusion, and you will have been captured by those calling themselves the friends of the United States—I came very near making a mistake and using another term—you will have been captured by the friends of the United States at a very cheap rate indeed.

Before I examine with any particularity the immediate bill before us, let me show you a very high authority and one that was never questioned, to the point that the marshals of the United States from the beginning of the Government, at least down to the year 1854 and so of course down to the year 1865 certainly, because there was no change in the law up to that time, had the express authority of the statutes of the United States to call upon the persons composing the military power—I beg Senators to mark my words,—to call upon the persons composing the military power, as well as everybody else, to assist in the execution of the laws. I refer now to the opinion of Mr. Attorney-General Cushing, of the 27th of May, 1854, upon the subject of the exertion of the military power of the United States by the marshal of the district of Illinois to arrest and return to E. Crawford Smith, of Missouri, a fugitive from labor, one of that then unhappy class of community that the honorable Senator from Alabama, representing so many of them as he does, dignifies with the name of "nigger."

Mr. MORGAN. I beg pardon; I have never used that word.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I misunderstood the Senator yesterday. Then I will say whom he now dignifies with the name of citizens.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not apply any name of dishonor at all, to any citizens of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am glad to know that. There was a time when it was not thought to be quite the thing in certain quarters of this country to be regarded as a citizen of the United States, but now it seems to be otherwise, and I am very glad of it.

The act of Congress providing for the forcible restoration to their masters of fugitives from labor provided that the marshals should execute the warrants of the commissioners. As Mr. Attorney-General Cushing says, and as I have already read to you, the act of 1789 provided that each marshal in his district should execute all warrants and that he should have power to command all necessary assistance in the execution of his duty, just as the statute is now exactly. The case was that the marshal of the United States apprehending that the turbulent people of the city of Chicago in the State of Illinois, enemies of their country and its laws, as they were then looked upon, would interfere with the restoration of this unhappy tramp as he might be called—I am sure the Senator from Alabama used that word—this unhappy son of toil tramping for freedom and labor that could be rewarded, and prevent his being sent back to his master and to his fetters in Missouri, called upon a police force of twelve men and a party of militia. The Attorney-General does not state how many there were, whether that "party of militia" was the democratic party or whether by "party" he means some other kind of "party;" I do not know, but the marshal called upon a party of militia, and as the statement of the case is, he called upon them as militia; but that is not the point I am on now. The question was whether that was lawful, whether the marshal of the United States, having express authority by statute to command all necessary assistance and having the powers of the sheriffs of the several States by express statute just as he has now and by the same statutes unchanged in letter or in form, had express authority to exert under his command any part of the military power of the United States, because you will bear in mind that the Supreme Court of the United States had decided that the States had nothing to do with the restoration of fugitive slaves, and therefore the militia could not be called upon as a part of the State power; the State had no right to intervene or "to interfere," as the title of this bill is; it could do nothing; it was the exertion of the power of the Constitution and the laws of the United States, and if it could be exerted at all undoubedly it was exerted over the militia as a whole because although the militia was the militia of the States in the territorial and divisional sense, the Constitution of the United States makes every particle of the military power the military power of the Union, and it commands that no State shall have any troops in time of peace nor employ them except in time of invasion or imminent danger of it. It was therefore the military power of the United States that this marshal called upon; and the question was when the tax-payers, the people, were called upon to foot the bills, whether that was an authority that the statutes of the United States authorized the marshal to exert. If they did, then this militia of the State of Illinois was entitled to its payment; if they did not, then it was not. What does the Attorney-General say? After a long discussion of the nature of what is a posse comitatus, &c., he says this:

These considerations—

Speaking of the power of the sheriff, and so by express grant of the marshal, to call upon everybody within his district to aid him in the performance of his duty he says:

These considerations apply as well to the military as to the civil force employed; for the posse comitatus comprises every person in the district or county above the age of fifteen years, (Watson's Sheriff, page 60,) whatever may be their occupation, whether civilians or not; and including the military of all denominations, militia, soldiers, marines, all of whom are alike bound to obey the commands of a sheriff or marshal. The fact that they are organized as military bodies, under the immediate command of their own officers, does not in any wise affect their legal character. The are still the posse comitatus (XXI Parl. Hist., pages 672, 688, per Lord Mansfield.)—Opinions of Attorney-General, volume 6, page 473.

And then he proceeds to say what I beg to quote in this same connection as having some application to the exertion of the powers the President and the marshals now have in the execution of the laws of the United States, not to send fugitives from service back—

Like the quarry-slave at night, scourged to his dungeon, but to protect their liberty under the law:

This statute of 1850 is enacted to execute a provision of the Constitution, the due and complete execution of which intimately concerns the fate of the Government of the United States and the integrity of the Union. Such a statute deserves, and will receive a beneficial construction, so that the mischiefs intended to be guarded against may be suppressed by the full use of all the remedies provided by Congress.—Ibid, p. 474.

No abolitionist belonging to the legal profession, no abolitionist belonging to the judiciary, no statesman, with hardly an exception, in the whig or abolition party, with the feelings and the sentiments they had in respect to the institution of slavery, ever denied or doubted the lawful existence of that power. They saw it exercised with grief. They wished for that better condition of things which, through slow processes and great convulsions, has come at last, with all its imperfections, all its present drawbacks; but they acknowledged fidelity to the existence of the law which, for such purposes even, under the laws of the United States, just as they stand now in respect to the powers of the President and the marshals, authorized them to exert the military power of this Union to execute every one of its laws; and if the statute upon which the security and the integrity of the Union was supposed to depend then, deserved "a beneficial construction" and called for the exertion of all the remedies that the Constitution and the acts of Congress had provided for its execution, do not the provisions of the Constitution of the United States as they now exist for the abolition of that system which that provision was intended to support, for the universal equality of the manhood of citizenship in the fourteenth amendment, and for the impartial suffrage of the fifteenth and the laws that I have had read to you made to support them, demand also a beneficial construction? Do they not also demand by a far more noble sign the execution and exertion of all the remedies that the Constitution and the acts of Congress have authorized to be employed to carry them into full, free, and orderly execution? On that one day of days in the year, when these people emerged from slavery into liberty and citizenship and those who stood by the flag of the Union in its darkest days in States where still it is not very popular, I fear, to have stood by it, are by the laws entitled to protection and the freedom of the ballot—on that one day of all days in the year that was made for them to participate freely and honestly under the law in the duties of citizenship and in the organization of the Government, is it not due that the military power of the United States, if the extremity comes that makes it necessary, shall not be taken away? Those who favor this bill say it shall.

Let us go a little further and see in particular what this bill provides. Its title untruthfully declares that it is "to prohibit military interference at elections;" and its preamble declares with equal—I have no right to say and I do not wish to say and I cannot allow myself to believe—studious untruth that "the presence of troops at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and the traditions of our people," because the traditions of our people and the spirit of our institutions from the very birthday of the Republic as declared by the solemn statutes of the people's representatives and those of the States and the people's Presidents are, that at all times, and in all places and on all occasions and on all days when the execution of the laws of the United States is forcibly obstructed, or when domestic tumult under the marshal sections of the statutes interferes with the exertion of any power or duty existing under the Constitution or laws of the United States, he has power expressly conferred, measured by that of the sheriffs of the States, to be exerted as well on days of elections as on any others; and you have never taken it away.

Why, sir, the marshal of the State of Vermont, not by any statute of the State but by this supreme act of Congress is authorized to call for the militia of that State by name and as an organized body to suppress any riot which interferes with the execution of the laws of the United States. He is not limited to the bystanders, the posse comitatus, the power of the county alone in that sense of it; and he gets that authority because the statutes of the State of Vermont from the days of the fathers have provided, loving peace and order and liberty combined, knowing that they cannot exist separately, that when a riot breaks out on any day and the due and peaceful execution of the laws giving equal rights to anybody is forcibly obstructed, the sheriff shall call for the militia of the State and puts it down.

But the false statement—no I will not say "false" and I did not intend to use the word "false" in any sense that implied a reproach to any member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives—the untrue statement of its title and of its preamble is rendered the more apparent when you come to read the act itself which, notwithstanding its title declares that military interference at elections is to be prohibited, and notwithstanding its preamble declares that the presence of troops at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, proceeds in the body of the act to say that both may occur. Troops shall not interfere with elections; their presence at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions; and yet on two occasions they shall be there and they shall exert this military power; they shall repel the armed enemies of the United States even on election day, and they shall suppress domestic violence in the State even on election day, in the manner and under the circumstances that the Constitution of the United States provides.

Thus you will perceive, Mr. President, that either the preamble of this bill and its title are untrue,—not so much its title because the word "interference" is capable of another and a much better construction than the one I have just put upon it—or the body of the bill is untrue and violates every principle that the preamble lays down. The preamble is without exception, it is universal and comprehensive; it is equivalent to saying that at no time and under no circumstances can the power of the law in the form of military organization be present at the polls, while its body says that there are occasions when the security of the Republic and the peace of the neighborhood, the smallest town in Vermont or in South Carolina, may require that the military forces of the United States shall be gathered at the place of carrying on an election.

But this bill is not confined to marshals or inferior officers; it does not say that it shall not be lawful for the marshal of the United States to call to his aid any part of the military power of the Government; but it says it shall not be lawful for anybody, be he President or marshal or whatever, be he the Army officer who in the city of New York is now bound by his oath and the statute to assist the State authorities in their quarantine and health regulations, be he the marshal of the United States or the person appointed by the President, who is bound in the city of New York to prevent the fitting out of armed expeditions against nations with whom we are at peace, be he the magistrate, the Indian agent, or whatever he may be, that on the borders of Kansas is bound to exclude from a defenseless remnant of a former race the swarming armed bands of greedy land-stealers, be he what he may, on that occasion, that day if it be a day, or that week if it be a week, or that year if it be a year, to do anything but fold up his arms in silence and see ruin spread in every direction. The command, as I say, is not limited to the marshals under election laws; it would be just as bad if it were, I admit; but with an exuberance of courage gained from one defeat, the men who framed this bill went upon the principle that they might as well be hung for a whole sheep as a lamb and therefore made their provision absolutely sweeping and exhaustive.

Mr. President, it is not confined, either, to interference with elections, if the exertion of the power to protect elections be "interference," which I earnestly deny and shall speak about presently if I do not forget it; but it extends, as I have said, to the exertion of any part of the power of the United States to execute any portion of its laws about anything else. Take the city of New York for illustration, where I believe by the laws of the State the voting precincts are so subdivided, or ought to be, as only to include two hundred voters or thereabouts,—a very small number whatever it may be; and therefore they are very small subdivisions of territory. Suppose that there be a polling place within ten rods of the sub-treasury of the United States, where the millions of revenue gained from the toil of the people are deposited, and where according to the previous declarations of members of this body and others and their present acts, they are to remain deposited until the Government goes to pieces unless we consent to the passage of this bill and give it our votes if our votes are needed to carry it. The thugs and mobs that exist in certain quarters of that city, and who in times gone by, as reports of democratic committees in the other House have shown, have run riot and ruin over the rights of their fellow-citizens in respect of elections, may take the frequent occasions of municipal elections—because the bill takes in "special" as well as "general elections"—that happen so often in that city, to take possession of the sub-treasury of the United States, because on that day and in that place the Army of the United States is powerless. You say that no part of the Army shall be used to prevent it.

It is not confined to a single day. It says "at any place where a general or special election is being held in a State." It is competent for any State to have its elections run over a week or two, and it is not long since that in some of the States the elections did run over two, three, or four days, and I notice in the constitution of one of the most conspicuous, and I hope one of the most prosperous and orderly of the States, that of Georgia, it is provided that the State elections shall begin on a certain named day, leaving it to the legislative authority to extend the number of days to any length they see fit.

You may say that we are looking to an impossible emergency in making this criticism upon this bill, that it is not at all likely that there will be a period of a week or two of time of a recurring election in any State or county or parish or town, or whatever it may be, day after day and week after week, when all the laws of the United States depend upon the mercy of the people who happen to be there, and upon nothing else. When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, that argument was used by its enemies, that there never could be any occasion when the exertion of the military power of the Republic was to be thought of, that it would not happen, and therefore to insert a power upon the part of the Congress of the United States and its Chief Magistrate to execute its laws and to raise a standing army and support it, of which he by the Constitution is the Commander-in-Chief, was exposing the liberties of the people to unnecessary peril. And yet the Constitution had not been in force six years before the very event occurred in the western counties of the State of Pennsylvania; and it had only been in force about forty years when in the State of South Carolina the events occurred so familiar to you all, supported by the same arguments for liberty and State rights, as they are erroneously called, that are urged now, when it was a serious question with the Congress of the United States how the means and the force were to be provided to sustain that great and brave President Andrew Jackson in exerting the military power to put down the obstructions to the execution of the laws.

So then, it is not fanciful to suppose that when you are untying the liberty of the mob and the organized opposition, treason, or whatever it may be, on one occasion which may be indefinitely prolonged by that portion of the people of a State who happen to exercise its authority (to borrow again the language of Andrew Jackson as to that portion of the people of the State of South Carolina who undertook to resist the execution of the laws of the United States) in order that they may perfect their schemes for again exposing to infinite peril and overturning the peace and harmony and existence of the United States. It is within the range of possibility, for it has happened.

It is not confined to cases of constitutional elections under a republican form of government. It embraces the case of rebellious elections held again to vote a State out of the Union; and on that day if the State of Virginia—no I will not say that—on that day if the State of Vermont, being dissatisfied with the way the Union goes on, should have arranged by that portion of her people who happened to be in power, the governor and his confederates, to culminate the potency of their resistance to law by holding and submitting to the people a special election to say whether they could agree to this law of the United States or stay in any longer or not, and when the honest people of that State, although they would deny the constitutionality of the law, would go to vote against it nevertheless, and put it down by a majority of ten to one, the armed power of the governor and his confederates would stand by the polls and say to the honest people, the patriotic, Union-loving citizens, "go away." They call upon the President of the United States, they implore the exertion of the military power under the civil law to arrest these people in this mad project to break down the Constitution and laws of the United States. The President turns to this statute and says, "No, no, I cannot do it; this is the very day and occasion of all others when the laws of my country have expressly forbidden that I or any officer of the United States shall interfere at all." That is the kind of an act of Congress that our learned friends would supply us with.

It is not confined to the polling-boxes or their immediate vicinity. The "place" is broad enough to include voting precincts, towns, boroughs, parishes, counties. In the State of Vermont, the place for holding elections by her constitution is one town in each county. The town is "the place" of election for State purposes; for city purposes the wards of the city. So it is in every other State, I presume. Suppose you have a universal election in all the States on the same day, as you do for members of Congress, and your towns and your counties are divided up into precincts and places, where is your Army going to stay? What are you going to do with it on that day? The honorable gentlemen who do not seem to have a strong affection for the Army of the United States, and naturally enough, will be able to answer, perhaps

That is not all. If you have a criminal who wishes an asylum, if you have a body of moonshiners who in Kentucky or Tennessee have slain the officers of the revenue and are pursued by the marshal and his posse or by a detachment of the Army under the express authority of the laws of the United States, all they have got to do to get an asylum for one day is to rush to the place where a general or special election is being held; and that place of asylum for that day, for every criminal who cannot be taken by the power of a single marshal himself or by the association of fellow-citizens of the criminal, (who in the case I have supposed would respond handsomely no doubt to help him to take him out,) is to take the place of the churches of the olden time where there were to be gathered for asylum and safety all those who could read and write—nobody else; so that would exclude the colored man generally, as it is said, in the South. He would not get the benefit of it, but all the white men would have free run for that day if they only stood about the polling places. That is one of the possibilities of this act!

As I have said, it forbids the use of military power for any purpose. It does this, also, which is more than all because it is fundamental, and no amendment can cure it unless it be an amendment which makes the act a mere repetition of what the present statutes are: it affirms the propriety and need rightly of using arms on election days when there is occasion for them, and it affirms the duty of the United States to furnish them at the mere call of the State for mere local elections and at all others; but it denies and denounces the same propriety and need, and forbids the exercise of the duty when national elections are proceeding under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, and when the safety and the very existence of the Union depend on preventing forcible and violent obstruction to the peaceful order and security of those elections. It calls upon the United States to exert that part of its duty which requires it, on the call of a State, to suppress domestic violence in a State on the occasion of an election, but it denies to it and denounces the exercise of the same authority on the same occasion when members of its own national legislature, created by its own Constitution and provided for by its own laws, are to be voted for.

If there be any depth of degradation to which this nation can go below that, I am unable to perceive it; and yet this is the proposition with which the House of Representatives comes to the Senate of the United States, "you shall exert the military power of the United States under the law and by force of the law when that portion of the people of any State who happen to be in power choose to call for it on election occasions; but when the supremacy of your own laws, the liberty of your own citizens, the exercise of your own rights, the existence of your own Government are concerned, the laws of your own Government shall forbid it." I say, sir, if there be any depth of degradation to which a government can go beyond that, I am not able to perceive it.

What, sir, is this Government of ours, what the nature of our republican Government? Has it anywhere, in its Chief Magistrate or any other of its numerous officers, any taint or vestige of the prerogative of kings that makes you afraid of the exercise of military power to overcome resistance to law? It has not. It is the Government of the people; it is a Government by the people; it is a Government for the people. It is not extraneous to the States. It resides in, was created in, and will exist forever on every foot of every State, as much as the government of the State itself. And yet the honorable Senator from Alabama spoke yesterday about "entering a State," the United States by its authority entering a State as the fleets of Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain might be supposed to enter the port of New York, either by leave or by force!

I repeat, sir, that the Government of the United States is at home on every foot of the territory of this nation. It does not enter States; it was there from the beginning of the formation of the Constitution. It is in every fiber of the muscles of every man. I wish it were in the hearts of all the men of this Republic.

I cannot with patience reflect on the doctrine advanced in support of this bill and that is embodied in it, whatever men may say, that this Government of ours, almost a century old, hoary with honor and with renown, should be, at last, after it has so often vindicated its right to exist, on great and small occasions, treated as an extraneous neighbor, sometimes a friend, sometimes an enemy of a State, and that it is to enter or depart from a State!

I denounce such a doctrine, and I repeat that the life of this nation under the Constitution circulates among all its inhabitants and in all its territories in the same way and by the same potency in respect of the objects for which it was formed as does the life of the government of each one of the States; and if there be any potency in the notion that a State for its self-existence must on occasion exert its powers to protect itself and the due execution of its laws, is it not equally true that the nation, so existing and so being in every State and among the people of every State, may exert for the same purposes of its own existence and the execution of its own laws the same powers? I take it it cannot be doubted.

Mr. President, the agency by which the Government of the United States operates upon the people is the same agency as that by which the governments of the States operate upon the people, in kind, in character, and in a large sense in degree. It is the agency of law. It is enforced by the methods and processes provided by law. It establishes courts of justice in and of and by the people who reside in the State. The judge and the jury, the parties, the witnesses, the marshal, all are there. Why do we say then that there is danger of Federal interference and entrance into States if it exerts its authority in any other respect, whether in the power of coercion, or in the beneficence of providing means for suppressing the spread of disease or improving rivers or harbors or building public buildings, when every one of the agencies and processes by which it does it is at home among the people. They are not foreign, they are not alien, they are identical and they are homogeneous, each acting directly with and by the consent of the people and through their own authority.

Mr. President, if you have laws, does it not naturally and necessarily follow that you are to provide, as the States do, for the exertion of and obedience to them? And what is the power of the law when you follow it to its ultimate consequence? It is nothing less than coercion. There is no law which regulates the administration of a government that does not speak coercively. You may give money, you may grant benefits; but when you enjoin the performance of duties and protect the exercise of rights, there you are exerting the power of coercion; and when the magistrate, be he President or marshal, or tax-collector, or judge, takes one step in the administration of the respective departments of this Government, that step is either absolutely absurd, vox et præterea nihil, or it carries with it the essential and inseparable idea of coercion; that is to say, compulsory obedience, if willing obedience be not accorded. What, then, is the reason why it should not be provided, if it were not so amply provided as it is, that on days of elections for national officers, as on all other days, every law of the United States that bears on the question should have peaceful sway against all opposers, and that if it be necessary to maintain that peaceful sway, that the force of the law by arms, should be opposed to the illegal force of armed and violent opposition?

Mr. President, what is this Army that we have, which in the end is the power of the law and nothing else? It is composed generally of citizens of the United States, certainly of those who are bound to pay allegiance and obedience to its laws. It exists because the Constitution of your country has said that it might exist. The President of the United States by the Constitution commands it, not because he is a military tyrant or has any military or divine right to command it, but because he, the chief civil magistrate of the Union and not the military magistrate of the Union, is selected by the Constitution to command it. The Army is not intrusted to the command of a military officer. It is intrusted to him by your Constitution, and beyond your rightful power to take away. I say "rightful power;" I do not know what will happen. It is intrusted, beyond your rightful power to take away, to him as a civil officer to command it. It is not, therefore, when it is exerted under his authority, the power of the sword per se, but it is the power of the civil law. All of its officers are sworn to support the Constitution of the United States. Their title to their office, the tenure of it, and their pay, are fixed by constitutional laws; and their disobedience to any statute of the United States is to be punished by methods and in ways that the constitutional laws of Congress provide.

Are you fearful of the liberties of your country from such an army as that? Are you fearful of the liberties of your country and the freedom of your elections from a body of men who are your fellow-citizens, who hold their right to be in the Army by the same title that you hold a seat in this body, the Constitution and the laws, whose duties are fixed by law, the punishment of whose misconduct, especially on election days, or of any abuse whatever, is most carefully provided for? Do you think that everything on this continent should stop, that you should dissolve sessions of Congress by their own limitation, without making appropriations, that appropriation bills should be suspended in these two Houses at a special session called to provide the money to pay the expenses of the Government, until you can muster strength enough here and elsewhere to overset the laws, and the experience, and the necessities of a hundred years in relation to the exertion of military power? Do you expect to have large success in convincing that portion of the people of the United States who read and think, that great body of men of whom an eminent statesman spoke as possessing the property and intelligence of this country being the governors of it, that everything is to be wound up until you can overset the right of the chief civil magistrate of the United States and the other civil magistrates of the United States to exert the power of its sword in support of the civil law against violent disturbance? If you do, sir, then I will say that your faith in the delusions of mankind is much greater than mine.

It looks to me—perhaps I am mistaken—as if this were one of the first parallels, to borrow a military phrase, inasmuch as we are speaking about the Army, run by a combination of men who, I suppose, think themselves patriotic, and I must not doubt they do, to besiege again the Government of the United States by the monster of so-called State rights, and that this is only the first step, a most important one, the first trench, toward the accomplishment of a series of objects, which naturally enough from that point of view should be accomplished, and the overthrow of every step, of every process, of every result both in law and practice, that has been supposed by some to have come from what was thought to be the final and triumphant assertion of the supremacy of the United States within the scope of the objects mentioned in the Constitution, and the universal liberty and equal rights of its people as members of this nation. That is not strange, sir; I should think it strange if it were otherwise, from a certain point of view; for every step that has been taken by friends of Union and liberty has been opposed by the same body of men or their predecessors who now wish to retrace and overthrow the steps by which the laws of the United States have reached the point that I have described them to have reached, and to overthrow them now and for this instance, upon the bare and bold declaration that for the enforcement of its own laws and the protection of the liberties of its own people the Constitution of the United States and the Government under it shall not, on one occasion, have any authority to exert itself in any State of this Union. And, if you succeed in establishing that doctrine for one occasion, you will be able to demonstrate that it must be conceded for every other occasion; and we shall go back, and the men who lived in 1833, if they could return to the world again, would have to regret that they did not live in 1879, when, by the same arguments and for the same purposes that they resorted to and desired, you have achieved the victory that Andrew Jackson and the patriotic people of both parties in the United States then prevented them from achieving. But, as I say, sir, it is not strange. Is there any one of the three amendments of the Constitution that a certain body of men in Congress and out of Congress did not oppose, not only as unsound in principle respecting the objects to which they were devoted, but also as being contrary to the structure of the Government itself? Has there been any one of the acts of Congress, passed to support those amendments that the same body of men has not denounced, not only as in violation of the very Constitution which said they could be passed, but as false in principle and as invasive of the supreme right of the State, so called, over everything within its own borders? There can be no denial of that. Has not the same body of men, in Congress and out of Congress, in season and out of season, denounced the assertion of any power in Congress to enforce by any affirmative law any one of these amendments? No man can deny that. And now, within a year or two, for the first time I believe in the whole history of this country, the next step is taken, and you deny and denounce the authority of the Congress of the United States to regulate the election of the members of its own national House of Representatives, and by refinements and sophistries you try to fritter away the plain and express words of the Constitution! You deny the traditions of the fathers that you flaunt at the head of your bill, and in the name of the liberties of the people you say they shall have no liberty at all unless they get it by the supreme and exclusive will of what you call the State. And have you not, sir—although that is not quite so new in one respect, for it was tried years ago and abandoned with the scorn and contempt of all patriotic men in the country—have you not now on foot a scheme, appearing in bills before one or both Houses of this Congress, and I believe a former one, to take away the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in respect of appeals from State courts in a broad and important class of cases that has existed from 1789 to this day, and again in the name of what you call the sovereignty of the State? Are there not also on foot in this House or in the other, similar bills in character, taking away every right of removal of causes wherein depend the rights of citizens of the United States under the recent amendments, from the State courts to the Federal courts for trial, and again in the name of the sovereign authority of the State?

Where are you going to stop, Mr. President? I had hoped that you were going to stop there; but I have seen within two or three days in this Chamber another step. I have seen that portion of the people of the United States, to borrow the language of President Jackson once more, who now compose a majority of this body, enter upon the consideration, at least, of the propriety of reversing the traditions of the Senate, the spirit of the Constitution, and the safety of this Republic, with the object, with the best intentions, I must presume, of overturning a decision of this body in respect of the right of a member to his seat, in order that a Senator of different politics may come in. When I say "in order," I hope gentlemen will not understand me as alluding to their personal impressions, but I speak of "order" as a consequence of what they would do. Where are you going to stop? Have you as the Trojans did, obtained by prayers the promise of unfriendly gods that

> When the crested Greeks departing in their ships shall take
> Their homeward voyage to their native land,
> We will, this wall o'erthrowing by our waves,
> Sink it a shapeless ruin in the sea:
> And spread again the sands o'er all the shore,
> That this great work of Greeks be no more seen?

Do you in the brief hour of triumph and temporary power intend to sweep away everything that the fathers of the Republic have established, and that the valor and the statesmanship of their sons have preserved? It looks like it.

But I have faith, Mr. President. I have faith that this scheme of yours will not become a law. I have that faith because I am profoundly impressed with the conviction that it ought not to be a law. I have faith that the first step in the direction I have indicated, and with its inevitable implications and its consequences, will not be taken; that somewhere in the Constitution and in spite of threats and menaces there will still be found a supreme power that will stand a bulwark against the waves of excitement, of prejudice, of ambition, sweeping in the direction of overthrowing the necessary provisions for the existence of this Union and the supremacy of its laws. And when at last you recover from these emotions, that I hope are temporary, you will then have peace, the peace that the act of 1865 speaks of, that you are so disturbed about,—peace at the polls.

But you will have peace at the polls and elsewhere only when you shall have recognized by deed as well as word the political equality of every one of your fellow-citizens, and I include in that the free right of free speech, the free right of lawful voting and no other, protected under the law and for the law and by the law. It will not be the peace of a reign of terror, of banishment, or the grave, but it will be the peace of justice administered fairly; it will be the peace of liberty exerting itself in lawful forms, and with equal rights, for the expression of the public will and for the promotion of the public weal. That, sir, will be a peace when by-gones will be by-gones, and when universal rights will reign everywhere, and universal harmony will flourish, and will refresh with its sunshine and its shade the equal rights and liberties of all our land.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] laid an amendment on the table, but it has not been offered.

Mr. BLAINE. I will now offer the amendment that I laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to modify the amendment by simply striking out the words "or within a mile of any place." I offer it in that form, and ask that it be read without those words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill, as an additional section, the following:

SEC. 2. Any person who shall carry a concealed deadly weapon at any place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished with a fine not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Is it the intention of the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill to urge it to a vote this evening?

Mr. EATON. It is but four o'clock. I said I would not force a night session; that I would not undertake to force the passage of the bill to-day and thereby incur a night session. If gentlemen desire to argue further, let there be an adjournment till to-morrow and an agreement to take the vote at a certain time; but if there be no one else upon the other side of the Chamber who desires to discuss the bill further, after the very able argument of the Senator from Vermont, we are perfectly ready to take a vote now and go to the people.

Mr. BLAINE. If it is the intention of the Senate generally, the general understanding, that the vote is to be taken now, I do not desire to detain the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. There is no understanding about it.

Mr. BLAINE. But I do not want to submit the few remarks that I may have to submit, and they will be very few, and then yield to an adjournment, for I am not in a condition to speak to-day.

Mr. EATON. If my friend will pardon me, I will state that early in the day, at the commencement of the session, I called upon many of my friends on the other side and said what I have now said, that if gentlemen desired to discuss this measure and made it necessary to either have a night session or a session to-morrow, I would not call for a vote to-day, but that if the bill could be disposed of by six o'clock I should be glad to dispose of it to-day. There was no understanding further than that, so far as I know.

Mr. BLAINE. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no amendment in the Senate the question is, Shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I submit my amendment now to the bill. [A pause.]

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is waiting for the Senator from Maine, who is upon the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. I will withdraw my amendment for the present. I do it at the suggestion of several Senators around me who have some views which I do not wholly concur in; but for the present I yield to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then is, Shall the bill be read the third time? upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I want to make a single remark on the bill itself, if there is to be a vote upon it, although my remarks may be merely a repetition of what has been so admirably said by the honorable Senator from Vermont. I desire simply to put a punctuation point in the progress of things as they are now going on, and that punctuation point is to mark the high-tide which the ancient doctrine of State rights is reaching in this Chamber and in this Congress. That question has engaged the attention of the American people for just about fifty years. It has had its ups and downs, its victories and its defeats. It was strangled for the time by Jackson; it was dallied with by Van Buren; it rose to full strength under Polk and Pierce and Buchanan; it marshaled itself for a deadly struggle under Breckinridge; and if I mistake not a majority of Senators who sit on that side of the Chamber supported Breckinridge when he embodied that deadly heresy.

In whatever there was in the issue between Calhoun and Jackson that side of the Senate Chamber represents Calhoun. Whatever there was in the contest dividing the democratic party between Breckinridge and Douglas that side of the Chamber represents all the evil there was in the politics of Breckinridge. And I desire here to affirm and point out that there never was before the rebellion, there never was at any time in the history of this country, any such assertion of State rights, any such assertion of mastery of the State government over the Federal Government in its own domain, as is here asserted by the heirs lineal of Calhoun and of Breckinridge.

I shall not debate this bill. It were useless. It has been exhaustively debated. The whole measure is a removal of the Federal Government from its proper domain and the installation of the States into degrees of power that were not dreamed of by Calhoun and were not asserted by Breckinridge.

We thought there had been something gained on this question in a costly war and in amendments to the Constitution. But the tide as it now sweeps is on the ebb, and the power of the Union, the power of the Federal Government was never so weak as these laws and these proceedings will make it.

Pass this bill. While warning off all interference or control of the Federal Government you voted down on the other bill a proposition that armed men should not come to the polls. You voted down on the other bill a proposition that armed men should not come to the polls with the express intent of interfering with the rights of voters, and you did it under the paltry quibble that it was not within the constitutional power of the United States Government to warn bloody-handed ruffians from the polls where the Representatives in the Federal Congress were being chosen.

Pass this bill. Pass it as the triumph of the reactionary party against the spirit of the Union. Pass it in defiance of all the lessons and all the teachings that have come from a bloody and abortive rebellion. Pass it, and mark it as the high tide of that reaction which were it to rise higher could lead only to another and more formidable rebellion against the legitimate authority of the Union. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let there be order.

Mr. CHANDLER. History, Mr. President, is repeating itself. It has been said that the old Bourbons learned nothing and forgot nothing. This is more pre-eminently true with the old Bourbons of democracy in America. In 1851 the Bourbons had absolute control of this Government, in both Houses of Congress, the White House, and the Supreme Court. The whole of this Government was under your control. You had a majority in this body, a majority in the other House; and you brought up the repeal of the Missouri compromise. You forced your men then, as you are forcing them now, to vote for that repeal, and you did it by caucus dictation. Then, sir, you crowded your northern allies until you crowded them off the bridge.

In 1857, when I first took my seat in this body with Mr. Jefferson Davis, there were in this body forty-four democrats, twenty republicans, and two independents. Of those democrats, twenty-eight were from the Southern States, sixteen from the Northern States. Then as now, the independents in this body, upon every question connected with slavery, voted with the South.

You in caucus, soon after I entered the Senate, decreed that Stephen A. Douglas, because he asserted that he did not care whether slavery was voted up or voted down, should be degraded from the chairmanship of the Committee on Territories; and there were but three northern democrats out of the sixteen on this floor who dared to resist caucus dictation. You did degrade him and put him off from that committee. Ah, sir, then you crowded your men off the bridge, and they sank into the waters of oblivion to rise no more forever.

Then you had fromthe Northern States on this floor: from California, two members; from Illinois, one; from Indiana, two; from Iowa, one; from Michigan, one. I am giving the democratic Senators from the North who obeyed and those who did not obey caucus dictation. From Minnesota you had two; from New Jersey, two; from Ohio, one; from Oregon, two; from Pennsylvania, one; from Rhode Island, one; which made the sixteen. Of those sixteen members not a solitary man from the North ever came up to the surface of the waters of oblivion. You crowded them off the bridge. You compelled them to vote for measures which the North could not and would not sustain.

To-day you are doing the self-same thing. To-day you have in this body forty-two democrats, thirty-three republicans, and one independent. To-day, as twenty-two years ago, on all questions connected with State rights the independent party as a unit votes with the democratic party. To-day you have, as I said, forty-three democrats in this body, forty-two leaving out the independent party. You have twelve members of this body from the North. There are twelve democratic Senators from the North and they are arranged thus: From California, one; from Indiana, now as then, you have two; from New Jersey you have two, now as then; from Ohio you have two, you had but one then; from Oregon you have two now and you had two then; from Pennsylvania you have one now, you had one then; from Rhode Island you have none now, but you have one from Connecticut; and you have one from New York.

Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, history is to-day repeating itself. You are to-day repeating what you did in 1857 and 1858; you are crowding your men off the bridge, and the men of to-day, as the men of 1857, will sink into the waters of oblivion to rise no more forever.

Look at the elections of this last year. Look at the change that has taken place since the 1st day of March, 1859. Sir, the people are more thoroughly aroused to-day against this heresy of State rights than they were from 1857 to 1861.

You proposed to pension Jefferson Davis, and every single one of your Northern allies voted to pension him. You enlogized him as a patriot to be compared side by side with Washington and all the patriots of the Revolution, and every one of your northern allies voted "ay."

After the close of the rebellion you claimed that you were poor; that you were suffering; and we found you poor and suffering; we found you ragged and we clothed you. We put upon you the robe of American citizenship which you had forfeited, and we killed for you the fatted calf and invited you to the feast, supposing that, after being clothed, you were in your right mind; and when we have invited you to the feast you say, "We always owned the calf and you have no interest in it." [Great laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will order the rule to be enforced and the galleries cleared if the disorder is repeated.

Mr. CHANDLER. And now you inform us that you are going to repeal all the republican party has done. What is the job that you have undertaken? You are going to undo all that the republican party has done. Where do you begin? Do you begin at Appomattox, or before? It is very important to know where you commence, and then to know where you propose to stop. You have undertaken a very large job for a party of your size, and with the people who are to sit as judges upon your case. You have undertaken to unseat a man in this body, but you will deny that you have undertaken the job; you say that you have simply undertaken to investigate the case of the seat of a Senator upon this floor that has been decided by the highest tribunal which could act upon that question. Sir, there are twelve Senators on that side of the Chamber who every man upon this side believes have a poorer title to their seats than the honorable Senator from Louisiana. By fraud and violence you occupy your seats. Show us the road how to vacate seats in this body by a majority vote, if you dare——

Mr. EATON. I call the Senator from Michigan to order.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well, sir; state your point of order.

Mr. EATON. My point of order is that the Senator from Michigan is entirely out of order when he says that twelve Senators on this floor hold their seats by fraud and violence.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not say that. I said that they held their seats by a poorer title than the Senator from Louisiana holds his.

Mr. EATON. No, sir, "fraud and violence" were the words the Senator used.

Mr. CHANDLER. I said we believe they do; and so I have a right to say.

Mr. EATON. Let the record be read.

Mr. CHANDLER. So I say we believe——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of order is not debatable.

Mr. GARLAND. I call for the words to be taken down by the Secretary.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, and others. I hope not.

Mr. BECK. Let the words be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the words as spoken by the Senator from Michigan to be that there were twelve Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber who were present now who held their seats by fraud and violence. Those were the words as the Chair understood——

Several SENATORS. Let the words be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Reporter will read the words.

The Reporter read as follows from his shorthand notes of Mr. CHANDLER'S remarks:

> Sir, there are twelve Senators on that side of the Chamber who every man upon this side believes have a poorer title to their seats than the honorable Senator from Louisiana. By fraud and violence you occupy your seats.

Mr. BECK. It was a distinct charge. Let him name the men.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the Senator from Michigan in order?

Mr. EATON. I call for the ruling of the Chair. The Senator is out of order—insultingly out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not for the Chair to say whether the remark is warranted or unwarranted; but the Chair does not see that necessarily fraud and violence are imputed to Senators who hold seats on this floor; and therefore he rules that the Senator from Michigan is not out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am appealing to the Senator from Connecticut to withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been decided. The Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Before the Senator proceeds I ask for order in the Senate and the galleries. I hope the Chair will let it be known that there is a rule here which requires order and that it ought to be obeyed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will enforce that rule even if it be necessary to clear the galleries. The Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I intended to state and did state that it is the belief of, I think, every member upon this side of the Chamber that there are twelve Senators upon that side who hold their title to their seats on a slimmer, poorer basis than my honorable friend from Louisiana. I intended to state that it is our belief, and it is my belief, that those seats were obtained and are held by fraud and violence. That is what I intended to say and that is what I now say.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss this question. I rose simply to say to gentlemen upon the other side you have your day in court; make the most of it; your time is short. The people of the North have taken this question in hand, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from one end of this land to the other, the people are aroused and alarmed at the statements that have been made and the action that has been taken in this Senate Chamber and in the other House within the last sixty days. And let me say to you, gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber, that mene, mene, tekel, upharsin is written all over your brows.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be read the third time? upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARPENTER, (when his name was called.) On this bill I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] who is confined to his room by illness. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HOAR, (when Mr. DAWES's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] If he were present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] Were he here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GORDON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.] Were he here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] If he were here, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BELL.] If he were here, I should vote "yea," and I presume he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] is detained from the Senate to-day by sickness. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] as has been stated. He would vote "nay," if present.

Mr. BLAINE, (who had voted in the negative.) I am informed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that it is the impression of Mr. WALLACE, of Pennsylvania, that he is paired with me on this question. I did not so understand it myself, but to obviate all possibility of a mistake I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Maine that I was informed that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] was paired with his colleague, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

Mr. BLAINE. My understanding was that my colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] was paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON;] but my withdrawal of my vote leaves it all right.

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 23; as follows:

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to repeat for the sake of the record that my colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and that I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.] My colleague, if he were present, and myself, if I were at liberty to vote, would vote "nay."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 9, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at eight minutes past twelve, and this being Friday the first business in order is the call of committees for bills of a private nature. The call rests with the Committee of Elections.

JOHN R. WADDY.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1840) to remove the political disabilities of John R. Waddy, of Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KNOTT. I would state that in the reports I am about to make, in this case and other cases that I am about to report for the removal of political disabilities, each one of the bills is accompanied by the petition required under the rule.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the petition be read.

The Clerk read the petition, as follows:

To the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States:

Your petitioner respectfully asks Congress for the removal of his political disabilities. The facts of his case are as follows: at the breaking out of the war between the States he was a first lieutenant in the Fourth Regiment United States Artillery and resigned his commission in said regiment and joined the confederate service, where he remained during the entire war. He is a native of Northampton County, State of Virginia, and is at present residing in said county and State in the capacity of a farmer.

JOHN R. WADDY.

EASTVILLE, VIRGINIA, April 3, 1879.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) passed.

JAMES H. NORTH.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1841) to remove the political disabilities of James H. North, of Culpeper County, Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CONGER. Let the petition be read.

The Clerk read the petition, as follows:

WARRENTON, March 20, 1879.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I respectfully request that my disabilities be removed, having once held a commission in the Navy.

Very respectfully, &c.,

JAMES H. NORTH.

Mr. DUNNELL. I call attention to the fact that the petition is very defective and very unusual. The petitioner does not ask that his political disabilities be removed, nor does he say that he once served in the Navy of the United States. I make no objection to the passage of the bill, but it is a very crude petition.

Mr. CONGER. In the first case the petitioner did not refer to any particular war.

The SPEAKER. It was a matter of notoriety.

Mr. CONGER. These petitions are worded so that they convey secret but indirect insult to the people of the United States; but I am willing that the political disabilities of this man shall be removed.

The SPEAKER. The petitioner in the first case was explicit.

Mr. CONGER. He speaks about a war between the States, and did not speak of any war of the rebellion to which the law refers. If these petitions were drawn with the design of putting a continual reproach upon those of us who think the war was a rebellion, why they accomplish the purpose. If they were drawn expressly, when asking a favor of the Congress of the United States, to intimate that they were in the right and that everybody that opposed them was in the wrong, they accomplish that purpose. There is a sort of humility about it which is very graceful.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say that this petition for the removal of political disabilities was drawn with no such purpose as the gentleman intimates, but was drawn in order to comply with the rule of the House.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) passed.

J. C. PEMBERTON.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1842) to remove the political disabilities of J. C. Pemberton, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like to hear the petition read.

The Clerk read the petition, as follows:

344 SOUTH FIFTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
May 1, 1879.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned having formerly held the rank of captain and brevet major in the United States Army, and having incurred the political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, respectfully petitions your honorable bodies that the same be removed, and that he be reinvested with all the political rights of a citizen of the United States.

J. C. PEMBERTON.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to inquire of somebody who knows whether Mr. Pemberton was a citizen of Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes great pleasure in answering the question, having himself presented the petition. He was a resident of the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. CONGER. At the time he withdrew from the service?

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to ask whether Mr. Pemberton left Philadelphia, that loyal city, and went South and joined the rebel army?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to answer that question, as he has no knowledge on the subject.

Mr. HUNTON. General Pemberton was a native of the State of Pennsylvania. He married a Virginia lady and became a resident of the State of Virginia. He was an officer of the United States Army when the war began, and resigned and took a position in the confederate army.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am aware that Pemberton is a family name in Philadelphia, but it is stated in the record that General Pemberton, having been a citizen of Philadelphia, left and joined the rebel army.

Mr. CLYMER. I think it is hardly fair in my colleague to say that General Pemberton left Philadelphia and joined the rebel army.

Mr. O'NEILL. He went South and there joined the rebel army.

Mr. CLYMER. His fortunes and his relations in life led him years before to make his home in the South, and he did not leave Philadelphia for the purpose of joining the rebel army. That is a harsh statement of the case. He happened to be stationed in Philadelphia but his alliances by marriage and family were such that when the war broke out his residence was in the South, and when he comes here to-day and asks pardon it would be unkind and ungracious to refuse it merely because he came from a State which my colleague and I have the honor to represent on this floor.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not wish to prevent a pardon being granted to Mr. Pemberton, because he has filed a petition here that is respectful to the House.

But the name of Philadelphia having been mentioned in this connection [laughter] for the first time in my experience in Congress, a Pennsylvanian asking to have his political disabilities removed from him, the first and only instance in the State of Pennsylvania, I believe, where a citizen of that State left the State and afterward joined the rebel army, I wish to have it so appear upon the record, because we live in a loyal city, and I do not know that the people of that city are aware that one of their number ever went south and joined the rebellion.

Mr. CLYMER. The exception proves the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, having presented this petition in his right as a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, desires to say that it does not matter what was the intention of this individual in the past. His intention now is plain, and, complying with the requirements of the law and of the Constitution, he desires to be reclothed with all the rights of citizenship.

Mr. O'NEILL. I have said that this individual asks in a respectful way of this Congress for the removal of his disabilities. Whenever that has been asked in that way pardon has always been granted. I desire, however, to have it known that this is the only instance within my knowledge where a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania has asked to have his disabilities removed on account of engaging in the rebellion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does not the gentleman recollect a rebellion which occurred in Pennsylvania during the administration of General Washington?

Mr. O'NEILL. I have lived through this late rebellion, and I want the people in the North to know who took part in it.

Mr. COX. I wish I could impress upon the Committee on the Judiciary the necessity of reporting something besides individual bills. We are discussing private amnesty still, fourteen or fifteen years after the war is over. Why do we not at once pass a general amnesty bill, even though it should include every man who engaged in the rebellion, from the highest to the lowest? Why do we not wipe out all these test oaths which we who were loyal have to take, and those who were disloyal cannot take? What a farce is all this amnesty business after so many years have elapsed since the so-called rebellion.

Several MEMBERS on the republican side. "So called."

Mr. COX. Yes, "so called;" so called by you and so called by me. There is no nation on the face of the earth which after so many years would not have given grace and amnesty. Even the communists of France have been amnestied by that government after the lapse of a very few years.

If gentlemen really desire peace, if they have any grace in their hearts to bestow upon others, they should endeavor to impress upon themselves and upon this side of the House the necessity for a general amnesty bill. Even though individual bills should be passed sufficient in number to reach every individual case in the South, I would still, as a grand monument of gracious mercy and justice and of the good sense of this country, favor a system of general amnesty. I would wipe out every vestige of the rebellion, to the end that we might be one people in all regards—idem sentire de republica; with one idea concerning our Republic.

To hear gentlemen on the other side laugh—I know they often laugh as men whistle, for want of thought—to hear them laugh one would suppose that they were sorry that their arms conquered the rebellion; that they would now seek to drive out the men who should be properly a part of this great Republic, men who are their equals in every respect under the Constitution, and who under our present law take an oath to support the Constitution which we ourselves cannot take.

One would think that gentlemen on the other side, who were so anxious to restore the Union by force, would at least seek to cement it by grace and mercy. I hope the Committee on the Judiciary, the next time they report, will go farther and give every one of us a chance to vote for general amnesty.

Mr. CONGER. This is not the first time that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has seemed to indicate his sincere regret that he is able to take the test oath when others of his own party cannot do so. Now, there is no compulsion about taking the test oath; the gentleman might possibly take the other.

Mr. COX. I do not exactly understand what my sweet friend from Michigan is after.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman regrets——

Mr. COX. I would say——

Mr. CONGER. Just wait a moment. Do not cover me with sweetness and then take up my time.

Mr. COX. Please address the Chair, and not me.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman says that to-day there is imposed upon him the necessity of taking an oath that he has been true and loyal to his country. He has expressed a sort of regret that it should be so, not only to-day, but on former occasions.

Now, there is no compulsion upon him. When he uplifts his hand to swear that he was a true and loyal citizen of his country he may take the other oath if this offends him so much. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. "The sweet singer of Michigan" is through. [Laughter.] Of all the persons in this House the most badly judged, perhaps, is my friend from Michigan. It is the general supposition that when he takes his breakfast he drinks about a quart of lemon juice; but I know there is sugar in his nature; and if we had in this country more of that sugar manufactured in Michigan we would not want a protective tariff in that regard. The gentleman from Michigan is not as he generally appears in this House. I know him better. He is not a political Zulu, dipping his spear in poison. [Laughter.] He always dips his spear in molasses. He is kind and gentle. He illustrates it to-day by making this point on me because I show the absurdity of a test oath—the odium of history. Men who stood by the Government in its peril are required to take the iron-clad oath, while men who did not may take the ordinary oath to support the Constitution. There is no such absurdity in legislative history. While the gentleman chooses to make the ad hominem plea, it is simply because he is ignorant of my relations to the Government during the war.

Mr. KNOTT rose.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say just this, if the gentleman from New York is done——

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. No, I will wait till the gentleman from New York finishes.

Mr. KNOTT. I move the previous question. I think we have had about enough talk on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky to call the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair recognize the gentleman from Kentucky when I am on the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has twice spoken. But if he desires to speak further, the Chair has no objection.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair is at all concerned about what I might say, I will not insist.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not concerned, surely.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair having introduced this proposition has, of course, the right to direct the debate upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed when he did introduce the proposition that it would give rise to no debate.

Mr. CONGER. I believe the Chair has twice spoken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes all responsibility in connection with the introduction of the petition. If the gentleman from Michigan is now through, the Chair will submit the question.

Mr. CONGER. I only wanted to say to my friend from New York that I had said all he might think was cruel, and he need not have soothed my feelings so much with pleasantries—with sugar and molasses—[laughter]—and with lemon-juice. He seems to be familiar with the kind of juice I take at my meals. I do not know the particular kind of juice he takes. [Laughter.] It may be a product of the broad fields of the West.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

E. E. RICE.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation a bill (H. R. No. 1363) providing compensation to E. E. Rice for property transferred by him to the Government of the United States for the use of the diplomatic and consular representatives at Hakodadi, in Japan.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Elisha E. Rice, late United States consul at Hakodadi, Japan, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,250, gold; the same being in full payment for certain lots and improvements thereon in Hakodadi, Japan, conveyed by said Rice to the United States, and used for consular purposes.

Mr. COX. If there be no objection I will ask that this bill be put upon its passage. I have a report here if any gentleman desires to have it read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve a point of order on the bill. I believe it involves an appropriation.

Mr. COX. I hope my friend will hear the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Elisha E. Rice, late consul of the United States at Hakodadi, Japan, beg leave to make the following report:

The said memorialist, Elisha E. Rice, was consul of the United States at Hakodadi, Japan, during the period between the years 1856 and 1871. While occupying this position he became the owner of certain lots of land in Hakodadi, upon which the memorialist made valuable improvements in building, fencing, filling, and otherwise, which buildings and grounds were occupied for several years by the United States for the use of the consular and vice-consular offices. Upon the termination of his official functions as consul, the memorialist, at the instigation and demand of Hon. Charles E. De Long, then United States minister to Japan, conveyed all his interest in the said lots and improvements to the United States, for which he has never received any compensation. At the time of said conveyance Mr. De Long caused an appraisement to be made of the value of said lots and improvements by the personal inspection of the minister and the sworn opinions of disinterested persons, who placed the following valuation upon the property:

Consular lot at Hakodadi	$600
Vice-consular lot at Hakodadi	50
Improvements on consular lot	1,600
Making a total of	2,250

which sum in gold is now due the memorialist.

In 1873 Congress intended to provide for the payment of this claim by the passage of an act entitled "An act providing for the payment to the government of Japan the sum due on account of rents for lands and buildings occupied by the diplomatic and consular representatives of the United States to Japan, and for other purposes," the first section of which appropriated $6,000 for these purposes, and the estimates for which included the several items and sums given above. (See page 5, Miscellaneous Document No. 151, Forty-second Congress, second session. Letter from the Secretary of State, March 21, 1872.)

The money, however, was never paid to the memorialist, for the reason that the Secretary of State determined that by the language of the said law he was required to pay the same to the Japanese government, through the minister of that government residing in Washington, and the money was so paid over. The money thus paid to the Japanese government is not lost to the United States, as it has been applied to the liquidation of accruing rents payable by the United States to that government.

Your committee, therefore, are of the opinion that the United States are justly indebted to the said memorialist, Elisha E. Rice, in the said sum of $2,250 in gold, and accompany this report with a bill for his relief.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has reserved a point of order on the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the gentleman whether a bill identical in form with this has passed the House heretofore. I understood the gentleman to say so.

Mr. COX. I am not certain on that point without looking at the record. I know that it was reported unanimously from the committee, and I think it passed the House. I can at any rate assure my friend that this matter has been thoroughly examined in the Department of State as well as by committees of Congress during three or four Congresses. It is proper and just that this man should no longer be deprived of this money. There will be nothing lost to the Government. I looked over the former debate when the $6,000 was appropriated, and that was supposed to cover the amount provided for in this bill. But that sum was paid over to the Japanese government on another account for rent, so that this citizen of ours has not obtained his money. The bill simply proposes to pay this man what we owe him.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think that the bill had better go on the Private Calendar.

Mr. COX. I hope my friend will not insist on his point of order.

The SPEAKER. He does insist.

Mr. COX. I ask my friend to withdraw the point because there is now before the House all the information it can have. The case has been well considered, and is supported by a unanimous recommendation of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia insist on the point of order upon the bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. Let it go to the Private Calendar where it belongs.

Mr. COX. Then there is no case coming from a committee which should not go there.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN JOSEPH IRISH.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1403) authorizing Captain Joseph Irish, of the United States marine service, to accept a grand cross of naval merit of the second class from the Spanish government, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, authorizes Captain Joseph Irish, of the United States marine service, to accept from the Spanish government a grand cross of naval merit of the second class for service rendered the officers and crew of the Spanish war vessel Pizarro.

A MEMBER. Let us have a division on the passage of that bill.

Mr. COX. This vessel Pizarro was foundered at sea. One of our officers did great kindness to her captain and crew. The Spanish marine minister thought proper to decorate this officer of our ship. That is all there is in it and I hope it will pass. I may add that he is a Philadelphia man, and I hope there will be no objection from my friend on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The demand for a division is withdrawn.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN H. BAIZE.

Mr. COFFROTH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John H. Baize, of Ohio County, Kentucky, asking the passage of an act giving him $75, the balance of original bounty in pay due him as a soldier, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

HOUSE PAGES.

Mr. BOYD, from the Committee of Accounts, reported back the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be authorized to employ an additional House page on this floor, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, for this session, making the number of pages twenty-nine instead of twenty-eight.

Mr. STEPHENS. I hope that resolution will pass. This is the one I offered which was referred to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman whether this resolution permanently increases the force?

Mr. BOYD. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. DUNNELL. The reading of the resolution would seem to imply that the number hereafter shall be twenty-nine instead of twenty-eight.

Mr. BLOUNT. What reason is there for an additional page at this session?

Mr. STEPHENS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that I offered this resolution. Twenty-eight pages were allowed under the law of the last session. An extra page was authorized to be appointed, to be paid out of the contingent fund. That page is still upon the floor. This resolution is to pay him for this session. Under the law, after July next the number of pages has been fixed at twenty-nine. Heretofore it was only twenty-eight.

Mr. BLOUNT. And that is the reason why it is confined to this session?

Mr. BOYD. Yes, sir; that is the reason.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BOYD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE CLERKS, ETC.

Mr. BOYD. I now ask leave to report from the Committee of Accounts, if in order, joint resolution (H. R. No. 62) fixing the date on which the payment of committee clerks and pages of the House of Representatives who were paid during the last session shall begin for this session.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the payment of thirty-five clerks to committees of the House, authorized by resolution of the House of April 22, 1879, and of the pages of the House now on the roll, shall begin for this session on the 18th day of March, 1879, the day of the organization of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is a public bill, but the Chair will receive it if there be no objection.

Mr. SPARKS. I think I shall have to object.

Mr. ATKINS. Where does it come from?

The SPEAKER. It comes from the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. BOYD. It has been the custom of Congress in cases of this kind to pass a similar resolution. A similar resolution was adopted by the last Congress, and the Committee of Accounts have concluded to make this recommendation in reference to the payment of clerks and pages at this session. It does not involve any large amount of money.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that prior to the adjournment of the regular session the clerks and other employés of the House were by resolution paid for one month in advance. I believe I am right in that. It is known, therefore, that would be paying them to the 4th of April. This session commenced on the 18th of March. Therefore, if this resolution should be adopted the committee clerks, many of them, would be paid twice for the same service; and if not, then those who were appointed in place of those going out would be paid for the same time that those who have gone out had been already paid for.

To repeat, under a resolution of the House clerks have been paid a month in advance from the 4th of March to the 4th of April. Now, if the pay of those same clerks is made to date back to the beginning of this session, then from the 18th of March to the 4th of April they are paid twice for the same service; and if not, if new men came in in place of those going out, those new men would be paid for the same time as that for which the others have already been paid after the adjournment. It is not right, in my judgment, and I think we should squelch that sort of proceeding here; and I object to the further consideration of the resolution if a single objection is sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman's right to object. But the Chair, to obviate the difficulty, would suggest that those who received additional pay from the 4th of March to the 4th of April should not be included in this resolution. There are some who have not been so paid who would be reached under this resolution.

Mr. BUCKNER. I suggest to my friend from Illinois that he withdraw his objection to considering the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman from Illinois who reports the resolution whether under it any one would be paid twice?

Mr. BOYD. I do not so understand.

Mr. SPARKS. Let the resolution be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SPARKS. Now I submit that under the resolution all those clerks of committees who are holding over from the last Congress, and I suppose that includes a majority of them, would get double pay from the 18th March to the 4th April.

Mr. BLOUNT. I suggest to my friend that he should offer a proviso to meet that point.

Mr. SPARKS. I do not desire to offer a proviso. I think it all wrong.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Congress has been in the habit of giving the per diem clerks thirty days' extra pay on the idea that during the short session they are here only ninety days, and that they incur the expense of coming and going many miles to and from their homes. That extra pay is given as a compensation for past services, and not for any future services. That was a question for the last Congress to decide how much they ought to pay their employés. It was ascertained, for instance, that the clerk of the Committee on the Judiciary and the clerk of the Committee of Elections, two of the highest committees in dignity in the House, and two of the committees having the greatest labor, were only paid a per diem, while clerks of other committees were paid an annual salary of $2,000. To make it approximate somewhat to even a half equality, Congress, in a spirit of justice, paid these employés for past services thirty days' extra pay. Now is it right, when these clerks are employed in this House in a new Congress, for this body to deduct what they have justly received for their past services and labor, the sum which has been paid them by the last Congress for services rendered in that Congress? They have received that thirty days' pay, not for services rendered to this Congress, but for services rendered in the last Congress.

Mr. SPARKS. At the end of last Congress thirty days' extra pay was allowed. The new Congress meanwhile convened. Suppose you go back to the date of the commencement of this Congress and pay a clerk from that date, covering a month or a part of a month for which the extra pay was allowed, do you not pay that man twice?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No, sir; not for the same service. The month's extra pay is presumed to be for the expenses of the man to and from the capital. He could not meet his expenses on the pay for ninety days merely.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman must see that under this resolution, from the 18th March to the 4th April, that clerk, whoever he may be, gets double pay. He has been paid a month in advance for clearing up the work he was engaged in. At all events, he is provided for and paid up to the 4th April. Now, a new Congress begins on the 18th March, and if you let his pay commence from the 18th March, then from that date to the 4th April that man gets double pay.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Like a member of Congress, the committee clerk is presumed to be a human being. He wants to go home and see his family, and this extra pay covers that expense.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania on the left, [Mr. SMITH,] a member of the committee, is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the payment of double pay to any of said clerks and pages.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] desires to amend in the same manner.

Mr. ATKINS. Let the amendment be read from the desk.

The amendment was read.

Mr. BOYD. I suggest that the amendment be modified so that it shall provide that the employés shall not be paid double for the same service.

Mr. ATKINS. I submit an amendment in lieu of that offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no person shall be paid under this resolution double pay for the same time of service.

Mr. BOYD. I think that meets the point.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I accept that modification of my amendment.

Mr. BUCKNER. It seems to me that that only brings up in another form the question raised by the gentleman from Virginia, whether these men were paid for any future services after the adjournment of the last Congress. I think it is not to be presumed at all that the last Congress paid for future services. The pay must have been intended for services during the last Congress.

Mr. KENNA. How could the extra compensation allowed by the last Congress have been based upon the idea of future services when that Congress could not know there would be an extra session or further services rendered within the thirty days? I am opposed to double pay to clerks or to anybody else, but I do not think that theory is correct.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then it is unjust to the employés of the last House.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman if he thinks that these officers should be paid twice for the same time?

Mr. BUCKNER. I want all paid equally. I undertake to say that you make an unjust discrimination by the adoption of this amendment against those gentlemen who were clerks of the last Congress and who got additional pay, for what? Why, it was for service rendered in that Congress. I say it is begging the question to say that gentlemen who were clerks in the last Congress and have been appointed clerks in this Congress shall not receive this pay, and it would be discriminating against them.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the resolution and amendments be recommitted to the Committee of Accounts. The matter can be adjusted by the Committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the discussion has disclosed the fact that there is really but one way by which we can equitably pay these employés: that is by commencing at the date at which they were sworn in. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] objects to this present proposition because it gives double pay. We all concede that that would be an improper thing to do. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] proposes an amendment providing that they shall not receive double pay. The effect of that is that the present Congress has paid a number of officers of the last House for thirty days. Before those thirty days expired these employés, these same gentlemen, these same clerks and pages were in the service of this House and it is proposed to refuse to pay them for that service and to deduct what was given to them in the previous Congress.

Mr. ATKINS. Well, that is right.

Mr. BLOUNT. I cannot see that it is right. These gentlemen have their pay for thirty days under the law of Congress. It is theirs, and no gentleman has a right to take it away under the pretense of equity.

Mr. ATKINS. It was given to them to enable them to go home.

Mr. BLOUNT. It does not matter for what purpose it was given to them. The act does not say so. I undertake to say that it would be a very difficult thing for us to agree for what services it was given. It was really done for the purpose of liberality. First one excuse and then another has been offered for it. These gentlemen are given thirty days' pay by law, and it does not become us to take a farthing from them. The only way, it seems to me, to do justice to the Government and justice to the parties is to say to them: we propose to pay you $6 a day for your services, and we are to find out when those services commenced by the time at which you were sworn in.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have prepared an amendment covering the ground taken by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] which is as follows:

Provided, That no clerk's or page's pay shall begin earlier than the date of his qualifying under oath as such clerk or page.

Mr. Speaker, the object of that amendment is to fix the only real test there can be of the time for which a clerk or page should be paid. We ought, in the first place, to fix the pay of the officers and attachés of this House at such rates as is just and reasonable and for such time as they actually serve. When we have done that we ought to confine ourselves to it, and not to give to one man a gratuity for one month's services and to another a gratuity for two month's services. Let us have the salaries fixed and pay for the term of service, and the only true mode of determining the term of service is to let the record show when that service began and pay from that date. These are my reasons for offering the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS. I desire to say a word upon the motion to recommit. I really do not see any necessity for the recommitment of this resolution. In reply to the remark of my colleague [Mr. BLOUNT] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] I have this to say: if this amendment is passed several of the pages upon this floor will be deprived of their pay because they were not qualified until many days after they commenced service here. I entirely concur with my colleague that the extra pay allowed to clerks of committees and pages in the last House has nothing to do with this Congress. Extra pay was allowed to them and many of them received it and went home and have not returned here.

I think the resolution is just as good as we can make it. If those who received extra pay last year as clerks of committees and pages came back and were appointed to clerkships or as pages they ought, in my opinion, to be paid from the beginning of this session. I only throw out these views in regard to the motion to recommit. I see no necessity for recommittal to the committee. I think the resolution is exactly right as reported by the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. WHITE. I think we shall save time by refusing to recommit and passing the original resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS. I agree with you.

Mr. WHITE. As I understand the question, at the last session we gave gratuities, so to speak, to these clerks, amounting to thirty days' pay. I am informed that that has been the practice of Congress for the last twenty-five years. It followed the line of precedent in this regard. Now, practically, what does it amount to? That gratuities will be paid to these men from the 4th of March to the reconvening of Congress on the 18th of March, so that the only practical difficulty would be the possibility of paying double pay from the 4th of March to the 18th of March. De minimis non curat lex. This is too small a matter to waste time about. I think we shall save time, and save the expense of paying the Printer for publishing debates upon the subject, if we dispose of the matter now. I am therefore opposed to the recommittal.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to have the joint resolution in relation to the pay of these clerks and other employés read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution in relation to committee clerks, pages, and other employés of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives are hereby authorized and directed to pay all committee clerks, pages, messengers, and other employés of the Senate and House of Representatives who do not receive annual salaries, their present rate of compensation respectively for thirty days from the date of the adjournment of this Congress; and the money required to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and shall be immediately available: And further, The provisions of this resolution shall apply to the persons holding their respective positions at the date of its approval, and they shall receive no other compensation for said time than that herein provided.

Mr. SPARKS. That these officials were paid for one month, additional or extra, we all know. The joint resolution just read is of course explicit on that point.

Mr. STEPHENS. They were paid for past services.

Mr. SPARKS. Call it past services or what you will; the fact is they were paid from the 4th of March to the 4th of April, and everybody knows it. Now, if you pay these identical men under this resolution from the 18th of March to the 4th of April, you will pay them twice for that time.

Mr. WHITE. What does that amount to?

Mr. SPARKS. I do not care whether this Congress or the last Congress did it; it is paying these men twice, and that is an outrage upon the Treasury.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. What was called the salary bill was passed by the Forty-second Congress, and it was supposed by the Forty-third Congress——

Mr. SPARKS. I do not yield. Now, let us be consistent. I say that under this resolution, as originally reported from the committee, every official now in his same office would receive double pay from the 18th of March to the 4th of April. That double pay will be taken out of the pockets of the people, and I object to it. I know this is a small matter. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] has stated that it is a small matter. But gentlemen must recollect that a great many small matters will make one large matter. This is an outrage and a wrong, and it ought not to be allowed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has; and this resolution will go over until the morning hour of next Friday.

RE-REFERENCE OF PETITIONS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I was not in my seat this morning when my committee was called. I ask unanimous consent to report back at this time from the Committee of Claims sundry petitions improperly referred to it, and that they be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. COX. Would that interfere with the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. COX. I do not want to lose my right to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman later for that purpose.

There was no objection to the request of Mr. BRIGHT.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am directed by the Committee of Claims to report back to the House sundry petitions improperly referred to that committee, and to ask that the committee be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on War Claims, not to come back on motions to reconsider.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following petitions were reported back from the Committee of Claims and referred to the Committee on War Claims:

The petition and claim of S. H. Hill, for amount of vouchers given for rent and occupation of property in the State of Georgia by United States troops in 1865;

The petition of William D. Wilson, and accompanying papers, for rent and occupation of building in Vicksburgh, Mississippi, by United States forces in 1864 and 1865;

The petition of Mrs. Susan Wilson, asking compensation for rent of property occupied by the United States Army during the late war;

The petition of Ferdinand N. Tuck, of Weakley County, Tennessee, for compensation for horse lost in the United States service during the late war;

A petition for the relief of E. A. Collins, administrator of W. P. Collins, deceased, of Tennessee, for the recovery of tax illegally assessed during the late war by United States troops;

The petition of J. J. Pullian, of Fayette County, Tennessee, for rent of building occupied as an ordnance warehouse at La Grange, Tennessee, during the late war;

The petition and accompanying papers of Meshack Franklin, administrator of John K. Welburn, deceased, of Shelby County, Tennessee, for compensation for quartermaster stores taken and used by the United States Army during the late war;

The petition of Andrew Jones, praying for the allowance of a claim in his favor against the Government;

The petition and accompanying papers for the relief of Cogswell & Co., of Saint Louis, Missouri;

The petition and accompanying papers of Harlan P. Eggleston; and

The petition and accompanying papers for the relief of William Ward, of Virginia.

HON. RUSH CLARK.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted the following; which was read and unanimously adopted:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds desires to place upon its record its appreciation of the kindly qualities and the intellectual endowments of its late member, Hon. Rush Clark. Its members unanimously express their mature judgment of his fidelity and ability as a Representative, and his devotion to his State and his constituents, as evidenced by his assiduity and labors in the sessions of this committee and of the House of Representatives.

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to make the customary appropriation of the balance of the salary which would be due to him as a member of the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANTS IN LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. GEDDES. I am instructed by the Committee on the Library to ask to have taken from the Speaker's table for immediate consideration the bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three additional assistants in the Library of Congress.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time. It authorizes the Librarian of Congress to employ three additional assistants at a yearly compensation of $1,200 each, and appropriates the sum necessary for this purpose out of any money not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, from what committee does this bill come?

The SPEAKER. It has not been referred to any committee; but the Committee on the Library have considered the subject, and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GEDDES,] on behalf of that committee, has asked consent to have the bill considered.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it not subject to a point of order?

Mr. GEDDES. I hope the gentleman will make no objection.

Mr. ATKINS. I make a point of order upon the bill.

Mr. GEDDES. If I may be permitted to make a brief statement, I will say that this measure met with the unanimous approval——

Mr. ATKINS. I do not withdraw the point of order. I think the bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

SUPPLEMENT TO REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) to provide for the publication and distribution of a supplement to the Revised Statutes be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. I will state that there is only one case on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

E. E. RICE.

The first and only bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1363) providing compensation to E. E. Rice for property transferred by him to the Government of the United States for the use of the diplomatic and consular representatives at Hakodadi, in Japan.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Elisha E. Rice, late United States consul at Hakodadi, Japan, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,250, gold, the same being in full payment for certain lots and improvements thereon in Hakodadi, Japan, conveyed by Rice to the United States, and used for consular purposes.

Mr. COX. This is the same bill reported this morning by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and sent to the Committee of the Whole on a point of order raised by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.] The report has already been read. The bill proposes simply to reimburse a gentleman, lately one of our consuls, for rent of property which he owned at Hakodadi in Japan. The Government made an appropriation which it was supposed would cover this amount; but by some mistake the whole amount was paid over to the Japanese government, and this man did not get his money. This matter has been thoroughly examined by the State Department and also by committees of this House, a bill of this kind having been unanimously reported at the last session, as this bill is now unanimously reported. I hope gentlemen will not require that the report shall be again read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am satisfied that this claim ought to be paid, but I think the gentleman from New York should consent to the reading of the report.

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. DUNNELL. It was not heard when it was read this morning.

The report was again read.

Mr. SCALES. Is the payment of this claim recommended by the Secretary of State?

Mr. COX. It has been recommended by the State Department over and over again.

Mr. SCALES. In this amount?

Mr. COX. The gentleman will see that the amount is carefully fixed in the report.

Mr. SAMFORD. Why was not this amount paid at the time?

Mr. COX. I cannot answer that question. This man no doubt trusted that the United States Government would make the necessary appropriation. An appropriation of $6,000, which was supposed to cover his claim, was paid over to the Japanese government for other rents, and this man did not get his share. There is no doubt that the claim is just.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to suggest an amendment to the bill. I see that it requires the payment of this money in "gold." I suggest that the word "gold" be struck out and "coin" substituted.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. COX. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1363) providing compensation to E. E. Rice for property transferred by him to the Government of the United States for the use of the diplomatic and consular representatives at Hakodadi, in Japan, and had directed him to report the same with a recommendation that it pass with an amendment.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, to strike out the word "gold" and insert the word "coin," was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANTS IN LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. GEDDES. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three additional assistants in the Library of Congress.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is this a public bill?

The SPEAKER. It is a public bill. So far as the Chair is aware, there is no private business now pending in Committee of the Whole. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] would be in order at any rate.

Mr. WHITE. Has this bill been referred to a committee?

The SPEAKER. It has not been. It was taken from the Speaker's table this morning for consideration, and upon a point of order it went to the Committee of the Whole. The object of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] is to reach the bill in Committee of the Whole. The Chair thinks it proper to state that the gentleman from Ohio in asking that the bill be taken from the Speaker's table made the statement that the Committee on the Library had considered the bill and had instructed him to make the request.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to know whether there is any necessity for these extra appointments.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter of debate in committee.

Mr. GEDDES. And, Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to give the information in my possession if it be in order to do so.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not now in order. The question is on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 27.

Mr. DUNNELL. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. GEDDES and Mr. WHITE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 42.

The SPEAKER. So the House determines to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. CALKINS. Before going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WARNER. I give notice that I shall call for a vote on the silver question on Tuesday next, and I should like to have the debate go on to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. EWING. Yes, let the debate go on to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. KENNA. I hope there will be a session to-morrow for debate only on this question, and that, I think, will answer all demands.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 53.

Mr. EWING. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNA. I give notice that if this motion is voted down I will ask for a session to-morrow for debate only.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 84, nays 127, not voting 74; as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON. My colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. RUSSELL, is paired with Mr. SPEER, of Georgia.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. BARBER, is paired with Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. They are absent by order of the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. On this question I am paired with Mr. HOOKER, of Mississippi. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. My colleague, Mr. HARMER, is paired with my colleague, Mr. WISE.

Mr. MCCOOK. My colleagues from New York, Mr. O'REILLY and Mr. PIERCE, are paired.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

ASSISTANTS IN LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER. Before the vote last taken a motion had been agreed to that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will please take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the public Calendar. The first bill thereon will be read.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three additional assistants in the Library of Congress.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Librarian of Congress to employ three additional assistants, at a yearly compensation of $1,200 each, and appropriates the sum necessary out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GEDDES. In asking the consideration of this bill I desire to invite the severest scrutiny of the economists of the House. I am myself opposed to the increase of clerical force or assistants in any of the Departments, and I would in committee and here oppose with what influence I could exert, and by my vote, any such increase without the clearest and most satisfactory showing of the propriety and necessity of it.

Mr. Spofford, the Librarian, presented the considerations to the committee that induced their unanimous action in supporting this proposition. That has been followed by the approval of the Senate, and, the bill now being before the House, I am gratified that members desire to know and inquire into the propriety and necessity of the measure. I could perhaps make no better statement of its necessity than the one made by Mr. Spofford. I regarded it as ample, and felt entirely satisfied with it, and cheerfully voted for the proposition. In order that I may put the House in possession of such facts as were presented to me and carried my judgment, I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read a concise statement made by the Librarian upon this subject.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I ask that the committee be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Library, now the largest in the United States, has three hundred and forty-five thousand volumes, by enumeration January 1, 1879. It is divided into two departments, a law library and a general library, to which last is added (what no other library in the world has attached to it) a bureau of copyrights, all the entries of copyright publications for the United States, with the deposit of such publications, being placed by law under charge of the Librarian of Congress. The duties of the Librarian include:

1. The purchase and receipt from copyright and other sources of about sixteen thousand volumes annually, involving the constant and vigilant search of Library, auction, and sale catalogues, and a careful selection from them of books needful to enrich the Library, with care to avoid duplicates.

2. The collation of all these accessions, to avoid adding any imperfect books to the collection, with the stamping and labeling of the books for the shelves, and their proper location in the Library with the related books.

3. The cataloguing of all the books both by authors and subjects, and the printing with careful regard to accuracy and fidelity of the titles of the whole collection, a work of great magnitude and importance, now going through the press. This requires a close familiarity with the ancient and modern languages in all their applications.

4. The preparation and supervision of the binding of all the periodicals and a large share of the books received annually, numbering from five thousand to six thousand volumes, all the titles to be carefully written in abridged form and in many languages, and both lists and titles verified on their return to the Library.

5. The heavy correspondence of the Library, involving purchases, exchanges, and copyrights, and requiring the writing of not less than twelve thousand letters annually.

6. The exchanges of Government publications with foreign governments, the accounts and correspondence connected with which require the entire time of one assistant.

7. And most laborious of all, the business of the copyright department, requiring the record of about fifteen thousand copyright publications every year, the furnishing of certificates of record, the recording of thousands of assignments of copyright property, the search of the records of former years, both in this office and in the books kept by the clerks of the district courts of the United States prior to 1870, when the entire copyright business was transferred to Washington. This department also requires the receipt and care of every publication deposited to perfect copyright (or from twenty-eight thousand to thirty thousand publications every year) all of which must be registered, stamped, numbered, and carefully filed away, as a necessary part of the Librarian's responsible duties. The whole of this work, moreover, as also the general business of the Library has to be carried on in a space so grossly inadequate and confined as greatly to embarrass the administration of the Library business; and it is not too strong a statement to add that the cramped and huddled condition in which the Librarian of Congress is compelled to transact a business of such magnitude would not be tolerated for a single year in the private business of any first-class house in the country.

In this summary of the duties devolving upon the Librarian and his assistants, the undersigned makes no account of the incessant supply of books and information to members of Congress, judges of the courts of the United States, the other officers of the Government, and to the general public, and the records connected therewith; since this is by far the least, as it certainly is the most pleasant of the multifarious duties of administering the Library, which has now become an institution of so great extent and importance. In the Boston Public Library, the next largest in the United States to our own, seventy-eight assistants are constantly employed. This is a library of large circulation and consequently of laborious clerical records, but has no bureau of copyrights. In the government library of Great Britain, the British Museum, which has eleven hundred thousand volumes and no circulation, the number of assistants employed is eighty-one. It has no copyright business (beyond the receipt of one copy of each British publication) the registry of copyrights being kept at Stationers' Hall. In the business of the Patent Office, involving the registry of about as many patents as the undersigned has the record of copyrights (say fifteen thousand a year) and the preservation of one model of each article protected instead of two, three hundred and thirteen officers and clerks of all grades are employed. The Library of Congress has been allowed only twenty-one assistants (besides the Librarian) by existing laws, for all the work of the law department, the general Library, and the copyright bureau.

He has carried on the varied and responsible business of the Library for fifteen years, and that of the copyright bureau in addition for nine years, with a force greatly inadequate, in deference to the spirit of economy which is regarded as a necessity in the public service. But the constantly increasing business under his charge compels him now to ask the allowance of three additional assistants at $1,200 each. This request he trusts will not be deemed unreasonable, in view of the fact that the Librarian pays into the Treasury a net sum of over $13,000 annually from copyright fees, while the pecuniary value of the publications accruing to the Library of the Government must be estimated at a much greater sum.

A. R. SPOFFORD,
Librarian of Congress.

WASHINGTON, April 7, 1879.

Mr. GEDDES. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ATKINS. Before the gentleman makes that motion, I desire to ask him a question. It is whether he has not provided in this bill a larger number of assistants than the regular estimates ask for?

Mr. GEDDES. That is true, but that is an argument in favor of the proposition as it now stands. The committee were induced to recommend it on account of the additional verbal statement of the Librarian, who satisfied us that he himself was an economist, and that he had not in the first instance asked for what he really needed. He showed us that his force was wholly inadequate, and would be so after the two additional assistants were given him, and that in the course of a short time, in the early part of next session, he would be required to ask for an additional force. In view of those considerations, a motion was made and unanimously carried that the three be given him now, with the idea that that was the economical course.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very glad indeed that this report is before the House. I always take great pleasure in helping any such proposition as this. I think we ought to be grateful to the Librarian and to the committee for bringing these facts before us and for asking for this additional help.

We are here under circumstances where, without the slightest regard for party, we ought all to vie with each other in being proud of that great Library and doing anything in the world that is reasonable to maintain it and render it more effective. And we have every reason to believe that there can scarcely be found a man anywhere so wise and so judicious and so capable of doing everything that belongs to the management of the Library as our present Librarian of Congress. He has been prudent, judicious, economical, thorough during the whole of his long service. And I know of no institution connected with this country more worthy of our cordial support.

Let us remember that the foundation of that Library was laid in the small library of Thomas Jefferson, and the spirit of scholarship and thoroughness that he showed in the care of his own books, which are still preserved in the Library as a monument of his learning and wisdom, seems to have been secured in the management of the Congressional Library itself. Perhaps gentlemen may not know that every one of the large body of books obtained from Thomas Jefferson to form the foundation of this Library has his own mark at some distinct page away over in the book, indicating his ownership.

I recollect to have seen a little thing which is worthy of mention here. In one of these books when it came here there happened to be left a little piece of paper, not more than five inches square, in Mr. Jefferson's handwriting. He had kept during the eight years of his Presidency this curious memorandum. He had drawn it off in the form of a table with the year at the head, a column for each year, and the date of appearance in the Washington market of every article of ordinary marketing such as vegetables; for instance, asparagus appeared in the Washington market in 1801 on such a date, and so on through, showing that in the midst of great affairs when President of the United States he took care of little things. These little observations marked him as a philosopher.

Now, I say the spirit of that man, and the care he took of his own books, has presided in that Library, has perpetuated itself ever since the Library was founded. We have never had a better representative of the true library spirit than we have in the person of the present Librarian, and when he asks for three clerks, and when we know how great the assistance is in less important libraries, we ought to be glad to grant him further assistance. I hope the House will give a unanimous vote for this measure.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 1376) making appropriations for constructing jetties and other works at the South Pass of the Mississippi River, with an amendment in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANTS IN LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

The Committee of the Whole then resumed its session.

Mr. CLYMER. It was my privilege and pleasure to have served upon the Committee on the Library during the Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses; during the first as a member of the committee and in the Forty-fourth as its chairman. In that long and intimate intercourse it gives me great pleasure to bear testimony here to-day that there never was, in my judgment, any man so fitted by learning, by spirit, by love for his calling, by care for the great interests under his control, than the present Librarian of Congress. He seems to have been born for that position. Intuitive knowledge with reference to books seems to be his, and in the long past that he has presided over this Library, which is a treasured idea with the people of the United States that here in this capital city shall be garnered all the fruits of its intellectual labor, he seems to have presided over it with that degree of care, circumspection, and regard for the future and the present which has rarely characterized any man in any position under this Government.

I know, sir, that when the democratic party came into power and inaugurated as they believed to be necessary strict measures of economy that he, in obedience to this general spirit, refused year after year to ask for any additional aid in the department of the Library. We almost insisted that he should do it, but he declined to do so, but the rapid annual growth of the Library has at length compelled him to do so, and I am delighted that the Committee on the Library have gone beyond his actual demand for two assistants and have given him three. It is absolutely necessary for its care, for its preservation, for the convenience of the members of both Houses of the National Legislature, and for the convenience of the public generally, and I have risen merely to bear my testimony to his worth, to his capacity, and to his desire to do that which is demanded by the highest public interests.

I have no doubt that my honored successor in the chairmanship of that committee will agree with me in all and everything I have said, and I trust that this joint resolution will be passed by the unanimous vote of this House. It will be a tribute to a faithful public servant who has always and ever done his whole duty.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations one question.

Mr. GEDDES. I will yield to the gentleman for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is all I desire; I do not wish to make a speech. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether there was any estimate made out by the Librarian?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. What was demanded by that estimate and when was it made?

Mr. ATKINS. It was made in December last and there were twenty assistants asked for; we gave him eighteen. I was under the impression and stated a moment ago that he only asked for eighteen, but he really asked for twenty.

Mr. McMILLIN. Twenty was all that was demanded?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; and this will make the number twenty-one.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I merely wish to add that, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stated, there were twenty asked for last December, and on inquiry of the Librarian we have ascertained that there are a number of plans, surveys, and papers of very great importance to the country, which are lodged up in a large garret, which cannot be used unless you tumble in there and pull them out—there is no catalogue, no papers stating what they are and no order nor any file of them; these three men would be employed a year in that service.

When this Congress is liberal enough to take care of its own property it will grant this increase. Mr. Spofford does what he can. I think he does the work of about four men. I do not believe there is a librarian in the United States who does the work he does; and if you want to take care of your own property, and put it where you can find it and where your constituents can, you would give him not only three but six.

I believe that you will be best protecting the interests of the people of the country if you give him six instead of three, and I hope the joint resolution will be passed.

Mr. GEDDES. I now move that the committee rise and report this bill favorably to the House.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for one word?

Mr. GEDDES. Certainly.

Mr. COX. My relations during the last Congress, as chairman of the Committee on the Library of this House, brought me very frequently into contact with Mr. Spofford, our Librarian. The House may not know that it is not the only business of the Librarian to give out books; he has various other duties assigned to him by law; he has to take charge of the copyright system of the United States; he has the indexing to make under a provision of law; he has to take care of certain publications ordered by Congress.

In the confused state in which our three hundred and fifty thousand volumes now are, with the limited room for their accommodation, it is almost impossible for any man to properly perform the duties of that office without more assistance than the Librarian has at present. I know that from personal observation of the Library. Until we have a more commodious building, with greater conveniences for the care of our books, our Librarian will need more assistance than he now has, or even than is proposed to be given to him.

I join with what fell from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in commendation of our Librarian. He has become an indispensability to that Library and to Congress. He has the care of these many thousands of books gathered with so much trouble, many of them at great expense, some of them so valuable that they cannot be replaced, and yet some of them are falling to pieces because of the bad arrangements of the library-room. We should remember what John Milton said of books: that they are reasonable creatures, more than life, a life beyond this life, an immortality rather than a life. And as we would care for our lives, so we should give our care to that which is the most useful of all the appliances of legislation—a good library.

I hope this bill will pass without dissent. I thank my friend from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] for giving me the opportunity to say this.

Mr. GEDDES. I now move that the committee rise and report this bill favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the public Calendar, and particularly the bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three additional assistants in the Library of Congress, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GEDDES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EADS'S JETTIES.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for the purpose of moving to proceed to business on the Speaker's table, in order that the House may take up and concur in an amendment of the Senate to the House bill in relation to Eads's jetties.

Mr. CONGER. That is right.

Mr. CLYMER. It is an important matter, and we should act upon it promptly.

Mr. WHITE. That is right.

Mr. WARNER. Will it lead to debate?

Mr. CLYMER. It will not.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 1376) making appropriations for constructing jetties and other works at South Pass, Mississippi River, was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendment of the Senate was, in line 2 of the bill, to strike out the words "to pay" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "to enable the Secretary of War to cause to be paid."

Mr. CLYMER. It will be observed by the House that that is a mere verbal amendment. I move that it be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was then concurred in.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion has already been made and voted down.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I know that, but I believe it is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is still in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the session of the House to-morrow be for debate only.

Mr. CONGER. I object. I think the business of this House should be carried on formally, and should be got along with and through with.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is carrying it on formally.

Mr. CONGER. I regret that anybody on this side of the House would vote to lose a single day.

Mr. WHITE. I will vote to adjourn over to-morrow. I do not think this is a party question at all. I think we can gain time by losing a day occasionally. We may as well adjourn over until the Senate get through with the military bill.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] that we very much hope to have a session to-morrow for debate only.

Mr. WHITE. Is this motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that we have some reason to hope that an appropriation bill will be reported to-morrow, and we want to have it reported. It ought to be reported, and we have reason to expect that what ought to be done will be done.

Mr. SPRINGER. What appropriation bill?

Mr. CONGER. The bill making appropriations for the support of the Army.

Mr. SPRINGER. We have passed a bill of that kind.

Mr. CONGER. No, we have not.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. RYAN, of Kansas; and it was not agreed to.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the bill known as the coinage bill; a bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, with amendments. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WEAVER Mr. Speaker, the discussion of the systems of finance for a great government is an important matter. It was remarked once by Alexander Hamilton that a government without an adequate system of finance is an object of pity. I have not been highly impressed with the manner in which gentlemen who oppose this bill have discussed the question. They seem to regard the bill as an unwarranted intrusion upon the rights of somebody. They attack it alternately with levity, sarcasm, and abuse. It is a question that ought to be discussed in the light of the Constitution, the necessities of our people, and the present condition of public affairs.

Two facts strike my mind with great force at the threshold of this discussion: First, silver and gold have been used as money from the foundation of human society, so far as we have any history. The next fact is that there is about an equal amount of gold and silver bullion in the world. Now, how any gentleman can oppose thorough remonetization of silver unless he first takes the position that there is too much metal money in the world I cannot understand. The annual gold product throughout the whole earth at this time is about $100,000,000, (and it is rapidly declining,) barely enough, if we could command it all, to pay the annual interest of the bonded debt of the United States alone. If we are to demonetize silver, and have no power to create a legal-tender paper money, it will be readily perceived that the proposition is to hitch the car of American progress and American civilization to this decreasing product, and this will lead us into inevitable decline and pauperism. The proposition, to my mind, is untenable and unreasonable.

The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." Again, by the same article and section of the Constitution Congress is clothed with power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with Indian tribes." The same instrument again provides that Congress shall have power to admit "new States into this Union." These grants of power are affirmative and express.

Under the power to admit new States into this Union, can Congress expel States from the Union? By virtue of the authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the States, can Congress prohibit all commerce with foreign governments and between the States? Certainly no one will claim such extraordinary construction. Then how can Congress under an express grant of power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," derive the right to prohibit the coinage of either gold or silver? To prohibit coinage is to exercise a power just the opposite to that conferred, and is the destruction of the power named in the Constitution. I demand of gentlemen who oppose this bill, that they shall tell us where Congress derives the power to prohibit coinage. It strikes me that gentlemen who hold to the opinion that the Government has no power to issue legal-tender paper money in time of peace, place themselves in a dilemma here, for if Congress may prohibit the coinage and circulation of silver as lawful money they may lawfully place the same restrictions upon gold, and here is another method of "starving the Government to death." [Laughter.]

I hold, therefore, that the law passed in 1873 was clearly unconstitutional. It was claimed upon the stump and claimed in Congress in the discussion of the bill that passed, partially remonetizing silver, that the demonetization of it was an accident, and was not intentional. If that excuse is the true one, the proposition to reinstate silver as legal-tender money in this country upon the footing that it occupied from the foundation of the Government down to 1873 would not have been resisted. The animus of the demonetization of silver is disclosed by the opposition which its remonetization has met with and is now meeting with. In reality and in truth, silver was demonetized in the interest, as I shall show, of a certain class of men in this and in other countries.

It is very remarkable, when you come to read the history of the demonetization of metal money, that that metal which is the more abundant is always demonetized. After the discovery of gold in Australia and California about the middle of this century, the money dealers of this and other countries became suddenly alarmed lest the amount of metal money in the world should be unduly increased; and Germany and Austria notably, in 1857 demonetized gold. For what reason? Not because gold could not maintain its relative value with silver, but because the mass of metal money, gold and silver combined, was depreciating as compared with labor and commodities. Throughout the entire discussion, from 1848 down to the demonetization of silver in Germany in 1871, no one of any distinction, no political economist, ever advocated the demonetization of either gold or silver because the metals could not maintain a relative value the one with the other, but solely because the mass of metal money as compared with labor and products was depreciating to the injury of gentlemen who held fixed incomes. I defy contradiction upon that point.

After the discovery of gold in Australia and California De Quincey, an eminent English writer, and Chevalier, aroused all Europe with the alarm that the precious metals were about to become too plentiful; and, following the advice of Chevalier and De Quincey, Germany and Austria demonetized gold, and but for the interposition of France the stampede would have become general.

In 1871 Germany remonetized gold and demonetized silver; and the last act grew out of the same apprehension that caused the demonetization of gold in 1857, namely, that there was about to be too much metal money. The Latin union was formed in 1865. From that period to the present there has been a constant effort throughout the earth on the part of those who have fixed incomes to debase and drive silver out of use as money.

The Comstock lode began to attract attention about 1861. In 1863 there were three thousand silver companies formed in San Francisco. While this did not attract general public attention it did attract the attention of financial circles.

The Emperor of the French sent a commission to investigate the amount of our silver production. It was ascertained the amount would be very large, although the estimates of that day have not been fully justified by results. Alarm was created in European financial circles that silver was about to become too plentiful. Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway all about the same time demonetized silver and reinstated gold as the standard.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a remarkable circumstance that demonetization in the Old World is coincident in point of time with demonetization in this country. And the war upon silver is made by the same class of men the world over, namely, those having fixed incomes and who complain that the value of their incomes will be depreciated in proportion to the increase in the value of property. I want these facts to be well understood by the people who own the great bulk of the labor and property of this country. I want them to distinctly understand that the conflict is between money on the one hand and all other kinds of property on the other.

I say on the floor of this House that I am as much opposed as any member here to worthless money, to depreciated money, but unquestionably it is the interest of the great mass of our people that we should have cheap money and dear property; I do not mean worthless money, but I mean cheap money as compared with the property which it buys. Property is held by the many and money by the few; and if the Government is to be administered in the interest of the many, then my proposition is correct. I want good money, but cheap money and dear property. We have just the reverse of this to-day; we have cheap property and dear money. Money to-day is master and king in America, and property goes begging and is at a discount.

To show that I am correct in my proposition as to the object of the demonetization of silver, I wish to read an extract from the report of the French monetary commission, published in 1869. In their résumé of the question it is said:

It is difficult to estimate exactly what diminution is going on in the value of silver, but whatever it may be it demands the attention of governments, because—

What? Because the relative value of silver with gold is depreciating? Not at all—because it affects unfavorably all that portion of the population whose income, remaining nominally the same, undergoes a yearly diminution of purchasing power.

England, the greatest bondholding nation upon the earth, demonetized silver in 1816 just four years before she passed her celebrated resumption act; Germany in 1871, and completed it in 1873; Norway, Denmark, and Sweden in 1871 and 1872, and the United States in 1873, and completed it in 1874, just prior to the passage of the resumption act.

I wish to speak further as to the design abroad and in this country. Ernest Seyd in his book, The Fall in the Price of Silver, published in 1876, estimates the amount of silver in the world as about three and one-quarter billions and the amount of gold three and one-half billions, and he further estimates that England has an annual income from other nations of $250,000,000 per annum. It can readily be seen why England, who holds the bonds of other nations, should want those bonds payable in a single metal, or in the dearest money. The money dealers of Germany, England, and the United States own the bulk of the funded debt of the world, which now amounts to about thirty-two thousand millions, mostly contracted in flush times.

Capitalists readily saw that if they could strike down as legal-tender money one-half of the metal money of the earth and make this enormous funded debt payable in gold alone, it would be greatly to their advantage. The people should thoroughly understand this also. They are beginning to understand it, and are everywhere and almost unanimously demanding that silver shall be thoroughly reinstated. Thus we are brought face to face with the great fact that demonetization was the result of a great international conspiracy, inaugurated by men who had fixed incomes as against, and to the detriment of those who own the great bulk of the property of the world.

Now, I wish to speak as to the specific intent in this country. It is well known that the bonds of this country, fifteen hundred millions of them, were originally payable in currency. That was the opinion of Senator Morton, of Senator Sprague, and of a score of others who might be named, and it could be plainly read upon the face of the bond. To get rid of that interpretation of the law which gave the people the right to pay the bonds in greenbacks, in legal-tender paper money, the law of 1869, "strengthening the public credit" was passed. That law took away from the people the right to pay the bonds in currency and conferred upon the holder of public securities the right to demand coin. But, as I said before, the silver product of the world was rapidly increasing, and it being the intention of those who manipulated and fastened upon this country this enormous public debt that it should be made permanent——

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to ask whether the gentleman at the time he speaks of, in the year 1869, was a republican, and whether he voted for General Grant as President?

Mr. WEAVER. I did.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was the gentleman aware that the public-credit act of 1869 simply put in the form of law what was declared in the platform on which General Grant was nominated?

Mr. WEAVER. I do not so understand it. And as to my connection with the republican party at that time, I was in the same situation then that the gentleman and many of his friends seem to be in now. I knew nothing about this question. I had never investigated it. I was in the same condition with Saul of Tarsus when on his way to Damascus. But I have gathered some light since then; and I stand here frankly and plainly to say, having investigated this question, that a great public crime was committed against the labor of this country by the passage of the act in 1869; that it amounted, if not in intention, at all events in effect, to the robbery of our people, General Grant to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SPRINGER. And the republican party to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. WEAVER. Yes; as the gentleman suggests—and the republican party also to the contrary notwithstanding.

Now, after the silver product of the country was greatly increasing the bondholder began to read his bond. "Why," he says, "here I have an investment I do not want to disturb, and if the yield of silver increases as the friends of silver expect it will, my bond will be payable in silver, for coin means silver as well as gold; silver, therefore, must be demonetized." And the measure accordingly was smuggled through. We can read the animus of that act in the opposition this bill is meeting with in this House to-day and throughout the country at the hands of the monometalists. It was smuggled through with the perfect knowledge that public sentiment would not tolerate it, and with the concealed and wicked purpose to deprive the people the second time of the right to pay the bonds according to the terms the bondholder had himself imposed. Silver being laid aside, coin then meant gold, and payment in gold meant that the principal of the bonds should not be paid at all, and, like the English debt, should remain in perpetuity. That was the design of this legislation. I have too much confidence in the good sense of the gentlemen who oppose this bill to believe that they dislike silver. It is not that. They do not want the principal of their bonds paid at all. They want the investment undisturbed and the annual interest to accrue, that they may be permitted to continue in the coupon-clipping business. That is the simple, naked truth.

The interest was at first payable in gold semi-annually, and now, under the funding scheme, payable quarterly, which enables the gentlemen having fixed incomes derived from bonds to compound their interest. Thus 4 per cent. payable quarterly is quite as good as 6 per cent. paid as provided in the 6 per cent. bond, and, in fact, greater when we compare the purchasing power of money now with its purchasing power, say, ten years ago. It is true beyond dispute that he is receiving a greater interest to-day than he received when he purchased his six percents from the Government.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I would ask him if that change from semi-annual to quarterly payments was not in the interest of the Government?

Mr. WEAVER. It was certainly in the interest of the bondholders.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Was it not in the interest of the Government? The Government receives its money from week to week, and from week to week pays it out, and it would otherwise have to lie in the Treasury.

Mr. WEAVER. It would not be a great detriment to the Government to let a little gold lie in the Treasury. Does the gentleman undertake to say before the House and the country that that was the design Congress had in view when they made the interest payable quarterly? Not at all. It enabled the bondholders to receive their interest four times a year, and to compound it by loaning it to the people. The effect on the Government in point of convenience is a mere bagatelle; it amounts to nothing. The same vouchers have to be kept, the same vaults are there, and more clerks have to be employed.

Mr. POUND. It saves interest to the Government.

Mr. WEAVER. How does it save interest? I will yield to the gentleman to point out how it saves a single cent of interest to the Government. Explain now; I will give you all the time you want.

Mr. POUND. The gentleman is making his own speech. I will not interrupt him.

Mr. CLAFLIN. We know that we receive the income weekly and monthly, and when the Government has received three months' money into the Treasury, then it is cheaper to pay it out than to keep it for six months.

Mr. WEAVER. Does that save any interest?

Mr. HASKELL. I will answer the gentleman if he will allow me.

Mr. WEAVER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HASKELL. The market quotations of all stocks and all bonds for one hundred years will show that a bond with its interest payable semi-annually is worth more in the market and can be sold at par and at a less rate per cent. interest than one on which the interest is payable only annually, and if payable quarterly you can sell the bonds for still more and at a less rate of interest.

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman's argument destroys itself. Why do bonds sell for a higher rate in the market when the interest is payable quarterly? For the reason that when the interest is payable quarterly the bondholders can compound it by new loans, thus making it a better investment. It is a pecuniary reason that controls them, and not charity for the people. I thought verily that it was a most remarkable thing that these people holding Government securities drawing 6 per cent. would voluntarily come forward and exchange them for 4 per cent. bonds, and I believed the story so prevalent on the republican stump that it was the love of the bondholders for the dear people that made them willing to surrender the bonds; but when I began an investigation of the matter and saw that the bondholder received in this way more interest than he received before, then I saw the cloven foot of the conspiracy sticking out, and no gentleman in the House and no gentleman on the stump has been able to cover it up. [Applause.]

Not only did they intend to put the bonded debt into a condition in which it can never be paid, but it was with an ulterior design, and I call the attention of the republican members who may follow me to the fact, that it was the ulterior design, after having placed the bonded debt of the country in a condition in which it could not be paid, to make the present national-banking system of the country, based upon the bonded debt, the great moneyed monopoly for all time to come. I proceed to prove it.

The Comptroller of the Currency, in his report for 1876, uses this language:

> It was shown in the report, from the discussions in Congress at the time of the passage of the legal-tender act, from the reports of different Secretaries of the Treasury, and from the uniform legislation since that time, that the national-banking system was intended to be permanent, the institutions organized under it being by the express terms of the law authorized to continue for a term of twenty years; while it was equally evident that the Treasury notes issued and still in circulation were intended to be funded.

Now if the national-banking system was intended to be permanent, then of necessity the bond system must be permanent also, for the former rests upon the latter. If you pay off your bonds, what becomes of your national banks? You cannot have a national bank without bonds. If the banks are to be permanent, the foundation must be permanent also. Hence you have ingrafted upon this Government as another step in the great conspiracy the system of permanent national banks and permanent national debt, the banks resting upon the debt; and from the law of self-preservation, if for no other reason, these corporations will forever exert all their powerful and consolidated influence to keep alive the system. To enable them to effectually do this the laws of Congress have placed in their hands absolute control over the volume of our currency.

Mr. SAPP. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEAVER. With pleasure.

Mr. SAPP. Is not the existence of every national bank in this country limited by law?

Mr. SPRINGER. In what respect?

Mr. SAPP. By law, by the law creating the national banks. Does not that law limit the existence of each bank?

Mr. WEAVER. When the bank act was passed it provided that national banks should be chartered for twenty years, and the circulation was limited to $354,000,000. But your resumption act of 1875 provides that there shall be in this country free national banking and unlimited national-bank issues.

Mr. SAPP. But does the gentleman pretend to say that the free national-bank law allows the national banks to exist without limitation as to time?

Mr. WEAVER. No, they are still chartered for twenty years.

Mr. SAPP. And then will not the national banks expire in twenty years from the time that they are chartered?

Mr. WEAVER. It does not limit the time during which national-bank charters may be issued. As long as that law is on the statute-book there is a perpetual right in this country for the chartering of national banks. Can the gentleman understand that? As the law now stands they are about as perpetual as the human family. The Almighty says that the days of a man's years shall be three score and ten. Was it the intention that at the death of my friend the human family shall cease? [Great laughter.] Not at all. One national bank will be chartered to-day and will die next year or in due time, and then another will spring up. As it is written, "Abraham begat Isaac, Isaac begat Jacob, and Jacob begat twelve sons."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And the new bank will have the same stockholders as the deceased bank.

Mr. WEAVER. If the gentleman says that there is a limitation to the national-banking system, then he must hold that the system is not designed to be permanent, but to be temporary. Why not, then, wipe it out now?

Mr. SAPP. I say that it would be contrary to the interest of the people to wipe it out now.

Mr. WEAVER. Then you want it to be permanent?

Mr. SAPP. I am answering your question.

Mr. WEAVER. Do you want it to be permanent?

Mr. SAPP. I will answer that question.

Mr. WEAVER. Answer it now.

Mr. SAPP. I will.

Mr. WEAVER. Answer my question, yes or no.

Mr. SAPP. I want our national-bank issues to continue as long as they will be of public utility.

Mr. WEAVER. That does not mean anything?

Mr. SAPP. Yes, it does.

Mr. WEAVER. I would like to know why it is of public utility now more than it will be twenty years from now.

Mr. WILBER. I would like to ask the gentleman why he would discontinue the national banks?

Mr. WEAVER. I will tell you before I get through.

Mr. WILBER. That is what I would like to know.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEAVER. I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan, of course.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman what necessity there is for bonds to the very existence of a national bank? I understood the gentleman to say that national banks could not exist unless bonds were also in existence. Now, I want to know if a national bank needs bonds at all for its existence?

Mr. WEAVER. It does.

Mr. CONGER. How?

Mr. WEAVER. The law requires bonds to be deposited before starting a national bank.

Mr. CONGER. For what?

Mr. WEAVER. To secure the circulation.

Mr. CONGER. Ah; but the existence of a bank does not require the existence of bonds.

Mr. WEAVER. A national bank without circulation is like a human being without a soul. There are no national banks without circulation.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman say that?

Mr. WEAVER. None that I know of. Does the gentleman know of any?

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman say that there are no national banks without circulation?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I undertake to say there is no national bank without circulation.

Mr. WEAVER. I will compromise with the gentleman in this way, and there will be a bill introduced no doubt during this session about to that purpose: I will let the national banks stand if the gentleman will take away their circulation. [A Voice: "That is fair."]

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman says that national banks could not stand without bonds. Now, I say that a bond is not necessary at all to the existence of a national bank.

Mr. WEAVER. Take away the bonds and take away the circulation and you may have all the national banks you want. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILBER. Last year the national banks paid in taxes on an average not less than 5½ per cent. on their capital, and they received a little over 4 per cent. upon their bonds. Now, I ask the gentleman why he would wipe out the national banks when they are paying that amount of taxes for the people?

Mr. WEAVER. The charges for interest and exchange are increased so as to cover all that, and so the people pay the tax in the end and not the banks.

Mr. FISHER and many others. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WEAVER. I am willing to yield to one at a time, but I declare I do not like to have the whole syndicate at me at once. You confuse one another, gentlemen. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, if the national-bank system is to be temporary, why not change it now? Why not give the country gold, silver, and legal-tender paper, all issued by the Government and not by or through the bank corporations? Can any gentleman give a statesmanlike reason for withholding this great boon from an oppressed people?

Now, I will, at the request of the gentleman who asked it, state my reason for opposing national-bank money. I oppose it, first, for the same reason that Jackson opposed money issued by banking corporations. In his farewell address, on page 995, volume 2, of the Statesman's Manual, he says:

> Corporations which create the paper money cannot be relied upon to keep the circulating medium uniform in amount.

That is one of my reasons for opposing national-bank money.

Mr. FISHER. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. WEAVER. I will, as I interrupted the gentleman once yesterday.

Mr. FISHER. I only wish to ask the gentleman what this has to do with the bill under discussion?

Mr. WEAVER. I will tell you, sir. I am discussing the question as to the intent of the demonetization of silver and the fastening upon this country of a permanent bonded debt with the national-bank system on top of it. [Applause.] You cannot get me away from that point. If silver is freely coined, they argued, the bonds will be paid in coin, and the banks will fall and our power will be gone. [Applause.]

Now, I will give another reason for opposing national banks. The act of June 20, 1874, now on our statute-book and the law of the land, provides that any national bank may at pleasure reduce its circulation in whole or in part. Thus these institutions are clothed with the right to contract the currency at their will. The act of January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, provides that they may increase the currency without regard to limit. Thus there is one act which allows them to "bear" the market whenever they please and another which enables them to "bull" the market when they please. They can contract the currency when they see fit; they can expand it when they see fit; and in this way they can control the value of every day's labor and of every product in this country. [Applause.] I say it is the climax of iniquity in legislation that a great government like ours, of forty-seven million people—soon to have a hundred million—should say that for all time we will never issue another dollar of legal-tender paper nor remonetize silver; that the national banks for all time to come shall have the absolute control of the volume of the currency of this country, and hence over the destiny of our people. I call on the people everywhere to arise, and in their might and strength shake off this incubus. [Applause.]

Suppose that this were a national convention assembled to frame a constitution; that all the articles had been framed, and it only remained to provide who should issue the currency of the country and control its volume. And suppose my friend from Michigan should rise in his place and say, "We have now our constitution all framed except that which shall determine who is to issue the money. Now there are a few hundred men who let us have money when we were in trouble; we love them; I move that we give it into the hands of our creditors and their successors, world without end, amen, to say how much money there shall be in this country and when it shall be issued to the people." Now I would move an amendment that the power to say what shall be the price of all property in this country shall not be conferred upon corporations, the creditors of the country, but that it shall be left to the whole people represented in Congress to say through their Representatives how much money we shall have and what shall be the money of the country. [Applause.] I venture to say that even in this House, with so many friends of the syndicate as we have here to vote, there would not be one man who would dare to vote "no" on my amendment, the proposition is so plain.

But, sir, it is contended that the national-bank system furnishes an elastic currency. My friend Thomas M. Nicholls, the secretary of the "Honest Money League" that represents to-day the hard-money element of both the old parties, and whose circulars are sent all over the country by members of Congress, says that the national-bank system furnishes an elastic system of currency; that if the wants of trade require more money the banks can get it by depositing bonds, and if the currency becomes redundant they can surrender it. They will regulate it solely for our good, of course. Thus it is claimed that under the national-bank system the amount of currency can be adjusted at the will of the banks in accordance with the demands of trade. But, sir, I maintain that the elasticity which we get at the option of the banks constitutes one of the greatest objections to the system. Such elasticity reminds me of the first piece of India rubber I ever saw. A great big fellow came to school, when I was a little boy about ten years old, holding in his hand a piece of India rubber which he was stretching. He said to me, "Jim, did you ever see anything like this?" I replied: "I never did; what is it?" "Why," said he, "they call it India rubber. Take one end of it between your teeth." I did so. "Now," said he, "pull!" I pulled and he pulled. While it was stretching out, while it was expanding, it did not hurt me a bit; but when he let loose the other end that was contraction, and you may depend it was not pleasant. [Great laughter.] Now, the proposition is to put the rubber to the lips of the American people and let the national banks draw it out whenever they please or let it snap whenever they please. [Laughter.]

I say that it is one of the monster evils of the age and in defiance of all correct systems of finance that we allow by law a set of men who are not elected by the people, who are not responsible to them for the management of their banking institutions, to regulate at will the volume of the currency. Such a system of finance is no better than a system of robbery; and it has had that effect practically, as a million ruined homes can testify.

Mr. WILBER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the speculators who are interested in the passage of the silver-bullion bill are under oath? Are they not in this respect in the same situation as the national banks?

Mr. WEAVER. My dear sir, I would like to know when it was the bondholding interest of this country became averse to legislation in behalf of speculators? And I should like to know another thing: What right has the gentleman to say, if I own a million of silver bullion and it is needed for use as money, that I shall not have the profit of its remonetization? I should like to know what right the Government has to say, "I will take it from you, or I will not allow it to be remonetized unless you will give up the profit to accrue from its remonetization—the profit which is to accrue, because of your industry in going out upon the frontier and digging it out of the earth where the Almighty had hid it away?" Shall this Government say it will not remonetize silver until those who hold silver bullion shall give up the profit which may accrue to them? Everybody knows you cannot remonetize silver without some one making something by it.

Some men may make large fortunes by it. I grant that, but who lost the difference between the price of silver now and the value of silver when it was demonetized? Then it was worth 3 per cent. more than gold and now it is only worth eighty-four cents as bullion. That depreciation in the price of silver was brought about, as the English financier, Ernest Seyd, has told us, solely by demonetization. The world lost by demonetization, let me say regretfully, far more than speculators will make by remonetization. Had the United States coined silver to the full capacity of the mints since 1873 we would now have $400,000,000 of silver in circulation and our people would be prosperous. Beside, sir, it comes with very bad grace from men who speculated upon our blood and suffering during our internecine strife, who speculated upon that war until they have become purse-proud and void of love or respect for the poor, as has been shown upon this floor by members of Congress—it comes, I say, with bad grace from those who have speculated upon the misfortunes of the people and who are now speculating upon the misfortunes of the people, to say that if we give back to the country its stolen silver somebody will make something by it. It is the expedient of men who are conscious of being in the wrong, of men who have been guilty wittingly or unwittingly of a great national crime. The people will profit by it, we will all profit by it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, resumption was another step in the great scheme which included the demonetization of silver. The resumption act was one of the trinity of infamies fastened upon the American people by that diabolical plot. What was the plea for that act? It was that we should pay our honest debts, that we should pay the debt created by the greenback. This was the plea of the republican party all over the country; that the Government ought to pay its honest debts. I wish to show right here and now the hypocrisy of that declaration. I say that the resumption act was not passed for the purpose of paying our honest debts, but for the purpose of increasing the bonded debt of the country.

You know, in the first place, there was the promise of a slight inflation, that the greenbacks should be withrawn down to $300,000,000 under the resumption act, and for every $80 of greenbacks withdrawn there should be an issue of $100 of bank-notes, so that there would be a little "elasticity" given to the currency, a slight inflation; and yet every one knows that under the operation of the two acts, of June 20, 1874, and the resumption act of January 14, 1875, the currency has been greatly decreased, both national-bank and legal-tender, so that to-day we have about $100,000,000 less than when the resumption act was passed.

But let me show that the design was not to pay our honest debts. Why did the Government sell its surplus gold coin? From July 1, 1867, to September 30, 1876, the Government sold $522,000,000. After having met all its coin obligations it sold in the markets of this country and in Europe $522,000,000. That was more than was necessary to pay off every dollar of our greenbacks in gold without issuing a bond. This is the record furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury himself, that this Government sold between the 1st of June, 1867, and the 30th of September, 1876, $522,000,000 in gold. The resumption act was passed January 14, 1875, and yet this record shows that after the passage of that act there was sold at public auction over $40,000,000 of gold, and then the Treasury immediately turned around, and under the resumption act, sold bonds to buy that gold back again. [Laughter and applause.]

In whose interest was that, pray tell me? Now, why did not the Government take that $522,000,000—and it accumulated as high as $77,000,000 in one year, in another, $76,000,000—why did not the Government take that coin and pay off the greenbacks? When you had both branches of Congress and the Executive, why did you not pass a law saying that the surplus coin in the Treasury should be used in the redemption of the greenbacks, if you were so anxious to pay your debts? That would have brought greenbacks to par with gold at once, and without expense to the people. But that would not have been in accord with your scheme.

But some gentlemen may say the gold was sold to defray the necessary expenses of the Government. The silver commission anticipating that objection have shown that statement not to be a true one, for during that period, after meeting the coin obligation and the currency obligations, the Government paid over $400,000,000 of debt which was not due. Every dollar of that gold could have been used to redeem the greenbacks and in bringing them to par.

But are we told there is objection to hoarding as the Government loses the interest? I wish to know how much the Government is losing to-day upon the gold in the sub-treasury of the United States, which nobody wants, notwithstanding resumption, and which has been lying idle there, a loss to civilization and to humanity? Borrowing money to hoard! What consummate folly, what a stupendous crime!

There was no honest design in that resumption act. The design was, not to pay the greenback debt unless the greenback could be funded into an interest-bearing bond. That was it. And hence the resumption scheme came in to authorize a new issue of bonds to pay off the greenbacks. That was the scheme. And I challenge any member here to examine these figures on page 459 of the report of the silver commission and show where the fallacy exists. It was no honest design to pay a debt, I repeat, but a design to increase the debt of this country and make it perpetual.

But in spite of the opposition to silver in this country remonetization has been partially accomplished. But it was remonetized not only over the vote of the monometalists here, but over the veto of the Executive himself. The tide of public sentiment in favor of silver rose so high that it swept through this House like a hurricane and through the sedate Senate of the United States. The measure went to the President and he vetoed it. But the tide kept on rising until Congress passed it by a two-thirds vote over the Executive veto; and then the people breathed more freely. They said, "This is a Government by the people after all; the syndicate and the Executive in its interest have not the power to defeat the people's will." And everybody supposed silver was to be paid out to the bondholders, because that was the point upon which the conflict turned. The Government had the right to pay off the public debt with silver beyond all question, and the people thought they had gained a victory. The Stanley Matthews resolutions, passed at the second session Forty-fifth Congress, expressly declared the right of the Government to pay the bonded debt in standard silver dollars. But the execution of the law went into the hands of an unfriendly Secretary of the Treasury, and a conspiracy was formed in New York with the clearing-house. [Laughter.] I hear some gentlemen laughing. He who laughs last laughs best. It was ordered that silver should not be received on deposit unless the depositors were willing to receive it back in kind. That was done after a certain distinguished gentleman who is now traveling abroad, and who is to be met on the other side of the continent with an escort, had written a letter from Smyrna, an old Bible town of Asia Minor. There was a letter written to Smyrna once, but it is a very different letter. It was one in the interest of the poor:

Unto the angel of the church in Smyrna write: * * * I know thy works, and tribulations, and poverty, (but thou art rich,) and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not.

[Laughter.]

This letter, written from Smyrna, was from General Grant, who was twice honored with the executive chair of this nation. It is dated February 22, 1878, and is addressed to Judge Long, of Saint Louis, and was first published in the Globe-Democrat, March 30, 1878. He says, speaking of the silver bill:

But if I were where I was one year ago and for the previous seven years, I would put a most unqualified veto upon the repudiation bill, called silver bill, if it should receive the vote of Congress. I fear it has passed, but hope, if so, all business men in the country will work to defeat its operation by refusing to make contracts except to be paid in gold coin.

I do not know what he meant by "an unqualified veto," unless he was going upon the principle that if you want to shoot a long way you must pull the trigger hard. [Laughter.]

Now, there has been great talk on this floor about "revolution;" and for my part I deplore such agitation to a degree that is almost akin to horror. It seems to be a privileged question here, however. It intrudes itself upon our consideration at every moment and at the most inopportune times. I deplore everything like revolution or the disturbance of tranquillity anywhere, in Congress or out of it. But I say here, as an ex-soldier who fought under General Grant's command, that to incite any portion of the American people to combine to defeat the operation of law, or to advise them to do so, carries with it all the moral guilt of revolution, and revolution of the worst kind. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GILLETTE. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and Mr. WEAVER's time was extended.

Mr. WEAVER. Talk about the extravagance of the people! The author of that letter is spending more money to-day in his trip around the world than most of our poor constituents who labor for their living will ever see or handle, and yet he advises the money kings of this country to combine to crush them. The New York clearing-house and other financial organizations took him at his word; and the Secretary of the Treasury, although an officer not even named in the Constitution, being a mere cabinet minister whose highest duty and pleasure should be to obey and enforce the laws, shook hands with Wall street and Lombard street, and struck hands with General Grant across the water and with the men of this country who have fixed incomes, and says he will not pay out silver. Let me show you what he says. Here is a letter written by this eminent cabinet officer addressed "To the Honest Money League at Chicago." [Laughter.] Honest money! The letter is dated the 30th January last. He says:

I have a clear conviction that the forced payment of the silver dollar to public creditors would tend to depreciate it and cause it at once to be sold in the market at less than par. * * * While it is the duty of the Government to coin different kinds of money, a public policy dictates it should be within the power of the citizen at his option to demand either form of lawful money.

Thus the Secretary stands up in his place not to obey the law, but to say, "I have a conviction that if I obey the law it will injure the value of silver!" This reminds me of an incident that happened when an effort was being made to launch one of our great steamers. A sub-engineer in charge of part of the work feared that there was some defect or fault in her construction which would prevent her from being safely launched. There was great confusion, when the chief officer came upon the scene saying, "Launch her! Launch her! I'll take the responsibility." [Applause.]

Now, the American people say to the Secretary of the Treasury through the law of the land, "You are our servant; you have no law-making power; we have told you to pay out the money and you must do it, and we will take the responsibility." Let me call particular attention to this remarkable language of the Secretary:

While it is the duty of the Government to coin different kinds of money a public policy dictates it should be within the power of the citizen at his option to demand either form of lawful money.

You will see that this places an absolute veto against silver in the hands of the public creditor. The law says that it shall be legal-tender money for the bond. The Secretary is bound by it, but he says the public creditor shall determine what he will take, and not the law. The President had a qualified veto of the bill and the veto failed. But the Secretary, like an autocrat, confers upon the public creditor more power than the President possessed. He gives him an absolute veto. If that is to be the law the bonds can never be paid. Again, he has coined under the law the minimum instead of the maximum amount.

I shall, if I am recognized for that purpose, at the proper time, offer the following amendment:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed and required to cause to be paid out without discrimination standard silver coin the same as gold coin in liquidation of coin obligations against the Government.

This amendment should be incorporated into this bill, and then I am in favor of passing it. And those who take the responsibility to defeat this measure, demanded by every consideration of public duty and justice, and by the almost universal public sentiment, will have to do so. The American people shall understand it.

The National Greenback party is not in favor of undue expansion of the currency. We believe in a trinity in finance—gold, silver, and legal-tender paper—all issued by the Government and not by banking corporations, and all full legal tender. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DE LA MATYR] introduced a petition here, but he disclaimed upon the floor that it was his bill or that he indorsed it; yet the most indecent allusions that a man would dare to make on this floor have been indulged toward him. He seems to be the center of their abuse and detraction.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Did the abuse come from this side of the House?

Mr. WEAVER. No, sir. [Loud cries of "Oh, no!" from the republican side of the House.] I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DE LA MATYR] will pay no attention to the abuse. The post of honor is the post of danger. You may fire off your blank cartridges from the guns of your syndicate. Fire! We are here, and the National Greenback party has come to stay, I notify you of that. [Applause.] The workmen may fall, but the work will go on. There is no doubt about that.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] pranced down the aisle the other day, and facing the little party in the center, poured out the vials of his wrath. His effort was full of impotent rage and utterly void of argument. I wondered if there was any stringency in the money market up in his district, if there had been any bankruptcies there? Then the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] yesterday delivered a very amusing speech, and I suppose he considers it a crusher; as a philippic it was a success; but it was as devoid of argument as the exhumed skull of a mound-builder. The gentleman styled himself a "capitalist and a robber." He was careful to say that he was a brother to any man who "owned" a bank, who "owned" a house, or who "owned" a railroad. But he expresses no sympathy for the vast army of the unemployed who "own" nothing but their labor. He claims no fellowship with them.

Gentlemen, if you want to discuss this question do it in a gentlemanly manner. Let us discuss the question calmly and logically. You cannot sneer this great movement out of existence. Ridicule has been your only argument thus far.

Over the wires this morning was flashed the news that the workingmen's party have carried California by ten thousand majority, [applause,] and although the workingmen's bill to enforce the eight-hour law was defeated in this House yesterday, let me tell you that your action will recoil upon you, and will come back with redoubled force. The eyes of the people are upon you, and you cannot escape. Remember that when the American Congress says that we will not enforce a law which was passed in the interest and at the behest of the workingmen of this country, but we will allow the heads of Departments to violate that law and then turn around and say that the workingman must obey the laws of the country, you are setting an example that may be dangerous. You are sowing dragons' teeth; you are sowing the wind and will reap the whirlwind. I hope the House will reconsider their action.

Joseph Cook in a lecture in Boston says that if the workingmen of this country demand legal-tender currency we will disfranchise them if it has to be done at the end of a bloody civil war.

I want to read a short extract from Scribner's Monthly of April last. This is from a man who claims to be a Christian, who has the control of one of the great periodicals of the country:

> We cannot do what the French government once did under similar circumstances, banish fifty thousand of them to colonial or penal servitude; and it is a great pity that we cannot. If we could gather the whole disgusting multitude, wash them, put new clothes upon them, and under military surveillance and direction set them quarrying stone or raising corn and cotton for ten years, we might save some of them to decency and respectability, and relieve the honest people of the country of their presence and their support. If we cannot do this, however, there are things that we can do. Every State in the Union can gather these men wherever found into work-houses where they can be restrained from scaring and preying upon the community and made to earn the bread they eat and the clothes they wear. It is necessary, of course, to throw away all sentimentality in connection with them. The tramp is a man who can be approached by no motive but pain—the pain of a thrashing or the pain of hunger. He hates work, he has no self-respect, and no shame, and by counting himself permanently out of the productive and self-supporting forces of society he counts himself out of his rights. He has no rights but those which society may see fit of its grace to bestow. He has no more rights than the sow that wallows in the gutter or the lost dogs that hover around the city squares. He is no more to be consulted in his wishes or his will in the settlement of the question of what is to be done with him, than the bullock in the corral. Legislation concerning this evil seems to have been initiated in various States; but at this writing we cannot learn that anything effective has been done. It would be well if the States could work in concert in this matter, but one great State like New York or Pennsylvania or Ohio has only to inaugurate a stringent measure to drive all the other States into measures that shall be its equivalent. The tramp whose freedom is imperiled in New York would fly to New Jersey or to New England, and New Jersey and New England will be obliged to protect themselves. So one powerful State can compel unanimity of action throughout the country. The Legislature of New York had a bill up a year ago which came to nothing, but something must be done somewhere very soon if we propose to have anything like safety and comfort in our homes, or to relieve ourselves of voluntary, vicious, and even malicious pauperism.

And that is not all. The other day my colleague from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] made a scholarly, able, well-tempered speech, one that was well received by the House and those holding his views throughout the country, a speech that was complimented everywhere. Now in the Evening Telegraph, a hard-money paper, published in that "loyal city" of Philadelphia, I find the following in a column notice of Mr. GILLETTE'S speech:

> If it were not for the cost of the powder and shot, his constituents had better take him out to an open lot and shoot him.

Then further, speaking of our Representatives, it says:

> If there is a way to crush them it should be used, and if there is no way one should be invented.

That is the way they meet the discussion of this question. If a man dare to raise his voice for the oppressed poor, this is the argument he meets. Well, is this your game? Beware! It makes the syndicate and subsidized press as mad to see a greenbacker in Congress as it does a bull to shake a red flag at him.

Mr. KELLEY. That is not the Telegraph which you hold in your hand?

Mr. WEAVER. No; but this is the leading republican paper of Iowa—the State Register—which quotes and approves the villainous article.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is not the Telegraph a republican paper?

Mr. FISHER. I can tell the gentleman that it is not.

Mr. WEAVER. I guess it is a republican paper.

Mr. SAPP. But here is a gentleman who has just said that it is not.

Mr. WEAVER. No matter whether it is or not; the Register is, and both are hard-money. You might take a magnifying-glass that magnifies ten thousand diameters and you could not tell the difference between a hard-money republican and a hard-money democrat. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASKELL. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WEAVER. What is it?

Mr. HASKELL. You say there is not a particle of difference between a hard-money democrat and a hard-money republican. I hope that is true. Now I want to ask the gentleman if there is any difference between a soft-money democrat and a greenbacker?

Mr. WEAVER. The same difference there is between a soft-money republican and a greenbacker. About the only difference is that the one is in one party organization and the other is in another if they are honest. Now, as to the infamous article from the Philadelphia Evening Telegraph and Iowa State Register, I want the historian to put these papers alongside the Okolona States, published in Mississippi. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] said that the people were extravagant and got in debt. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] said the same thing. The inference is that all this business depression is the result of the extravagance of the people.

That is not true; it is a mere afterthought. While the people had their currency, and before contraction set in, they were out of debt. It is not natural for people to go in debt if they have the money to pay, nor did they do so before contraction was inaugurated by McCulloch. The people of this country were then out of debt. When they failed to realize upon their investments, when they failed to obtain money, they substituted credit for money. But that was all done after contraction began, and I propose to prove that from high authority.

Mr. Secretary McCulloch, in his annual report to Congress in 1865, in which he was urging upon Congress the adoption of the contraction scheme, says:

> The people are now comparatively free from debt.

This he gives as a reason why it is safe to enter upon contraction, that contraction which has ruined and pauperized one-half of our people. Who can portray the experience and suffering of the American people since that fatal hour? Hoping that the people may arouse and take the Government once more into their own hands, and that our civilization may be made better through our great suffering, I will not trespass further upon the time of the House.

Mr. HEILMAN. Mr. Speaker, it was my sincere desire that the cause for this debate should not have occurred during this extra session. By far the best that we can do for the good of the country at the present time and under existing circumstances is to do nothing but pass the appropriation bills and go home. This extra session itself was a disagreeable and harmful necessity brought about by the fault of the democratic party in the last Congress. The interests of the country demanded the passage of the appropriation bills, but I must earnestly protest against any legislation such as we are now debating upon. I do not claim to be an orator; my whole life almost has been devoted to business, and, partly because I am a business man, I believe myself to have been honored by being sent here by the people of the first district of Indiana, a district which for many years without interruption has been largely democratic. The people feel, I think, that "the world is governed too much," and that the manufacturing of bills by the thousand, the bepapering of the country with acts and laws and resolutions and bills and amendments might just as well stop for a little while. [Laughter and applause.]

This law-making by wholesale is, however, no wonder when we consider that about five-sixths of the members of Congress are always lawyers who seem to delight in making laws, as many people do in making money: the more the better. Now and then a doctor, or a minister who considers himself as good a doctor as any other man for the treatment of the complaints of the people, is elected to Congress, and proposes a cure by a thousand million pills—I mean a thousand million bills. [Laughter.]

I am strongly in favor of practical, well-considered legislation to benefit the manufacturing and agricultural interests, to increase our commerce and our wealth but by all means let us also have some stability, especially in our financial legislation. The condition of the country is at last surely getting better, although it may be slowly; and what commerce and the finances want just now more than anything else is to be let alone.

Believing as I do, that the deplorable condition in which our commerce and our industries were until lately was a result of the rebellion and of the inflation which naturally followed, and that the reaction which commenced in 1873 was the inevitable consequence of the preceding period of reckless expenditures, I still cannot but recognize the fact that the time during which this prostration has lasted was greatly prolonged by the unnecessary agitation in Congress of questions tending to disturb public confidence, to threaten the stability of our financial system, and to paralyze our commercial and manufacturing interests. The republican party, under the splendid leadership of our present Secretary of the Treasury and others, and fighting and defeating step by step the democratic-greenback combination, has at last brought us back to the resumption of specie payments. There we stand once more on firm ground. Let us stay there and not plunge back into the whirlpool of inflation and wild speculation.

I repeat, I do not mean to say that I am not heartily in favor of the adoption of such measures as will give the greatest facilities in developing the immense resources of our country in agriculture as well as in regard to mining and manufacturing, and which will render reasonable and legitimate aid to useful and necessary public improvements. In fact, it was the narrow-minded and niggardly policy pursued by the democratic party in Congress that was to a large extent responsible for the depression of labor and for the hard times. Had they gone ahead with public improvements, as it was their duty to do, it would in a great measure have furnished relief for the laboring classes. This was done under similar circumstances and with the most beneficial results by Colbert, the great secretary of Louis XIV, of France; by Frederick the Great, of Prussia; and by Napoleon III, the late emperor of the French, under whom, whatever else there may be said against him, France, in regard to material prosperity, stood higher than at any other time.

It is possible that we might do some good by some new legislation in this direction, but I believe that we will do more good by waiting for this until next winter. It is certain, at least, that we shall keep business in a feverish excitement by staying here longer than necessary to pass the appropriation bills.

I desire to say a few words more in regard to inflation. Whatever may be advisable to do after due and deliberate consideration in order to give remunerative employment to a number of people and to assist the commercial and manufacturing interests, and thereby all interests of the country, it will cost money. This money-spending may be made to lead to good results, but it must be done without taking away again our specie foundation. We had inflation enough during and immediately after the war. We were then heavily discounting the future, giving out notes and bonds and certificates and contracts by the armful. The year 1873 came, as it had to come, like a bank-collector, demanding of us to pay up. Then we found that we did not feel as well as appearances and our feverish excitement had led us to believe, and got sick after our spree. [Laughter.] We are getting better now, and will soon be well again if only the inflation doctors will let us alone.

Paper money, a good thing in the pocket of an individual, is not a part of the wealth of a nation. If it were, the easy road to fortune would be plain enough. Wealth is the result of labor, and is shown by acres blooming with crops, cities busy with work and thrift, commerce and manufacturing, rivers, lakes, and seas studded with ships. Money is only the tool with which we measure and exchange wealth, but is not wealth itself. For a certain number of people and a certain amount of trade a sufficient supply of these tools, that is of the different kind of things which represent money, must be given. But the storekeeper may as well expect to double the value of the stock in his store by doubling the number of his yardsticks as the greenbackers have a chance to make us richer by one thousand million pills.

Especially the workingman, the poor man will suffer by inflation. One dollar will now buy at least as much as $2 ten years ago. But if you double our currency the consequence will be that prices will rise much higher and faster than wages.

In regard to the expediency of making a silver dollar equal in all respects to a gold dollar, it seems to me that there is no good reason why it should not be done, provided we put silver enough in the dollar. The best, I repeat, however, that we can do for the material interests of the country now is to pass the appropriation bills and go home.

Mr. Speaker, I presume my speech will be interpreted as that of a "bloated bondholder and capitalist." Far from it. I own no bonds. I am simply a manufacturer, and speak in the interest of labor. I came to this country when nineteen years old without a dollar. I worked hard and saved myself $500. With that amount I commenced an iron foundery and machine-shop. My "power" consisted in a blind horse. [Laughter.] It is labor rightly applied, as my friend from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] said, that is capital in this country. I have only one word further to say, and that is, honesty is the best policy, and no man or nation will prosper by being dishonest. This bill is a cheat, and nothing else. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KELLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest that the gentleman give way for a motion to adjourn. I think we would prefer to hear the honorable gentleman to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. KELLEY. I yield for that purpose.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. EATON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 580) relating to telegraphic communication between the United States and foreign countries; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three additional assistants in the Library of Congress.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business what is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. BECK. I propose that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will consider the morning hour at an end, if no objection be made, and the unfinished business is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, being the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes. If there is no objection the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill, and the Secretary will commence the reading of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not make any objection to that course, only I should like to have it understood at the same time that if there be any amendment as we go along, in some part of the bill, that any Senator would like to have go over until the bill is gone through with, it may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly; and it will also be understood that Senators can go back to a portion of the bill which has been passed over in the reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, of course.

Mr. BECK. What is the suggestion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I said was that I should like to have it understood, in considering the amendments as we go along, that if there should be an amendment any Senator would like to have wait until the bill is gone through, it may be deferred.

Mr. BECK. That meets the views of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that there are any such amendments.

Mr. WITHERS. We first act on the amendments reported by the committee, and then any Senator can offer amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; but I am speaking of the committee's amendments. Possibly one might come up that needed a little further time to think about, and therefore I did not wish to have the consent to consider them as we go along as absolutely final; that is all.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to have one point understood. I understand the Chair to state that as the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations are reached they will be acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless some Senator should desire an amendment to be passed over for further consideration.

Mr. MAXEY. Suppose an amendment at some particular point is proposed by direction of another committee, will it be appropriate to have such an amendment taken up and acted upon after the amendments of the Appropriations Committee have been acted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been usual first to act on the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations. When they are through the whole bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. That is not the point I am trying to get at. When one subject is taken up and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations on that subject are disposed of, is that the proper time for an amendment offered by another committee to come in?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it were an amendment to the amendment of the committee, that would be the proper time for it.

Mr. MAXEY. An amendment to the amendment of the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the amendment modified the amendment of the committee, it would be in order at that time.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say one word, and perhaps it will save time. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate ascertained by an examination of the House bill that it was substantially the bill of last session as agreed to in committee of conference as far as it was agreed to. There was no formal agreement in the conference, but this bill conforms substantially to what was done then, with one or two exceptions. The House returned to the provisions of the original bill as to the Senate employés and restored those provisions to what it had formerly insisted upon. There are one or two exceptions, however, to which I will call attention; but the bill is substantially what both Houses agreed to last session, with the exception, as I said, of the Senate retaining its employés as they stood before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the reading proceeds, may I ask the Senator from Kentucky, for I have not looked at it myself, whether what is called the political legislation in this bill is substantially the same as in that of the last session, or does it differ in some material respect of enlargement or diminution?

Mr. BECK. I did not compare the two bills in regard to that point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. BECK. I thought that would create a great deal of discussion, and I examined the mere business parts of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is of no particular consequence just now. I did not know but the Senator might be able to inform me in a moment, as I have not looked at it.

Mr. BECK. I am not really prepared to answer the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 16, of section 1, to increase the appropriation "for compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary in the service of the Senate from $144,400 to $187,422."

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the question, I understand, which has been a matter of controversy between the two Houses, in relation to the pay of the employés?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to answer the Senator.

Mr. BECK. While there was no formal agreement about this matter at the last session, I think but for the political part of the bill it would have been agreed on. The Senate claimed the right to retain its present force at its present rates of pay, allowing the House the same privilege as to its employés. The House has added largely to its own force, in one case increasing its force from twenty-one clerks to twenty-five clerks, and in one or two other instances. We believed that we could not now go into a revision of the whole matter on this bill; and as a committee has been instructed to rearrange and readjust the question of the payment of the employés of the Senate, and as the House, I understand, is trying to do the same thing, we thought for the time being that it would be better to let the matter remain just as it was, without attempting to do anything until that committee had made its report as to what ought to be done. We were unable to obtain the information necessary to act upon the matter satisfactorily at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order to facilitate the business the Chair will state that he will make inquiry in regard to the amendments relating to Senate employés, which are very numerous, as they are reached, to know if there is any objection to the particular amendment. If there is no objection, each will be considered as concurred in. If there is any objection, then the question will be put. Is there any objection to this amendment?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I suppose the compensation of employés is a matter of controversy between the two Houses that ought in some way or other to be adjusted so as to relieve the Houses of that difficulty and of that trouble. The Senator from Kentucky speaks of the House of Representatives regulating the pay of its own employés and the number of its employés, and of the Senate doing the same as to its. Now, that really in legal parlance cannot be done. If we can convince the House that we need a certain number of employés at a certain compensation, then the House will accede to it. If the House can so convince the Senate, then the Senate ought to agree with the House. But the idea that each House can regulate the number and pay of its own employés without the concurrence of the other House, I think is utterly untenable. If we have a judgment upon that subject and the House agree with us, then our judgment ought to be carried out. The compensation allowed to the employés of the two Houses is according to law. A law to be passed must have the assent of both Houses of Congress; and when we have such a law it is exceedingly unfortunate that trouble should exist between the two Houses and that one should compensate its employés higher than the other.

I think it is the duty of the Senate, and I regret that the Committee on Appropriations did not see proper to take such a course upon the subject and so act with the members of the committee of the House as to harmonize the difficulties and compensate alike the employés of the two Houses.

As far as this amendment is concerned I shall vote against it, because I propose to do exactly by the employés of each House the same even-handed justice. Believing that the employés here do no more labor than the employés of the House perform, and believing that the employés here are entitled to no greater compensation for the same labor than the employés of the House are entitled to receive, as a member of this body I feel it my duty to so vote to regulate the subject as to do for them all the same even-handed justice.

Mr. BECK. All I desire to say is that the committee had not time to go into the matter of regulating the compensation of employés now. When the regular session meets it is to be hoped that the difficulty that exists between the Houses will be adjusted and arranged. For the time being we thought the course we pursued the only safe thing to do, with new officers at the head of the employés of the Senate, with no absolute information as to whether the rule we followed is right or whether it is wrong, and the subject being now carefully considered by a committee of this body, and for the present we did not deem that this was the proper time to go into the matter.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the proposition of which the Senator from Kentucky speaks one looking to the raising of a joint committee between the two bodies or has this Senate organized a committee for its own purpose without reference to any action of the other House? If the latter branch is the correct statement of it, then, as a matter of course, that same want of harmony will exist in the compensation of the officers between the two branches of Congress. If this subject was really before a joint committee of the two Houses with a view to meet these troubles and to obviate them for the future, then I would acquiesce; but I do not understand it that way. My understanding is that the Senate is prepared to refer it to a committee of its own without reference to any joint action with a committee of the House and without having in view the great point I have in my mind, namely, harmony between the two branches of Congress in relation to this matter.

Now, sir, in my judgment the Senate has no more right to establish the pay of its own officers than it has to establish the compensation of the officers of the House. The same claim of power that would enable the Senate to say what its employés should receive, would result in giving to the Senate the power to say what the employés of the House should receive. We must act on such a subject by a law, and it being a law the two Houses ought to act together and ought to agree upon something just to the employés of both, and thereby these difficulties in the future will be obviated. There being simply one committee now looking into the matter I do not think that meets the difficulty, and I therefore shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that the harmony which he so much desires to see established in the amount of compensation of the employés at the two wings of the Capitol will not be attained by passing the bill as it came from the House and voting down the amendments of the Senate Committee of Appropriations, because the rates of compensation fixed by the House bill are not identical in every case according to the services rendered, the bill in some cases paying more and in other cases less to the employés of the Senate than the corresponding officer of the House receives.

Mr. HOUSTON. In how many cases?

Mr. WITHERS. In several cases. In other cases the bill makes annual clerks of certain committee clerks of the House, and the Senate clerks of the same committees, who by the law are annual clerks, are degraded to session clerks. Therefore that harmony and unity which the Senator desires to see established cannot be attained by voting down the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, we have had this controversy every year upon this bill, and it has always been decided, as I think it will be decided now, to allow each House to judge of the number and compensation of its own employés without the practical supervision of the other. That is the way that will best conduce to courtesy, and to decorum, and to the orderly transaction of business. I understand, the Senator from Kentucky will inform me if I am wrong, that the bill as it comes from the House puts the compensation of certain Senate employés below the compensation of the corresponding officers of the House.

Mr. BECK. I cannot name each instance, but take for example, in the bill as passed by the House the following items: Chief engineer of the Senate, $1,400; chief engineer of the House, $1,700. As passed by the House, the bill gives $300 more to their engineer than to ours; and there may be other cases of the kind.

Mr. WITHERS. There are several other instances.

Mr. BECK. There are several other instances of the same sort All we desire to do is to retain the salaries for the time being, just as they are now provided by law or by previous appropriation acts. We have a committee of our own who are now looking into the whole subject, the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and when the regular session comes we expect to look into the matter with more care, and see whether we are right or wrong.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the amendments of the committee will be adopted.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the recollection of Senators to one fact. I think in the Congress before the last—I am not quite sure of the date of the transaction, but I am absolutely sure of the transaction—the Senate undertook to make some amendment in its appropriation act which the House claimed was the assertion of an authority by the Senate to deal with the number and compensation of the House employés. The two branches differed, and the House very earnestly insisted that it was a matter which must be referred to its own control, and insisted on a conference between the two branches, and the Senate yielded to that view.

Mr. HOUSTON. The fact that the House may have insisted upon a wrong principle would not influence me in my judgment. If these discrepancies are now in the bill as presented by the House it would have been much more easy for the Committee on Appropriations here to have taken up the whole subject and reconciled the differences and reported the bill so amended as to have made them all, as I think they should be, compensated properly but compensated alike. There is one instance that I just happen to think of. It must be very evident to every Senator who will think upon the subject at all that the clerks of certain committees have different labor. The clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the House has perhaps ten times as much work to do as the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, because he makes up and frames and prepares the bills for the action of the two Houses. Perhaps I state the disproportion too largely, but certainly there is a great difference. While I do not care to interfere with the compensation allowed to the employés of either House, yet I do not agree to the doctrine as presented by the Senator from Rhode Island. I do not acknowledge that the House has the right to increase the number of its employés beyond what is my judgment, without my vote against it, any more than I think we should have the right to increase our own number of employés without the concurrence of the House. My duty, my power, and my obligation under my oath are the same in regard to the House employés as they are in regard to the Senate employés.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment being objected to the Chair will put the question. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 19, after the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "eight hundred and ninety-six;" so as to read:

For Secretary of the Senate, including compensation as disbursing officer, $4,896.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not care to say anything more, but to all these amendments that relate to this subject I have the same objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Alabama to object and require the vote to be put?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not care whether the vote is put or not; but if it is put I shall vote against the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 22, to strike out "six" before "hundred" and insert "twelve;" so as to read:

And for hire of horses and wagons for the Secretary's office, $1,200.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not care about consuming time by taking the vote on every amendment. I remarked to the Chair that I did not care about the vote being put, but I wanted it understood that I applied my objection to all these amendments alike.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 22, after "Chief Clerk," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand;" in line 24, to strike out "and" before "minute;" in the same line, after "journal clerk," to insert "financial clerk, and enrolling clerk, at;" in line 25, after "hundred," to insert "and ninety-two;" in line 26, after "each," to strike out "financial clerk and three clerks, at $2,250 each;" in line 28, before "clerks," to strike out "five" and insert "six;" in line 29, after "thousand," to insert "two hundred and twenty;" and in line 30, after "each," to strike out "one clerk at $1,800" and insert "five clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, at $2,100 each;" so as to read:

Chief Clerk, $3,000; principal clerk, principal executive clerk, minute and journal clerk, financial clerk, and enrolling clerk, at $2,592 each; librarian and six clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, at $2,220 each; five clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, at $2,100 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 33, after "stationery," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,102.40;" in line 36, after "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "eight;" in line 37, after "hundred," to insert "and ninety-six;" in line 38, after "Senate," to strike out "six hundred" and insert "seven hundred and twenty;" and in line 40, after "hundred," to insert "and ninety-six;" so as to make the clause read:

For keeper of the stationery, $2,102.40; assistant keeper of stationery, $1,800; one messenger, $1,296; four laborers in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $720 each; for one special policeman, $1,296.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 42, to increase the appropriation "for the salary of the secretary to the Vice-President" from $1,800 to $2,102.40.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 52, to increase the appropriation "for salary of clerk of printing records" from $2,000 to $2,220.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "Commerce," in line 55, to strike out "and;" in line 56, after "Judiciary," to insert "clerk to the Committee on Private Land Claims, clerk to the Committee on Pensions, and clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs;" and in line 59, after the word "thousand," to insert "two hundred and twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

For clerk to the Committee on Finance, clerk to the Committee on Claims, clerk to the Committee on Commerce, clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary, clerk to the Committee on Private Land Claims, clerk to the Committee on Pensions, and clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs, at $2,220 each.

Mr. BECK. I said I would call attention to anything that was new in the bill. We have added an annual clerk for the Committee on Military Affairs, not there before. Upon the statement of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] at the last Congress, and of the chairman of the committee now, we thought it was necessary.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I doubt the propriety of adding to the number of annual committee clerkships of the Senate. This makes the clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs an annual clerk. We have now as many annual clerks as they have in the House, which is a much larger body, and I doubt whether we ought to increase the expenses of the Senate by making annual clerkships to committees unless there is an absolute necessity.

I think the clerk of the Committee on Private Land Claims has not been an annual clerk heretofore. This includes him and the clerk of the Committee on Pensions. In my opinion the number of annual clerkships is more than we ought to have. We ought to cut them down rather than increase them. I have no doubt that a saving of $50,000 might be made in the expenses of the Senate, and I do not believe it is good policy or good economy to multiply the number of annual clerkships in this body, but on the contrary I believe we ought to address ourselves to a curtailment of the expenses of the Senate rather than be adding to them.

Mr. BECK. At the last session the Senate made this provision so far as it was concerned, on the motion of the Senator from Texas, on a statement which convinced the Senate. The Committee on Appropriations, therefore, have conceded that there ought to be a permanent clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs. The other day the present chairman of the committee, the Senator from New Jersey, addressed the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who is now necessarily absent, the following short note:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, April 30, 1879.

MY DEAR SIR: For reasons I have assigned, I request that the clerk of the Military Committee be made a permanent one.

It is impossible for me to get and keep a competent clerk except he obtain the salary of the year.

I have to keep an extra man at my own cost, as matters now stand. The committee has, as the files will show, over four hundred bills and promotions now before it, and the correspondence and examination coming from these military cases keep one man employed.

The business coming to the Military Committee of the Senate is much larger than that to the House Military Committee, and the business of the two cannot be well compared therefore.

Very truly yours,

THEO. F. RANDOLPH, Chairman.

In addition to that, the present chairman of the committee told us that the number of appointments, the number of promotions, the number of recommendations to be examined personally outside of the regular committee-room was so great that the amount of money he was paying out of his own pocket in order to get help was something that no Senator ought to be required to do. The business of the committee made it to our minds absolutely necessary that an annual clerk should be allowed.

Mr. MAXEY. On two occasions before, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I have made the proposition to the Senate that that committee ought to have a permanent clerk, and for the reason that my experience in that committee has taught me that a clerk to that committee should be an expert. An ordinary clerk, however good he may be, is not the kind of clerk necessary for that committee. It needs one that is conversant with the machinery of military affairs; one who, when a case comes before that committee, knows at once what bureau or what branch of the military service to apply to in order to get the necessary information. To secure the necessary talent and the necessary information in a clerk for that committee, I have believed and do believe that that clerk should be a permanent clerk. The Senate took that view of the case, and by an overwhelming majority at the last session voted that committee a permanent clerk.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There are other committees here whose labors are equally as onerous as those of the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, of which my friend, the Senator from Texas, is chairman, is one. I am a member of that committee, and I know there is a great deal of business coming before that committee. Fully as many communications are sent to that committee as are sent to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I have no doubt that the business of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is fully as heavy to-day as that of the Committee on Military Affairs or any other committee. Perhaps the Judiciary Committee may be different; that may be an exception. But if we are to add to the annual clerkships of this body we shall soon have an increase of expense. I think we ought to have some regard to economy in running the Senate.

For these reasons, not that I have anything against these clerks, because I do not know now who is clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Pensions, or the Committee on Private Land Claims, they may all be efficient men—my purpose is simply to see that the expenses of the Senate are not unduly increased. I should vote for an annual clerkship to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, because in my judgment the duties of the committee are fully as onerous as those imposed upon any of the committees that has an annual clerkship.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. By direction of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads I move to amend the clause just adopted as follows——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HEREFORD in the chair.) The Chair would suggest that the Senator allow the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations to be gone through with first.

Mr. BECK. I hope the amendments of the committee will be passed on first.

Mr. MAXEY. Very well; but I give notice now that when we go through the reading of the bill, I shall call attention to this clause and ask that it be amended further.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "thousand," in line 61, to insert "three hundred and twenty;" in line 62, after the word "dollars," to insert, "clerk to the Sergeant-at-Arms, $2,000;" in line 64, after "thousand," to insert "five hundred and ninety-two;" in line 65, after "Doorkeeper," strike out "one thousand eight hundred," and insert "two thousand five hundred and ninety-two;" and in line 67, after the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

For Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, $4,320; clerk to the Sergeant-at-Arms, $2,000; assistant doorkeeper, $2,592; acting assistant doorkeeper, $2,592; three messengers, acting as assistant doorkeepers, $1,800 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 71, to increase the appropriation "for salary of assistant postmaster and mail-carrier" to the Senate from $2,000 to $2,088.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 74, to increase the appropriation "for salary of superintendent of document-room" from $2,000 to $2,160.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 77, to increase the appropriation "for salary of superintendent of the folding-room" from $2,000 to $2,160.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 79, to increase the appropriation "for salary of twenty messengers" from $1,000 each to $1,440 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 82, to insert:

For messenger to the Vice-President's room, to be appointed by the Vice-President, $1,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 86, after the word "engineer," to strike out "one thousand four hundred" and insert "two thousand one hundred and sixty;" in line 87, before "assistant engineers," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" in line 88, after the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred" and insert "four hundred and forty;" in line 90, after the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred" and insert "four hundred and forty;" in line 91, after the word "thousand," to insert "two hundred;" in line 92, before the word "firemen," to strike out "three" and insert "two;" in the same line, after the word "at," to strike out "nine hundred" and insert "one thousand and ninety-five;" and in line 94, after the word "at," to strike out "six hundred and sixty" and insert "seven hundred and twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

For chief engineer, $2,160; three assistant engineers, at $1,440 each; assistant engineer in charge of the elevator, $1,440; conductor of elevator, $1,200; two firemen, at $1,095 each; three laborers in the engineer's department, at $720 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 96, after the word "at," to strike out "eight hundred and forty" and insert "one thousand;" in line 97, after the word "at," to strike out "six hundred and sixty" and insert "seven hundred and twenty;" in line 99, before the word "laborers," to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve;" in line 101, after the word "passage," to strike out "six hundred and sixty" and insert "eight hundred and forty;" in line 102, after the word "dollars," to strike out "Kate Dodson" and insert "female attendant;" in line 103, after the word "retiring-room," to strike out "six hundred" and insert "seven hundred and twenty;" and after the words "telegraph operator," in line 104, to strike out "during the session, $800," and insert "$1,200 per annum;" so as to make the clause read:

For eight skilled laborers, at $1,000 each; ten laborers, at $720 each; twelve laborers, during the session, at the rate of $720 each per annum; one laborer in charge of private passage, $840; female attendant in charge of the ladies' retiring-room, $720; telegraph operator, $1,200 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "for contingent expenses of the Senate," in line 110, after the word "and," to strike out "two" and insert "one;" in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "each;" and in line 111, after the word "Secretary," to insert "and Postmaster;" so as to make the clause read:

For stationery and newspapers, (including $5,000 for stationery for committees and officers of the Senate and $100 each for postage-stamps for the Secretary and Postmaster of the Senate,) $14,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 113, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-seven" and insert "twenty-six;" and in line 114, after the word "session," to strike out "thirty-four thousand three hundred and forty-four" and insert "thirty-three thousand and seventy-two;" so as to make the clause read:

For twenty-six clerks to committees, at $6 per day during the session, $33,072.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 118, after the word "riding-pages," to strike out "one page for the Vice-President's room;" and in line 121, after the word "thousand," to strike out "eight hundred and thirty-five" and insert "two hundred and sixty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For fourteen pages for the Senate Chamber, three riding-pages, and one page for the office of the Secretary of the Senate, at the rate of $2.50 per day each while actually employed, $10,265.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 126, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "two dollars and fifty cents" and insert "$3;" and after the word "employed," in line 127, to strike out "three thousand five hundred and four" and insert "four thousand;" so as to read:

For four folders, at not exceeding $3 per day while actually employed, $4,000: Provided, however, That any portion of said sum may be used, at the discretion of the superintendent, for piece-work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 139, after the word "apparatus," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" in line 141, after the word "packing-boxes," to strike out "six hundred" and insert "seven hundred and sixty;" and in line 144, after the word "all," to strike out "forty-five thousand one hundred" and insert "forty-six thousand two hundred and sixty;" so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 171, to increase the appropriation for compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary, in the service of the House of Representatives, from $197,015.20 to $197,915.20.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line 379.

Mr. BECK. The committee will desire to go back to page 15, line 354, to make an appropriation for the three assistants to the Librarian authorized by the bill passed yesterday without an appropriation. It will be necessary to make an amendment there so as to provide for the pay of the officers provided for under the bill which passed both Houses yesterday. I now desire to give that notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line 396.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to call attention to an amendment I have submitted to be proposed to line 396. I move to strike out the word "executive" in that line and insert after the word "clerks" the words "of the General Land Office;" so as to read:

And the duties prescribed by section 450 of the Revised Statutes shall devolve upon and be discharged by one of the clerks of the General Land Office, to be designated by the President for that purpose.

I am not certain whether the Committee on Appropriations have a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office recommending it or not, but I know such a letter has been prepared and is in transitu. This work of signing land patents—that is the duty referred to by section 450 of the Revised Statutes—is wholly a formal duty. The name of the President is attached by a clerk. Under the rule established by this bill the patents will be required to go from the General Land Office to the President and back again, necessitating a letter of transmissal. Inasmuch as the President exercises no discretionary power at all, and since he merely causes his name to be signed, or in fact the clerk signs, without consulting the President, every patent sent him from the General Land Office, it is deemed desirable and advisable as a matter of economy not only of money but of time that some clerk in the General Land Office be designated by the President to perform this act for him, and shall be the person to do this service, and not an executive clerk in the mansion of the President.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Kansas will allow that matter to be passed by for the present. We copied the existing law in this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand the desire is to change that in order that all these matters may be transacted in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office under one roof and save the necessary letters of transmissal and the time now occupied in sending them.

Mr. BECK We had some communication on that subject last year. We have had none at this session, so the clerk of the committee informs me, but we shall look at it carefully.

Mr. PLUMB. With the understanding that we can go back to this matter before the bill is finally passed, I do not urge the amendment now.

Mr. BECK. Certainly; that can be understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will proceed.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the clause making appropriations for the Bureau of Statistics, in line 677, to increase the sum for the "compensation of the officer in charge of the Bureau of Statistics" from $2,400 to $3,600; and in line 684 to increase the total of the appropriations for the bureau from $40,760 to $41,960.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that that is an increase of the present salary, but we make this officer correspond to the Auditors who get $3,600; and this was agreed to in conference at the last session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 829.

Mr. BECK. We have now proceeded through the provisions in relation to the Senate and House of Representatives, the Executive Department proper, the State Department, and the Treasury Department in all its branches. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] is obliged to be absent and has remained for several days at personal inconvenience to himself. He desires now as I am advised to be heard upon a portion of the bill that has not yet been reached, and as he wishes to go away the committee in charge of the bill will give way to him now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill to be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and referred to the committee.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to my friend, the Senator from Kentucky, and the Committee on Appropriations for yielding to me at this time. I would not speak to-day at all but for the fact that I am compelled to leave the city and perhaps, possibly at least, not to return until this bill is disposed of. There are some observations which I desire to submit; and as this is the only opportunity to do so, I will avail myself of the kindness of the committee in suspending the reading of this bill to proceed now with what I have to say.

Mr. President, it is known to the Senate and the country that the discussion of the questions involved in this and the kindred bill began in the last days of the Forty-fifth Congress. The result of the discussion then necessitated the calling of an extra session of Congress, and since the assembling of this session the discussion has been almost continuous in the two Houses of Congress. I have taken no part in it hitherto, because in my judgment there was nothing in the legislation pending that justified discussion, nothing in the substance or form of the legislation which in my judgment could even excuse the elaborate discussion which has been had; and I suppose if we were to apply the test, nine-tenths of the arguments which have been made and placed upon the record have no application whatever to the immediate subjects involved in either of the bills.

I have watched the discussion with very intense, I might say with anxious, interest for the purpose of discovering if I could the true reason, the active inspiring motive of this discussion. Why has it been thrust upon the country? The legislation proposed is simply nothing more nor less than the repeal of a very small portion of legislation which was enacted during and since the war, legislation which had no place upon our statute-book for the first seventy-five years of our history; and why has such an earnest, such a heated, I had almost said such an ill-tempered, discussion been thrust upon the country on the occasion of repealing a few statutes of the kind alluded to?

I have no desire to do any one injustice. I have watched this discussion solely for the purpose of arriving, if I could, at the real motive which lies at the bottom of it. I am thoroughly satisfied that the motive is very plain and unmistakable. A great party in this country have entered upon a well-considered, or I ought to say ill-considered, but determined purpose of reopening the sectional agitations which have so long divided this country for the purpose of consolidating one section of the country against the other, solely for the benefit of that particular party, and without reference to the good, as I think, of the country.

Now, sir, what is the result? The country now beholds the extraordinary spectacle of an extra session of Congress, of weeks and months of agitated discussion, the whole purpose of which discussion, at least on one side of this House, seems to be to convince one section of the country that the people of the other are not to be trusted in their fidelity and patriotism to the country. Suppose they succeed in establishing that proposition; if it be true they have established a proposition which demonstrates that the Government is on the eve of failure; if it be false, why should they seek to impress upon the country a condition of things affecting the integrity of the Union itself which is not true?

I am not going to go through the many arguments and speeches that have been made on this floor which seem to be inspired by nothing on earth but hatred to one section of this country and the people thereof. I cannot afford to do that. Speech after speech has been made which could have no other purpose, which has no other meaning. Do Senators expect to benefit the country by such a course of proceeding? Do they think they promote the good of this country, of any section of it, when they labor so industriously to prove to one portion of the people that another portion is not to be trusted? Are they not citizens of the same Government?

Now, as an illustration of what I say, pardon me if I select the two most distinguished gentlemen of the republican party, gentlemen who above all others have distinguished themselves for their ability in the discussion of this question, who I suppose from their position and character in every respect command perhaps more than any others the confidence of the party to which they belong. The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] in the very effective speech which he made on the 24th of April reminded us that "one of Rome's famous legends stands in these words: 'Let what each man thinks of the Republic be written on his brow'" and the Senator wrote on the forefront of his speech delivered on that important occasion a most remarkable declaration which he must excuse me for saying illustrates the animus of the speech. He commences in this way:

During the last fiscal year the amount of national taxes paid into the Treasury was $234,831,461.77. Of this sum one hundred and thirty million and a fraction was collected under tariff laws as duties on imported merchandise, and one hundred and four million and a fraction as tax on American productions. Of this total of $235,000,000 in round numbers, twenty-seven States which adhered to the Union during the recent war paid $221,204,268.88. The residue came from eleven States. I will read their names: Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia. These eleven States paid $13,627,192.89. Of this sum more than six million and a half came from the tobacco of Virginia. Deducting the amount of the tobacco tax in Virginia, the eleven States enumerated paid $7,125,462.60 of the revenues and supplies of the Republic.

What does the Senator here say, what does he write upon the forefront of his magnificent oration? It is that all the customs revenues of the country are paid by the State at whose port the revenue is collected. If his argument be true, New York pays over $90,000,000 of the customs revenue, because the port of New York is a great port for the whole country, and he credits the twenty-seven States with the payment of all the customs revenues collected in that port and Boston and other northern ports. He should credit it to the city of New York. It is all paid at the city of New York. The Senator might have enlarged his argument; he might have selected from the Western States a group of eleven States that pay perhaps less customs revenue than the eleven Southern States. I doubt whether the great State of my friend from Ohio pays much on the Senator's method of computation. Certainly those great interior States that have no ports, according to him, pay none of the customs revenue. How much would Ohio pay under that rule? How much would Indiana pay; how much would Minnesota pay? The Senator might have gone further. If New York is to be credited with all the revenues that are collected upon importations at New York, New York ought also to be credited with all the products that are exported from the port of New York, and the distinguished Senator by figures could have proven that New York was the largest cotton-growing State in the world.

Why should so distinguished a Senator, so able a Senator, find it necessary to commence his speech with an argument of that kind? What had it to do with the question? The question pending in the bill which he discussed was whether it was wise and proper to use the Army to keep the peace at the polls, and the Senator commences his argument upon that question by giving a statement of the revenues collected for the support of the Government, and puts the statement in such form as to show that all the revenues are paid by twenty-seven States, of which New York pays half. What had it to do with the question? Nothing. Then, if the Senator found it necessary to make such a statement, why did he hazard his reputation in such a manner as to make a statement the incorrectness of which could not fail to be seen by any one who understood the facts of the case? And then he put it in the strong form of figures, and he had the benefit of the old aphorism that figures will not lie. The Senator's phraseology is very curious too. I say nothing of his refusal to permit a correction to be incorporated in his speech, which I attempted. He goes on; he says:

The laws exacting these few millions from eleven States, and these hundreds of millions from twenty-seven States, originated, as the Constitution requires all bills for raising revenue to originate, in the House of Representatives.

Where is the law that exacts these few millions from eleven States, these hundreds of millions from twenty-seven States? Is there such a law known? Is there any revenue law of this country which is not uniform? Is there any law of this country which could justify that distinguished Senator in saying that eleven States pay so few millions of revenue and twenty-seven States pay so many hundred millions of revenue, and, to use his emphatic words, that this revenue in this disproportion is exacted by the laws of the country? I do the Senator no injustice when I say that the purpose of the statement is indicated by the application which is made of it:

This vast revenue is raised and to be raised for three uses. It is supplied in time of severe depression and distress, to pay debt inflicted by rebellion—to pay pensions to widows, orphans, and cripples made by rebellion; and to maintain the Government and enforce the laws preserved at inestimable cost of life and treasure.

Why was it necessary to say that?—

Why should the Senator make a statement in figures that is not correct, and speak of the exactions of a law that does not exist in relation to revenue, and then seek to arouse, as doubtless his method of stating facts does arouse in so many minds at the North, a prejudice against these eleven States that have been so wicked as to make it necessary for such enormous taxes to be collected and who under the laws are required to pay so few of the taxes. Everybody knows that each section of the country pays according to its consumption of the importations into the United States. It is hardly necessary to say that the money collected by the Government at the port of New York is not paid by the city or people of New York, or by the State of New York, but is paid by the people of the country all over the country who buy and consume the goods imported. All the point I make on this is to ask the country what could have been the motive of so distinguished a Senator for making such a statement which had no relevancy to the subject under discussion, what could be the purpose except to use his great powers, aided by a singular computation of figures, to impress his section of the country with feelings of antipathy and dislike to the southern people?

But, sir, we had a more remarkable exhibition than that yesterday. I pass for the moment from the honorable Senator from New York to the distinguished Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] for if these great men say these things what shall we not expect of the smaller men, the legions of them? The Senator from Vermont yesterday, who may, perhaps, be called with fitness the legal adviser of the republican party, who seems to feel under special obligations on all occasions to interpret the law for that party, with all his distinguished ability absolutely came into the Senate and had read from the Secretary's desk a large number of clauses of the Constitution on the subject of the powers of the Federal Government, and then had all the acts of Congress, almost, I believe, without an exception, from the administration of President Washington down, read, had the act of 1789 read, the act of 1792, the act of 1795, the act of 1807, the act of 1833, being careful to notify the country in whose administration these various acts were passed, beginning with the sacred administration of Washington, and then qualified all that with extensive quotations from that great work written by Hamilton and Madison and Jay, known as the Federalist. For what purpose? Why all that? Would any man believe it? For the purpose of taking the position and seeking to enforce upon the country the idea that the little bill prohibiting the use of troops at the polls had the effect to change and modify, if not to repeal, all this legislation to which I have alluded, that that bill was in conflict with the clauses of the Constitution which he read, that it changed the legislation of the country from the days of Washington to the days of Grant, when that Senator must know, when every legal mind of this country must know that the bill which was pending before the Senate yesterday did not affect in the slightest degree or repeal a single provision of a single statute to which he referred previous to 1865; not one; I affirm it with confidence, not one. When the bill shall become a law, if it shall become a law, the acts of 1789 and of 1792 and of 1795 and of 1807 and all those other acts will remain perfect and complete just as they always were before the passage of the act of 1865. They will not be repealed, they will not be changed, they will not be modified in one single particular.

That is not the worst. I have the Senator's speech before me, and it is a labored effort to impress upon the country what the Senator would not say in precise language himself, but to impress upon the country the idea that Washington and Jefferson and Jackson, and all the distinguished Presidents of this country and the Congresses of their day in passing these laws had the purpose in view of enabling the President to employ the Army to preserve the peace at the polls, and that by passing this bill and declaring now that the Army and Navy shall not be brought to the polls during the elections we are coming in conflict with those statutes that come down to us from the days of Washington, and yet every Senator knows that there is not a word of that correct, as I have stated.

Why, sir, the act of 1795 and the other acts alluded to by the distinguished Senator from Vermont were not intended to give the President power to use the Army to keep the peace at the polls or to interfere with the elections, and that Senator knew that it was impossible that that legislation could have had such a purpose. Why do I say he knew it? Because during all those years of our Republic there was no law enacted by the Congress of the United States giving to the Federal Government control of elections in the States. The President could not send the Army and Navy to enforce a State law; and every law during the administration of Washington and Jefferson and Madison, and so on down, regulating the time, place, and manner of holding elections even for members of Congress was a State law; and even if the power had been conferred by the Constitution upon Congress to enact laws to regulate these elections, that power had not been exercised. Now, why should a distinguished Senator like the Senator from Vermont get up in the face of this country and make an elaborate argument to prove that the purpose of this legislation is in conflict with the legislation of 1789 and 1792 and 1795 and 1807, when he knew that at the time of the enactment of those laws the Federal Government made no pretension to regulate elections, had no law to enforce on the subject of elections, and left the regulation and conduct of elections exclusively to the States? And if we do by legislation what this bill proposes, that is, direct that from this time forward the Army and Navy shall not be used to interfere with elections, do we not re-enact what was the practice, what was the custom, and what was the law before the war?

But there is another proposition, and it is all over the argument of the distinguished Senator from Vermont, the argument on the assumption that when we take away from the President the power to use the military at elections we take away all power from the President, and he makes an argument to prove that we not only take it away practically for elections, but we take it away for all purposes. He gave several instances to prove that a criminal of any character against the laws of the United States has only to make election day a house of refuge, and for that day at least he cannot be disturbed by the Army. He assumes, and his whole argument goes upon the assumption, that if the Army can not be used the Federal Government is powerless. And the country is to be impressed with the idea that we who favor this bill, we who desire to prevent the use of the Army at elections, really intend to destroy the power of the Federal Government even to enforce any law that may exist on the statute-book in any matter.

Mr. President, the speech of the Senator from Vermont ought to be studied by every statesman in this Union, for it shadows, as that distinguished Senator only knows how to shadow, the great distinction that lies at the bottom of all the differences between the two parties that now contend for the mastery in this Government. This whole argument goes upon the idea that there is no protection for the citizens of this country save by the military arm. This whole argument of the honorable Senator from Vermont is replete with the idea that when you withdraw the Army or fail to furnish the military arm for the protection of the citizen, he is without protection; when you fail to give the President the Army and the Navy to enforce the laws, the President is without power to enforce the laws!

Well, sir, if we have arrived at that condition of things, our condition is indeed lamentable. We have been taught from our youth to believe that this was a country of self-government, that the people are able to protect themselves, that freemen did not need a standing army and a navy to protect themselves—protect themselves from themselves. It has not been customary to teach our people that they must look to the arms of military power through a Federal centralism for the protection and preservation of their rights; and yet I challenge any gentleman to give this speech a critical reading, and it goes altogether on the assumption that if military protection is withdrawn there is no protection worth having remaining, and the practical result of the Senator's argument is to show that by passing this bill, which simply declares that the Army and the Navy shall not be used at the polls, we repeal all the acts which authorize the enforcement of the laws previously passed and leave the President powerless to enforce the laws and the citizens without protection.

I heard a similar argument from that distinguished Senator on another memorable occasion. I noticed it then, and I call the attention of the country to it now. I heard it on one of those bills during the last Congress before us making appropriations for the Army, in which there was a clause prohibiting the Army from being used as a posse comitatus to execute the law. If Senators will turn to the short speech made by the distinguished Senator on that occasion they will find that he said broadly that if that clause of the appropriation bill became a law, and a mob should be organized in the city of Washington to rob the Treasury, there would be no power to protect the Treasury from that mob, impressing the country with the idea that its defense, that its safety, that its protection rests in the arm of the military power. Can it be true? If a mob should organize in the city of Washington for the purpose of capturing the Treasury and robbing it, is it true that because there is no army here, because the Army cannot be used as a posse comitatus, therefore the mob has only to go and take possession of the Treasury? In a city of one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants is there no power to protect the Treasury from a mob save through an army? Sir, that idea is at war with every feature of our Government, and certainly at war with all its fundamental principles. Our Government rests upon the idea that we are capable of self-government, that the people are patriotic, and the defense and protection of the property and liberties of the country rest in that belief—the people and the authority of the courts, which is the same thing, because they come from the body of the people. It rests upon the idea that we do not need a standing army to protect the American people from outrage by the American people as a body. Of course there are exceptions, as in all countries. The people must be protected from mobs, but the people can be protected from mobs without the use of the Army.

What would be the result of this style of argument? Gentlemen strangely have come out here now and, in opposition to the bill passed yesterday, they have taken the distinct position that it is necessary to keep upon your statute-book the right to use the Army and Navy for the purpose of keeping the peace at the polls. Well, sir, it is idle, it is worse than idle, to give the President of the United States authority to use your Army for any purpose and not furnish him an army for use. You say the President must have the right to use the Army to control the elections. That is what you say by your opposition to this bill, for that is the only idea that the bill negatives. If it is necessary to have the right to use the Army, the right is worthless unless you furnish an army to use. Make the calculation. Let the citizens of this country make the calculation and see what destiny is in wait for them when the proposition is once established that an army must be supplied for the purpose of keeping the peace at the polls. How many troops will it take? What sized army must you have? You must have an army in every State, in every county, in every town; for if one portion of the country is entitled to protection, and that protection can only be extended by the Army, every other portion of the country is entitled to protection; every other portion of the country must have an army; and America, free America, will present to the world the singular spectacle of standing more in need of an army than any other country on the globe; and we must have a larger standing army than Germany or Russia.

Sir, does not every man see in the very idea that the people of this country on that day when they are sovereigns come to exercise the power of a sovereign, that they must have an army to control them, an army to protect them, an army to regulate them, an army to keep the peace among themselves in the exercise of this great power, that even by that very idea they must admit that free self-government is a failure? It is the last idea that an American ought to admit. Of all ideas possible in this day and age of degeneracy, I should have supposed the very last idea an American statesman would have admitted as at all applicable to the condition of things in this country would be that we needed military interference on the days of elections for the purpose of protecting the people at the polls.

Whenever the American Congress shall in solemn form tell the world that an army is needed to protect American freemen when American freemen go to the polls they have admitted that the American popular system of government is at an end.

I must say that I am loth to believe and I do not believe that the distinguished gentleman who made the argument of this kind on yesterday, and which necessarily leads to this result, any more believes the statement he was making than did the Senator from the State of New York believe the statement of figures he made was correct. Neither of them had any purpose to make an incorrect statement, but both of them were after the great purpose of this whole movement—to excite one section of this country against the other and to avail themselves of any occasion for that purpose. I have been watching during the progress of this discussion not only the character of the speeches that have been made, which have convinced my mind thoroughly of the whole purpose of it, but simultaneously the extraordinary movements that are going on through the country. Take the republican newspapers of the day, and it seems to me that they are fuller of abuse, misrepresentation, and vituperation of the section of the country from which I have come than they ever were before. I know, from direct communication to myself, that various gentlemen who have been living for a few years in the South are going through the North, some of them as lecturers, some of them in the garb of ministers of the Gospel, and their whole lectures are simply replete with the most extravagant and false statements of wrongs and injuries in the South.

Designing persons are circulating letters and documents among the poor colored people, telling them that in Kansas they can have forty acres and a mule and money free of cost, and the Government, the great good Government that freed them, will take care of them. For what purpose is this second signal movement among the poor negroes of the South, the effect of which is to dissatisfy them with their condition? That they may, as many of them have been, be deceived and undertake to emigrate to this heavenly region, the new Canaan of the negro—the colored man. Why is that done? Not for the purpose of benefiting the poor colored man, oh, no; but for the double purpose of making it an occasion to vituperate the southern people before the northern people, charging their own duplicity to be the effect of cruelty and wrong by the very men whose advantage it is to be kind to their laborers and to keep them among them in contentment. There is the political purpose. Thus they get thousands of poor creatures away from home, naked and hungry, and then the appeal comes to the philanthropy of northern people and the plethora of the Treasury to come and take care of them; and the agents who circulate the falsehoods and create the dissatisfaction and produce the mischief come in of course as dispensers of the alms. It is a sad fact that these sectional passions are yet used by statesmen, by politicians, by bad men and by thousands of small men in a hundred shapes and forms, these sectional passions that keep the people of the North and the people of the South distrustful of each other and which are made commerce of by these people for their own selfish ends without any regard to consequences.

We are to be told that the military arm is essential to the protection of the country, but that under no circumstances can the North trust one-third of the people of this Union. No man can read these remarkable declarations of the leading men of that great party and not feel that the American Rubicon is in sight and that Cæsar is ready to cross over.

But, sir, I should not have perhaps said one word, notwithstanding my convictions, of the purposes of the discuss.on here, the style of discussion, the manner of the discussion, its perfect consonance with what is going on outside, notwithstanding the conviction on my part that there is this day a concerted movement in this country permeating the whole republican party, high and low, for the purpose of consolidating one section in this country against the other for no purpose but that of dominion, right or wrong—I perhaps should have said nothing in view of all this but for the fact that in the present case the immediate legislation and the purpose manifested in opposing that legislation would amount to nothing unless they could control the President of the United States. If the President should oppose the bill passed by the majority of Congress of course that was an end to the contest here, and distinguished gentlemen who had made such tremendous clamor against the bill would be like Othello, their occupation would be gone. I do not wish to do any one injustice, but it cannot be disguised before the country that a persistent, earnest, arbitrary, I almost said dictatorial, purpose has been manifested by that party to get control of the President and influence him to veto the bill.

I have never believed it would be done. I do not believe the President will lend himself to the scheme, and I have not believed it. The present Chief Magistrate of this country distinguished his administration in a manner worthy of his best predecessor when he first took charge of it by signalizing the beginning of that administration by the removal of the troops from the polls of the States and from interference with the States. I cannot believe that a President who thus signalized his administration in the beginning would be guilty of the enormous inconsistency of now insisting, against the will of a majority of Congress, that he should have the power to use troops, not only to control the States, but to control all the elections in the country. It would be too manifestly inconsistent. The President has sent in one veto. I confess that it surprised me in one respect, and it did not in another. It showed the power of the gentlemen on the other side, that they had accomplished their end that far; but the bill which we sent him before, though constitutional, though usual, contained what is called general legislation attached to an appropriation bill, and in its peculiar phraseology gave the President some pretext for vetoing it, and he did veto it. We desire to remove every reasonable objection. So far from desiring to coerce the President, there has been a general purpose to accommodate this legislation to the President, so as to accomplish the main end in perfect harmony between the Executive and the legislative branch of the Government. Therefore, much to the consternation of the gentlemen on the other side it seems, we have brought forward the single, naked proposition that all laws authorizing the use of the Army and Navy at the polls shall be repealed. That makes the issue direct and simple. The country I think had a right to expect from the character of the discussion when it opened, especially during the Forty-fifth Congress and the early days of the Forty-sixth Congress, that when this proposition was stripped of its connection with the appropriation bills and presented to our friends on the other side in a simple, naked issue as to whether we should use the Army and the Navy at the polls they would rise above all their prejudices and purposes and vote for the bill. But to a man in the other House they have opposed it, and to a man in this body they have opposed it, and the country waits with anxiety to know how it will be treated by him who now to such a great extent holds the peace of this country in his hands.

Sir, I would not say one word of disparagement to that high Chief Magistrate in this critical hour. I feel and feel keenly the heavy responsibilities that rest upon him. Will he remember now those grand words which he uttered in his inaugural, "He best serves his party who best serves his country?" Will he rise above the clamor, the dictation, and the demands of a struggling party seeking to regain life by reviving sectional agitation and serve his country like a patriot? Will he do that? If he shall do so he will for the second time at least in his administration show himself worthy of the high position which he holds. If, on the contrary, the President will do what is so contrary to the records of his own administration, what is so contrary to all the fundamental principles of our free popular Government, what is contrary to the correct understanding of his own message, and if he shall insist upon the bald, naked, fearless, terrible proposition that we shall have upon the statute-books that it shall be right and lawful to use the Army on the great day of days for an American—election day—that he will keep a law upon the statute-book against the will of a majority of both Houses of Congress, and that he will use his veto power for such party ends, then the time will come when the voters of this country will be face to face with a very grave issue, which I doubt not the democracy will be able to meet with moderation and wisdom.

Mr. President, upon this subject of the veto power I wish to submit a few observations to the Senate, and I take for the basis of my observation a portion of the speech made by the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] That Senator said:

It—

can be devoted to its uses in only one mode. Once in the Treasury, it must remain there useless until appropriated by act of Congress. The Constitution so ordains. To collect it and then defeat or prevent its object or use would be recreant and abominable oppression.

The Constitution leaves no discretion to Congress whether needful appropriations shall be made. Discretion to ascertain and determine amounts needful is committed to Congress, but the appropriation of whatever is needful after the amount has been ascertained is commanded positively and absolutely. When, for example, the Constitution declares that the President and the judges at stated periods shall receive compensation fixed by law the duty to make the appropriations is plain and peremptory; to refuse to make them is disobedience of the Constitution and treasonable. So, when it is declared that Congress shall have power to provide money to pay debts and for the common defense and the general welfare, the plain meaning is that Congress shall do these things, and a refusal to do them is revolutionary and subversive of the Constitution. A refusal less flagrant would be impeachable in the case of every officer and department of the Government within the reach of impeachment. Were the President to refuse to do any act enjoined on him by the Constitution he would be impeachable, and ought to be convicted and removed from office as a convict.

Mr. President, I have read that clause so strongly and forcibly put by the Senator from New York, to say to him, to the Senate and the country that I indorse every word of it. I believe the Senator has not stated the truth too strongly. There is no clause in the Constitution which says in so many words that Congress shall vote appropriations; but the preservation of the Government itself requires that appropriations shall be voted. The taxes are paid into the Treasury for the purposes of supporting the Government, and the Congress which willfully refuses to appropriate money to support the Government, in my judgment, is guilty of revolutionary conduct which cannot be excused.

I suppose I have stated that with sufficient strength for the Senator from New York. Now, what are the facts? Mark what I state; that the refusal to vote the appropriations to support the Government is unconstitutional, that we are bound by the very terms of our oath to take care of this Government, to support it, to maintain it, and to that end to make the necessary appropriations. What are the facts? Take the Forty-fifth Congress. Every democrat in the House voted for appropriations; every democrat in the Senate voted for appropriations, and every republican in the House and Senate voted against appropriations. Who violated the Constitution? Did the democrats who voted to make the appropriations violate the Constitution? Did the republicans who voted not to make the appropriations support the Constitution? The Senator says it is a constitutional duty to make appropriations. I admit it. Why was it that appropriations were not voted by the Forty-fifth Congress to support the Army and to carry on the Government? It was because every republican in this body rallied and defeated the bill making appropriations for that purpose. There is the record. Let us get the facts right, and I will attend to the excuses afterward. The unconstitutional act of voting against appropriations was done by the republican party. The constitutional duty of voting for appropriations was performed by every democrat in both Houses. How, then, can it be charged over the country that the democratic party is responsible for the failure of the appropriations?

Not only was that true in the Forty-fifth Congress, but it is true of the Forty-sixth. This Congress was called together, and every democrat in both Houses voted for a bill appropriating money to support the Army, all that the Departments demand and need. Every republican in both Houses voted against it. If it is unconstitutional to refuse appropriations, who has refused appropriations? But the Senator is right again. If it is a constitutional duty on the part of Representatives and Senators to vote for appropriations it is equally a constitutional duty on the part of the Executive to approve the appropriation bill, because under the forms of the Constitution every bill has to go to him for approval or disapproval. The appropriations cannot be made by a majority of Congress without the concurrence of the President, and, therefore, it is just as unconstitutional for the President to defeat an appropriation as for Congress to do so.

The President has done it in this case, but they say there are excuses for it. The first question I wish to put to the Senator is this: What excuse can justify a man in doing an unconstitutional act? The Senator says it is unconstitutional to vote against appropriations. What excuse can justify a man in voting against an appropriation? What excuse can justify the President, therefore, in vetoing an appropriation bill? I think it must be conceded on all hands that no man can be justified in doing an unconstitutional thing for any reason less than the preservation of the Constitution itself.

Now, what are the excuses offered in this case? The excuse is the general legislation that was attached to the appropriation bill. What was the form of that legislation? First, it is admitted to be usual and constitutional. The Senator from New York himself admits that. The Senator from New York goes further and says that so far as the mere form is concerned any bill which Congress has the power to pass can be attached to an appropriation bill, and unless the President can find cause on its merits it is difficult to see how the veto of such a bill could be sustained; and the Senator is right. The form was usual and constitutional. So the President cannot be justified in vetoing the bill, nor can the gentlemen on the other side be justified in voting against the bill because of the form, if the form of the bill is usual and constitutional. Mark you, they say to vote against the bill is unconstitutional. To refuse an appropriation (and every man by his vote against an appropriation does refuse it) is unconstitutional. Then you cannot plead that you do not like the form for the purpose of justifying the unconstitutional act.

Then take the substance of the bill. What is it? It is nothing in the world but to repeal certain legislation. That is constitutional. The Senator from New York would admit that Congress has a right to repeal those acts; that it is constitutional to repeal the acts we seek to repeal. None of these acts had existence on the statute-book previous to 1862. One was passed in 1862, one in 1865, and one in 1870–'71. These are the acts we propose to repeal, and all admit that it is constitutional for Congress to repeal those laws. So you cannot justify the unconstitutional act of voting against appropriations by pleading that you did not like the form or that you did not like the substance when you are compelled to admit that both the form and the substance are constitutional.

But another reason was urged. It is said that the democratic party have been threatening the President? Threatening him with what?

Threatening him with coercion. Coercion how? Why, you say if the President vetoed the bill we said we would not vote supplies. In the first place, I deny the fact that there was any such threat; but admit it to be true, what is the character of the threat? It is a threat that the President can defeat by doing his constitutional duty of approving the act, because the threat which they allege could only take effect after the President had vetoed the bill. Every democrat voted for the bill; the bill went to the President, and the President had the power, therefore, of avoiding any threat of withholding appropriations by simply doing his constitutional duty.

Mr. President, view this thing in any manner you please, the question comes down to a single point. Admitting the position taken by the Senator from New York that it is a constitutional obligation resting upon Congress to make the appropriations to support the Government, and that it is the constitutional duty of the President therefore to approve appropriation bills, that only the republican party prevented their passage in the Forty-fifth Congress and that only the President has prevented the appropriation bill from becoming a law in the Forty-sixth Congress, and that they have done it upon an excuse as to the form of legislation which they admit to be constitutional, as to the substance of legislation which they admit to be constitutional, the threats of the democratic party, which are not true in fact, are futile in view of the power of the President himself to prevent them from taking effect.

In view of all these facts we are brought nakedly to the simple proposition that the republican party have refused to do their constitutional duty of voting for appropriations, and have pleaded in excuse that which is a constitutional right in Congress to do. Congress has a right to put on riders, as they are called. Congress has a right to put on this general legislation. You admit that it is constitutional, and the President is put in the awkward dilemma of vetoing a bill which the Constitution requires should become a law, without which the support of the Government cannot go on, and pleading as an excuse for it that he did not think that certain portions of the bill were expedient.

I admit that if Congress should so far forget its duty as to attach unconstitutional legislation to an appropriation bill, then we put the President in the awkward predicament of having to violate the Constitution in any event. If he approves the bill he approves an unconstitutional provision. If he refuses to approve the bill he refuses to perform the constitutional duty of granting appropriations. Congress cannot be justified in putting the President in that dilemma. I will say that although I might believe legislation attached to an appropriation bill to be perfectly constitutional, yet if the President would say that he believed it to be unconstitutional I for one would scorn to put him in the dilemma of either failing to do a constitutional duty or doing an unconstitutional act. I would not require it of him; but when the legislation of which complaint is made is constitutional in form, constitutional in substance, constitutional in every respect, then clearly Congress has a right to enact it. I deny to any man the right to do an unconstitutional thing and plead a difference of opinion or a question of expediency as an excuse for doing an unconstitutional thing. The President has no right, the gentlemen on the other side have no right, to refuse appropriations to support the Government and say they will refuse the appropriations because they do not want Congress to do what Congress has a constitutional right to do. If the veto power shall be used in this way, there is an end of this Government. If the President can use the veto power for the purpose of defeating an appropriation necessary to support the Government and be justified in doing it because he dislikes a portion of the bill on the score of expediency, then the President can use the power vested in him by the Constitution for the purpose of preserving the Government to destroy the Government.

If this is to be the rule you see where it leads. No law, however odious, which the minority in Congress shall desire to retain on the statute-book can be repealed in any form or manner if they and the President concur in that desire. If that were so the people cannot change the law by changing their Representatives in Congress. They must also either change the President or they must make a two-thirds majority in both branches of Congress. It cannot escape the attention of any intelligent man that the whole purpose is to use the veto power to keep upon the statute-book laws which are intended to be used by the republican party as elements of force to control the future elections of this country to keep themselves in power.

I will not believe that the President of the United States has given himself to such an extreme extent that he is willing to stop supplies to the Government rather than repeal laws which he or his party may deem essential to enable them to keep in power. If so the veto is used for a purpose at war withe very sentiment and principle which induced the framers to put it in the Constitution. Everybody knows (and I will not take time to read to the Senate to show it) that this qualified veto power was given to the Executive in a general form, it is true, but for the express purpose of preventing unconstitutional and inconsiderate legislation. You cannot call this legislation, as I have shown, unconstitutional. You cannot show it to be hasty, because the favorite defender of the President, the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] himself spoke on it three hours. It cannot therefore be said to be inconsiderate; it cannot be said to be hasty. It was debated for a month in the two Houses.

So we have arrived at a new point in our history. If the veto power can be used for such a purpose, the country must know it. If this negative upon the will of the majority of the people can be used not to protect the Constitution, not to protect the prerogatives of the other Departments of the Government, not to protect the country from the consequences of ill-advised legislation, but if this great negative upon the will of the people can be used for the purpose of retaining a party in power, if it can be used for the purpose of keeping control of the Army and Navy, if it can be used for the purpose of employing an indefinite number of Federal deputy marshals and supervisors of election—if it can be used for those great purposes, we have arrived at a new era in our history, when the veto power, which was expressly conferred to preserve the Government, will be used for its destruction. As my friend [Mr. EATON] reminds me, you cannot say this legislation was hasty, because it was passed last session. It has been passed twice. Perhaps no measure before Congress ever received fuller consideration. If it was not unconstitutional and was fully considered, will any sensible man come down to the real truth of the argument and tell me what excuse can be rendered for the veto of legislation which the Constitution requires the President to approve?

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer upon this branch of the question than I had any thought of doing. I advance to a more significant proposition, one which I consider still more important than any that has been discussed. You cannot believe that this great party, led by such intelligent gentlemen, is simply influenced, and influenced alone, by a desire to control an election. There is a greater significance. I will not say the manifest purpose, but I will say the logical tendency of the doctrines which have been advanced and which are in perfect consonance with the history of the republican party is the destruction of the States as an element in the character of this Union. Take the argument of the Senator from New York. Let me read what he said. The Senator from New York said:

> In the city of New York all the thugs and shoulder-hitters and repeaters, all the carriers of slung-shots, dirks, and bludgeons, all the fraternity of the bucket-shops, the rat-pits, the hells, and the slums, all the graduates of the nurseries of modern so-called democracy, [laughter,] all those who employ and incite them, from King's Bridge to the Battery, are to be told in advance that on the day when the million people around them choose their members of the National Legislature, no matter what God-daring or man-hurting enormities they may commit, no matter what they do, nothing they can do will meet with the slightest resistance from any national soldier or armed man clothed with national authority.

Now, does the Senator from New York mean to say (and his argument is utterly worthless unless he does mean to say so) that protection from thugs and shoulder-hitters and the various unnamable bad men that he enumerates is impossible in New York except through the national soldiery, except through the arm of the National Government? Is that what the honorable Senator means? Yet that is what he says. He says that every one of these terrible characters is to be told that he may commit any enormity he pleases; he cannot be interfered with by any national soldiery. That is all true; but does it therefore follow that they can do these great crimes with impunity? Has New York no power to protect her citizens in the exercise of the right of suffrage? Is New York so given up to thugs and shoulder-hitters—I cannot remember those other hard names; but is New York such a hell that New York cannot protect her own people; and does the embassador from New York, in his high place, say that to the country? If New York can protect her people, why does she clamor for the national arm? Is New York unable to protect her citizens? Then let New York petition this Congress and say so, and we will help the poor, feeble, emasculated State of New York! Is New York able to protect her citizens and yet unwilling to protect them? Then New York does not deserve help; then New York does not deserve to be a State. One or the other must be true. If she demands the Federal arm; if she demands the Army and the Navy; if she demands that the soldiery shall protect her people, it must be because she is either unable to protect them or unwilling to protect them.

Mr. KERNAN. She is neither.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Ah, my friend, you are right; she is neither. She is able and she is willing to protect her citizens in this right. But let the argument progress. If the Senator is right, and if in New York the national soldier must protect her citizens in the exercise of the right of suffrage, must we not do the same thing in every other right? If New York cannot protect her people in one right, can she protect them in any other right? If New York must have the national arm to help her protect her people in the exercise of one right, I repeat, must not New York demand the national arm to help her protect her people in all other personal rights, and what is the result? The argument comes just to this, that the State of New York is unable to protect her people in any of their rights, and therefore it is necessary for New York to have the protection and the help of the National Government in the protection of all. If New York cannot protect her people, what State can? If New York with her five million people, the largest State in this Union, the wealthiest State in this Union, having the commercial metropolis of this great country, is unable to protect her people from thugs and shoulder-hitters and rat-pitters, what other State is able to protect her people? Does not every man see the necessary logical result of the honorable Senator's argument, that States must be destroyed, that the Government must absorb to itself all the power of protecting the citizens of this country, all their rights, and reduce the States to incompetent provinces? That is the goal of the republican party. Every hour of their history has been a direct march to the destruction of the States.

Mr. President, if the Senate will bear with me I wish to give my views upon a question growing out of the subject I am now considering. I want to call the attention of the people of this country to the real danger that threatens them, for I do not disguise the fact that they are in danger. The Senator from New York says they are alarmed because the National Government is threatening not to help them to protect their citizens in the right of suffrage. They have no just cause of alarm in that respect because they can protect their own people, but there is cause of alarm. There have been two parties in this country from the beginning which have been inimical to the true character of the Government under which we live. When the convention met that framed the Constitution there were two antagonistic ideas in that convention. One class of delegates wanted simply to amend the Articles of Confederation and continue purely a Federal system of government. Another party wanted to destroy the Federal features altogether and institute a purely national government. Neither succeeded. I was somewhat impressed, and I confess a little amused, by an argument of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] or rather a statement he made. In the speech which that Senator made he says:

I assume, sir, that this Government is either a nation per se, or it is a simple voluntary aggregation of States with a sovereign autonomy, each entirely competent to exercise its sovereignty by a withdrawal from the federation whenever it desires.

There is doubtless an idea in those words, but I am not able to catch it. He says further:

It cannot have the aspect of both a sovereign nation and a collection of sovereign States. A paradox of insurmountable character is involved in the very idea of such a thing. But, however we may argue upon this matter, the strong arm of the American people, with gun and sword in hand, have settled the principle that the American Union is a nation sovereign and supreme.

The Senator says "It cannot have the aspect of both a sovereign nation and a collection of sovereign States. A paradox of insurmountable character is involved in the very idea of such a thing." It is a remarkable fact that just what the honorable Senator from Illinois calls an insurmountable paradox is exactly the Constitution of the United States. After listening to the honorable Senator's speech for two hours, without meaning anything offensive to him, I must say that I think the Constitution is to him an insurmountable paradox.

Now, the Constitution has formed just that character of government. It is partly national and it is partly Federal. It is both in part and neither altogether. In my opinion the best description of the Constitution ever written by anybody was that written by Mr. Madison in the thirty-ninth number of the Federalist, and I watched with a good deal of curiosity the Senator from Vermont yesterday when he was collating quotations to prove that Mr. Madison was in favor of a strong central government, to see if he would not read what Mr. Madison had definitely explained to be his idea of this Government. Here is what he said, and I call the attention of the Senate to it; it ought to be read from every house-top in this country:

First. In order to ascertain the real character of the Government, it may be considered in relation to the foundation on which it is to be established; to the sources from which its ordinary powers are to be drawn; to the operation of those powers; to the extent of them, and to the authority by which future changes in the Government are to be introduced.

On examining the first relation it appears, on one hand, that the Constitution is to be founded on the assent and ratification of the people of America, given by deputies elected for the special purpose; but on the other that this assent and ratification is to be given by the people, not as individuals composing one entire nation, but as composing the distinct and independent States to which they respectively belong. It is to be the assent and ratification of the several States, derived from the supreme authority in each State—the authority of the people themselves. The act, therefore, establishing the Constitution will not be a national but a Federal act.

Mark that. The act establishing the Constitution is not a national but a federal act. He goes on:

That it will be a federal, and not a national act, as these terms are understood by the objectors, the act of the people, as forming so many independent States, not as forming one aggregate nation, is obvious from this single consideration that it is to result neither from the decision of a majority of the people of the Union nor from that of a majority of the States. It must result from the unanimous assent of the several States that are parties to it, differing no otherwise from their ordinary assent than in its being expressed, not by the legislative authority, but by that of the people themselves. Were the people regarded in this transaction as forming one nation, the will of the majority of the whole people of the United States would bind the minority in the same manner as the majority in each State must bind the minority; and the will of the majority must be determined either by a comparison of the individual votes, or by considering the will of the majority of the States as evidence of the will of a majority of the people of the United States. Neither of these rules has been adopted.

I call the attention of gentlemen to that. Neither of these rules have been adopted:

Each State, in ratifying the Constitution, is considered as a sovereign body, independent of all others, and only to be bound by its own voluntary act. In this relation, then, the new Constitution will, if established, be a federal and not a national constitution. The next relation is to the sources from which the ordinary powers of government are to be derived. The House of Representatives will derive its powers from the people of America; and the people will be represented in the same proportion and on the same principle as they are in the Legislature of a particular State. So far the Government is national, not federal. The Senate, on the other hand, will derive its powers from the States, as political and coequal societies, and these will be represented on the principle of equality in the Senate as they now are in the existing Congress. So far the Government is federal, not national. The executive power will be derived from a very compound source. The immediate election of the President is to be made by the States in their political characters. The votes allotted to them are in a compound ratio, which considers them partly as distinct and coequal societies, partly as unequal members of the same society. The eventual election, again, is to be made by that branch of the Legislature which consists of the national Representatives; but in this particular act they are to be thrown into the form of individual delegations from so many distinct and coequal bodies-politic. From this aspect of the Government it appears to be of a mixed character, presenting at least as many federal as national features.

The difference between a federal and national government, as it relates to the operation of the Government, is by the adversaries of the plan of the convention supposed to consist in this, that in the former the powers operate on the political bodies composing the confederacy, in their political capacities; in the latter, on the individual citizens composing the nation, in their individual capacities. On trying the Constitution by this criterion, it falls under the national, not the federal character; though perhaps not so completely as has been understood. In several cases, and particularly in the trial of controversies to which States may be parties, they must be viewed and proceeded against in their collective and political capacities only. But the operation of the Government on the people, in their individual capacities, in its ordinary and most essential proceedings, may, on the whole, designate it in this relation a national government.

But if the Government be national with regard to the operation of its powers, it changes its aspect again when we contemplate it in relation to the extent of its powers. The idea of a national government involves in it not only an authority over the individual citizens, but an indefinite supremacy over all persons and things, so far as they are objects of lawful government. Among a people consolidated into one nation this supremacy is completely vested in the National Legislature. Among communities united for particular purposes it is vested partly in the general and partly in the municipal legislatures. In the former case, all local authorities are subordinate to the supreme, and may be controlled, directed, or abolished by it at pleasure. In the latter, the local or municipal authorities form distinct and independent portions of the supremacy, no more subject, within their respective spheres, to the general authority than the general authority is subject to them within its own sphere. In this relation, then, the proposed government cannot be deemed a national one, since its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects. It is true that in controversies relating to the boundary between the two jurisdictions, the tribunal which is ultimately to decide is to be established under the General Government. But this does not change the principle of the case. The decision is to be impartially made, according to the rules of the Constitution, and all the usual and most effectual precautions are taken to secure this impartiality. Some such tribunal is clearly essential to prevent an appeal to the sword and a dissolution of the compact; and that it ought to be established under the general rather than under the local governments, or, to speak more properly, that it could be safely established under the first alone, is a position not likely to be combated.

If we try the Constitution by its last relation to the authority by which amendments are to be made, we find it neither wholly national nor wholly federal. Were it wholly national, the supreme and ultimate althority would reside in the majority of the people of the Union; and this authority would be competent at all times like that of a majority of every national society, to alter or abolish its established government. Were it wholly federal on the other hand, the concurrence of each State in the Union would be essential to every alteration that would be binding on all. The mode provided by the plan of the convention is not founded on either of these principles. In requiring more than a majority, and particularly in computing the proportion by States, not by citizens, it departs from the national and advances toward the federal character. In rendering the concurrence of less than the whole number of States sufficient, it loses again the federal and partakes of the national character.

The proposed constitution, therefore, even when tested by the rules laid down by its antagonists, is, in strictness, neither a national nor a federal constitution, but a composition of both. In its foundation it is federal, not national; in the sources from which the ordinary powers of the Government are drawn it is partly federal and partly national; in the operation of these powers it is national, not federal; in the extent of them again it is federal, not national; and finally in the authoritative mode of introducing amendments it is neither wholly federal nor wholly national.

This establishes the proposition that the Government as formed under the Constitution is both national and federal. For instance, in its structure it is federal because made by the States, each State acting through its own people as a separate community. In the powers by which it enacts laws it is both national and federal. The House of Representatives is a national body because the House of Representatives is composed of members chosen according to population. The Senate is a federal body. Here our Government is confederate. In the House, New York is equal to thirty-three Delawares, and there we have a national government. Here New York is equal to one Delaware, because New York and Delaware confederate here as equals.

I could not help but be amused the other day when I said this was a confederate Senate men whose hairs had grown gray thought it was a slip of the tongue, they knew that much of the Constitution of the country, and the papers all through the country took it up and said it must have been a lapsus. Sir, I was not thinking of the Confederate States of America. According to Mr. Madison and as I say the best description of the Government that ever was written, he says this Senate is a confederate Senate, because the States confederate here as equals; he says the House is national, and I admit it; and he says, and correctly says, that the executive department of the Government combines in itself both the national and the federal features. The executive government is peculiarly what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] would call "an insurmountable paradox," because in itself it is both federal and national. The electoral college which elects the President is composed of two embassadors from each State and a number of other members equal to the House of Representatives. The embassadors who represent the State are the confederate embassadors like the Senators upon this floor; the members who go into the electoral college representing the districts are national. So you see here in the House of Representatives, which is national, New York is thirty-three times as great as Delaware; in the Senate, which is exclusively confederate, New York is equal only to Delaware. In the electoral college New York is about twelve times greater, not thirty-three times, because there, as Mr. Madison says emphatically, the Government becomes compound. So that in the structure of the Government it is federal, that is in the process by which it was made it is federal; in the different departments of the Government as made we find the national and the federal features commingled, one branch of the legislature national, the other branch of the legislature confederate, the executive both national and confederate.

Mr. BLAINE. Does Mr. Madison use the word "confederate?"

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. He does a great many times; he calls it a confederacy in many places, and he says especially that the Senate is federal.

Mr. BLAINE. "Federal?"

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. What is the difference? I should like to know the difference. The Senator from Maine is a distinguished gentleman and if he can show the difference between a federal Senate and a confederate Senate he will have done much more than any man has ever done.

Mr. BLAINE. There is a great deal of difference, if the Senator will permit me to say so——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. A friend reminds me, what I intended to mention, that when the election of a President fails before the people and goes to the House of Representatives that House of Representatives which in its organization as a legislative body is national, at once becomes confederate because each State has one vote and New York is no greater than Delaware in the election of President by the House of Representatives.

Mr. Madison repeats the same doctrine precisely in a great letter which he wrote in 1830, in which he was proving that the Virginia resolutions of 1798 and 1799 did not authorize the doctrine of nullification, and proved it correctly. In a letter dated Montpelier, August, 1830, he says:

In order to understand the true character of the Constitution of the United States the error, not uncommon, must be avoided of viewing it through the medium, either of a consolidated government or of a confederated government, while it is neither the one nor the other, but a mixture of both. And having in no model the similitudes and analogies applicable to other systems of government it must, more than any other, be its own interpreter according to its text and the facts of the case.

From these it will be seen that the characteristic peculiarities of the Constitution are: 1, the mode of its formation; 2, the division of the supreme powers of government between the States in their united capacity and the States in their individual capacities.

I. It was formed, not by the governments of the component States, as the Federal Government for which it was substituted was formed. Nor was it formed by a majority of the people of the United States as a single community in the manner of a consolidated government. It was formed by the States, that is, by the people in each of the States, acting in their highest sovereign capacity, and formed consequently by the same authority which formed the State constitutions.

While the Government is federal in its structure, partly federal and partly national in the enactment of its laws, when it comes to the operation of its laws it is national. In the extent of its powers it is federal, because, as Mr. Madison justly remarks, you cannot say that a nation is an absolute nation whose powers are limited. Then, because the powers of the Federal Government are limited, not inherent, are delegated, it is federal in that respect; but in the operation of its laws, operating as they do upon the citizen, it becomes national. This Government, then, in the powers granted to it is absolute—it is national. Its laws operate upon the citizen just as the laws of England and France do, and they can be enforced. It must enforce its own laws.

Two things have struck me as a wonderful marvel. The claim by some, one extreme class of thinkers or theorists in this country, is that the Government is altogether federal. How any man can say that the Government under the Constitution is altogether federal, in the face of the fact that the very object of forming it was to get rid of a government altogether federal, is to me a mystery and a marvel. On the other hand, how any man can say that the Government is absolutely national, adopted by the people of the United States as a unit, as one people, is to me a marvel, since the people of the United States in that character never passed upon a single question. There never was a question submitted to the people of the United States as one aggregate people. They never voted on any question as one aggregate people. The Constitution was adopted by the people, but it was adopted by the people of each State acting for itself just as the people of a State adopted their own State constitution. Therefore it is federal in its structure; therefore it is national in its operation; therefore it is national and federal in its Constitution; therefore, as the Senator from Illinois and a great many like him say, it is an insurmountable paradox. A friend suggests that in adopting amendments we act by States.

Mr. Madison advances the same doctrine again. Mr. Madison wrote an admirable letter directed to that great man, Daniel Webster, in March, 1833, complimenting Mr. Webster for his great reply to Mr. Calhoun when Mr. Calhoun contended that the Federal Gover nent was a league, as Mr. Webster understood him, a mere compact, a mere league, an exclusively federal government. This is Mr. Madison's letter:

MONTPELIER, March 15, 1833.

MY DEAR SIR: I return my thanks for the copy of your late very powerful speech in the Senate of the United States. It crushes "nullification," and must hasten an abandonment of "secession." But this dodges the blow, by confounding the claim to secede at will with the right of seceding from intolerable oppression. The former answers itself, being a violation without cause of a faith solemnly pledged. The latter is another name only for revolution, about which there is no theoretic controversy. Its double aspect, nevertheless, with the countenance received from certain quarters, is giving it a popular currency here, which may influence the approaching elections both for Congress and for the State Legislature. It has gained some advantage also by mixing itself with the question, whether the Constitution of the United States was formed by the people or by the States, now under a theoretic discussion by animated partisans.

It is fortunate when disputed theories can be decided by undisputed facts, and here the undisputed fact is, that the Constitution was made by the people, but as embodied into the several States who were parties to it, and therefore made by the States in their highest authoritative capacity. They might, by the same authority and by the same process, have converted the confederacy into a mere league or treaty, or continued it with enlarged or abridged powers; or have embodied the people of their respective States into one people, nation, or sovereignty; or, as they did, by a mixed form, make them one people, nation, or sovereignty for certain purposes, and not so for others.

The Constitution of the United States, being established by a competent authority, by that of the sovereign people of the several States who were parties to it, it remains only to inquire what the Constitution is; and here it speaks for itself. It organizes a government into the usual legislative, executive, and judiciary departments; invests it with specified powers, leaving others to the parties to the Constitution. It makes the government like other governments to operate directly on the people; places at its command the needful physical means of executing its powers; and finally proclaims its supremacy, and that of the laws made in pursuance of it, over the constitutions and laws of the States, the powers of the government being exercised, as in other elective and responsible governments, under the control of its constituents, the people and the Legislatures of the States, and subject to the revolutionary rights of the people, in extreme cases.

Such is the Constitution of the United States de jure and de facto, and the name, whatever it be, that may be given to it can make it nothing more nor less than what it is.

Pardon this hasty effusion, which, whether precisely according or not with your ideas, presents, I am aware, none that will be new to you.

With great esteem and cordial salutations,

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. WEBSTER.

Sir, I want to say here now—and I feel it a privilege that I can say it—I believe all the angry discussions, all the troubles that have come upon this country have sprung from the failure of the people to comprehend the one great fact, that the Government under which we live has no model; it is partly national and partly federal; an idea which was to the Greeks a stumbling-block and to the Romans foolishness, and to the republican party an insurmountable paradox, but to the patriots of this country it is the power of liberty unto the salvation of the people. And if the people of this country would realize that fact, all these crazy wranglings as to whether we live under a federal or a national government would cease; they would understand that we live under both, that it is a composite government, that it was intended by its framers that the Union shall be faithful in defense of the States, that the States shall be harmonious in support of the Union, and that the Union and the States shall be faithful and harmonious in the support and the maintenance of the rights and the liberty of the people.

Sir, Mr. Webster concurred fully with Mr. Madison in these views. Mr. Webster said in his speech at the whig convention in Richmond:

I will now say, however, that which I admit to be very presumptuous, because it is said notwithstanding the illustrious authority of one of the greatest of your great men—a man better acquainted with the Constitution of the United States than any other man—

That I believe. I believe Mr. Madison understood the Constitution of this country better than any man who ever lived in it.

A man who saw it in its cradle, who held it in his arms, as one may say, in its infancy, who presented and recommended it to the American people, and who saw it adopted very much under the force of his own reasoning and the weight of his own reputation, who lived long enough to see it prosperous, to enjoy its highest honors, and who at last went down to the grave beneath ten thousand blessings, for which, morning and evening, he had thanked God; I mean James Madison. Yet even from this great and good man, whom I hold to be chief among the just interpreters of the Constitution, I am constrained, however presumptuous it may be considered, to differ in relation to one of his interpretations of that instrument. I refer to the opinion expressed by him, that the power of removal from office does exist in the Constitution as an independent power in the hands of the President, without the consent of the Senate. I wish he had taken a different view of it.

I say here if there are any two men in this country I have ever studied and loved and honored, they are Madison and Webster. This is the only instance I have found where Mr. Webster ever differed with Mr. Madison upon any interpretation of the Constitution. Mr. Webster denied that the power of removal was an independent power and absolute in the hands of the President. Mr. Madison conceded that power. That is the only difference I have ever been able to find between the two.

Mr. Webster again said, speaking of Mr. Madison at a public dinner in New York:

Having been afterward for eight years Secretary of State, and as long President, Mr. Madison has had an experience in the affairs of the Constitution certainly second to no man. More than any other man living, and perhaps more than any other who has lived, his whole public life has been incorporated, as it were, into the Constitution; in the original conception and project of attempting to form it, in its actual framing, in explaining and recommending it, by speaking and writing, in assisting at the first organization of the Government under it, and in a long administration of its executive powers, in these various ways he has lived near the Constitution, and with the power of imbibing its true spirit and inhaling its very breath from its first pulsation of life. Again, therefore, I ask if he cannot tell us what the Constitution is and what it means, who can? He had retired with the respect and regard of the community, and might naturally be supposed not willing to interfere again in matters of political concern. He has, nevertheless, not withholden his opinions on the vital question discussed on that occasion which has caused this meeting. He has stated with an accuracy almost peculiar to himself, and so stated as, in my opinion, to place almost beyond further controversy, the true doctrines of the Constitution. He has stated not notions too loose and irregular to be called even a theory, not ideas struck out by the feeling of present inconvenience or supposed maladministration, not suggestions of expediency or evasions of fair and straightforward construction, but elementary principles, clear and sound distinctions, and indisputable truths. I am sure, gentlemen, that I speak your sentiments as well as my own, when I say that for making public so clearly and distinctly as he has done his own opinions on these vital questions of constitutional law, Mr

Madison has founded a new and strong claim on the gratitude of a grateful country. You will think with me that at his advanced age and in the enjoyment of general respect and approbation for a long career of public services it was an act of distinguished patriotism, when he saw notions promulgated and maintained which he deemed unsound and dangerous not to hesitate to come forward and to place the weight of his own opinion in what he deemed the right scale, come what come might. I am sure, gentlemen, it cannot be doubted, the manifestation is clear, that the country feels deeply the force of this new obligation.

In his letter to Mr. Cooper, Mr. Webster, referring to this question, again used strange but strong language which looks like "a paradox" in itself. He says "the States are united, confederated;" that is, they are both united and confederated. Again Mr. Webster, in his great speech in the case of The United States Bank vs. Primrose, uses as strong language on this subject as a man could ask. He says:

Suppose that this Constitution had said, in terms, after the language of the court below, "all national sovereignty shall belong to the United States, all municipal sovereignty to the several States." I will say that, however clear, however distinct such a definition may appear to those who use it, the employment of it in the Constitution could only have led to utter confusion and uncertainty. I am not prepared to say that the States have no national sovereignty. The laws of some of the States, Maryland and Virginia, for instance, provide punishment for treason. The power thus exercised is certainly not municipal. Virginia has a law of alienage; that is, a power exercised against a foreign nation. Does not the question necessarily arise, when a power is exercised concerning an alien enemy—"enemy to whom?" The law of escheat, which exists in many States, is also the exercise of a great sovereign power.

The term "sovereignty" does not occur in the Constitution at all. The Constitution treats States as States and the United States as the United States; and by a careful enumeration declares all the powers that are granted to the United States, and all the rest are reserved to the States. If we pursue to the extreme point the powers granted and the powers reserved the powers of the General and State governments will be found, it is to be feared, impinging and in conflict. Our hope is that the prudence and patriotism of the States and the wisdom of this Government will prevent that castrophe. For myself, I will pursue the advice of the court in Deveaux's case—I will avoid nice metaphysical subtilties and all useless theories.

And that advice I give to the republican party generally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would my friend be willing to take the advice, as well as give it?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have always taken it, my friend, in all my political career. This is the first speech I ever made of this character on the subject of secession and consolidation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This, then, is the first case of sophistry.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Ah! I do hope, Mr. President, whatever other misfortune may befall me, I shall not imbibe the habit of sophistry by associating with the Senator from Vermont in this Chamber. [Laughter.] I continue the quotation from Mr. Webster:

I will keep my feet out of the traps of general definition, I will keep my feet out of all traps, I will keep to things as they are, and go no further to inquire what they might be, if they were not what they are. The States of this Union, as States, are subject to all the voluntary and customary law of nations.

No stronger State-rights doctrine than that was ever uttered. And Mr. Webster, in that very great, almost unprecedented, speech which he made in reply to Mr. Hayne, the second speech on Foote's resolution, said that "the States are unquestionably sovereign" and that the General Government has no power "beyond the actual grant;" but in the exercise of the powers actually granted it is national, and that is right. That has always been my belief. Therefore I have never discussed these abstract theories, as I said to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. Webster in his argument with Mr. Calhoun was combating the theory that under the Constitution the Government was a league; and when he said it was not a confederacy he of course was combating the theory of a confederacy in the sense of a league. Mr. Webster evidently, in combating that particular theory, may have used language which he would not have used if he had not been combating that theory. Therefore in his speech on that occasion, especially the great speech in reply to Mr. Calhoun, which was an abler argument than his speech in reply to Hayne, he said "this Government is not a confederacy, a league, or a compact," and yet often afterward in other places he did speak of it as a confederacy and a constitutional compact. What does he mean? He means just what Mr. Madison says: in some respects the Constitution under which we live has ordained a Government which is national, in other respects federal. It is both federal and national, and therein is its glory. One great trouble with book theorists is that they go upon examples. They cannot find any precedent in history of this kind. They find governments either national or federal, and they say as the Senator from Illinois, "I assume that it is either altogether national or altogether federal." That is the substance of what he says. That is directly in the teeth of the truth. It is partly national and it is partly federal; it is both; and it is neither.

This Government was not the result of mere human wisdom. No human minds could have conceived this Government, as a mere intellectual effort. What produced this Government? In the first place the framers of the Constitution had the benefit of three hundred years of the struggles of our forefathers for the great principles of liberty, which it is the duty of all governments to preserve and protect. Then they had the experience of a purely federal system under the articles of confederation which had proved to be an utter failure. Then they had the benefit of a new country, different from any other country, whose needs were different; and though at that time there were but thirteen States skirting the Atlantic, even they had the prescience to see that this country would extend back from sea to sea and have fifty States. Therefore, as Mr. Madison says, you cannot determine this Constitution by any model; you must determine it by itself and by the facts of the case. Sir, this Constitution of government framed in 1787 is the result of wisdom, the result of experience, the result of condition, the result of necessity, and the result of all the feelings and elements that can stimulate the intellect and prompt the desires of men; and the result is that the framers, trusting to their own good sense applied to the facts of their condition, and aided by the experience of three hundred years of history, gave to the world a Constitution which was as new in the science of government as the American continent was new to the geography of the world when Columbus discovered it. When you hear a man talking about going to Rome or to Greece or to Switzerland or anywhere to find models by which to understand the Constitution of the United States, he is going in dark places to gather light.

The Constitution is its own interpreter in the light of the circumstances under which it was made. It is the noblest government, the greatest government that human wisdom ever devised, and it could not have been framed by human wisdom alone. The human intellect never existed in this world that could from its own evolutions have wrought out such a thing as this Constitution of the United States; and the trouble has been that though such men as Madison explained it, though such men as Webster expounded it, yet the old theory that divided the convention has continued to divide the country. We had one class of men who insisted that the Constitution and the Government was nothing but a league, nothing but a compact, nothing but a confederacy. It was made by compact, but it resulted in a government, a government capable of preserving itself, a government capable of sustaining itself, a government capable of making, capable of expounding, and capable of enforcing its own laws against all the earth. It is a government such as Roman never dreamed of, such as Grecian never conceived, and such as European intellect never had the power to evolve. When the American people, either for the purpose of dismembering the States or of destroying them, shall destroy this unparalleled Government, this Government without a model, this government without a prototype, they will have destroyed a Government which seems to have been wisely adapted to the peculiar condition of the time and to all their future wants, and they will launch out on a sea of uncertainty the result of which no man can forecast.

Sir, I will not trace the history of these two extremes. One was the secessionist, the other was the consolidationist. Both are disunionists. The man who would destroy the States is as much a disunionist as the man who would divide the States. Ay, I put the query to the American mind to-day, which I trust they will ponder, if he is a traitor who would divide the States, how can he be less a traitor who would destroy the States?

The doctrine of secession—I do not say it for the purpose of exciting sectional acrimony, but for the simple purpose of getting the facts of history—this doctrine of secession originated in New England and it first developed itself in 1790. Those twin curses of the South, secession and slavery, were both transplanted from New England.

Mr. HOAR. To a more congenial home.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. Jefferson, in his works, gives a very interesting account of the first threat of secession. It arose on the occasion of a defeat in Congress of a bill to assume the debts of the States incurred during the Revolution.

This measure (the assumption of State debts)—

Says Mr. Jefferson—

produced the most bitter and angry contest ever known in Congress before or since the union of the States. I arrived in the midst of it; but a stranger to the ground, a stranger to the actors in it, so long absent as to have lost all familiarity with the subject, and as yet unaware of its object, I took no concern in it. The great and trying question, however, was lost in the House of Representatives. So high were the feuds excited on this subject that, on its rejection, business was suspended, Congress met and adjourned from day to day without doing anything, the parties being too much out of temper to do business together. The eastern members threatened secession and dissolution. Hamilton was in despair. As I was going to the President's one day I met him in the street. He walked with me backward and forward before the President's door for half an hour. He painted pathetically the temper into which the Legislature had been wrought, the disgust of those who were called the creditor States, (the Northern,) the danger of the secession of their members, and of the separation of the States. He observed that the members of the administration ought to act in concert; that though this question was not of my department, yet a common duty should make it a common concern; that the President was the center in which all administrative questions ultimately rested, and that all of us should rally round him and support, with joint efforts, measures approved by him, and that the question having been lost by a small majority only, that an appeal from me to the judgment and discretion of some of my friends might effect a change in the vote and the machine of Government, now suspended, might be again set in motion.

The result was that Mr. Jefferson gave a dinner to which Mr. Hamilton invited some friends and Mr. Jefferson invited some. On the same day that this controversy arose about the assumption of State debts there was a controversy also as to the locality of the capital. The northern members wanted it fixed on the Susquehanna or the Delaware; the southern members wanted it fixed on the Potomac at Georgetown. Each proposition was defeated by a small majority. Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Hamilton got together and persuaded the good Union men of the East that they would not secede provided some few southern men would vote to assume the State debts and they would vote to locate the capital on the Potomac. In that way the Union was saved by a bargain of two men on each side, a bargain at a dinner. I state that simply as a fact.

Several times again secession was threatened. It was threatened according to my reading about four times in New England before it was threatened anywhere else, and it took a very dangerous form in New England. New England opposed the war of 1812, as everybody knows, and the greatest men of New England assembled in convention at Hartford and adopted the very doctrines which were taken by the secessionists in the South and incorporated in their ordinance of secession, the very same doctrine. This doctrine of secession never acquired a great stronghold in the South until the opposite doctrine took strong hold in the North. The opposite doctrine to secession, that of consolidation, never had as many advocates known and avowed as had the doctrine of secession; yet there were some. The most absolute expressions of consolidation that I have been enabled to find were by Patrick Henry, of Virginia, and Mr. Lincoln. Patrick Henry was opposed to the adoption of the Federal Constitution because he insisted that it established an absolute consolidated government which would destroy the States; and as a State-rights man, he opposed the adoption of the Constitution. But when it was adopted, he insisted that the fear he had expressed was true, that it was the true theory of the Constitution; and, therefore, in the great fight over the alien and sedition laws, Patrick Henry approved those laws, and stated in an argument he made that the States bore the same relation to the General Government that the counties in the States bore to the States. And Mr. Lincoln, I noticed, on his way to the capital after his election suggested that same idea.

Those two expressions I have not seen repeated by anybody else; but they embodied in a few words the most absolute expression of consolidation and entire nationalism I have ever met anywhere. But this doctrine of consolidation did not do much mischief previously to 1860, though it had its advocates; yet when the collision came the doctrines then held by those who went to war with secession were as absolutely national in their character and just as inconsistent with the character of our Government as was secession itself.

Here is the truth, Mr. President: the whole war was the result of crimination between two extreme ideas. I deny that the Union, as interpreted by Madison and expounded by Webster, was any party to the late war except as a victim, a threatened victim, and a very dangerously threatened one. It is true that the war was the result of a collision of ideas and interests between the extreme nationalists and the extreme federalists. They brought about the war; but the slavery question entering into it sectionalized it, and therefore the North became consolidated on one side, and the South, or a portion of the States of the South, consolidated on the other. After the war arose the Union became involved, and therefore it is that those who fought on the side of the Federal Government fought for the Union and are entitled to all the benefits that result from that relation, and no man will always give them to them more cheerfully than myself. The war being the result of this collision of extremes, the consolidationists, the centralizationists, the monarchists, (for that is what they mean,) had the advantage in that they had possession of the Union, possession of its power, possession of its Army, and possession of its Navy—an advantage which they acquired by secession folly. The collision coming on in this form, secession was crushed out in the conflict, utterly crushed out. I want the country to understand that. It was utterly crushed out. There is no longer any danger to this country by reason of secession. It has no advocate in the South. It is a heresy which has had its day, wrought its wrongs, and gone to its grave, for which there is no resurrection, unless it gets that resurrection in the home of its birth, New England.

But, sir, that other extreme enemy of the Constitution and Government and Union, as expounded by Madison and Webster, was not crushed out by the war. It was the cardinal principle of the republican party. All good Union men at the North, by reason of the condition of things, being compelled to go into the Federal Army as others in the South of a like character who had no sympathy with secession were compelled to go into secession, it was by the aid of the democracy of the North, of the conservative men of the North who did not agree to absolute nationalism, who did not agree to the doctrine of consolidation, who did not agree to the absolute theory of a national government in the Federal head—it was by the aid of these democrats and conservative men that the Federal armies were enabled to triumph and crush out secession. A united North overpowered a divided South.

But the men who happened to be the party in power, and who are the representatives of this extreme idea of consolidation, took all the credit to themselves; and one of the dangers now arising to this country is from the fact that the party which represents this central, absolutely national idea—this consolidation idea, this monarchizing idea—that party claims the credit of having saved the Union. It gives no credit to its allies whatever. What would you have done without the democrats in the war? And yet it was amusing to hear the distinguished Senator from New York the other day in his own way describing the democratic party as consisting of a northern tail and a southern head. What would you have done without that tail in the war? If the conservative Union men North and South could have left the war to be fought out by the advocates of secession on the one hand and the advocates of consolidation on the other there would have been some other party in control of this country for the last eighteen years.

But, as I say, the respective sections became involved without regard to the individual opinions of their people. This national party, this party of absolutism is not only the party in power by reason of its representation that it saved the Union and taking all the credit of saving the Union, but it claims all the credit of having suppressed the rebellion and demands that it shall be esteemed as the secessionists shall be hated.

These two sources of strength to the republican party are now endangering the States. Why, sir, every step of the republican party is to the destruction of the States. Take the very measures now under consideration. What are they? In 1862, for purposes which every man can explain, a test oath was prescribed for jurors. In 1865 a clause was put in an Army bill authorizing the use of troops to keep the peace at the polls. Neither of these statutes was ever known on our statute-book before; they did not exist in the early days of the Republic; they never existed until they were enacted during the war. In 1870 and 1871 your election laws were passed. They never existed before. Up to that time all parties had agreed that the States were both able and willing to take care of the elections and protect their citizens. Now I put it to every intelligent man what stronger indication of a desire to grasp power, what stronger indication of a purpose to crush out the States than the attempt to drive intelligence and virtue and property from the jury-box and use the Army at the elections, and to place in the Federal Government power by supervisors and deputy marshals to take absolute control of the States in their elections, things that were never done before?

If either one of the laws which we now propose to repeal had been proposed for enaction in any administration of this Government from the days of Washington to 1860, it would have ruined the man that made the proposition. No man could have stood before the indignation of the American people who would have proposed to place upon the statute-book a law keeping intelligence and virtue from the jury-box, a law surrounding the polls with the Army and the Navy, or a law giving to the Federal Government absolute control of the elections, and, as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] suggests, fixing the congressional elections to come off on the same day with presidential elections and State elections, so as to control all.

I have given this subject careful consideration. I wish to do no man injustice; but with a full sense of responsibility to my country I affirm to-day that this heated contest we have had here for six weeks has no meaning, has no purpose, and can have no result but the absolute control of the States by force through the Federal Government to perpetuate the republican party in power, whether the people will it or not; and if the President shall use the veto power, conferred upon him for a high conservative purpose, to aid these party schemes, and the people shall not rise in their indignation and drive from power these men who thus abuse power and disregard their duty, the Union will be destroyed in the destruction of the States.

But, sir, to accomplish their purpose, almost every speaker of the republican side in the Senate and in the other House is persistently seeking to impress the country with the idea that the dangers to the country come from the confederates in this presence. The Senator from New York said:

> Twenty-seven States adhered to the Union in the dark hour. Those States send to Congress two hundred and sixty-nine Senators and Representatives. Of these two hundred and sixty-nine Senators and Representatives, fifty-four, and only fifty-four, were soldiers in the armies of the Union. The eleven States which were disloyal send ninety-three Senators and Representatives to Congress. Of these, eighty-five were soldiers in the armies of the rebellion, and at least three more held high civil station in the rebellion, making in all eighty-eight out of ninety-three.
> Let me state the same fact, dividing the Houses. There are but four Senators here who fought in the Union Army. They all sit here now; and there are but four. Twenty Senators sit here who fought in the army of rebellion, and three more Senators sit here who held high civil command in the confederacy.
>
> In the House, there are fifty Union soldiers from twenty-seven States, and sixty-five confederate soldiers from eleven States.
>
> Who, I ask you, Senators, tried by this record, is keeping up party divisions on the issues and hatreds of the war?
>
> The South is solid. Throughout all its borders it has no seat here save two in which a republican sits. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] are still spared; and whisper says that an enterprise is afoot to deprive one of these Senators of his seat. The South is emphatically solid. Can you wonder if the North soon becomes solid too? Do you not see that the doings witnessed now in Congress fill the North with alarm and distrust of the patriotism and good faith of men from the South? Forty-two democrats have seats on this floor; forty-three if you add the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] He does not belong to the democratic party, although I must say, after reading his speech the other day, that a democrat who asks anything more of him is an insatiate monster. [Laughter.] If we count the Senator from Illinois, there are forty-three democrats in this Chamber. Twenty-three is a clear majority of all, and twenty-three happens to be exactly the number of Senators from the South who were leaders in the late rebellion.
> Do you anticipate my object in stating these numbers? For fear you do not, let me explain. Forty-two Senators rule the Senate; twenty-three Senators rule the caucus. A majority rules the Senate; a caucus rules the majority; and the twenty-three southern Senators rule the caucus. The same thing, in the same way, governed by the same elements, is true in the House.
>
> This present assault upon the purity and fairness of elections, upon the Constitution, upon the executive department, and upon the rights of the people; not the rights of a king, not on such rights as we heard the distinguished presiding officer, who I am glad now to discover in his seat, dilate upon of a morning some weeks ago; not the divine right of kings but the inborn rights of the people—the present assault upon them, could never have been inaugurated without the action of the twenty-three southern Senators here and the southern Representatives there, [pointing to the House.]
> The people of the North know this and see it. They see the lead and control of the democratic party again where it was before the war, in the hands of the South.

And he says that alarms the North. Mr. President, I shall meet that question as I endeavor to meet all others, frankly. These charges are all made against the southern Representatives in this House and the other upon the assumption that they are enemies of the Government, that the people they represent are enemies of the Government, and therefore when the Government passes into their control the Government is in danger. Well, sir, if the assumption be true, the conclusion is inevitable. If the southern people are the enemies of this Union and if the members of this House and the other from the Southern States are the enemies of the Union, we have no right here, we have no business here; if we are honorable men we will not remain here.

I grant you that the people of the North ought to have solid arguments on this subject. I grant what the Senator from New York intimated, that gush will not do; simply talking about shaking hands and locking arms does not amount to much. That will do for children and Sunday-school teachers. Statesmen want facts; statesmen want arguments; statesmen want reasons why the southern people are not the enemies of the Government, and therefore ought to be friends and can be safely trusted. I propose to give some of those reasons.

The laws that are now proposed to be repealed have been made the occasions for all kinds of intimations from the leaders of the republican party that the South is not worthy to be trusted. How on earth can a proposition to repeal a law which was unknown to the country for the first seventy-five years of the existence of the Government be an evidence of disloyalty? How is it any evidence that we are not to be trusted because we want intelligence and virtue in the jury-box? How is it an evidence that we are not to be trusted because we want the absence of the Army from the polls when the Army was never known at the polls in the days of our fathers? How is it that we are to be declared disloyal because we are in favor of taking away from the Federal Government the control of the elections through the deputy marshals and the supervisors? United States deputy marshals and supervisors in elections were never known to the history of this country for the first eighty years of its government.

Are we disloyal because we want what Washington had, what Jefferson had, what Madison had, what Jackson had? The President in his message says that he invites us back to the good old habits and customs of the country, and he says that the habit of tacking legislation to appropriation bills was unknown in the first forty years of the Government and invites us back to those good old days. I mean to accept his invitation. I say to the President "Come, sir, let us go back to the good old days when for not forty but seventy-five years troops were not known at the polls; let us go back to the good old days when for not forty but for eighty years supervisors and deputy marshals in control of the elections were unknown to the Federal statute-book. Now, come, let us go back." Why not? That is what we are trying to do.

Here let me notice another quotation of the Senator from Vermont. I was amused yesterday when he used the argument of Mr. Madison on the subject of electing members of Congress as a true exposition of the clause of the Constitution. I accept it. I believe Mr. Madison was right, and what did Mr. Madison say? Those words ought to be remembered. Mr. Madison said that the control of elections for members of Congress had to be given either wholly to the National Government or wholly to the State governments, or primarily to the State governments and ultimately to the National Government. He goes on to explain, and other writers explain the same condition of things in this way, that as long as the States are willing to exercise the power of controlling the elections they ought to be allowed to do it; it is proper and right that they should, but the time might come when the States might not be willing to elect their Representatives to Congress, and then the power should be in the Federal Government to do it as the ultimate authority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish my honorable friend would read any passage of Mr. Madison—I do not desire to interrupt the course of the Senator's remarks, but he is quoting Mr. Madison, and I have not been able to read in anything Mr. Madison said any question as to the willingness of a State to elect as being the test of the exertion of the national authority.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. Madison said if any bad influences should prevail, or something of that kind——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what is the trouble now.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Did he mean the bad influences in New York that the Senator from New York talked about? Did he mean thugs, and shoulder-hitters, and rat-pitters? That is a pretty bad state of things. That is not what Mr. Madison meant. No, no. If Mr. Madison meant that because there were bad men in a State, therefore that was the ground on which the Government should exercise this ultimate power, it would have been exercised from the beginning, because we have had bad men from the beginning. There may be more in New York than anywhere else; according to their Senator it seems there are; but there are a good many elsewhere; there is no doubt about that. Mr. Madison meant just what I have said, because he explained it in another clause where he said that every government ought to have the power of its own preservation, and I grant it that right. Every government ought to have it. Therefore, when the State should fail in the duty it would be proper for the National Government to take control of the elections.

Sir, are the States of this Union any less able or less willing to protect their citizens in exercising the right of suffrage now than they were in the days of Washington, than they were in the days of Madison, than they were in the days of Jefferson or Jackson? Are they not able now? If they are as willing now, the contingency upon which Mr. Madison placed the exercise of that ultimate authority has not transpired, and therefore, according to Mr. Madison, it being a question of constitutional power, looking upon it in the meaning of the Constitution, the true intent and purpose of it in the light of wisdom and expediency, we ought to leave this question to the States, where it was left until 1870.

But I want to give the reasons why the South is trustworthy, and I want to call the attention of the country to them. First, the southern men went to war for what they believed their self-preservation. They defended their convictions bravely. They have surrendered; they have abandoned their convictions; they have abandoned secession, both as a doctrine and a remedy; and a people who were brave enough to defend their convictions with their blood are honorable enough to keep their pledges. When the Senator from New York points out that eighty-five out of the ninety-three southern Senators and Representatives—I will not quarrel with the figures—went to the battle-field and shed their blood for their convictions, he stated a strong reason why they are trustworthy; when he shows that twenty southern Senators on this floor were willing to defend their convictions with their life and only four on that side of the Chamber, he shows a large proportion of republicans who were very anxious to get up war and very few who were willing to fight in the wars.

But, sir, there is another reason why the South ought to be trusted. I say here that the South did not secede from hostility to the Union nor from hostility to the Constitution. That is your assumption. You are always talking about the southern people as enemies of the Union. Not a word of it is true. As I said, the South was driven into secession by the opposite extreme at the North, who were as inimical to the Constitution as the secessionists themselves. That is the truth, and every intelligent man and every honest man admits it. The aggravations of the slavery question got possession of their respective sections and carried them into war, but do you suppose every southern man who stood by his section in a sectional war was hostile to the Union? Not a word of it.

The Senate will pardon me if I refer to a little personal history in this connection, because I am a representative man, but before doing it I want to call the attention of the Senator from New York to another count of figures. He counted up the number of confederates from the South, as he calls them, in this House and in the other, and he says they have control of legislation, and then he notifies the North that they ought to be alarmed, because the legislation of this Union is under the lead of the same men who were here before the war. Now, I want to say to the Senator from New York that I have been making a count too, and strange as he may think it, while I have not been able to make the count with perfect accuracy, it is more accurate than his on another subject, much more. Of the eleven Senators and Representatives from Georgia in the present House and Senate nine, certainly eight, were opposed to secession.

Mr. CONKLING. When?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. When it occurred, and up to the time it was an accomplished fact. As for going with our States after secession was an accomplished fact, we shall not apologize to any mortal man. We stood up for our own section; but up to that dark hour four out of five of the men who represent Georgia to-day faced secession and fought it in more dangerous places than did you who now libel them; and from the best count I have been able to make, out of the ninety-three southern Senators and Representatives in this Congress about seventy-five were opposed to secession, four-fifths of the whole number. I do not make this statement for the purpose of saying that those who were in favor of secession are less to be trusted. By no means. They were brave and honest men who fought for their convictions and their section, and they have given their pledge and their word of honor, and the people are willing to trust them. But I refer to this for the purpose of showing a fact. It shows how sound the people are. The people of the South are not enemies of the Union in that they are willing to be represented by men here who were always true to the Union in the hour of doubt. They do not repudiate the Union sentiment that prevailed before the war nor allow it to be a reason why they should not be their representatives now.

But, sir, I want to give a little personal history, because I give it as a representative man and it is directly upon this question. South Carolina seceded, I believe, on the 20th of December, 1860. A convention was called by the people of Georgia to take into consideration the course that Georgia should pursue. That convention was called to meet on the 16th of January, 1861. The people of the county of Troup, in which I then lived, assembled en masse and requested me to represent them as a delegate in that convention. They made that nomination on the 25th of December, 1860, and appointed a committee to notify me of that nomination. I accepted, and, as was my duty, avowed to them the principle on which I should act as a member of that convention if chosen; and here is what I said in a letter then written and published:

I will consent to the dissolution of the Union as I would consent to the death of my father, never from choice, only from necessity, and then in sorrow and sadness of heart; for, after all, the Union is not the author of our grievance. Bad, extreme men in both sections of the Union abuse and insult each other, and all take revenge by fighting the Union which never harmed or insulted any. Perhaps it has blessed all above their merits. For myself, I will never ask from any government more real liberty and true happiness than I have enjoyed as a citizen of this great American Union. May they who destroy this Government in a frolic have wisdom to furnish our children a better.

And upon these sentiments, written and published at that day, the people of that county sent me their delegate to that convention without opposition. The convention assembled the 16th of January, 1861. On the 18th of January a debate took place on a resolution asserting the right and duty of the State to secede. I had the honor of making the last speech on that occasion against the resolution. The resolution, however, was adopted just at nightfall. A committee was appointed to report an ordinance to carry the resolution into effect. The ordinance of secession, therefore, actually passed on the 19th of January, 1861, though the resolution declaring it the duty to secede was passed on the 18th. On the night of the 19th I wrote a letter to a friend, which was then published, and a copy of it I now have in my hand. That was the night of the day of Georgia's secession.

MILLEDGEVILLE, January 19, 1861.

DEAR SIR: The deed is done. Georgia this day left the Union. Cannon have been firing and bells tolling. At this moment people are filling the streets shouting vociferously. A large torchlight procession is moving from house to house and calling out speakers. The resolution declaratory passed on yesterday, and similar scenes were enacted last night. The crowd called loudly for me, but my room was dark, my heart was sad, and my tongue was silent. Whoever may be in fault is not now the question. Whether by the North or by the South or by both, the fact remains; our Union has fallen. The most favored sons of freedom have written a page in history which despots will read to listening subjects for centuries to come to prove that the people are not capable of self-government. How can I think thus and feel otherwise than badly?

Do not understand me as intimating a belief that we cannot form a new union on the basis of the old Constitution. We can do it, and we will. This point we have secured as far as Georgia can secure it and her will on that subject will be the pleasure of her sister seceders. But can we form one with more inspiring hopes of perpetual life than did Washington and his comrades? Despots will say no; and therefore if the first Union lived only seventy-five years, how long will this live, and the next, and still the next, until anarchy comes! It will take an hundred years of successful, peaceful free government to answer the logic of this argument against constitutional liberty.

Sir, in 1868 I had a correspondence with that great man, Horace Greeley. In my judgment he did more to build up the republican party than any other man in America. He was a great and a good man, honest in his convictions and fearless in asserting them. The charge had been made that the South had sought war, that the southern people were not to be trusted. The correspondence is published in the Tribune of that day. I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I read an extract from that correspondence. The letter is dated New York, October 2, 1868. I will read the extract. Gentlemen can see the letter by looking at the New York Tribune of October 2, 1868. It is to Mr. Greeley:

Sir, let the deep sincerity of my convictions crave your indulgence for a few additional sentences. I am entitled to an audience from your readers, and through your assistance. I allude to the incident following in no spirit of reproach, but in entire kindness, and only to illustrate my point and my motive. I have seen the explanation of the Tribune, and recognize its force viewed from the stand-point of the Tribune, but our people did not then so understand it. On the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, nearly all the old whig leaders of the South joined the democracy. This left the whigs or Americans in a decided minority. It was then I felt it to be my duty to change the purpose of my life and enter politics.

It was my lot to engage with all my humble powers, from 1855 to 1861, in a vain effort to arrest the tide of secession that was sweeping the South, as I thought, into revolution. Late in the winter of 1860, more earnest than ever before, I warned our people that war, on the most unequal terms, must follow secession. On one of these occasions a distinguished secession gentleman replied to my war warnings by reading extracts from prominent northern republicans—and with special emphasis from the columns of the Tribune to the effect that if the people of the South desired to secede they had a right to do so, and would be allowed to do so in peace. He then alluded to me as one born and raised in the South, and yet was endeavoring to frighten our people from their rights by threats of war, while northern free-soilers, who had been esteemed the enemies of the South, were conceding our rights and assuring its peaceful exercise. Now, my good sir, what could I have rejoined? Here are the very words I did rejoin:

I call your attention to that—

"I care not what Mr. Greeley and Mr. Wade, or any other republican, or all republicans together, have said or may say to the contrary. More to be relied on than all these, I plant myself on the inflexible laws of human nature, and the unvarying teachings of human experience, and warn you this day that no government half as great as this Union can be dismembered and in passion except through blood. You had as well expect the fierce lightning to rend the air and wake no thunder in its track as to expect peace to follow the throes of dissolving government. I pass by the puerile taunts at my devotion to the best interests of the people among whom I was born and reared, and trust my vindication to the realities of the future, which I deprecate and would avert, and again tell you that dissolve this Union and war will come. I do not say it ought to come. I cannot tell when, nor how, nor between whom it will come; but it will come, and it will be to you a most unequal, fierce, vindictive, and desolating war."

I have reason to know that those words impressed Mr. Greeley. How could a northern free-soiler stand up and charge infidelity to the Union when that northern free-soiler, as many of them did, had told the southern people that it was their real desire that the South should secede and they could do so in peace. But there were men all over the South who stood up in that mad hour and warned their people what would result, that these free-soil teachings must not be listened to.

Sir, I am reading these things to show the sentiment in the South. The southern people did not secede from hostility to the Union nor hostility to the Constitution nor from any desire to be rid of the system of Government under which they had lived.

The highest evidence is what is given you in the very act of secession, when they pledged themselves to form a new union upon the model of the old. The very night when I was writing that letter and the serenading bands were in the streets I wrote to my friends, "We will be able to effect a new union upon the model of the old," and we did form a constitution which varied not one whit in principle from the one under which we had lived.

No, sir; the South seceded because there was a war made upon what she believed to be her constitutional rights by the extreme men of the North. Those extreme men of the North were gaining absolute power in the Federal Government as the machinery by which to destroy southern property. Then the northern people said, a large number of the leaders and the republican party said, that if secession was desired to be accomplished it should be accomplished in peace. Mr. Greeley said that they wanted no union pinned together by bayonets. Here is the condition in which the South was placed: they believed the northern extremists would use the machinery of the Government to their injury; the people of the South believed that they would protect their property by forming a new union in the South precisely upon the basis of the old. They believed they could do it in peace; and I say here there were thousands upon thousands, yea, hundreds of thousands of the best men of the South who believed that the only way to avoid a war was to secede. They believed the northern conscience wanted to get rid of the responsibility for slavery; they believed they had a right to protect their slave property, and they thought they would accommodate the northern conscience by leaving the Union and preserving that property. They believed they could do it in peace and if they had believed that a war would result they never would have seceded.

Mr. President, how was it at the North? How was it with many who are now clamoring in this country that the Southern people will not do to be trusted? I shall never forget an instance. Notwithstanding those sentiments which I have read to the Senate, the convention at Milledgeville selected me as one of the delegates to the provisional congress at Montgomery, which met, I believe, on the 4th of February, 1861. Up to that very hour those of us who believed that the interest of the South was in the Union looked to the North anxiously to avert war. We believed in our hearts that if war could be averted for a few months the Union could be restored on terms honorable to all parties. Virginia had not gone out. Virginia had a glorious record in this country. It was the eloquent voice of her Patrick Henry which aroused the colonies to resistance to tyranny. It was her Jefferson who framed the Declaration of Independence. It was her Madison who was the father of the Constitution under which we live. It was her Washington who conducted our armies to victory in the great struggle for liberty. It was Virginia that first made the call for the convention that framed the Constitution. No man can ever know with what gladness and hope I saw glorious old Virginia issue a request to the States of this Union in that dark hour to meet in conference and see if the peace could not be preserved and the differences adjusted between the sections.

I am not ashamed to say here, and I said there, a member of the provisional congress of the Confederate States as I was, that my heart was with that proposition, and I prayed God that it might have success. Seven States had gone out, and they could not co-operate in that peace convention. Virginia undertook the peace conference with her sister border States. I watched every movement giving hope of its success. What did we see? These very men who are now dinning the weary air with charges of infidelity upon the southern people, who are absolutely defiling themselves with calumnies upon everything southern, went to work to defeat the purpose of Virginia and to defeat the peaceful purposes of that movement. I shall never forget the feelings I had when I read letters from leading citizens in Washington, leading and controlling members of the republican party, written to the governors of their States asking them not to send delegates to that convention, and preventing its success. Here is one of the letters:

WASHINGTON, February 11, 1861.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: Governor Bingham and myself telegraphed to you on Saturday at the request of Massachusetts and New York to send delegates to the peace or compromise congress. They admit that we were right and they were wrong; that no republican State should have sent delegates; but they are here and cannot get away. Ohio, Indiana, and Rhode Island are caving in, and there is danger of Illinois—

"Caving in" how? Becoming willing to compromise to preserve the peace. He called that "caving in"— and now they beg us, for God's sake, to come to their rescue and save the republican party from rupture. I hope you will send stiff-backed men or none. The whole thing was gotten up against my judgment—

That is, the whole conference, the peace conference.

The whole thing was gotten up against my judgment, and will end in thin smoke. Still I hope, as a matter of courtesy to some of our erring brethren, that you will send the delegates.

Truly, your friend,

Z. CHANDLER.

His Excellency AUSTIN BLAIR.

He adds a postscript:

P. S.—Some of the manufacturing States think that a fight would be awful. Without a little blood-letting this Union will not, in my estimation, be worth a rush.

Sir, I was standing at the door of my hotel in Montgomery when that letter was put in my hands. I was looking to see the prospects from this peace conference. I do not wish to do anybody injustice. I do not know the gentleman who wrote that letter. It is only one of many, and it showed a purpose on the part of the republican party to defeat all efforts at peace, a peaceful adjustment. I said to a friend standing by me, "this is terrible; it is sad. If the leading republicans seek to defeat the purpose of Virginia in this peace convention it will fail; but, if war shall come, I predict now that those men who are so anxious to let blood for the Union will never let any of their own blood; they are anxious to let other people's blood." That is what I said then. I do not know whether it came true or not. Did "Z. CHANDLER" let any of his blood? I said more. I said, "I will venture that these men at the North, who are so clamorous to defeat this peace movement will not only not go into the war, but they will seek easy places and make money during the whole time it lasts." I do not know whether any of them did it or not. I will not say they did. I am merely stating a fact of history.

Now, the Senator from New York tells me that of all the loyal men on his side of the House who were clamoring at the rebels as unworthy of being trusted, men who in the terrible war of secession were battling for the Union, only four of the whole number now on this floor were willing to save the Union by shedding their own blood Sir, will the people look at these things? You could not have pronounced a higher eulogy upon the confederates in this Congress than when you showed that eighty-five out of ninety-three were willing to give their blood for what they believed to be right.

Sir, that peace conference was broken up. I put it to the northern people who claim that they were looking to the preservation of the Union, looking to the preservation of their rights, who is most to be trusted, those men at the South who were doing all they could to avert war, or those men at the North who were doing all they could to bring it on and then refusing to take any part in it? I know that the republican party claim that they alone saved the Union. It is a claim of which history will judge, and it will make the claim not good. If there had been no republican party the Union would never have been endangered. If there had been no republican party there would have been no secession, no war, no reconstruction, no returning boards, and no electoral commissions. It will always be an impeachment of the statesmanship of America that they were not wise enough and deliberate enough to dispose of the question of slavery without shedding each other's blood. If the South had respected as she ought the conscience of the North on this subject, and if the North had respected as she ought the property of the South, and there had been no obstruction from the leaders of the republican party, there might have been a peaceful settlement of the whole controversy. Then a million of glorious, brave spirits that are now sleeping in their graves might be living, and millions more that are widows and orphans might have husbands and fathers, and millions more who are traveling through the country houseless and naked and hungry might have raiment and shelter and plenty.

Yet the Senator from Maine finds in the passage of the bill that passed yesterday a stronger assertion of the State-rights power than has ever taken place before. What a declaration was that!

I shall not debate this bill—

Said the Senator from Maine.

It were useless. It has been exhaustively debated. The whole measure is a removal of the Federal Government from its proper domain and the installation of the States into degrees of power that were not dreamed of by Calhoun and were not asserted by Breckinridge.

Is it possible a bill which simply says that the Army and Navy shall not be placed at the polls is a stronger assertion of secession or the doctrine of State rights than was ever made by Calhoun or Breckinridge? What is the purpose of such language as that but to alarm and awe. A bill which proposes to put the people of this country just where they were for seventy-five years, a bill which proposes to put the people of this country just where they were under Washington, just where they were under Jefferson, just where they were under Adams, just where they were from 1790 to 1865, is a bill to endanger this Union more than the war of secession, according to the interpretation of the Senator from Maine! That is not all. The Senator from Maine became perfectly dynamitic:

Pass this bill. Pass it as the triumph of the reactionary party against the spirit of the Union. Pass it in defiance of all the lessons and all the teachings that have come from a bloody and abortive rebellion. Pass it, and mark it as the high tide of that reaction which were it to rise higher could lead only to another and more formidable rebellion against the legitimate authority of the Union. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Who is talking about war now? Who was talking about war when Virginia was talking about peace? Sir, I will not do injustice to the American character by collating, as I could do, the number of sentiments that have been uttered upon this floor and in the other House during the last six weeks intimating that the people of the North would have another war, another war that is to cut deeper than the first and cut beyond the wound. Whom will you have the war with? A war because we want intelligence, virtue, and property represented in the jury-box! A war because we want to keep the Army from the polls! A war because we want to say to the States, "You are able and willing to control your elections as you have done for seventy-five years of the Government and we will trust you to do it again!" A war for that! A war because we stand here as a bulwark of defense for the Constitution of the country against disunionists who would destroy the Union by destroying the States! A war because we will not consent to manacle the States of this Union, because we will not centralize power in this Government!

Sir, I hope the people of America will not commit another mistake. I always said it was a fearful mistake that the people of the North who did not agree with the republican party and the people of the South who did not agree to secession could not have managed to preserve this Union and let the others alone go to battle. If war must come, with whom shall it come? As I said to my own people on one occasion, and I repeat it here, if war shall come—God forbid that it should ever come—I give them notice now that the men they call rebels, that the men they say are not trustworthy, we of the South to a man will go to battle under the Star and Stripes, under the flag of our country. Do not imagine that the destroyers of the States and the advocates of monarchy shall ever again bear the flag of our country. If you must have a war, we shall maintain our rights in the Union; but I pray God the people will take charge of this question and see where the danger lies.

You say the northern people are alarmed. I assure you they have no right to be alarmed with us of the South. I assure you they have no right to be alarmed at southern representatives on this floor and in the other House; but I tell you the northern people have a right to be alarmed by such threats as have been made here. They have a right to be alarmed by men who say or intimate that if they cannot control the Government, if they cannot surround the polls of freemen with armed men, if they cannot take control of the elections in the States by Federal supervisors they will come to another war and cut deeper than the core. They are the men for the North to be alarmed at, not we.

But, as I said in this letter to Mr. Greeley, the Constitution could not be destroyed without war any more than the Union could be dissolved without war, and the States can no more be destroyed without war than they can be divided without war. I said that the danger to the country was imminent, and I so confessed it to him; that I feared that the course of the extreme men who had remained untouched by the war, secession being utterly crushed out, consolidation being not only alive but insolent by reason of its apparent success—I believed another war would come; but I believe Providence has averted that; I believe the very condition of things which seems to alarm the country is going to save this country and preserve its peace. I believe that the democratic majority in the House and the democratic majority in the Senate are going to be able to take care of this country, preserve its peace, promote its glories, and increase its prosperity.

We appeal to the people. We are going to the people in favor of the Constitution of Madison, the Constitution of Webster. We are going to the people in favor of their own freedom at the polls, in favor of their own intelligence in the jury-box, in favor of the independence of the States in the management of their elections, as had always been the case heretofore. The people will answer, in my judgment, North as well as South.

The course the gentlemen are pursuing, so far from bringing the day which they expect—of the reversal of a majority of this body—will, as I believe, increase it. Men who have lost by revolution, men who have lost all by revolution, are the ones who are not going to force another revolution. Men who owe all they have to revolution, who owe wealth and position and power to revolution, who owe the highest honors of the Republic to revolution, are the men who may be fairly expected to want revolution again. They are the ones for the people to fear.

But the Senator from New York and the Senator from Maine, as various other gentlemen have done before, take occasion to remind us that they were exceedingly gracious to us after the war. The Senator from New York tells us that after reconstruction was completed none of our property was confiscated and none of us were disfranchised and none of us were imprisoned. That is a fact, after reconstruction was completed. He takes credit for turning us loose after he had completed reconstruction and reorganized the States upon his idea. I do not put the comparison as applicable to the Senator from New York, but it is just as true of the robber who claims credit for kindness to the traveler because he had done him no harm after he had robbed him and let him go, because since the time he had let him go he had done him no harm at all.

Sir, the Senators are mistaken if they do not think we understand to what we owe our redemption. It is not to the republican party. The republican party set aside our State governments. The Senator from Maine the other day said there had been only fourteen thousand citizens disfranchised in the South. The Senator confounded disabilities under the fourteenth amendment with disfranchisement. There were at least two hundred and fifty thousand citizens disfranchised in the South.

Mr. BLAINE. I said by the action of the Federal Government.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly, by the action of the Federal Government; by the reconstruction acts of Congress. By the reconstruction acts you came down there and took possession of our States, set aside our State governments, declared we had no legal State governments, and you created a constituency and created new governments and disfranchised two hundred and fifty thousand of the very best men, the most intelligent, the property-holding men in the whole South, at a time when our governments were destroyed, when our industrial system was destroyed, and you put us in the hands of our slaves, under the lead of strangers, men who came for no purpose but to get power over us and build governments for us, and we had to stand by and witness the process, threatened with confiscation and exile if we dared resist. And there were two hundred and fifty thousand in that condition.

Do gentlemen say that we owe anything to them? Did not my friend from Kentucky quote from the Senator from Maine in 1868 a statement that there was nothing more to be feared from the South? You thought you had destroyed us. You created new constituencies and created governments to suit them; you had the power. You thought we were powerless forever, and then, like the wicked Delilah, you said:

Samson, the Philistines be upon you.

And they were. And after that you left, and left us, as you thought, bound with your cords and whips. It was then that the Samson of State sovereignty stretched himself and burst them all.

Mr. HOAR. And pulled down the temple?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Well, I should think, if the Senator would go through the South, he would find his carpet-bag temples in that country just now in the returning boards. There is nothing so sacred to him as a returning board. That is all that was left.

It was through this very agency of the autonomy and sovereignty of the States that we were able to recover ourselves, not by violence, not by intimidation as you falsely charge, but by the very autonomy of the States which you thought you had manacled, which you thought you had destroyed. It is to this very autonomy of the States that we owe our presence here to-day. Oh, but you say the South is solid. That is true. And you intimate to the North that we are solid against the Union. That is not true. There is not a word of truth in it. We are solid. Solid how? Solid against whom? Solid against the republican party. Why should we not be? Do you wonder? The past is enough to make us solid. But let that go. I would remember nothing in the spirit of revenge. Do you think, Senators, that such speeches as you have been making here during the last four weeks have no tendency to make the South solid against your party? Do you think that such speeches as you have been making in the House have no such tendency? Do you think that it is perfectly legitimate and proper for you to calumniate and slander and misrepresent and abuse us in every form in which language will authorize you to do it, and that we are going to love you for it? You may not know it, but we are men. You pick up every vagabond in the South who can be induced by any motive to testify against us, and you believe him, you praise him. In your papers you scatter it through all your country. You make it appear that we are rebellious. I do not care how vile a character he is, I do not care how covered with crime he is, if he testifies to barbarities and cruelties against the best class of southern people you believe him, you profess to believe him; you parade that testimony on this floor; you parade it on the floor of the other House; you parade it before the northern people; and I do not care how manly, how intelligent, how earnest a man may be that testifies justly for the southern people and gives them credit for honor and honesty, you discredit him as unworthy of belief.

That alone would be sufficient to make the South solid, but the South is solid against the republican party for another reason. We regard the republican party as only a sectional party. It was sectional in its origin. I will not say anything about the questions which then divided us, but it was a sectional party; it had no organization save in some of the States. It has been sectional in its history; it has been sectional in its doctrines; it has been sectional in its purposes; it has been sectional in its triumphs; it is sectional now. You never have had any organization in the South except that which you forced and bought—and that could not last—and you never will.

Now, we have tried sectionalism and we have abandoned it, and therefore we cannot consistently affiliate with the republican party. We are for national parties now. We come back to the grand old party of the North that never went off after secession, that never went after the Baals of consolidation. If there are any men on this earth for whom I have a higher regard than others, they are the democrats of the North. I know those of us at the South who were for the Union went through a trying ordeal, and none can ever know how trying it was except those who passed through it; but it seems to me the northern democrats who were so maligned and abused by the republicans went through a greater, for when the crisis came they that had no sympathy with the objects or purposes of the republican party shouldered their arms and marched side by side with the republicans of the North to put down their real friends in the South, and they did it. And yet, notwithstanding their fidelity to the Union, notwithstanding so many hundreds of thousands of democrats periled their all in the war, you abuse, you malign them, you give them no credit for it. And why do we affiliate with them? Because when we grounded our arms they met us as brethren and not as enemies.

Then, again, we never can affiliate with the republican party for a higher reason, a greater reason than the one I have given. The republican party to-day is the representative and the only representative on this continent of the consolidation theory of our Government, the theory, not of a mixed union, federal and national, the theory of an absolute nationalism, a theory which in its doctrines is seeking at this very hour to destroy the States of this Union. While we have abandoned secession, while we have agreed never to divide the States, we have never agreed to destroy the States; we will not agree to do it.

And then, gentlemen, because of your conduct, your calumnies, your slanders, what we know to be slanders, the South is solid against you. Every day things are repeated upon this floor against ten millions of people which no gentleman would dare repeat against one man. You charge a whole people with being false, untrustworthy, untrue, without evidence, against the fact, and yet you alarm the North by crying of a solid South. You seek to destroy the States when so far from yielding our devotion to the States we owe all that is left of us to the States and to that very principle of the Government which recognizes the States as a part of our system.

Sir, if the South were solid from any motives of hostility to the Union, from any motives of hostility to the Constitution, from any motives of hostility to the northern people, the South would be exceedingly reprehensible. We were made solid in defense of our own preservation; we are now solid in defense of our own honor and self-respect. We will be kept solid in defense of the Constitution of our fathers as interpreted by Madison and expounded by Webster. We would be glad, if it could be, to see two national parties in this country, national in organization, national in principles, national in hopes, and consistent with the true interpretation of the Constitution; but the northern man who after having made the South solid by calumny, by wrongs piled mountain high extending through years, that northern man who takes advantage of the wrongs he has inflicted upon the South, and thereby made them solid, who now undertakes for that very reason to make the North solid too, having a solid North against a solid South, is a disunionist in fact, for whenever we shall have a solid North and a solid South in this country the Union cannot last.

No, my good northern democratic brethren, you saved the country at last; you saved the Union in the hour of its peril; not the republican party. You who had showed devotion to your flag saved the Union, and now it is for you to go before your people and tell them that the solid North must never become a fact against the solid South. If so, disunion will be accomplished. It is you that we look to. You saved the Union and you will save the States. We could not help you save the Union, but we are here with all the power that God has given us to help you preserve and save the States of this country against the only remaining enemy of either the States or the Union.

Mr. President, I know I have detained the Senate long. I was born a slaveholder. That was a decree of my country's laws, not my own. I never bought a slave save at his own request; and of that I am not ashamed. I was never unkind to a slave, and all I ever owned will bear cheerful testimony to that fact. I would never deprive a human being, of any race, or color, or condition, of his right to the equal protection of the laws; and no colored man who knows me believes I would. Of all forms of cowardice, that is the meanest which would oppress the helpless, or wrong the defenseless; but I had the courage to face secession in its maddest hour and say I would not give the American Union for African slavery, and that if slavery dared strike the Union, slavery would perish. Slavery did perish, and now in this high council of the greatest of nations, I face the leaders of State destruction and declare that this ark of our political covenant, this constitutional casket of our confederate nation, encasing as it does more of human liberty and human security and human hope than any government ever formed by man, I would not break for the whole African race. And cursed, thrice cursed forever be the man who would! Sir, in disunion through the disintegration of the States I have never been able to see anything but anarchy with its endless horrors. In disunion through the destruction of the States I have never been able to see anything but rigid, hopeless despotism, with all its endless oppression. In disunion by any means, in any form, for any cause, I have never been able to see anything but blood, and waste, and ruin to all races and colors and conditions of men. But in the preservation of our Union of States, this confederate nation, I have never been able to see anything but a grandeur and a glory such as no people ever enjoyed. I pray God that every arm that shall be raised to destroy that Union may be withered before it can strike the blow.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire to proceed to-night, but would like to retain the floor. With the consent of the Senate I will yield to the Senator for a moment if I may do so without losing the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, by the consent of the Senator from Minnesota I shall occupy the time of the Senator for a moment.

Mr. President, this is the fourth time since 1861 that allusion has been made to a letter written by me to the governor of the State of Michigan; first it appeared in a newspaper published in Detroit, a copy of which was sent to me and a copy was likewise sent to the late Senator Powell. The letter was a private note written to the governor and no copy retained. Senator Powell approached me with his copy of the letter and asked if it was a correct copy. I told him I did not know; I had written to the governor of Michigan a private note and had kept no copy and could not say whether this was correct or not. He told me that if it was a correct copy he would wish to make use of it, and if it was not he did not propose to make use of it. I said, "Sir, I will adopt it, and you may make any use of it you please." So to-day that is my letter. If not originally written by me, it is mine by adoption.

And, Mr. President, what were the circumstances under which that letter was written? I had been in this body then nearly four years listening to treason day by day and hour by hour. The threat, the universal threat daily, hourly, was, "Do this or we will dissolve the Union; if you do not do that we will dissolve the Union." Treason was in the White House, treason in the Cabinet, treason in the Senate, and treason in the House of Representatives; bold, outspoken, rampant treason was daily and hourly uttered. The threat was made upon this floor in my presence by a Senator, "You may give us a blank sheet of paper and let us fill it up as we please, and then we will not live with you." And another Senator stood here beside that Senator from Texas and said, "I stand by the Senator from Texas." Treason was applauded in the galleries of this body, and treason was talked on the streets, in the street-cars, in private circles; everywhere it was treason—treason in your Departments, traitors in the White House, traitors around these galleries, traitors everywhere.

The flag of rebellion had been raised; the Union was already dissolved, we were told; the rebel government was already established with its capital in Alabama; "and now we will negotiate with you," was said to us. Upon what basis would you negotiate? Upon what basis did you call your peace convention? With rampant rebellion staring us in the face. Sir, it was no time to negotiate. The time for negotiation was past. We had offered everything we could in the way of negotiation, everything in the way of compromise, and all our proffers had been indignantly refused.

Sir, this was the condition of affairs when that letter was written; and after Mr. Powell had made his assault upon me in this body for it, I instantly responded, relating what I have related here now with regard to the letter, and I said, "I stand by that letter," and I stand by it now. What was there in it then, and what is there in it now? The State of Michigan was known to be in favor of the Constitution and the Union and the enforcement of the laws, even to the letting of blood if need be, and that was all there was and all there is in that letter. Make the most of it.

The Senator from Georgia says that I did not shed any blood. How much blood did he shed? [Laughter.] Will somebody inform us the exact quantity of blood that the Senator from Georgia shed?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The difference between us is that I was not in favor of shedding anybody's blood.

Mr. CHANDLER. Nor I, except to punish treason and traitors. Sir, the Senator is not the man to stand up on this floor and talk about other men saving their own blood. He took mighty good care to put his blood in Fort Lafayette where he was out of the way of rebel bullets as well as Union bullets. He is the last man to stand up here and talk to me about letting the blood of others be shed.

Mr. President, I was then, as I am now, in favor of the Government of the United States. Then, as now, I abhorred the idea of State sovereignty over national sovereignty. Then, as now, I was prepared even to shed blood to save this glorious Government. Then, as now, I stood up for the Constitution and the Union. Then, as now, I was in favor of the perpetuity of this glorious Government. But the Senator from Georgia was, as he testified before a committee, "a Union secessionist." I have the testimony here before me. Will somebody explain what that means—"a Union secessionist?" Mr. President, I should like to see the dictionary where the definition can be found of "a Union secessionist!" I do not understand the term.

He says that they have a right to have a solid South, but a solid North will destroy the Government. Why, Mr. President, the South is no more solid to-day than it was in 1857.

Several SENATORS. Eighteen hundred and sixty-one, you mean.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, it was the same in 1857. It was just as solid in 1857 as it is to-day. It has been solid ever since, and it was no quarrel with the North that made it solid. It was solid because it was determined either to "rule or ruin" this nation. It tried the "ruin" scheme with arms; and now having failed to ruin this Government with arms, it comes back to ruin it by withholding supplies to carry on the Government. Sir, the men have changed since 1857. There is now but one member on this floor who stood here with me on the 4th of March, 1857. The men have changed, the measures not at all. You then fought for the overthrow of this Government, and now you vote and talk for the same purpose. You are to-day, as you were then, determined either to rule or ruin this Government, and you cannot do either.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I desire simply to make one remark only; and that is this: the testimony to which the Senator from Michigan refers, taken by the ku-klux committee in Atlanta, contains, I believe, what he says—I have never seen it for I have never read it all over in my life—the term that I was "a Union secessionist." I will simply say that that testimony was written out after the stenographer and the committee left Atlanta. There are several typographical errors in it, and some mistakes of that sort such as get even into the RECORD or anywhere else occasionally; but I never used an expression of that sort.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky who has charge of the bill, that I do not wish to proceed to-night, but I would like to cite one little scrap of history suggested by the remarks of the honorable Senator from Georgia. I shall occupy the Senate only two or three minutes.

The burden of the speech of the Senator from Georgia since I came into the Senate Chamber was that secession was brought about by the extremists of the North who threatened to take away the property of the South. Now I want to read to him, for I think he must have forgotten it, what those extremists of the North did in February, 1861. There was then a republican House of Representatives, and they passed this proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States by a two-thirds vote:

> No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere within any State with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State.

I am not here to defend that amendment, but a republican House of Representatives passed it by a two-thirds vote and it was agreed to by the Senate of the United States, and submitted to the people for their adoption. Mr. Lincoln, a few days afterward, in his inaugural address, used this language:

> Apprehension seems to exist among the people of the Southern States, that, by the accession of a republican administration, their property and their peace, and personal security, are to be endangered. There has never been any reasonable cause for such apprehension. Indeed, the most ample evidence to the contrary has all the while existed, and been open to their inspection. It is found in nearly all the published speeches of him who now addresses you. I do but quote from one of those speeches, when I declare that "I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists." I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so.

That is the manner in which the extremists of the North compelled this Union-loving people of the South to secede for fear they would lose their slave property!

I yield to the Senator from Kentucky for a motion to adjourn now.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1492) to amend section 688 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to writs of prohibition and mandamus; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three additional assistants in the Library of Congress; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GORDON. I ask indulgence long enough to make a remark in reference to a vote given by myself yesterday. Before I left for Georgia, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] was kind enough to pair with me at my request. On my return, not observing that he was out of the Senate, I proceeded to give one vote yesterday, when I was reminded by another Senator on that side of the Chamber that the Senator from Nebraska himself was absent. I therefore wish to explain that I gave that vote inadvertently. Afterward, I announced my pair with him. I should have announced it at the time if I had observed that he was not in the Chamber.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1492) to amend section 688 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to writs of prohibition and mandamus, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK. I rise for the purpose of saying that I have no idea of sitting the bill out any further to-night, and therefore I propose to make a motion to adjourn. Before doing so, I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota to allow us on Monday morning to proceed, say, until half past one with the bill before he begins to speak. By that hour, perhaps, we shall have reached the part of the bill to which he desires to speak.

Mr. WINDOM. I am entirely content with that arrangement.

Mr. BECK. Let us proceed with the bill until half past one on Monday, and then the Senator can speak. I move now that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 10, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. ORTH. On behalf of a minority of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, I ask unanimous consent that certain amendments designed to be offered to the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts be ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

VINEGAR FACTORIES.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1843) relating to vinegar factories established and operated prior to March 1, 1879; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. I move that the rules be suspended, so as to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. ACKLEN. I trust we shall have a morning hour.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let us not dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. WARNER. If it is the desire of the House to have the morning hour, I will withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The vote on the motion will test the desire of the House.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WARNER, it was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock.

JURISDICTION OF SUPREME COURT.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1492) to amend section 688 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read. It provides that section 688 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by striking out, in the second and third lines of said section, the words "in the district courts when proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," so that the section will read, when amended, as follows:

SEC. 688. The Supreme Court shall have power to issue writs of prohibition and writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed under the authority of the United States, or to persons holding office under the authority of the United States, where a State, or an embassador or other public minister, or a consul or vice-consul, is a party.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to state that a bill embracing the same provisions as this was introduced in the last Congress by my friend from Alabama, [Mr. HERBERT,] was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, was unanimously reported by that committee, and was passed in this House without objection; but for the want of time the Senate did not act on it. Another bill containing the same provision was, at the last session, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and by that committee unanimously approved. This bill simply proposes to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as to the issue of writs of prohibition and mandamus in other than maritime and admiralty cases.

Mr. McCOOK. Is this a unanimous report?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes, sir, from both committees.

Mr. McCOOK. Was the bill ever referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes, sir. In the last Congress the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, was unanimously reported by that committee and passed unanimously by the House. The bill has also received the unanimous approval of both committees in this Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to hear the bill again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask whether this bill is now with the Judiciary Committee? Has it been referred to that committee?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It has been ordered to be reported by that committee.

Mr. DUNNELL. I cannot understand how the same bill can be referred to two committees.

Mr. HERBERT. I will answer the gentleman's question. The bill was called up yesterday before the Judiciary Committee, and on consideration I was instructed by the unanimous vote of that committee to report it back to the House and ask for its passage. We have since been informed that the same bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, of which the gentleman from Virginia is chairman. Both committees made unanimous report in favor of this bill, and I therefore join the gentleman from Virginia in asking for its passage.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I suggest to my friend from Virginia that he amend the title so as to show exactly what is the purpose of the act. This habit of referring to Revised Statutes without stating the object of the law in the title to it results in confusion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. What phraseology would the gentleman suggest?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that it be made an act relating to writs of prohibition and mandamus.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Very well; I will accept that amendment to the title.

The amended title was agreed to.

WAR OF 1812.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported back favorably a joint resolution (H. R. No. 39) construing the act of Congress approved March 9, 1878, so as to entitle widows of the soldiers of the war of 1812 to a pension notwithstanding a second marriage, provided they were widows at the date of said act or at the time of application.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that section 1 of an act entitled "An act amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and their widows, and for other purposes," approved March 9, 1878, shall be so construed as to entitle widows to the benefits of said act although they may have again married, provided they were widows at the time of the passage of said act or are widows at the time of their application for the benefit of said act.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the object of that resolution is to construe the act of March 9, 1878. That act authorized the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men without regard to color, including militia and volunteers in the naval and military service of the United States, who served fourteen days, &c., and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men. And surviving widows! Now, the Pension Bureau has construed the law so as to exclude a woman who married a second time, although her second husband was dead at the time of the passage of the law. The Commissioner holds that she is not a widow of a soldier of 1812, because during the intervening time she remarried, although that man has long since been dead and buried. The object of this resolution is to construe that law so as to place a widow who has had two husbands and had the misfortune to lose both, upon the same footing as a widow who had only one husband and lost him.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is this a change in the pension laws reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes, it is a report from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws construing the law.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is not that a construction of a pension law?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It has nothing to do with pension laws.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think anything which relates to the body of our pension laws ought to go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I believe it has been the uniform usage during the history of this Government that a widow's pension goes to her only while she is a widow; and that when she marries, when she chooses to desert the guardianship of the United States, the guardianship of the Government, the pension then ceases. As I understand the gentleman, this breaks down that rule which has governed from the beginning, and it seems to me it is a rule which is wise and just, that where a widow pensioner makes her election——

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Does he hold there is in this case a renouncing of the guardianship, so to speak, of the United States? At the time of the passage of this law she was not under the guardianship of the United States, because she did not have any pension. In the passage of this law we give it to the widow of the soldier. It could only be after the passage of the law that she renounces the guardianship of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the gentleman nevertheless if he approves this bill approves of a change of what has been the general law from the beginning. And if this change is made, then it ought to follow the change should be made universal. And the result would be a mass of applications for pensions of persons who had remarried, losing their rights under the law; and then when the husbands died or a divorce occurred came back, opening cases forty and sixty years old.

I think this is an unwise and uncalled for extension of the pension laws. It not only interferes with all the decisions which have been made hitherto, but it is a new opening in a new direction, which, if it is to be considered at all, ought to be considered by the Pension Committee in its relation to the whole body of our pension laws and not by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, whose proper duty is to rectify any manifest mistakes or inaccuracies in the form of the law and not to go into a change of the spirit and purpose and substance of the laws themselves. I hope this bill will not pass in its present shape. But not to antagonize all its purposes, I ask the committee to consent to its reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question: whether or not the committee have investigated to see how much the expense of the Government will be increased by the passage of this bill?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. There is no mode of ascertaining that point.

Mr. BLOUNT. It seems to me that ought to be known to this House before we are called upon to act on the bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. There can be very few widows of the war of 1812. The bill refers only to them and to no others. I am told the rule which has been stated applies in the Departments to pensions of the late war; but this is not a precedent for any other case than that now before the House. I am satisfied the House intended when they passed this law last year to give the pension to any widow of a soldier of the war of 1812 who was a widow, whether she had remarried once, twice, or thrice in the mean time.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. As I understand, the bill only provides for those who have married a second time and again become widows. It does not provide for one who has been thrice made a widow.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The bill covers the whole case. Its provisions are not restricted to those who have only remarried once. I do not see why a widow who was a widow at the time of the passage of this law should not be entitled to a pension, although she had remarried, as well as one who had not married again.

Mr. BREWER. In the law which applies to pensions to invalid soldiers of the late war and soldiers of the Mexican war is it not provided that when the widow marries the pension ceases?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That would be the case also under this bill. If the old lady who is in receipt of a pension should be silly enough to get married the pension would be stopped, and it ought to be stopped so long as she has a husband to take care of her. But when she is a widow she ought to receive the pension. I am surprised at the want of gallantry displayed in this matter by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is a question of justice, not of gallantry.

Mr. VANCE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia why he does not report an amendment to include those who served fourteen days in the war of 1812, though a portion of that time might have been after the proclamation of peace?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. We do not propose to change the general law at all, but simply to interpret the law. I am satisfied Congress meant that a pension should be given to any woman who had been married to a soldier of the war of 1812 who was a widow at the time of the passage of the act.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to allow a test vote on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that will be voted down; and if it is I will then move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The question being put on seconding the demand for the previous question there were ayes 46, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I consent to that.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1382) to prohibit military interference at elections.

REPORTER OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, also reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1493) defining the duties of reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, fixing his compensation, and providing for the publishing and distribution of said reports.

The bill was read. It provides that said reporter shall, when required by the said Supreme Court of the United States, attend its sessions and consultations, and under its direction report and prepare for publication its decisions and such other decisions as it may designate.

The second section provides that it shall cause to be reported, with as much brevity as practicable, its decisions, whether made in the disposing of a motion or otherwise, that determines any theretofore unsettled or new and important, or modifies any theretofore settled, question of law, or that gives construction to any statute of the United States, or of any State or Territory, or of any treaty made by the United States with any foreign nation or Indian tribe, together with such other of its decisions as may be deemed of public interest and importance.

The third section provides that it shall be the duty of said reporter immediately after the decision of any case to be reported to prepare for publication a report thereof, under the direction and supervision of said court, and in general conformity with the plan hitherto adopted and pursued, and when he shall have so prepared a sufficient number of decisions to form a volume of the size of the volumes of said reports known as Wallace's Reports, he shall also prepare an index and table of contents of said volume, and deliver the said reports with said index and table of contents to the Public Printer, who shall cause the same to be printed with all reasonable dispatch; provided that no argument of counsel shall be published with said report other than a brief of the points made and the authorities cited and relied upon by said counsel, unless specially ordered by said court.

The fourth section provides that said Public Printer shall cause said reports to be printed upon good white paper, and bound in law leather, in style not inferior to said Wallace's Reports, and shall deliver 300 copies thereof to the Secretary of the Interior, to be by him distributed as provided for by law, and the remainder he shall sell to such persons as may desire to purchase the same at a price not exceeding 10 per cent. in addition to the cost of printing and binding said reports; provided no person shall be permitted to purchase said reports for resale, unless he shall give bond in the penal sum of not less than $1,000 to the United States, to be approved by the judge of any United States court, with good and sufficient security, that he will not sell the same at a greater price than the cost of printing and binding, with 25 per cent. thereof added.

The fifth section provides that said Public Printer shall publish an edition of 2,000 copies of each volume of said reports, and when said edition is exhausted, as aforesaid, a second edition of 1,000 copies, or larger if the demand for the same makes it necessary.

The sixth section provides that said reporter shall receive for his services from the Treasury an annual salary of $4,500 when his reports of said decisions shall constitute but one volume, and an additional sum of $500 when there is printed and published more than one volume per year; but said salary shall only be paid when he causes said decisions to be delivered as aforesaid to said Public Printer.

The seventh section repeals sections 681 and 682 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to raise the point of order on this bill that it is not a bill which should properly come from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. This is a bill creating a new law, a new body of legislation touching the subject to which it relates. To report such a bill is not a part of any of the duties committed to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. It is a bill relating to the management of the affairs of the Supreme Court of the United States and the decisions of that court and is, in the very terms and nature of it, a bill that naturally belongs to and should come from the Committee on the Judiciary. I am not now speaking of the merits of the bill at all, but only of the order in which it should come before the House. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws has been understood from the beginning to be a committee to rectify manifest errors in the revision of the laws. It was a committee created in connection with the codification and revision of our statutes. That was so laborious a work, the codification of some eighteen or twenty volumes of statutes into one or two of a comprehensive and succinct body of laws, that it was found best to have a committee to supervise and test the correctness of the work.

It never has been understood to be any part of the duty of that committee to go into new legislation, except merely corrective of the codification of the laws. Here now is a bill entering into an entirely new field of operations; regulating the modes of practices in regard to the proceedings of the Supreme Court, and the publication of the report of them. While the bill may be well enough in itself, it certainly belongs to the Committee on the Judiciary, the law committee of the House, and therefore I make the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The point of order comes too late.

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill has never been read before.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The point of order should have been made when the bill was referred; but the House has given, by its reference to the committee, jurisdiction over the subject.

The SPEAKER. Was the bill referred in open House?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am not prepared to say positively, but I think it was during the morning hour of last Monday.

Mr. GARFIELD. We do not know whether it went in through the petition-box.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No, sir; it was introduced in open House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that if it went through in open House the question is properly raised. We cannot raise the question as to the reference of a bill, when it has never been read except by its title.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. You had a right to call for the reading of the bill then.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is the first time the bill has been read to the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. But you had a right to call for its reading when it was introduced.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not want the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to go uncontroverted. As to what properly comes within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, if gentlemen will examine into the organization of that committee it will be discovered the House gave that committee jurisdiction over all matters which properly came before the Committee on Unfinished Business. If they will examine what were the duties of the Committee on Unfinished Business they will find that that committee, which was organized as far back as 1795, was given jurisdiction over all bills or matters unfinished at the previous session of Congress.

Now, if the Committee on the Revision of the Laws has jurisdiction over unfinished business, the question is, was this bill introduced at the last session of Congress?

I understand that a bill of this identical import was introduced in the last Congress, and was undisposed of when that Congress adjourned. I maintain, then, that all unfinished business which came over to us from the last session of Congress comes within the jurisdiction of the committee. If any member disputes it, I can refer to authorities on the subject.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not care to discuss the question of jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will restate the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that the bill is not properly in the hands of the committee. The House has never heard the contents of the bill before.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not understand that under the rules of the House a matter of reference is such a matter as is subject to a point of order. The House may refer a bill to any committee that the majority of the House may desire to refer it to, and when it is so referred there is but one way by which the reference can be corrected, and that is by a motion to reconsider. When a bill is referred and no motion to reconsider is made, and the committee report it back, it is then in the custody or within the jurisdiction of the House and subject to its control, and the only remedy is, if the bill has been improperly referred, to move its reference to that committee to which it should properly have been referred.

Mr. KNOTT. I would ask the gentleman this question: after the bill has been referred in the morning hour of Monday how could it be brought back by a motion to reconsider?

Mr. SPRINGER. The rule provides that any gentleman may call for the reading of a bill, and the object of the rule is to enable members to know at the time what the bill contains.

Mr. KNOTT. That is not answering my question.

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill goes to a committee and cannot be brought back by a motion to reconsider, but the committee to which it is referred is in duty bound to report the bill. When the bill is reported it is not subject to a point of order that it was improperly referred, but gentlemen can move to refer it to the proper committee, or the committee may report the bill back and ask its reference to another committee. I have never known the point of order to be raised that a bill has been improperly referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that if any error has been committed in the reference of the bill it was committed by the House. The House had a right when the bill was introduced to regulate its reference, and the House constantly does regulate references, even during the morning hour of Monday, and divisions of the House take place as to the reference of bills.

Bills introduced in the House on Mondays, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, are bills referred with the understanding that they are not to be brought back under a motion to reconsider. Now, it has been the practice in the House for committees, when matters had been referred to them which they did not think came within their province, to report the fact to the House and ask for a proper reference; and the remedy is still in the House now. If this bill has, in the judgment of the House, been improperly referred, the House can refer it to the proper committee by voting down the previous question, when a motion to refer to another committee would be in order.

The Chair is of the opinion that, the bill having been referred to the committee by the House and acted on and reported by that committee, it is not subject to the point of order. The remedy of the gentleman is, as already stated by the Chair, in a motion to commit to some other committee should the demand for the previous question be refused.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a further point of order. I will say that I hope the Committee on the Revision of the Laws will pardon me; I do not desire to interfere with their proper jurisdiction.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Then why interpose any objection?

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that under Rule 112 this bill should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that point of order is well taken.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. This bill fixes the salary of the Supreme Court reporter, but it does not increase it.

The SPEAKER. Does it create any new office?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It does not.

The SPEAKER. Does it increase any salary?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It does not.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman refer the Chair to the section of the Revised Statutes relating to this subject?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Under the law and the present practice of the court the reporter of the Supreme Court receives an income of from $8,000 to $12,000 a year. The object of this bill is to provide that the decisions shall be published by the Government Printer like other public documents, and sold for cost and 10 per cent. additional.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman refer to the section of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am looking for it, and talking while I am looking.

Mr. FIELD. It is section 682 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It is as follows:

The reporter shall cause the decisions of the Supreme Court made during his office to be printed and published within eight months after they are made; and, within the same time, shall deliver 300 copies of the volumes of said reports to the Secretary of the Interior. And he shall, in any year when he is so directed by the court, cause to be printed and published a second volume of said decisions, of which he shall deliver, in like manner and time, 300 copies.

The reporter shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury an annual salary of $2,500, when his report of said decisions constitutes one volume, and an additional sum of $1,500 when, by direction of the court, he causes to be printed and published, in any year, a second volume. But said salary and compensation, respectively, shall be paid only when he causes such decisions to be printed, published, and delivered within the time and in the manner prescribed by law, and upon the condition that the volumes of said reports shall be sold by him to the public for a price not exceeding $5 a volume.

Some of these volumes can be published for a dollar and a half a volume, and the reporter gets all the profit above that sum to $5. We want the law so fixed that the country can have these reports cheap.

The SPEAKER. According to the statute the salary now provided by law for the Supreme Court reporter is $2,500 a year, and $1,500 additional under certain circumstances, making $4,000 in all. This bill, as the Chair reads it, provides an annual salary of $4,500, an increase of $500 over the present salary.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will move to amend by striking out the $500.

The SPEAKER. The point of order was made before the amendment was suggested. The Chair sustains the point of order and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three assistants in the Library of Congress.

PROOF IN LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. LOWE, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 436) to amend section 2290 so as to allow affidavits therein provided for to be administered by United States commissioners.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2290 of Revised Statutes be so amended as to allow the affidavits therein provided for to be administered by United States commissioners in all cases where the affiant resides in the same State as the United States commissioner.

The committee recommend that the bill be amended so as to read as follows:

That section 2290 of Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, so amended as to allow the affidavits therein provided for to be administered by United States commissioners in all cases where the affiant resides in the same State as the United States commissioner, as well as by the register or receiver, as provided in said section.

Mr. HURD. I move that this bill, with the pending amendments, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LOWE] reporting the bill does not demand the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor. I do not see how he can be taken off without his consent.

Mr. LOWE. This bill is very simple, and is in the interest of persons remote from the various land offices in the States. There is no necessity for its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. It provides that United States commissioners who are convenient to the people shall have the power to take these affidavits, and that they shall be filed with the receiver or with the register of the land office as is now provided by law. It does not deprive the register or the receiver of the land office from taking affidavits where doing so would be for the convenience of the people. But where the people live at a remote distance from the land office, as in my State, it is very convenient for them that the United States commissioner shall be empowered to take the necessary affidavits. Instead of requiring them to travel great distances—one hundred or two hundred miles—to make these affidavits, this bill provides that they may be taken before any United States commissioner and filed in the land office. These affidavits are simply the necessary and customary affidavits made in the entry of land. I call the previous question.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to hear the section read which it is proposed to amend.

Mr. LOWE. It is section 2290.

Mr. DUNNELL. It seems to me a very unwise measure to extend this privilege to the United States commissioners. The very law which it is proposed to amend did away with that argument relating to travel that was used at the time the act was passed. I ask that the section be read.

The section was read as follows:

The person applying for the benefit of the preceding section shall, upon application to the register of the land office in which he is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the register or receiver that he is the head of a family, or is twenty-one years or more of age, or has performed service in the Army or Navy of the United States, and that such application is made for his exclusive use and benefit, and that his entry is made for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, and not either directly or indirectly for the use or benefit of any other person; and upon filing such affidavit with the register or receiver, on payment of $5 when the entry is of not more than eighty acres, and on payment of $10 when the entry is for more than eighty acres, he shall thereupon be permitted to enter the amount of land specified.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to say a single word.

Mr. LOWE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. DUNNELL. This bill ought to have gone to the Committee on Public Lands. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws has no more to do with questions of this kind than the Committee on Commerce. All the bills that have been reported this morning from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws should have come either from the Judiciary Committee or from some other committee having charge of the subject.

Mr. LOWE. I cannot yield to the gentleman any further.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Alabama having called the previous question——

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman yielded to me.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hold that no debate is now in order.

The SPEAKER. But this bill is presented by a committee. The gentleman loses no right. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LOWE] to test the sense of the House on ordering the previous question. The Chair presumes the gentleman from Illinois does not want to cut off the gentleman from Minnesota, to whom, as the Chair understood, the gentleman from Alabama yielded for a question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from Minnesota to be discussing an irrelevant question, one already disposed of. I did not understand the gentleman from Alabama to yield for any such purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not undertake to decide what point the gentleman from Minnesota is discussing; but the Chair understood the gentleman from Alabama to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota for a question.

Mr. LOWE. But not for a point of order already decided by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided no point of order on this bill.

Mr. LOWE. But the same point was decided on the bill preceding this.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I raise the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama has not yielded to the gentleman from Minnesota, and that the latter gentleman is speaking out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Alabama to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota for a question. The gentleman from Minnesota will ask his question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated over and over again that he did.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have raised the question whether the accommodations which the bill now pending seeks to extend to the people are not already provided for in the Revised Statutes. I have before me section 2294 of the revision, on which I base my question. That section is in these words:

SEC. 2294. In any case in which the applicant for the benefit of the homestead, and whose family, or some member thereof is residing on the land which he desires to enter, and upon which a bona fide improvement and settlement have been made, is prevented, by reason of distance, bodily infirmity, or other good cause, from personal attendance at the district land office, it may be lawful for him to make the affidavit required by law before the clerk of the court for the county in which the applicant is an actual resident, and to transmit the same, with the fee and commissions, to the register and receiver.

Now, here we have all the provisions of law called for——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota will indicate his question.

Mr. LOWE. I want to hear what the question is. I do not care to hear an argument. I am willing to answer any question.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will ask the gentleman whether the pending bill can possibly give any facilities not already secured by the section I have read. It seems to me the bill simply multiplies officers to do the same kind of business.

Mr. LOWE. I answer the gentleman that the bill can and does give increased facilities. If the gentleman has ears to hear, let him hear. The bill provides that the United States commissioners, when convenient to the people, may take these affidavits. It does not multiply officers. It simply gives the people power to go to any convenient United States commissioner, make affidavit before this officer, and send it to the land office.

Mr. DUNNELL. Why not also give the same power to the judge of probate or the district court?

Mr. LOWE. I am willing to give it to any court of record.

Mr. DUNNELL. I trust the House will see the confusion that may result from the passage of such a bill.

Mr. LOWE. As these commissioners are United States officers, it was deemed eminently proper that they should be empowered to take these affidavits.

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to make the inquiry whether this matter has been referred to a committee?

The SPEAKER. The bill comes up upon a report from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. BRIGHT. I submit that the discussion which has been going on involves the consideration of questions that properly belong to the committee, and about which they will report in due time.

The SPEAKER. The bill is reported from a committee.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LOWE] demands the previous question. If the House desires to refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands or to the Committee on the Judiciary, it can reach the end by voting down the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was not seconded, there being—ayes 38, noes 78.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] who first indicated a purpose to move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, is recognized to make that motion. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] moves to amend so as to refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. DUNNELL. It clearly belongs to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SAMFORD. I desire to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I introduced this bill; and in answer to his question whether or not it would be more convenient to individuals to empower United States commissioners to take these affidavits I desire to say——

The SPEAKER. The question now under consideration is simply upon the reference of the bill.

Mr. SAMFORD. I do not desire to say anything on that question, but simply on the merits of the bill. This is only a question of convenience. There can be no valid objection to allowing United States commissioners to take these affidavits; and it was upon a petition of several citizens that I introduced the bill. In many localities it is inconvenient to go before the clerk of the court to make affidavit; and there being no valid objection to giving this power to United States commissioners, as a mere matter of convenience to the people I introduced the bill; and thinking the Committee on the Revision of the Laws the proper committee, I asked that reference.

Mr. DUNNELL. The bill can be as well taken care of by the Committee on the Public Lands.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DUNNELL, to refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands, there were—ayes 69, noes 52.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment of Mr. DUNNELL was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. HURD, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

That sections 639 and 647, of chapter 7 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to the removal of causes from State courts into circuit courts of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That section 641 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the words "or criminal prosecution;" also, by striking out in the same section the words "or prosecution;" also, by striking out in the same section the words "any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the time of entering his appearance in said court."

SEC. 3. That section 642 of said Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the words "or prosecution."

SEC. 4. That section 643 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the words "or criminal prosecution," "or prosecution," wherever they occur in said section; also, by striking out in the same section the words "any time before the trial or final hearing thereof;" and insert in said section, after the words "in the following manner, said petition," the words "shall be filed in said court at the time of entering his appearance in said State court and said petition."

SEC. 5. That section 644 of said Revised Statutes be amended by inserting, after the words "United States" where they first occur in said section, the words "for or on account of any act done by authority or under color of his office."

SEC. 6. That section 645 of said Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the words "or prosecution" where they occur in said section.

SEC. 7. That section 2 of an act entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875, be amended by striking out the words "or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States, or a controversy between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States, or a controversy between citizens of a State and foreign States, citizens, or subjects;" also, by striking out in the same section the words "and when in any suit mentioned in this section there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States, and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district;" also, that section 3 of said last-mentioned act be amended by striking out the words "before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof," and insert in lieu thereof "at the time of entering his appearance in said court;" and also striking out all of said section after the words "and the said copy being entered as aforesaid in said circuit court of the United States, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the said circuit court:" Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall affect any causes in which proceedings for removal from State courts shall have been commenced before the passage of this act.

The amendment of the committee was read as follows:

Strike from section 4 the following words:

Also, by striking out in the same section the words "any time before the trial or final hearing thereof;" and insert in said section, after the words "in the following manner, said petition."

Mr. CONGER. Let the fourth section be again read.

The fourth section was read.

Mr. STEPHENS. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. WARNER. Then I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. CONGER. I reserve all points of order upon that bill.

Mr. ATKINS. It is entirely too late for the gentleman to reserve points of order, as the bill is up and goes over to the next morning hour, and the House has now passed from its consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, in the chair.) The gentleman is right, the morning hour has expired and the point comes too late.

AGRICULTURE.

Mr. LE FEVRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House may, and he is hereby, directed to appoint a special committee, consisting of five members of this House, to be selected from the Committee on Agriculture, to take into consideration such measures as may tend to promote the agricultural interests of the country; to investigate the system and workings of the Department of Agriculture, and report, by bill or otherwise, such additional legislation as may be deemed necessary for the promotion of the Department of Agriculture and the advancement and protection of agricultural interests. Said committee may sit during the recess, and shall have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. FORT. Let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

CLAIMS AGAINST NICARAUGA.

Mr. ACKLEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House to fix a time for the consideration of the resolution offered by me on April 23, relating to the Nicarauga cases, and suggest that said resolution be considered on next Wednesday after the morning hour. I desire further to say in this connection that unless some such time be fixed for the consideration of this matter it cannot be done this session, by reason of the fact that it is pending in the morning hour after the call of committees and will not therefore be reached in such order.

That the House may fully understand this case, I will say that the resolution presented by me was a unanimous report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the last Congress, but was not then brought up for discussion on account of my illness during the last session of that Congress.

It provides for the appointment by the Speaker of five members of this House to examine the records on file in the Department of State and hear any additional testimony that citizens of the United States having claims against the Government of Nicaragua may choose to present. When it is borne in mind that these cases have been pending from eighteen to twenty years unsatisfied, I can hardly imagine that any member of this House would throw obstacles in the way of their speedy consideration. The Government of Nicaragua justly owes this money to our people and it ill becomes us to retard its payment.

The Senate of the United States has already passed the resolution which I presented and appointed a committee of five members of that body. The House must be represented or the cases passed upon by the Senate committee will simply lie over until they can be acted upon by some standing committee of this House. I therefore urge the House to grant this request that we may not be considered derelict in that duty which we owe to every citizen of our States, whether he be living within the borders of our country or abroad, and to uphold that national honor which should be dear to the hearts of every member of this House.

Mr. WILBER. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the further consideration of the bill known as the coinage bill, a bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures with amendments. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, to prevent an indefinite number of interruptions I had better begin my remarks by frankly and humbly confessing that since 1872 I have learned something on the silver question, which, in my judgment, is the paramount question of the period. Gentlemen seek to convict me of inconsistency. I value consistency, but not that kind which by ignoring the lessons of experience precludes intellectual progress and constrains men to go through life the advocates of error because when they entered manhood they were ignorant of the real law which controlled a given question. I have through life been a seeker after truth as a guide and have accepted it from any and every source.

> On pagan or on Christian ground,
> The plant's divine where'er 'tis found.

I have believed that consistency and duty to my manhood both required me to change my opinions and line of action whenever increase of knowledge should satisfy me that I have been in error, though such change should disturb my most cherished social and political relations. Thus, I was in 1846 an enthusiastic democrat; but when Mr. Calhoun declared by a resolution offered in the Senate that slavery was national and freedom sectional and confined to a few States into which Southern men might rightfully carry their slaves, and that doctrine was accepted by Mr. Yancey and introduced as a resolution in the Baltimore convention of 1848, and was supported, if my memory serves me, by thirty-six delegates, I denounced it, and voted openly for the free-soil candidate for President, though still maintaining my devotion to State rights, free trade, and other doctrines of the party against whose presidential candidate I voted; and when, in 1854, the attempt was made to enforce this novel and pernicious dogma by carrying slavery into the northwestern Territories, I avowed myself a republican, and, in 1856, resigned a judicial position, in which I had reason to believe I was honored by my constituents, in order to lead a forlorn hope as the republican candidate for Congress in a district in which I was awarded by the election officers one vote out of every ten.

Again, sir, I was not only a free-trader, but an intense and, as I believed, a well-instructed one, having read largely on the subject. I had been a disseminator in my city of the publications of the corn-law league and was a recognized volunteer agent for their distribution.

But when in 1857 the course of events proved that the assumptions from which my convictions had been deduced were false—and it became patent to all men that, notwithstanding the discovery of gold in California and the mining of nearly a thousand millions of dollars thereof; that the potato rot in Europe had given an extraordinary market and unusual prices to our agricultural products; that for a series of consecutive years every natural incident had favored the prosperity of the country and the accumulation of capital by the people, yet at the end of that decade from the discovery of California gold, we had made so small an accumulation of capital that the draught of British and continental banks for $7,000,000, only $7,000,000, caused a suspension of specie payments throughout the country and paralyzed our industrial system—I said to myself, "The laws of trade and finance are inflexible as the law of gravitation, and have produced results so diametrically opposite to those promised by the theories of free-traders that my principles cannot be sound, my belief must be erroneous."

It was not easy, sir, to yield my most cherished convictions, and I did not do it without much study and reflection. Indeed, sir, it required three years of patient investigation to bring me to conclusions on the merits of the question of free trade or protection in which I could rest. That it may be seen whether I changed my opinions lightly, I will hand to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] and my colleague, [Mr. FISHER,] who have so chided me for avowing that I had learned something on the silver question, a pamphlet containing my reasons for that change, and will also see that a copy of it is handed to each member of the House.

In 1872, when I made the remarks which were cited by those gentlemen, and which have been frequently quoted in both Houses, and always with an air as much as to say that to convict this man of the crime of having been instructed by the logic of events would forever settle this momentous question, we were not using coin, and no gentleman in either House appears to have appreciated the scope and magnitude of the silver question or to have given it special study. Hence the bill—and I wish gentlemen to know what that bill was; it was a bill to reorganize the mints, not to revise the coin money of the country, but to reorganize the mints, and it was passed without allusion in debate to the question of the retention or abandonment of the standard silver dollar. The then Speaker of the House, now a distinguished member of the Senate, and Hon. Mr. VOORHEES, of Indiana, who is also a member of that body, were then members of this House; and during the last Congress this colloquy occurred between them. It was, I thipk, denied by Mr. VOORHEES that members of the House knew that the bill proposed to demonetize the silver dollar, and to sustain his view he said to the ex-Speaker: "Did you know it, sir?" "No," said Senator BLAINE; "did you?" "No," replied Senator VOORHEES.

I was chairman of the committee that reported the original bill, and I aver on my honor that I did not know the fact that it proposed to drop the standard dollar, and did not learn that it had done it for eighteen months after the passage of the substitute offered by Mr. Hooper, when I disputed the fact, and was shown the law. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who now leads this side of the House was then as now an attentive and already a distinguished member of the House; yet when in joint debate before the people of Ohio in October, 1877, the question arose as to who was responsible for its demonetization, he frankly said he did not know that such a provision was in the bill when it passed the House. I state this the more freely in his absence because I informed him that I intended to do so; and he replied, "It is the case; I did make that statement, and it is true."

Nor did the President who signed the bill know that it abolished legal-tender standard silver dollars, for in his letter to Mr. Cowdrey of October 6, 1873, cited by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] he said:

> Silver will gradually take the place of this currency, and, further, will become the standard of values, which will be hoarded in a small way. I estimate that this will consume from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 in time of this species of our circulating medium. * * * I confess to a desire to see a limited hoarding of money. It insures a firm foundation in time of need. But I want to see the hoarding of something that has a standard value the world over. Silver has this.

Gentlemen will observe that this letter was written several months after the writer's signature had given the force and effect of law to the bill which prohibited the further minting of the kind of coins he expected the people to hoard.

Let me in passing say that the statement of Mr. McNeely, of Illinois, which has been so often cited as though it discredited my word, that the bill had been read line by line and paragraph by paragraph in the committee has my indorsement. It is true as to the original bill. Hence it was that I admitted, as I so long and frequently did, that I had reported a bill which demonetized the standard dollar, and that I continued to believe that that provision had escaped my notice until my friend who sits before me, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] investigated the subject from the egg up and brought me the bill I had reported retaining the standard dollar, together with a Senate bill which had been substituted for it, which changed a section and omitted it. In view of these facts, I think I may be permitted to believe that it is not specially discreditable to me that I alone among all those who then constituted the law-making power, either in the legislative or executive department, had not been illuminated on this grave question.

In justification of a change of opinion on this question I may be permitted to say that in 1872 I was ignorant of the existence of Emile de Laveleye and of Henri Cernuschi; but since then it has been my privilege to correspond with these learned and distinguished men and I have enjoyed much social intercourse with Mr. Cernuschi. I have read their instructive writings and would have been a dullard indeed had they made no impression upon my mind. Nor did I then know that Wolowski, Seyd, and their learned associates had predicted the terrible results which have followed the attempt of one great nation to demonetize silver, but since then I have done much to bring their conclusions and the reasons upon which they rested to the attention of Congress and the country. Nor had I then read the well considered and instructive books of our countrymen, S. Dana Horton on silver and Francis A. Walker on money, neither of which was written until years thereafter.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me an inquiry? I would like the gentleman to state, if he is able to do so, on which side of the silver question S. Dana Horton is? He says he has read his book.

Mr. KELLEY. I make this remark that I will object to no interruption that is pertinent if I can be assured that my time will be extended beyond the hour in proportion thereto.

In reply to the gentleman from Ohio I say that though I am not able to define exactly the position of Mr. Horton, I regard him as a bimetalist and that I found his book, in connection with other studies, most instructive, as I think any gentleman will. It embodies an immense number of facts and much definite thought on the money question.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question or two, because I regard him as one of the fathers of this measure.

Mr. KELLEY. Please do not make a speech, but put your question.

Mr. BELFORD. The third section of this act provides that any owner of silver bullion may take it and deposit it at the mint and have it coined.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will permit me to anticipate his question I will answer it so far as I am prepared to, that is by declining to entertain it. I am not a member of the committee that reports this bill, and it is not my purpose to discuss its provisions in detail. I desire to take a general and broad view of the question, and I therefore refer him to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS,] chairman of the committee, for the details. I cannot be led away from the line of discussion which I have prepared for myself.

Mr. BELFORD. I merely asked the question for information.

Mr. KELLEY. I have no doubt that the gentleman asks for information, but he comes to the wrong source. He ought to have asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] whose bill it is, and not me who am here simply discussing the general question it involves in a broad and general way.

In 1872 I had not read this extract from a speech of the late President Abraham Lincoln. That great and always conservative man, in the hall of representatives in Springfield, Illinois, in December, 1839, spoke as follows:

> The natural effect of this change of policy, every one will see, is to reduce the quantity of money in circulation. * * * The man who has purchased any article, say a horse, on credit at $100, when there are $200,000,000 circulating in the country, if the quantity be reduced to $100,000,000 by the arrival of pay day, will find the horse but sufficient to pay half the debt; and the other half must either be paid out of his other means, and thereby become a clear loss to him, or go unpaid, and thereby become a clear loss to his creditor. What I have said of a single case of the purchase of a horse, will hold good in every case of a debt existing at a time a reduction in the quantity of money occurs, by whomsoever and for whatever it may have been contracted. It may be said that what the debtor loses the creditor gains by this operation; but, on examination, this will be found to be true only to a very limited extent. It is more generally true that all lose by it. The creditor by losing more of his debts than he gains by the increased value of those he collects, the debtor by either parting with more of his property to pay his debts than he received in contracting them or by entirely breaking up his business, and thereby being thrown upon the world in idleness.

The pertinence of these wise words of Mr. Lincoln will become more apparent as I proceed. Nor, sir, had I then read the very powerful articles from the pens of Stephen Williamson, of the great Liverpool house of Balfour, Williamson & Co., and R. H. Patterson, the distinguished author of the Science of Finance and of the Economy of Capital, in the Contemporary Review for April, 1879.

Nor had I seen in the Financial Chronicle of the 12th of last month this manly statement and significant reminiscence which gives me the right to claim the moral support of England's premier, the Earl of Beaconsfield, who seems to have foreseen, as no American statesmen did, the dire calamities that must follow an attempt to demonetize silver:

> Let it be borne in mind that we are proposing no stupendous novelty. Nay, rather let it be kept in view that we are suggesting a return to the old and safe conservative paths in regard to "money." We are no innovators. The innovators were the gold monometallic propagandists of 1868, who are accountable for all the recent dislocation and mischief; and I regret to say that a few Englishmen, who certainly could not have dreamed of the consequences of their propaganda, were among the number, if they were not the chief instigators of the movement. They are now alarmed at the success of their teaching and are fervently praying that there may be no further demonetizing of silver in the world. Lord Beaconsfield referred to the impending dislocation and the evils likely to result—almost with prophetic vision—on the 19th November, 1873, when he was installed rector of the Glasgow University. He then said, at the evening banquet: "I attribute it to the great monetary disturbance that has occurred, and is now to a certain degree acting very injuriously on trade—I attribute it to the great changes which our governments in Europe are making with reference to our standard of value. I attribute the present state of affairs very much to a commission that was sitting in Paris at the time of the great exhibition. That was a commission the object of which was to establish a uniform coinage throughout the world—a very beautiful idea which could do no great harm, but difficult to attain. The commission never came to a definite recommendation on this subject, but they did on another subject, and that was, that no time should be lost by any of the states of Europe in taking steps to establish a uniform gold stardard of value." His lordship (then Mr. Disraeli) proceeded to point out that it was the greatest delusion in the world to attribute our commercial preponderance or prosperity to our having a gold standard, and then warned his hearers that we must be prepared "for great convulsions in the money market—not occasioned by speculation or any old cause, but by a new cause with which we are not yet sufficiently acquainted." He added: "When countries inundated with silver are trying to get rid of it, convulsions must come, and no one would be able to form an adequate idea of the monetary arrangements of the times in which he lives if he omits from his consideration the important subject to which I have called your attention."

Finally, sir, I am free to admit that when in 1872 I absurdly asserted that the unit of our monetary system, the legal-tender silver dollar, which was worth commercially three cents more than a gold one, was subsidiary coin, I knew no more of the stupendous significance of the silver question than the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] and my colleague, [Mr. FISHER,] do now in 1879.

I was then, as they now are, involved in the battle of standards. It is a bootless controversy. A standard is a fixed and unchanging measure, and that which is fixed and unchanging cannot be found in that which is liable to great and incessant fluctuations. Nothing in the history of man has fluctuated in value more frequently or more extremely than gold. The value of both gold and silver fluctuates, and hence it was that in my ignorance I became confused and, believing that we must have a standard of value, thought that only one metal could properly furnish such a standard. These metals fluctuate not only relatively between themselves, but relatively with every other commodity. Neither, therefore, can, I repeat, be a standard of value.

Nor is money such a standard, let it be made of what it may, whether it have intrinsic value or rest on the credit of the Government that issues it. Money is a convenient representative of value, a medium of exchange used in current purchases and a standard of deferred payments. A debtor agrees to pay so many marks or florins or francs or pounds or dollars on a given day, and on that day to maintain his credit he must pay that number of designated coins, but unless he has expressly stipulated that the coins shall on the maturity of the obligation be of the existing weight and fineness, and the Government which issues the coin has, pending its maturity, reduced the weight or fineness of the coin specified and made it less valuable, the debtor pays his obligation by producing on the day fixed the stipulated number of the coins the value of which the Government has thus by law reduced. This is the law of every civilized nation. This right is, I reaffirm, established by law, and in no sense depends upon the intrinsic value of the metallic or other unit of payment upon which the law has bestowed the attribute of legal tender.

Thus, when we diminished the value of our gold dollar, for we have never changed that of our silver one, he who owed a million dollars when that change took place met his obligations with honor, though every one of the coins with which he paid were of the lighter and cheaper kind then recently ordained; hence it is apparent that the gold dollar, though it is a standard of deferred payments, is not a standard of value.

But I must proceed to more general considerations. This decade, I mean from 1872 to 1883, will mark one of the most instructive epochs in modern history. Its progress in discovery, iuvention, and the application of science to the useful arts is probably unparalleled in the story of man's existence. It is also marked by great movements of people to new countries with cheaper lands and freer institutions. Yet, as its later half passes it is marked by a reaction against the progress of civilization and social refinement the severity of which must, within its limits, compel a change in the financial and economic system of Great Britain, and endanger, if it does not overthrow, the governments of some of the great continental nations.

Look where we may, restless discontent prevails. In our own country, by far the happiest of all by reason of our broad, free lands and the intelligent self-reliance of our people, discontent and agitation mark these years. From New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and the entire manufacturing sections of the East, working men, women, and children, who, having secured their own homes or partially paid for them through building associations, were prosperous and contented, are fleeing to the remote West to endure the hardships and risks of frontier life and to make at best but bad farmers. Remonstrate with them against the change as we may, they will say to us, "there we can at least live; but here, without employment, or with partial employment at reduced wages, we cannot live."

So, too, is it in the South; and I admit that political causes may have had some effect there. You find the laboring population, a people specially fitted for labor in that section of the country, fleeing as eagerly as the intelligent working people of New England, New York, and Pennsylvania to States within which there is no employment for them in producing cotton or sugar, as there are no manufactories to employ those of the white mechanics who are augmenting the proportions of this modern exodus. Sir, the flight of this decade is marked by all the symptoms which preceded the fall of the Roman Empire, the French and continental revolutions of 1793, the convulsion of Great Britain in 1847 and 1848, the overthrow of the French monarchy and the driving from Berlin of the German government in the latter of these years. Indeed everywhere outside of our own country, Canada, Australia, and other British colonies which are settled by people of British origin and enjoy self-government, we find evidence of the action of a potent disturbing cause. I have said that the same symptoms preceded the overthrow of the Roman Empire. I speak with diffidence from my own general study on this point, but beg leave to read a short passage touching it from Alison's History of Europe:

The two greatest events which have occurred in the history of mankind have been directly brought about by a successive contraction and expansion of the circulating medium of society. The fall of the Roman Empire, so long ascribed in ignorance to slavery, heathenism, and moral corruption, was in reality brought about by a decline in the silver and gold mines of Spain and Greece. * * * And, as if Providence had intended to reveal in the clearest manner the influence of this mighty agent on human affairs, the resurrection of mankind from the ruin which these causes had produced was owing to the directly opposite set of agencies being put in operation. Columbus led the way in the career of renovation; when he spread his sails across the Atlantic he bore mankind and its fortunes in his bark. * * * The annual supply of the precious metals for the use of the globe was tripled; before a century had expired the prices of every species of produce were quadrupled. The weight of debt and taxes insensibly wore off under the influence of that prodigious increase; in the renovations of industry the relations of society were changed; the weight of feudalism cast off; the rights of man established. Among the many concurring causes which conspired to bring about this mighty consummation, the most important, though hitherto the least observed, was the discovery of Mexico and Peru.

I need not dwell upon the causes which produced the French revolution. Whoever has read any history of that event, whether by Guizot, Thiers, Carlyle, or other justly distinguished writer, knows that the outbreak was precipitated by financial embarrassments; that the people were impoverished; that the farmer-general could not collect the revenues; that industry was paralyzed, and that discontent produced by want drove the masses into revolt. Yes, out of the financial difficulties of the period came that war which raged for nearly a quarter of a century, involving all Europe, and as one of the incidents of which we have the instructive lessons furnished by English history, that an increase in the volume of paper money, though inconvertible, stimulated industry, production, and the growth of durable wealth in ratios previously unknown, and that by its contraction, enforced by law, in order to bring about specie payments ruin overtook the people, and for a time threatened the permanence of the government.

In 1847 and 1848 the supply of gold and silver from the mines had diminished; it was not equal to the annual loss and consumption by the arts. The credit of countries then dependent on coin had to be contracted as that "enduring" standard of value diminished in amount and increased in purchasing power. Industry was without reward. The French monarch was driven from his throne, and a republic established which avowed as its first duty the creation of remunerative employment for the people, even though it should be by the establishment of national workshops.

How were the people brought to order and contentment? It was by giving them remunerative employment. I have recited twice on this floor the story from the London Times, and will not now repeat, but simply allude to it. The Bank of France was authorized to issue an immense amount of irredeemable paper, and commissions were appointed to loan it, not only to those who could bring gold-bearing bonds as security, not to the wealthy alone who could offer still wealthier indorsers, but to the people of the workshop. The test of fitness to receive a loan was the exhibition of the books of the man who sought it. If they exhibited proof of a useful and well-managed business with a general result of profit, the applicant was to have a loan commensurate with the demands of his business. France thus stimulated her productive power, and in a few years, by supplying the world with silks, wines, and gewgaws, was enabled to purchase gold and silver with which to redeem every note the bank had issued; and the loss by these seemingly loose loans was when the accounts were closed, reported to have been inappreciable.

But how was peace restored to the whole continent of Europe? I am speaking of 1848. The threatened convulsion in England occurred in 1847 and the early part of 1848. Then it was that Louis Napoleon established his British respectability by entering the ranks of the citizen police and bearing a staff in the maintenance of order, not dreaming that in five years he would have overthrown the Republic of France and secured the power to make himself Emperor. But let me answer my question.

It was these disturbed years of 1847 and 1848 that gave the world a new Mexico and Peru in California and Australia. As the gold and silver of Mexico and Peru banished the dark ages of Europe which had intervened between the fall of the Roman Empire and the rise of arts after Columbus's voyages, so the precious metals of California and Australia flowed into the channels of commerce, quickened industry, enabled capital to employ and pay labor, and thus restored peace and order to Europe.

These are, I think, instructive periods in history. And I repeat that the current years are marked by all the symptoms that characterized those immediately preceding each of the events alluded to, and from the same cause, the shrinking away of the metallic basis of the credits of the world, which is now occurring by the force of legislation in the presence of an immense annual production of the precious metals. Germany and the United States are doing summarily by law what the consumption of the precious metals by the arts, the power of abrasion, and the contingencies of mining operations then did by slow and unobserved processes. Let me show you upon how grand a scale we are promoting those evil ends, idleness, want, discontent, and revolt.

Here is an elaborate report from the select committee on the depreciation of silver, together with the proceedings of the committee, minutes, evidence, &c., printed by order of the House of Commons on the 5th of July, 1876. Among these papers I find a statement of the world's annual production of gold and silver from 1852 to 1875, inclusive, giving by years the production of each metal. Though prepared for the Journal des Economistes, it was accepted by the committee. It shows that the production of gold was $2,913,000,000, that of silver $1,187,500,000, making a total of $4,100,500,000. Germany and we have undertaken to exclude from use as money—not by the slow process of abrasion, loss, and consumption in the arts, but as I have said summarily by law—nearly one-third of that total production. But, as I am reminded, we propose to do more and worse than this. We will also banish from circulation the stock of silver the world had accumulated prior to 1852. Since that year the steadily increasing stock of these metals has been augmenting the wants and productive capacity of man, sending forth adventurers into every new country, improving and extending the means of transportation, building up manufactures, stimulating agricultural production, promoting commerce and extending it to all the islands of the sea and to every navigable river of the world. In view of these facts how stupendous is our undertaking! Can any gentleman predict the evil consequences the attempt, though baffled it must be, may produce?

It is impossible to estimate the depreciation of values that so enormous and so gradual and long continued a contraction of the volume of money must produce; but, to give gentlemen who have not considered the subject data for forming a vague and remote estimate, let me remind them that it was in testimony before the secret committee which reported to Parliament in 1847 that the withdrawal of $45,000,000, coin, from the Bank of England had depreciated public stocks $573,761,125. That was the rapid work of a crisis, but the retirement of silver from the circulating medium of the world is to be the work of one or more generations, during which the average of prices cannot advance, but must continue to fall. Let me also invite gentlemen to consider the fact that when the resumption act of 1819 was under consideration Ricardo, Peel, and others of their school recurred to the fact that the difference between bank-notes and gold was less than 5 per cent., and said that, as the act gave four years in which to effect that slight change, it would work no appreciable depreciation of prices. But what was the result? Industry and commerce were paralyzed. The bank, finding that the people could not endure the consequences of a contraction that was to continue through four years, hastened the operation and concluded it in two years; yet it effected a change in the price of every commodity, including land and improved real estate of 45 per cent., and caused a relative appreciation in the value of government stocks. The direct effect, the widespread ruin produced by this action was confined to Great Britain, but the history of the times shows that the people of every nation to which she was commercially related suffered with her to a greater or less extent.

But, say monometalists, the discrediting of silver must proceed. The two metals have given the world too much money; its abundance has produced extravagance; men ought not to live as it justified them in living; they, especially laborers, must not live so well; the wages paid for labor have been too high; and in their effort to correct these alleged evils they attempt to force back the tide of civilization and social refinement by destroying the purchasing power of more than one-third of the world's metallic money.

Mr. FISHER. Will my colleague allow me to ask a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FISHER. Do you mean to assert that the German Empire has demonetized silver?

Mr. KELLEY. I do.

Mr. FISHER. In the next place, does not the gentleman think that if German statesmen see they have committed an error they will retrace their steps, as they have done in adopting the protective policy, upon which my colleague and I agree?

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman will find out before I close, if I have time to say all I wish to, that I do not think it will be optional with the German government whether it will retrace the step it took in demonetizing silver; that the terrible force of events will compel it to abdicate or to retrace its steps. The maintenance of order in Germany under that demonetization and the effect it has produced on the markets which Germany formerly supplied with her productions will compel the adoption of one of the alternatives I suggest.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has just pointed me to a page of the report of the commission to which I have already referred, on which I find the official answer to the question of my colleague as to whether Germany had demonetized silver. Having referred to several laws demonetizing portions of the current silver money, the report proceeds to say:

The scope of this first law is so far important to the present inquiry, as it bears on the state of the silver market between December, 1871, and the middle of July, 1873, when the next great step was taken.

On the 9th of July, 1873, another coinage law (Münzengesetz) was passed. This law introduced the gold standard. It commenced with the words "the imperial gold currency takes the place of the various currencies which are now legal in Germany belonging to the separate states."

Since 1871 Germany has been selling her silver. Her citizens could pay it to the government, which received it at its denominational value up to certain dates; but when the government received it, it put it into bars and has been selling those bars by the ton from then till now. What it holds and is trying to sell is, as I shall show, regarded by the highest financial authorities in England as the cause of all her recent manufacturing, commercial, and financial troubles and of the world-wide business depression now prevailing.

Thus Mr. Williamson in his article in the Contemporary Review for April, after reciting the conclusions touching the effects of demonstration presented to the government by the Liverpool Board of Trade, said:

These conclusions by no means exhaust the category of untoward results. The picture could be greatly heightened in coloring, but they are enough for our purpose, accounting as they do for the greatly diminished demand there now is for our textile fabrics, railway materials, machinery, and other things from vast and populous regions of the globe, whose money is now useless to us and unsuitable for the discharge of our trade accounts. Merchants are at their wits' end. They are shut up to refuse credits in silver-using countries. They are baffled in all their exchange calculations. They are driven to restrict their operations. The malign and adverse influence acts and reacts. The distress intensifies. Manchester warehouses are filled to repletion with unsalable stocks. Iron rails go down to a point lower than ever known. Many good opportunities for developing the resources of other countries, and of investing English capital, pass unheeded and unavailed of. Men inquire what will the silver dollar or rupee be worth six months or six years hence in the London market; and the deduction from late monetary legislation prompts the reply that there is no bottom to the fall. India may be ruined—our investments may be worthless; and the inevitable conclusion is that we must minimize our risks, restrict our operations, draw in our capital from silver-using countries, and let things take their chance. The Economist and Mr. Giffen prophesied three years ago that trade would soon mend. They ridiculed our fears and what they called our heroic remedies. But the world now knows they were prophets who prophesied pleasant things because men loved to have it so.

Now, sir, I affirm that to remonetize silver (and it must sooner or later be done by all the commercial nations, including England) would restore peace, order, and prosperity throughout the world, as did the increase of the precious metals from Mexico and Peru, and at a later day the increase from California and Australia. Let me sustain this assertion by pregnant proof.

Prediction is said to be the test of truth, and I propose to apply it in this case. Mr. Ernest Seyd, in the course of his address before the British Society of Arts on the 3d of April, 1878, said:

In 1867-'68 M. Wolowski, then a senator of France, in opposing the proposition that that country should demonetize silver, said: "If in the then existing state of the balance of trade one of the great nations demonetized silver the balance would be overthrown and dire mischief would follow."

In 1868, four years before Germany demonetized her silver, M. Wolowski, a bimetalist, and Ernest Seyd, who, as an Englishman, loyally held the doctrine that England should adhere to a single standard, but who, nevertheless, opposed demonetization, were the central figures in a conference of distinguished men on the question, and predicted, in six specific propositions, the effects which would inevitably follow such action. Let us consider their predictions:

I. The international trade of the world would instantly show signs of decline, to the special injury of the countries whose international trade was large.

Will any gentleman deny that this prediction has been fulfilled? England, whose international trade vastly exceeded that of any other nation, has suffered more than any other. She lost of her international wealth, as is shown by Mr. Seyd in the address to which I am referring, more than a thousand millions of dollars in three consecutive years. Her commerce is crippled, her manufacturing and mining industry is prostrate, and her greatest dependency, India, lies weltering in a slough of misery and despair. She has lost her American market, and her people of every rank and condition are now asking what shall England do to be saved from the possible result of the severe and protracted depression she is enduring.

II. That public enterprise, such as results in the construction of railways and other beneficent undertakings, would come to a standstill, and that general progress would suffer.

Will any gentleman deny that this prediction has been abundantly fulfilled here and elsewhere? If any one doubts on this point it may be well for him to consider the facts set forth in this paragraph from the last issue of the New York Mercantile Journal:

The Railway Age brings forward its record of railway foreclosures through the year 1878, giving a list of forty-eight roads sold during that year, representing a total mileage of 3,902 miles, $160,014,500 bonds and debt, and $151,616,700 capital stock; the entire amount of bonds, debt, and stock being $311,631,200. The following shows the foreclosure sales during the last three years:

Year.	Number of roads.	Mileage.	Capital invested.
1876	30	3,846	$217,848,000
1877	54	3,875	238,984,000
1878	48	3,902	311,631,000
Total	132	11,623	768,463,000

These represent only the roads that have been sold, and not lines which are in the hands of receivers. Should these be added, and those which are still maintained because they were built upon the credit of cities that will not repudiate the expenditure, it may be safely stated that the railroad mortality, so to speak, in this country has involved the loss of an amount of capital larger than the bonded debt of the United States.

III. That the decline in price would compel countries internationally indebted to depart more and more from the principles of free trade toward a policy of protection.

Has not this prediction been verified? Canada has just passed her first protective tariff law; Australia is about to follow the example; and the papers yesterday told us of the indignation with which Bismarck left the chamber of the Reichstag because unexpected opposition was made to one of his protective measures, and the last of his words given us by the telegraph were that he insisted that the Zollverein must be re-established. It was the Zollverein which made the empire possible. Frederick List, a young and enthusiastic German, came to Pennsylvania and resided there for several years, during which he studied the American system of Henry Clay. He consorted almost exclusively with protectionists, and when he returned to Germany he devoted himself to the work of inducing the German states and duchies to make a league on the basis that the productions of each should enter the others free of duty, while commodities produced beyond those states should pay a protective duty. Thus he wove together in internal interest what is now the great empire of Germany, and made the Prince Bismarck and Emperor William we know in their grandeur possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want?

Mr. KELLEY. I am speaking from notes; I cannot say exactly. I would be grateful to the House for indefinite extension. I believe I have some information of value to bring to the attention of the House and through the RECORD to the country. My speech is unwritten, and it will likely remain unwritten unless the reporters write it for me. I will be as brief as possible.

Mr. KNOTT. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended indefinitely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time is extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. DEUSTER, (after a time.) I object.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say I was one of the gentlemen who was taken off the floor in the discussion on the legislative bill; every other gentleman was given unlimited time save the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DE LA MATYR] and myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has been extended indefinitely, as the objection came too late.

Mr. KELLEY. I thank the House, and proceed to consider prediction No. 4, which is:

IV. That the nations of the world would first be divided into two principal groups, the one trading in gold, the other in silver, and this would render commerce between them precarious.

This is now being fulfilled, and I will recur to it at a later stage in my remarks, and merely say now that when that division occurs I want this nation to be at the head of the silver group, which will embrace three or four times the population of the gold group.

V. That throughout the world a fall in prices would take place injurious alike to owners of solid property and to the laboring classes, and advantageous only, and unjustifiably so, to the holders of State debts and other contracts of that kind.

Will any gentleman deny that this prediction has been verified; that the wages of labor have gone down; that the value of real estate has depreciated; that the price of merchandise of every kind has declined in the hands of merchants; or that national credits have gone up so that 4 per cent. interest on a bond will buy its holder twice as much as 6 per cent. used to before Germany discredited silver?

VI. That when this time of depression sets in there would be this difficulty, namely, that the causes of this depression would be sought for in all directions; that all sorts of allegations more or less groundless and fantastic, or of a secondary nature only, would be brought forward by the gold-valuation school, and that this real cause, the demonetization of silver, would be neglected until strong signs of distress compelled thinking men to refer to it.

Now upon what were these predictions founded? On this point Mr. Seyd says:

The extent of international trade and business generally depends mainly on the means available to liquidate balances. Hitherto both gold and silver, in equal proportions, had served for this purpose. But the moment that Germany overthrew the balance and compelled other European states to close their mints against silver, that metal ceased to be an effective medium of exchange between the civilized nations.

He also asked, "What, then, are the causes of the present aspect of affairs?" and illustrated the correctness of prediction VI by answering the question as follows:

In order to lead to the true cause let me first endeavor to review the various allegations which have been made, in numerical order, and to show whether they are tenable:

First. When, in 1873, trade began to slacken a little the cause referred to was the Franco-German war. Strange to say, however, the two years following that war were in reality prosperous. From 1848 upwards we have had the French and continental revolutions, the Crimean war, the Franco-Austrian war, the American war, and several minor wars. In fact, never has there been a period so rich in war. Yet our trade steadily increased year by year. In connection with this, although only within the last two years, it was said that the threatening Oriental war caused want of confidence. In former times, when merchants had long-winded ventures at sea, and vessels were liable to capture and blockade, there would have been grounds for such want of confidence; but now, when steamships run and voyages are much shorter, news traveling instantly, when railways lessen the importance of blockades, and a better international understanding exists, there is little occasion for such apprehensions.

Secondly. It was then suggested that the dullness in trade represented but one of the usual periods; that in the following year it would recover. Refer to our statistics of the last sixty years, and, although they exhibit certain variations between one or two years, yet the increase was steady. The years following the crises of 1847, 1857, and 1866 showed a falling off of several millions, but in the next following again an increase. But now we find that there has been a falling off for four years, getting worse year by year, at an unheard-of ratio, and without any of those causes to which we ascribe crises and ordinary periodical variations.

Thirdly. Then followed the allegation that "things had been overdone generally." Hitherto things were "overdone" at the crises before mentioned. It was then stated that the "overdone" referred to the use of more machinery and overproduction. That we are making continual improvements in and additions to our machinery and industry is evident, and for the last thirty or forty years there has been a steady progress here and elsewhere. But can any one say that suddenly, in the years 1873 and 1874, we had made such a start in this as to bring out the results before us? And as regards overproduction, that may have appeared so at first from the stocks on hand; in reality, however, the production was not in excess of the consumption it had hitherto met with. During the last two or three years the production has diminished sensibly and stocks of goods are not excessive. A great portion of our manufacturers have worked half time or less, or closed works temporarily. The stoppage of public works, such as railways abroad, is one of the most remarkable features. The existing railways pay fairly; there is room for more. Why should the cessation of this kind of enterprise be so sudden?

Fourthly. A favorite allegation is that which ascribes all the mischief to the strikes of the workingman. Apart from the question that strikes do not affect much the value of certain commodities in which the falling off has been severe, it has always been held that higher wages encourage consumption and production among the masses. "Strikes" cannot in any case account for the sudden reversal in trade, and at this moment, when wages are again much reduced and prices fallen much below those of 1873-'74, there is no improvement nevertheless.

Fifthly. The "competition" of the foreigner was then referred to. Now, if on account of strikes or for other reasons the foreigner had acquired our trade, this might seem a legitimate reason; but it is not so. Foreign manufacturing nations complain of badness of trade and falling off of exports even more loudly than we do, and in their turn ascribe it to the competition and cheaper prices in England.

Sixthly. One of the arguments used is that during recent years we have lent but little money to foreigners, who were in the habit of taking large quantities of goods on the credit of loans. I have pointed out before that, if this were so, we ought to have an enormous accumulation of gold here; but, as that is not the case, the real reason may be rather that of our diminished ability to do so. It will also be found that the defaulting nations were not such large customers of ours as to warrant this large falling off, and that this falling off is especially noticeable with nations in whom we have confidence or who have no occasion to be debtors to us on such loans.

Numerous other allegations have been made which, simply or collectively, do not account for the state of things.

These secondary symptoms, as Mr. Seyd calls them, are just such as we are in the habit of hearing assigned in this country as the cause of the hardships the world is enduring But he proceeds to say:

Permit me here to point out what I, in conjunction with many others, deem to be the real or only cause of all this mischief, a cause of which all the other allegations made are but secondary symptoms. This real cause is the demonetization of silver, or rather the steps so far taken in that direction.

In proof of the correctness of prediction IV, that is, that nations would be divided into two groups, one using silver and one gold, I beg leave to adduce the following evidence. Mr. Coke, in seconding the adoption of the report presented to the board of trade of Liverpool by the committee it had appointed to present its resolutions and petition to the government of England, said:

It is impossible that India can continue to purchase from England at the rate expected when her money is discredited 20 per cent., and may be 30 per cent., if nothing is done to arrest the present decline. If the manufacturers of this country wish to retain India as a market for their productions, they must assist in supporting the value of the rupee.

And again:

The only permanent cure would be the adoption of a bimetallic system throughout the great commercial countries of the world, by which silver and gold would become legal money at a fixed ratio of value. In such case not only India but all other silver-using States would be able to buy from England, and, unfortunately, they are her principal customers.

Mr. R. H. Patterson, in his article on The Eastern Trade and the Precious Metals in the Contemporary Review for last month, said:

The system of demonetizing silver would lead to world-wide consequences of really incalculable disaster. Those persons who talk so glibly of the advantages of "monometalism" and a single gold standard must be totally blind to the inevitable consequences of the course which they so complacently advocate and extol. Were silver degraded from its place in the currency of the world, or even of Europe, the fall in its value, say one-half—although the fall might be very much greater—would be equivalent to destroying one-half of all the silver in the world! It would annul a vast outlay of capital and the labor of generations of hard-working miners. Were it possible in like fashion—namely, by legislation or edict—to reduce the price of ordinary commodities, such as food or clothes or houses, in such a case, although the producers of those commodities would unfairly suffer, the community at large would gain to an equal extent. The usefulness of such commodities would remain unimpaired. But the chief usefulness of the precious metals nowadays, and the sole usefulness of gold and silver coins, lies in their purchasing power, their value as money; hence, a demonetization of silver would be proportionately destructive to its present usefulness, and, we repeat, would be equivalent to a willful annihilation of a vast portion of the world's stock of money. In proportion as this demonetization was carried out, it would be a voluntary throwing away of the vast blessings and benefits which mankind have recently enjoyed from the new mines of America and Australia. The world would be plunged back into the "hard times" which previously prevailed, or in truth into a far worse predicament. The fact that our own country is under a single gold standard (a condition into which we passed by successive stages from a purely silver currency, the act of 1816 merely establishing by law what was already established in fact) would be powerless to ward off from us the effects of a demonetization of silver, which still constitutes by far the larger portion of the world's stock of the precious metals. Our stock of gold would be drawn upon to supply the dearth of money in other countries. Not to speak of the inevitable collapse of our monetary system as regulated by the absurd and pernicious bank act of 1844, the burden of our national debt would be vastly increased, and so would that of every other country. These debts, which amount to an enormous sum, would thenceforth hang like a millstone around the neck of the nations. Add to these results the restriction upon trade and industry inseparable from a dearth of money, and any statesman who at present favors the general, or any extended, adoption of a single gold standard may well shrink back from such a change, and refuse to imperil the prosperity of his own country, and of the civilized world at large, by producing an arbitrary and artificial dearth of money, which is the most potent auxiliary, we might say the very life's blood, of trade and industry, as these are and must be carried on under a mature civilization.

Sir, the verification of Mr. Seyd's prediction, to which I am referring, seems from the extracts just read to be near at hand. When it comes where shall we take our place? But before answering this question let me refer to some of the laws of international trade. When such trade may and generally does yield two profits, one to each country engaged in it, it does not flow along parallels of latitude, as does trade between the Northern States of our Union and England, France, Belgium, and Germany. These States and nations possess in greater or less profusion the same raw materials and manufacture like commodities. They are the great rival industrial nations of the world, and, with free trade between them, the elder nations, whose capital is cheaper and whose industries are more perfected, often carry off the sole profit of the trade. Commerce, to be reciprocal and mutually profitable to those who participate in it, should travel on longitudinal lines. The people of tropical countries export raw materials which we cannot produce. They are not manufacturers. They need what we produce and we need their productions from which to fabricate ours. Hence the true line of American commerce is across degrees of latitude. And I ask gentlemen to consider the question whether we shall place ourselves at the head of the silver-using group of tropical and semitropical nations which would give us the true lines of commerce, or shall remain, and suffer that we may remain, the tail of the gold-using countries, a mere bob to their kite? This is one of the grave questions now before Congress.

The following extract from a work by Condy Raguet, which appeared, if my memory serves me, in 1839, is pertinent in this connection, as it illustrates not alone the point on which I am speaking but the folly we perpetrated when we recently attempted to establish a single gold standard, and at an earlier date when we so far diminished the value of our gold dollar as to make it profitable to export our silver. Prior to that time, 1834, so far as trade between Great Britain and the United States was concerned, the two countries constituted a bimetallic union. Though our law tolerated both metals and made them both legal tender, we were practically a silver-using and England absolutely a gold-using nation; and the result of this use of both metals is shown by Mr. Raguet as follows:

Prior to the passage of the gold bill above referred to the metallic currency of the United States had been virtually, as above stated, a currency of silver since the establishment of the Government, gold very rarely appearing, while that of Great Britain was of gold. The consequence was that the currency of each was independent of the other, and the contraction or expansion of each did not necessarily act upon the other. The contraction in England which preceded the resumption of specie payments in 1821, after a long suspension of twenty-four years, produced no convulsion on this side of the Atlantic; nor did our contraction, distressing and durable as it was, after the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, on the 1st of October, 1833, which brought down the prices of stocks from 20 to 50 per cent., and led to the importation of $3,793,293 in silver from England alone, during the year ending on 30th September, 1834, produce any convulsion whatever in that country. Such would have continued to be the case had the mint regulations remained without alteration; but no sooner was gold, by a change in its relative value to silver, rendered the most profitable of the two metals to import than we found the currency of England disturbed to a degree that rendered necessary an immediate reduction of her paper issues, although the amount of gold drawn from her between the passage of the law in June, 1834, and the 30th of September of the same year was but $1,922,960. To the importations of gold in the years 1835 and 1836, instead of silver, may be ascribed that further contraction of the British currency which led to the crisis of the latter year, that was so fatal to American credits and American cotton, by which millions of dollars were lost to the country.

Now, as like causes will produce like effects, it behooves us to examine well into this matter, and if we find that we have committed an error, it is our duty to retrace our steps. Thus far very little progress has been made toward introducing gold into actual circulation, notwithstanding that a large amount had been imported, still a long perseverance in the law will give us a gold currency, but it will be most dearly purchased. It will so closely ally our fortunes with those of Great Britain, that no convulsion can take place in the currency of that country that will not act directly and powerfully upon ours; while on the other hand, none can take place on our side that will not act directly upon hers, and in so doing, break down the prices of cotton and tobacco, and other American products in the markets of Europe, to the injury of our planting interest.

Let us hastily consider the question with which league interest invites us to unite? The population which uses gold numbers 180,450,000 and they all dwell on our lines of latitude. They are older in manufactures than we, and against the productions of their cheaper capital and labor we have to maintain an artificial barrier by our tariff.

The nations using gold and silver as we would if we fully remonetized silver have a population of 132,500,000, nearly as many as the gold-using countries. They also are on our lines of latitude, and as bimetalists could trade with us even while silver may continue to be depreciated. The silver-using people number 876,700,000, which is largely more than twice the total of the others combined. Where do they dwell? India—British India, with whom England can no longer trade; China, Japan, and the islands of the Southern Sea, Africa and, to come to our own doors, Central America, Mexico, and South America are all silver-using nations. Shall we seek to become the manufacturers for this nearly one thousand million producers of raw materials, and become what England through the possession of this trade has been, the work-shop of the world, and, as an inevitable consequence, the mistress of the seas? If we aspire to this proud position we must place ourselves on a bimetallic basis, so that their coin shall be at par with ours, while 20, 30, or 50 per cent. may be between their par and that of those manufacturing nations of Europe which may adhere to the gold valuation.

My friend and colleague [Mr. FISHER] intimated that in advocating this bill I was doing something against the protective policy. I asked him to demonstrate his proposition. He said he had done so; but I have read his speech with equal care and pleasure and have not found the demonstration. Let me whisper to him confidentially that it was not our statutory tariff that propelled the manufacturing industries of this country by the marvelous strides with which they advanced between 1862 and that year of such triumph for us, 1876, when Philadelphia and Pennsylvania conferred upon this nation an international exposition. I do not mean to taunt gentlemen who come from States which made no contribution toward the cost of that exhibition. The burden was cast upon us, except that New Jersey gave $100,000, and I am a little proud of the fact that Philadelphia and Pennsylvania conferred that boon on the nation and welcomed the people of all the States to a share in its advantages. We will be amply repaid, for the exhibition proved to the world our country's capacity for manufacturing supremacy.

But to my point. What was it that so marvelously quickened our progress between 1862 and 1876? It was not our statutory tariff. No; it was the difference between the current value of the legal-tender money with which our immense domestic commerce was carried on and the money of the gold-using manufacturing nations. The depreciation of our paper made a measure of protection that false invoices nor any other means of defrauding the revenue could evade. It was inexorable; and when stupid people cried out for gold and were ready to make any sacrifice to bring our greenbacks to par with gold, they were hastening the abolition of the most effective protection on the industry of any nation ever had. I hope my colleague will carry these suggestions in his mind while I proceed to exhibit evidence of the correctness of my position.

Mr. FISHER. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. I will hear my colleague.

Mr. FISHER. Are we to understand that you now advocate a silver standard?

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir; I am a bimetalist.

Mr. FISHER. A bimetalist?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FISHER. Is Mr. Williamson?

Mr. KELLEY. He is, and presented to the British government the recent memorial of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce demanding the remonetization of silver.

I am a thorough bimetalist. Let me state what I mean. I am ready to remonetize silver at the present market rate, and, to borrow a phrase from my learned friend from Maine who sits beside me. [Mr. REED,] to make this country the dumping-ground of all the world for its silver.

Mr. REED. At what rate; the market rate?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes. If England and Germany see fit to send their silver here in advance and have it coined and use it in the form of dollars they will buy no more than the silver dollar would then be worth, and before we should have received $100,000,000 of their silver that metal would be at its old par with gold and the "daddy dollar" be again worth three cents more than its gold rival.

On this point there is small room for doubt: as I shall show, on the authority of the London Economist, than which there is no higher monometallic authority, that the cause of the commercial dislocation prevailing throughout the world, and which has already destroyed the possibility of profitable commerce between England and her Indian possessions, which embrace one hundred and ninety millions of people, is the possession by Germany of from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 of silver, which having been demonetized is for sale. Were that amount absorbed in the circulation of the world, the Economist holds, the old equilibrium would be re-established, and not only British and Indian trade would revive, but the trade of the whole world also. Who can doubt that in this country, under a system of free mintage which would scatter the standard dollars over the face of the country instead of locking them up in the Treasury as is now done because the metal for them is bought by the Government with interest-bearing bonds, the southern people alone would absorb $100,000,000. This is a moderate proposition, for I have shown you that months after he had signed the bill which demonetized the silver dollar, President Grant's calculation was that our people could readily absorb from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000; and I am ready to make this country the dumping-ground of silver because it is apparent that before Germany could send us $50,000,000 the price of the metal would go to par with gold.

Mr. FISHER. I fear I have misunderstood my colleague; I thought he was advocating a gold group of nations and a silver group of nations.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not propounded that suggestion as an original idea, a theory of my own evolving; I only quoted Wolowski and Ernest Seyd, who said such a result was among the inevitable consequences of the demonetization of silver by any one great nation. I think their prediction is being rapidly fulfilled, and am not afraid that we will receive an excessive volume of silver, for, as I have shown, the total amount which now hangs like a threatening cloud over the world is but from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000, an amount which our people could readily absorb. On this point the Economist shall speak for me. It is the highest economical and financial authority among the monometalists of the world. It is opposed to bimetalism and advocates the demonetization of silver; but trade between England and India has almost ceased, for in one year that trade cost England in loss on exchange $20,000,000, because there was no par between the units of payment of the two countries. Nations who adhere to the more costly unit cannot profit by trade with those who use a less costly one.

How does the Economist propose to overcome this difficulty and relieve England from her distressing embarrassment? To recede squarely from monometalism and advocate bimetalism would not do for so dignified and authoritative a journal; it therefore evades that issue and proposes that England shall buy half of Germany's silver. To put it to what use? To use it indirectly as money. To issue legal-tender paper upon it, just as the bill under consideration proposes to receive some of the silver dollars in the Treasury and issue certificates therefor which shall be legal tender. Yes; it proposes that England shall buy the half of Germany's silver on such liberal terms as will justify her in stipulating that Germany shall withhold the balance from the markets of the world for a given period, and that the Bank of England shall be authorized to issue legal-tender notes on the basis of the silver thus purchased. In its issue of April 12, 1879, it said:

> The operation of supplying Germany with a gold currency may now be understood to be completed in the main.

That phrase, "in the main," is a very large saving clause. Bismarck and Emperor William would be glad to know that not much more gold was required in Germany, for whenever they put their new gold coins into circulation they fly away; they will not stay in Germany.

> Fresh additions may have to be made from time to time, but no vast and sudden demand like that caused when the currency was instituted need any longer be apprehended. But though the gold currency has been established, the superseded silver has not—> yet been entirely disposed of, and the German government still holds a stock variously estimated at fifteen, seventeen, or twenty millions sterling. The whole of this, presumably, is not for sale, though it appears that but little, if any, more will be wanted for further subsidiary coinage. It would probably not be wrong to assume that fifteen millions may ultimately come on the market. It is uncertainty as to the course Germany may pursue with regard to this sum which keeps France in an expectant attitude. It is the restriction of the coinage of silver in the Latin union, at Vienna, in the United States, which as much as, if not more than, anything keeps the price of silver to the point it now stands at. So far, then, there are grounds for believing that the present depression in the price of silver is temporary, and not permanent. To a temporary difficulty a temporary remedy may fairly be applied, which could not be thought of were the evil certain to last for any lengthened period. The following course appears to have a great deal to recommend it: That our government should ascertain from the German government the actual amount of silver they have for sale, and that our government then should authorize the Bank of England to buy one-third or the half of the amount on the understanding that no further sales of silver should be made for a limited period of not less than five or seven years. The purchase might suitably be made at the average price of, say, the last three years. The bargain might fairly be expected to answer the purpose of both parties. Germany would gain at once a customer at a fair price for an article which she finds it difficult to dispose of. England would expect to reap a corresponding advantage in the rate of exchange with the East.

That word "superseded" is a good synonym for discarded. My friend and colleague [Mr. FISHER] will by and by begin to believe that Germany has demonetized silver—

Yes, there is the cause of Britain's commercial depression, "the rate of exchange with the East." The Economist proceeds to say:

> The arrangement might further provide that the Bank of England should hold this sum of silver among its bullion, and issue notes against it, as far as the provisions of the act of 1844 permitted, the government guaranteeing the bank from loss on the transaction, if any were incurred, and sharing the profit, if any, on terms to be stipulated. * * * That such an operation as has been indicated would relieve both trade and the finances of the Indian government there is little doubt. The movement in the price of silver but a few days since, when the Indian loan was proposed, shows how sensitive the market is. The removal of the pressure of the German silver would doubtless have a far greater effect.

The difficulty which is crushing England is, I repeat, the derangement of exchange between gold-using England and silver-using India and other silver-using states, whose total population numbers nearly nine hundred million.

One word further as to protection. Let me show that the depreciation of the commercial value of India's monetary unit is operating so protectively to India that the manufacturers of Lancashire are demanding that England's Indian subjects shall be made to wear and pay for Manchester cotton goods. The authority for this statement is before me. When addressing the House on the 9th of May, 1878, in opposition to Mr. WOOD'S tariff bill, I cited the ridicule heaped by the London Times upon Lancashire manufacturers, who had even then made this demand, and I again bring it to the attention of the House:

> There was scarcely a town in our cotton-manufacturing districts which was not represented. Lancashire en masse had turned out for the occasion, personally or by deputy, and the speakers may be fairly taken as expressing the fixed opinions of some hundreds of thousands of Englishmen. Private disputes were sunk for the moment in the face of a great question in which the earners and payers of wages were equally concerned, and Lancashire, for once in a way, was in perfect harmony in all its sections. * * * Their wish to preserve a foreign market for their goods is natural enough, and, within decent limits, praiseworthy enough. We can scarcely say much for them when they ask not only that Indian finance shall be regulated for their own convenience, but that the export trade of India shall be kept within the bounds they wish to assign to it, and shall be crushed out of existence when it intrudes itself as their rival. It was nothing less than this that the deputation were asking for, and with scarcely a disguise as to their real meaning. It is a strange thing, we cannot help remarking, to observe the new quarters from which proceed, in the case before us, the attack on free trade.

The British Indian government cannot raise revenue enough to meet current expenditures, and though each member of it is a free-trader it imposes an import duty of 5 per cent. on cotton fabrics. This light duty with the effect of the depreciation of silver have developed cotton manufacture in the presidencies of Madras and Bombay to such an extent that in addition to all her other inhumanities toward that unfortunate dependency the British manufacturing interests again and more emphatically demand the repeal of the duty and the compulsory consumption of British cotton goods by the miserable people. In this connection the Economist, in the number from which I have read, says:

It is nearly certain, whatever the fiscal regulations which may ultimately be adopted, that a considerable body of factory hands will ultimately be formed in India. The native capitalists, especially the Parsees, have learned how to use machinery, and with cotton on the spot, coal almost on the spot, and a large supply of cheap labor, they are almost certain to defeat foreign competition. Their fuel will become no dearer, their cotton tends to become cheaper in proportion as they learn to pack it for railway carriage and to store it, and their labor will hardly rise in price.

A five per cent. duty is not sufficient to account for this sudden and immense increase of manufactures in India. No, the depreciation of her discredited silver is doing for her what the depreciation of our paper money did for us. How this development continues to terrify Manchester is shown by Mr. Coke, whom I have already quoted, and who in his remarks to the Liverpool Board of Trade, said:

But the selfishness, nay, the cruelty, of this treatment of India is further exemplified by a correspondence on the Indian import duties which, strange to say, appears also in this day's Manchester papers. Mr. Raynsford Jackson, writing to the secretary of state for India on behalf of Lancashire manufacturers, demands that India should be compelled to buy Manchester goods duty free. The other markets of the world being inaccessible, because of the wall of protection with which they are surrounded, India must be made to buy. She has only silver money with which to pay; then give more of it, take off the duties, borrow when she can only buy Manchester goods.

I have, I fear, wearied the House. But I beg leave to briefly call its attention to the condition of France. She has been bimetallic since 1803, and though she has in this long interval seen dynasties rise and disappear in quick succession, she is now serene in the midst of the perturbed nations of Europe. The descent of her Crown has been changed several times. Empire has succeeded monarchy, and a republic the empire, more than once, yet through all these changes she has never since the adoption of bimetalism endured a financial crisis such as has so often prostrated the commerce and manufactures of England and the United States. She resorts when necessary to the use of inconvertible notes of her bank, having required it to issue $612,000,000 of them during the German war; but, unlike us, she has never been deluded into the idea that the way to pay debts is to suspend the operations of productive industry and to compel laborers to suffer in enforced idleness. When war or any other exigency compels an expansion of her paper currency she makes it, and then stimulates industry by every conceivable appliance, never retiring the inconvertible paper until there has come into the country a gold or silver franc for every paper one that is to be withdrawn. She maintains steadiness of business by maintaining a uniform and sufficient volume of currency. When she has to ask a loan she never organizes a syndicate to sell it to foreign capitalists, but through her own agencies disposes of it to the French people and thus binds them in loyalty to the nation by the tie of self-interest. Her policy is the very opposite of ours. What a contrast she presents to Germany, whose Emperor was recently so popular, he who with his chiefs won rich provinces and five milliards in money from France in 1872-'73 and became the idol of his subjects, but who now dare not show himself in the streets of Berlin without his guards about him; his approach like that of the Czar being heralded by the tramp of a detachment of cavalry. Meanwhile England finds herself in a condition which must constrain her to abandon her most cherished economic and financial theories or prepare to again trample into submission her suffering laboring people as she did in the streets of Bristol and Peterloo while she was arbitrarily forcing the resumption of specie payments. But mid all these perturbations bimetallic France moves on prosperously and contentedly, an example in monetary matters to our poor benighted country, and is quietly consolidating a republic which we may hope and believe will prove an enduring example to all the nations of Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question which I have withheld until the present time because I did not desire to interrupt him.

Mr. KELLEY. I shall be glad to reply to the gentleman if it be in my power.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I understood the gentleman to state, in giving an account of the demonetization of silver, that the effect of the measure was not understood by him at the time, although he reported the bill. Now, for the information of the country, I wish to make this inquiry: If that bill was passed by Congress and signed by the President in ignorance of its effect in demonetizing silver, why was it not repealed by the party then in power when it was discovered that an outrage of that kind had been perpetrated?

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot answer that question because it inquires into motives. All I can say is that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, who reported the original bill, were faithful and able, and scanned its provisions closely; that as their organ I reported it; that it contained provision for both the standard silver dollar and the trade-dollar. Never having heard until a long time after its enactment into law of the substitution in the Senate of the section which dropped the standard dollar, I profess to know nothing of its history; but I am prepared to say that in all the legislation of this country there is no mystery equal to the demonetization of the standard silver dollar of the United States. I have never found a man who could tell just how it came about, or why.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. My inquiry was why the party then in power did not repeal the provision when its effect was discovered.

Mr. KELLEY. I will answer that by another question, though I am not a Yankee. Will the gentleman tell me why this House, in which his party has a majority, does not hasten to repeal that legislation? I presume that the same cause which now controls the majority here controlled the majority of the other party when they were in power.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. The democratic party did attempt it in 1878, but were prevented by the republican Senate; and we are now attempting effectually to do it by this bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. As neither gold nor silver circulated at that time in this country, may it not be possible, if not probable, that this fact enabled that legislation to be passed without the scrutiny on the part of anybody which it would have received if coin had been actually in circulation?

Mr. KELLEY. I have so said in my remarks.

Mr. BOWMAN obtained the floor and said: I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, although I am to follow for a few moments the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] I propose to reply to only a few portions of his speech and those merely incidentally. I rise for the purpose of making a remark or two upon what seems to be the vital point concerned in the question now before the House; but before doing that I wish to say a word or two which I hope may have the effect to remove in some degree the prejudice by which this matter has been attempted to be surrounded. This prejudice relates to two things. First, it is declared that the demonetization of the silver dollar was a "fiendish outrage" of which somebody or other, name not given, was guilty; and, secondly, it is affirmed that the taking away of the legal-tender character of the trade-dollar was "a trick" disgraceful to all parties concerned. Those two allegations seem to lie upon the threshold of the discussion of this question as matters of prejudice.

Mr. WARNER rose.

Mr. REED. Now, I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will remain quiet long enough to allow me to say something. I say to this House that from the year 1835 until 1875 there was a discussion going on throughout the world among economists and persons specially interested in the question, whether a single standard or a double standard was the more desirable for a commercial nation as advanced in character and manufactures as the United States and Great Britain and various other nations. About the year 1872 that discussion culminated in a general belief on the part of all persons concerned that a single standard was the best. This belief prevailed, more or less, in all European nations and in all nations as far advanced in civilization as we are. And the point upon which that discussion turned was mainly, if not solely, that of stability. It was and is desirable in all civilized countries that there should be a standard of value which should be stable, which should not fluctuate in its character; and in the then condition of the world it was deemed proved by facts and circumstances, and by the general consent of mankind, that a gold standard was such a standard. I believe that there was no thought in anybody's mind of pillaging or plundering anybody, but simply of establishing a standard which should be permanent, and pillage and plunder nobody. On that question of stability we all of us agree. The gentlemen who are in favor of a double standard argue it upon the ground of the greater stability of the double standard and upon none other.

Now, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in my judgment is suffering under a lapse of memory on this subject. He did not understand when the demonetization took place, he says. I am bound to believe he states the matter exactly as he understands it now. But the truth about it is that this particular act attracted very little attention, although the discussion itself undoubtedly attracted the attention of a gentleman so well acquainted with and so well versed in such subjects as the gentleman from Pennsylvania. And to show that the discussion was in his mind I call his attention to a statement which has already been quoted. It is true he was talking in the preceding sentences about the subsidiary coinage, but it is equally true that he had the whole subject in his mind in the discussion during which this bill was passed. For he said at that time:

It is impossible to retain the double standard. The values of gold and silver continually fluctuate. You cannot determine this year what will be the relative values of gold and silver next year. They were 15 to 1 a short time ago; they are 16 to 1 now.

Now, I do not find any fault with the gentleman from Pennsylvania because he has received information on these various subjects. I do find a little fault, however, that he should boast of the necessity of having received so much; that he should have stated to this House that he had changed his mind upon all economical and financial subjects and then made a merit of the change. That a man should learn is an advantage not only to him but to the world at large. But there is one thing that I do insist upon, that he shall not in any way talk about the conduct as "fiendish" of gentlemen who have not been able to get his light. Why in the world cannot a man get credit for honesty when he is consistent as well as credit for honesty when he is inconsistent? [Laughter.] In short, does all human virtue consist in wobbling?

Mr. KELLEY. One moment, if you please.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not know that any human virtue consists in wobbling. I was speaking of Germany, and I did not know that any gentleman on this floor had legislated for her; or probably should have been more guarded in my expression.

Mr. REED. The gentleman misunderstands me. This was a debate in Congress on a bill in Congress. The gentleman has already made his explanation before to-day, and I make my comments upon it.

Now I come to the question of the demonetization of the trade-dollar, or rather to the taking away from the trade-dollar its legal-tender power.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] that I mean no disrespect to him by now retiring from the Chamber. I find myself in such a condition that I must seek repose; otherwise I should be very glad to stay and listen to his argument.

Mr. REED. When the trade-dollar was first coined—and this is an undisputed fact—silver was then in such a condition that the amount of silver put into the trade-dollar was worth one hundred and four cents. Consequently, by a law which is as immutable as the law of the attraction of gravitation, it could not circulate in this country, and our bullion-holders, desirous of finding a market for their bullion, asked the United States to put their stamp on a certain amount of their silver, and then they could export it so stamped to China and to the East generally. Accordingly that was done. But in the law, by some "mystery" or other—and by "mystery" I mean simply that I do not know how; that is all, and that is about the size of most of the "mysteries" there are here—it was made a legal tender to the extent of $5; but it was discovered upon the fall of silver shortly afterward that these trade-dollars were coming back. Then, when the matter was fresh in everybody's mind, the legal-tender clause was repealed so as to prevent this silver, which was coined simply for export purposes, from becoming a part of the currency of the country and driving gold out; or perhaps I should not say driving gold out, for I believe we had not much then.

Well, now, let me give the particulars. Let us see what were the names of these "conspirators" who perpetrated the trade-dollar "trick." In the first place, on the 8th day of May, 1876, Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, introduced into the House a bill the third section of which repealed the legal-tender quality of these coins. Well, whatever faults the gentleman from Pennsylvania may possibly have, nobody ever accused him of being a conspirator. He is certainly straightforward in all his actions. He brought the bill into the House and it was then reported—by whom? Why, by my friend from New York, [Mr. COX!] And it was passed by this House without a single dissenting vote, and at a time when people understood just what it meant. Now, it does not seem to me there is any trick about that.

Well, sir, having cleared the subject as I hope, in some slight degree, I do not desire to magnify my efforts in that direction, but having indicated a way in which men's minds may be cleared to some slight extent from the effects of prejudice, let us see what the question is for us to-day. People differ on the question whether it produces a more safe standard to have it bimetallic or monometallic. Into that dispute I do not propose to enter. In my judgment the opinion of the world after having been in favor of monometalism is now swinging the other way. Men are changing their opinions upon the subject as to which is the best standard, a double or a single one.

What I have to say I desire to say entirely upon the basis of a double standard. I want to confine my remarks to that. I want to place myself at the outset on the basis of a double standard, for the purpose of this argument, reserving to myself the right to change my mind in consequence of any future wisdom I may acquire, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, from communion with the saints and demi-gods who reside in Philadelphia or any other place.

A MEMBER. Does the gentleman say "demagogues?"

Mr. REED. I said demi-gods, from whom you may get wisdom; from the demagogues you get words only. [Laughter.]

Now, the situation of the world on this subject is something like this: I am not going into details. There are certain nations of Europe with whom we have trade and connection which are practically monometalists, which have gold for a standard and not silver. There are certain other nations which have silver for a standard. We at present have gold with a limited coinage of silver. Now, in that state of affairs India has ceased to absorb the amount of silver that it used to absorb in times past. Germany, for political reasons mainly, has demonetized silver to get rid of a great many silver coins and to have a universal coinage of the empire; and that has put $75,000,000 of silver in a threatening attitude as to the market, in such an attitude that the effect of it is much more depressing than the actual production of seventy-five millions of new silver, because nobody knows what they are going to do with it; nobody knows when they are going to sell it; and the consequence is the hostile attitude, the scare arising from it does much more toward the depression of silver in the market than the amount would seem to indicate.

Then there seems to be a larger production from the mines with the prospect of a still greater production. And besides that, there is the attitude of France. My friend from Pennsylvania eulogizes France. And whenever you find one of these gentlemen who are dissatisfied with the system of the United States he is always in love with the system that prevails in France. France's great system produces nothing but prosperity. The French system produces nothing but what is to be imitated by us. And yet the French to-day, or at least quite recently within a few months, have concluded a treaty by which they have stopped the coinage of silver for seven years. Why is it that our admiration of France should stop at these glittering generalities instead of following the system out into particulars? In France they have done a sensible thing; and they have done it because they have found that under the coinage of silver by the Latin union the gold is gradually disappearing from France; and hence from being a bimetallic she is becoming a monometallic nation, a silver instead of a gold and silver nation.

Just in this attitude of affairs, in this condition of things which renders the value of silver the most fluctuating possible, it is proposed to us to adopt, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, a double standard, but really a silver standard. But there are nations with a double standard which have really a single standard of silver. When the proportion is 1 to 16, it is really a single standard, and that is a standard of silver, which is what this bill means. Now look at the effect of this. We adopt what is really a single standard at the very time when it is most fluctuating and its future most uncertain. And here I must suggest to members that it is a little difficult always to follow the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] He says that silver, the standard in India, has raised a barrier which causes the Lancashire men to cry that they must take goods of other countries at any price, and that such a barrier is a good thing, because it operates as a protective tariff; and in the first part of his speech he talked about India "weltering" in poverty, I think that was the expression, as the result of this very thing. He first tells us that India is "weltering" in poverty and in a state of sorrow, and before he gets through with his speech he has her with a beautiful barrier erected and "virtue rewarded everywhere."

Now, what is the situation of England and the other nations with regard to this silver question? England used to be not only monometallist, but she had propagandist tendencies. She not only believed in that system herself, but she wanted to make every one else believe in it; but she has found that the experiment as between herself and India has been a pretty expensive amusement for her; and now the English say we are in favor of a single standard, and that standard gold; but as to you, the people of other nations, we do not like to banish silver, and we rather think you ought to have it as a part of your currency. Why? Because if you, particularly you of the United States, take it, it would relieve us of our troubles about India, for the United States would become the dumping ground, to use the expression which my friend from Pennsylvania has honored with his approbation, for all the loose silver in the world, and then England would be relieved. Now, we want the whole world to come to the bimetallic system, and consequently the proper attitude for us to assume is what they call an expectant attitude, only waiting until England is driven to do what we believe to be the proper thing on the subject.

Now, what is our theory and what do we believe to be the proper thing? It is that when all nations have gold and silver, if by any local changes silver, for instance, becomes cheaper in one country and drives gold into another country it will cheapen gold in that country and have a tendency to push the gold back and there will be the least possible disturbance of the equilibrium of values all the time. If that equilibrium is liable to be disturbed by the change in the value of money arising from temporary increased production of gold, the disturbance will be much less if the effect of the increase is distributed over a base of both gold and silver than if distributed over a base of gold alone. So with an increase of silver. It would have much less effect on money composed of gold and silver than on money of silver alone. And a temporary increase of production of silver and gold is not likely to be simultaneous. This idea can probably be carried out practically if all or nearly all civilized nations will come into it; if not, or if some of the greatest refuse, it will not work at all. I know the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will say let us have silver, and if gold is driven out to other nations it will lower the value of gold and raise the price of silver. Only temporarily and to a very slight extent. Perhaps, practically, at the present time, not at all. Silver has certainly fallen in spite of our purchase of thirty millions. Whatever effect this would have it would be only temporary; it would not be establishing a system placing us in accord with the rest of the world. If our silver became dear it would have nowhere to go to. A circulation must have a circuit, veins, arteries, and capillaries. Bimetalism to give stability implies free circulation.

Now, whether the monometallic system or the bimetallic system is the best is a question not yet decided. It is a scientific question, a complicated one, containing many elements that require to be studied, and it cannot be decided by a shout of fraud. We may be doubtful about the true decision of the question, but it seems to be sufficiently proved by the facts within our knowledge that it is an experiment to be tried, and if we want to try it we ought to try it under advantageous circumstances and not under bad ones. If we try it now it will be under bad circumstances and will be a failure; if we wait we can try it under proper conditions and it promises success.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman before he takes his seat allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REED. I will answer it if I can. My knowledge, however, is exceedingly limited, and I do not keep a note-book.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman remarked that we could not settle this question by crying fraud, and that it was a question that required very weighty consideration. Did it have that consideration when the change was made?

Mr. REED. In my judgment it did. In my judgment the people of the country discussed the question just as they discuss other questions. It was considered as a great many truths are, and the people may, perhaps, have changed their opinion from the changed condition of the country.

Mr. WARNER. I would ask the gentleman if the two leaders of the republican party, one in the Senate and one in the House, have not admitted to the country that they did not know that this provision was in the bill demonetizing silver?

Mr. REED. I say that it had consideration, but the leader of this side of the House now does not know of this discussion between you and me, and the two leaders may have been absent at that time; but what astonishes me is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who was the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, does not recollect anything about it.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman tell us where the democrats were about that time?

Mr. WARNER. I was not speaking of parties. I was speaking of the whole country.

Mr. REED. I find in a speech by the gentleman from New York, Mr. Hewitt, delivered on the 23d of August, 1876, that it took six or seven pages of the finest print to simply give the heads of the transactions of the House and Departments upon that question.

Mr. WARNER. Was there any discussion in the Senate?

Mr. REED. I do not know, but I know that the question was discussed all over the country and in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and in the reports of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. WARNER. Did not the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] ask the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate the question whether the silver dollar had not been dropped and was no longer a legal tender?

Mr. HASKELL. If the gentleman will allow me I can answer that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. BOWMAN. I do.

Mr. HASKELL. That bill was prepared by Mr. Knox, Comptroller of the Currency, in 1870; was submitted to twenty-five monetary experts for their opinion, which was given; was agreed to by the New York Chamber of Commerce and by the New York Board of Trade. It was introduced into one Congress, referred to a committee, and debated; it was introduced into another Congress, referred to another committee, and debated. It was thirteen times ordered to be printed by Congress. The debates in the House and in the Senate upon that bill cover eighty RECORD columns. It was debated by Senators on both sides, republicans and democrats. The special feature of the demonetization of the silver dollar was referred to by Comptroller Knox in his report, was referred to by these twenty-five monetary experts, by the New York Chamber of Commerce, by the Board of Trade, by Mr. KELLEY, Mr. Potter, Mr. Hooper, of the House, by Senator Casserly, Senator BAYARD, and I think five or six other gentlemen.

At the expiration of over two years, after having been considered by two Congresses, by two committees, on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Comptroller of the Currency, it became the law of the land.

Now we are here to-day debating a bill changing the coinage of the United States and are talking about the debate upon the former measure. We will be called upon next Tuesday to vote upon the several provisions of a specific bill, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is the only man on this floor who has taken up and considered that bill carefully and presented his views upon the subject. Unless we can have a debate different from that which has been had for five days on this bill we will come to a vote next Tuesday on the provisions of a bill which has never been represented on this floor save by one man; its language never having been referred to and its effects never more than guessed at.

Mr. WARNER. It has been discussed in every journal of the United States, while the former bill was never alluded to in any public journal or by any public writer of the country.

Mr. HASKELL. When my hour comes for making a speech I will refer the gentleman to at least twenty-five journals of this nation which contained articles on demonetization.

Mr. BOWMAN. And the gentleman from Kansas might have said that that matter was discussed in about eighty pages of the RECORD, in the Bankers' Magazine, and in the newspapers of the country for days and weeks. At this late hour of the day, and when other gentlemen are anxious to speak, I do not intend to detain the House by any extended remarks on this bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman will yield I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I will take but a short time. The hour is late, and, as I have said, other gentlemen are anxious to speak, and I think that the ground for Monday is all mapped out. I desire now only to state the foundation principles on which I shall act.

I have listened here day after day to the debate upon this question. I have heard our greenback friends and our friends on the other side give a thrilling and eloquent account of the condition of the people, of the depression of trade, and of the needs of labor. But I have not heard in any discussion of this bill any reference to the principles involved in it; a bill than which none has been introduced into this House at this session or at any other having a more vital bearing on the interests of all classes of the people.

What does this bill provide? As I understand it, this bill establishes four simple distinct propositions, which propositions have not been explained and have not been met by the advocates of silver currency. The first proposition is for a free and unlimited coinage of money, an absolutely free and unlimited coinage of silver money, or only limited by the will of the holders of the bullion or the supply of the metal. Second, it makes all such silver money, issued absolutely without any limitation except the will of the holder of the bullion or the supply of the metal, a legal tender. It provides that every man shall be obliged to take it for the debt due to him, whether this experiment is a success or a failure.

Third, it provides for the issue of silver certificates for the silver bullion or coin left on deposit in the Treasury; for the issue of silver certificates to an unknown and unknowable and unlimited and illimitable amount, regulated only by the amount of silver which may flow into the Treasury, which amount is likewise to have no limitation except the will of the owners of the bullion or the supply of the metal.

The fourth and the most extraordinary proposition makes the silver dollars not of legal weight a legal tender for all debts according to their weight. This great mass of silver issued at the will of persons outside of the Government is to be turned into the currency; and then no matter how abraded, worn, or mutilated, how clipped by punching or otherwise, how difficult even of identification it may be, every man must receive it in payment of his debts at a valuation in proportion to its weight.

It may be worn so that you cannot tell whether it is legal-tender coin or not; but if, it being tendered, an expert can afterward show upon the stand at a trial and by an analysis of the metal that it is a true legal-tender coin, the man who refuses it does so at his peril. Only half of it may be left; only quarter of it may be left; it may be in any condition you please, yet you are obliged to take it at its full value according to weight as a legal tender for debts.

I think I have made a fair statement of the four propositions contained in this bill, and I say that it is one of the most vicious bills ever introduced into the Congress of the United States—a bill which is not aimed at capitalists alone but aimed also at the laboring classes. In this country there can be no distinction between the interests of the capitalist and the interests of the laboring-man. They are interwoven and twisted together like net-work or basket-work. They are the warp and woof of civil society. Pass a law which cripples the manufacturers, and the loom stops, and, as in some of our cities, thousands of men and women and little children cry for bread. Endanger the interests of the laboring classes, and the loom likewise stops, and disaster is brought upon the capitalist.

Now consider for a moment the provisions of this extraordinary bill, which I say has not been analyzed by its supporters. The gentleman who represents on this floor and is said to be the leader of the greenback persuasion [Mr. WEAVER] said yesterday that he would endeavor to discuss the merits of this bill. He gave us an argument about inflation and told us how poor people suffer, and said in substance they would not endure it any longer. He would have us believe that the laboring classes were on the verge of revolution. He gave us a history of the country for many years past. The gentleman who has defended this bill to-day [Mr. KELLEY] told us about France and about the ancient Romans. He gave us a history of the condition of the country. But none of the advocates of this bill have analyzed it or endeavored to show that it meets the wants of the community or would relieve the sufferings of business men. Now I ask the House for a moment to analyze patiently this bill to see what it is—to see the wickedness and viciousness and bad policy embodied in this measure, the ruin which it threatens to the business of the country, or that at least which is left to us.

In the first place this is a scheme for the inflation of the currency, and the wildest scheme of the most unlimited inflation ever before attempted. In the days of the war, when greenbacks went down to their great discount, and gold upward to its premium, there was a limitation. There was never an issue of greenbacks at the will of the people. The greenbacks were only issued as the Government needed them. As the war went on and great purchases had to be made, as the vast demands of the war had to be met, greenbacks were issued. But there was never a scheme of inflation like this—never an issue of greenbacks, except to meet the needs of the Government and at the will of Congress. The supply of coin under this bill has nothing to do with the needs of the Government, has nothing to do with the needs of the banks, has nothing to do with the needs of the laborer, has nothing to do with the needs of business in its various operations. All questions of expansion or contraction, all questions of a tight or loose money market, all questions of the state of exchanges or the balance of trade, in a word, all questions of the need of money are entirely eliminated and have nothing to do with this question of the issue of silver. The Government has nothing to say about it.

This question is, as it were, wholly lifted out of the control of the Government. The Government says, in effect, to the holders of bullion, "We will have nothing to say about the question; we withdraw our control; we give it all into the hands of you, a few private men who own mines in Nevada or who are speculators in silver; we do not even retain a power of supervision or veto over you; we absolutely give up the control which we had during the war to decide how much money the Government would issue. You are a little syndicate—ten, twenty, fifty, a thousand men. All congressional power, all the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, to decide how much money there shall be in this country, all power of breaking down or affecting business by inflation to the utmost extent we surrender, we relegate to you. Do you represent the people? No. Are you members of Congress? No. Are you watching over the interests of the people? No. You are simply operators in bullion, and in your sole individual hands we place that power heretofore reserved by Congress or the Government of saying what the extent of the currency shall be." Congress cannot take back this power during the recess; the Government cannot interfere; the Secretary of the Treasury must be dumb. No matter how the experiment fails, these few men are the leaders and the rulers of the country so far as the amount of the currency can affect business prosperity. Did you ever hear of a more monstrous proposition? Would we dare to give ourselves that power? Would we dare to vote here to-day that members of Congress at any time after adjournment may get together and vote that the currency shall be inflated to the extent of $1,000,000, $5,000,000, $50,000,000, or $70,000,000? I say that at this time, with the silver reservoirs in this country and in Europe ready to flood us with a resistless stream of silver, this is a monstrous power, at which every business man may shudder—a power which may be so tremendous in its effects that business men will not dare to embark in manufacturing enterprises or in importations of goods or in any business when the price of money may go up and down, not, as in the times of the war, at the will of the Government, not at the will of the Secretary of the Treasury by his issue of greenbacks, not at the will of Congress, but at the will of speculators in bullion, who want to carry prices up or down, or who want to sell their silver bullion to the Government at eighty-five cents on the dollar, receiving therefor one hundred cents on the dollar, with which to pay poor men through the country debts which they owe.

Now, is there any danger in this? There is no danger as to gold. Gold will keep its value. Gold is a good tender through the world. Go through the countries of Europe, among the wild Indians of the West, among the savages of the whole world, and you will always find that your gold dollar is a legal tender, accepted for anything. But the demand for silver will not absorb the silver so as to keep it up to its par, as contemplated by this bill, of one hundred cents on the dollar.

From 1866 to 1875, a period of ten years, the production of gold was £237,000,000 sterling and a fraction, while the production of silver was about £118,000,000 sterling, making a yearly average of about £24,000,000 sterling in gold and £12,000,000 sterling in silver.

From 1853 to 1875, a period of twenty-three years, the production of gold amounted to about £569,000,000 sterling, and of silver about £231,000,000 sterling. In 1877 the production of silver in this country alone was about seventy millions. Imagine the holders of the Nevada mines and other mines in this country having the power to inflate the currency yearly at the rate of $70,000,000, more or less, and then that power re-enforced by the inexhaustible reservoirs of Europe, with their hoards of demonetized silver, and then consider what inflation might possibly result, and consequent disturbance of the currency. Would any man be such a natural fool as not to take advantage of the speculation if he could? Would you or I, if we held silver at eighty-five cents on the dollar, not take that silver in a cart and go with it as quickly as we could to the Treasury, and march off, in place of our silver, with silver dollars or silver certificates, to be paid to our creditors at one hundred cents on the dollar? Are our people crazy? Do the brokers of Europe know what they are about? Do you believe that the Rothschilds and other great monetary firms in Europe will not send their silver here and heap it into our vaults and inflate our currency?

Why is there a discrimination against the United States? You are not giving the United States Government a fair chance when you pass a law providing that private individuals shall speculate all they want and make all they can out of silver; that foreigners may do it; that the world may do it at a profit of 15 per cent.; and all may do this except the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States is shut off from this speculation. It is not to buy this silver at eighty-five, ninety, or ninety-five cents on the dollar. The bullion speculators, the money speculators, the foreigners of the whole world may go into this speculation, but the United States is shut out and has no right to do it. It is wholly shut out from taking this bullion and making any money out of it, if money is to be made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said and have I not rightly said and has that argument been met by the advocates of the bill, that this is a scheme of boundless inflation of which no man can prophesy the end? He can prophesy, to be sure, but will his prophecy come true?

> I can call spirits from the vasty deep.
> Why, so can I, or so can any man;
> But will they come when you do call them?

You may prophesy, but the prophesying may not be carried out. We may exercise our New England practice of guessing how much the currency will be inflated, but there is no rule to go by. It would be like an endeavor to tell how much water would run down the Mississippi River. The question is how much the fountains will hold; how much rain will descend from the heavens and fill those fountains.

If we had only our own country to consider we could judge with safety to a limited extent, but how can you tell how much silver would come from Europe? Who can tell, with the discovery of new mines and new appliances, how much silver will be produced in our country next year or the year after? Will the gentleman who has charge of the bill put upon record his prophecy whether the currency will be inflated to the extent of ten, fifty, seventy, or one hundred millions?

No man can tell, and it is put beyond the reach of the Government; beyond its control, and absolutely into the hands of private individuals.

Suppose this Congress should pass a bill like this: that a body of men, brokers and bankers of Wall street, might by a vote properly entered decide at any time how much greenback currency should be issued, and thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury should issue the legal-tender greenbacks that such body of men require. Is there a man who would vote for that? Yet that is the very bill that is here to-day. This Congress if it passes this bill will vote that a body of men may decide at any time how many legal-tender greenbacks shall be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, providing that sufficient silver is deposited as collateral. The Secretary cannot say "yes" or "no," but must simply issue those greenbacks.

I agree with the gentleman of the greenback persuasion who spoke yesterday that it makes no difference whether you call them greenbacks or silver certificates. It is just as well to say instead of silver certificates that the Government can issue an amount of greenbacks equivalent to the amount of silver put on deposit; hence this is not in one sense a silver bill. No man believes that the people are going to carry silver in their pockets to a great extent. This is simply a greenback inflation currency bill. It is a bill providing that currency in the shape of paper shall be issued by the Government to an amount that outsiders (men out of the Government) think to be best, provided they can put a corresponding amount of silver bullion in the Treasury. Hence it is a bill to secure not only an unlimited issue of silver, but an unlimited issue of paper money, the amount of which no man can conceive, or prophesy, or guess, and this at the instigation of men outside of Congress, outside of the business interests of the country, and who care for nothing but their own pockets and their own business speculations.

Now, I say if we are going to have an issue of silver let us meet the question honestly in behalf of the people. Let the Government say how much shall be issued from time to time; let the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury be asked. If that will not do, why not put the power in the hands of one man? There is a man in Nevada who studies the silver market, the greatest owner of silver stock in the world, a shrewd, keen, clear-headed business man, who understands the laws of trade and of finance. We might trust his opinion on this subject. Why not put this law in a form which will leave that gentleman to decide how much silver shall be coined and how much the currency shall be inflated at any time? Why not trust him as well as to trust a dozen or fifty others? Why not trust him as well as to trust a foreign broker? Why not trust him as well as to trust the Rothschilds?

I remember reading a little while ago an account that the Rothschilds hunted up the statutes and found an old law by which the French government were bound to coin silver bullion into silver francs. They reckoned the price, bought the bullion, and sent it to the mint. The authorities there did not know of the law, and upon hunting up the statute they found that they would be obliged to coin that silver. In order to discourage the Rothschilds they said that because of the great amount of business they would not be able to furnish them the coin for one year. The Rothschilds figured on it and found that they could afford to lose the interest for one year, and they sent word to the mint to go on and coin it as soon as they could.

After awhile it was discovered that this silver bullion had been stolen from the mint. Under the French law the government was not bound to guarantee the safe-keeping of the bullion, and hence the case got into the courts and became public.

Now, we propose to advertise to the Rothschilds that they need not go to the French mint, but if they will be kind enough to send their silver over here, we will coin it for them and give them 15 per cent.

profit. At the same time we advertise to all the money kings of Europe that we propose to give them the power to say how much our currency shall be inflated at any time. If they want our bonds to go up or to go down, if they want our goods to decrease or increase in price, we hereby notify them in the most public manner that we will place in their foreign hands the right, without any appeal to our Government or our people, to say how much our currency shall be inflated; whether we shall have a great deal more of currency or a little; whether we shall be kept short of currency or whether we shall be flush, to use the broker's term. The whole monetary power in that respect is to be transferred to foreigners, to brokers and speculators, to any persons who may be interested in that question and can secure the bullion.

I say that this is a bill which violates all the laws of common sense. I submit to you, gentlemen, whether these statements have been answered by any facts; whether it has been shown that this is not unlimited inflation; whether they have put any checks around this bill to guard it in case the experiment shall prove to be a failure. In case the silver of the world is poured into our Treasury, is there anything by which the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, or even Congress can protect the people in case of disastrous results?

The Treasury mills will still grind on, no matter how much silver may be depreciated. The carts will drive up to the Treasury and empty out their bullion, and the mills will turn around and make it into silver dollars. The bullion will go in at one end worth eighty-five cents on the dollar, and come out at the other end worth for tender purposes one hundred cents on the dollar, and will be used to pay our debts.

A flexible currency, one that is adjustable to the wants of the people, is what is needed. The national banks issue money sparsely or plentifully, according to what is needed. What this country wants is a flexible currency in some way adjusted to the wants of the people. That was what was meant to be attained by former laws of Congress, by the rules of the Treasury, and the mode of proceeding adopted by the national banks.

Now, what do you substitute for the flexible currency adapted to the wants of the people? You substitute an arbitrary rule with which the people and their wants have nothing to do. They are eliminated from the case; they are not considered for a moment. The only question asked is whether there are any holders of bullion who desire to have it turned into legal-tender silver dollars.

Hold up this bill and examine it in any light you please; look at it upon all sides, upon the side of the capitalists, of the merchants, of the manufacturers, of the bankers, of the brokers, (except the brokers in silver,) of the laboring-man whose wants are supplied by his muscle and to whom the question of the value of money is a vital question; turn it around and examine it from all points of view, and you will find that it is a monstrous law, a law the most independent of the people, of Congress, of the Government that was ever attempted to be put on our statute-book. It is a law which will be a curse to the business man because there is no element of certainty in it, and, worse still, because there is no element of Government protection in it.

The Government cannot protect us under this law. The power will be put into the hands of a few individuals. Silver may pour in in a steady stream, or it may come in "spurts" as it may affect this or that business speculation. It may change according to the temporary wants of speculators, according as to whether they want to bull or bear the market, to buy or sell stocks. Any of these reasons may affect this expansion, and no man can foresee what will be safe for him to do in business enterprises.

The law of supply and demand is wholly violated. This law applies to money as well as to all other things. One gentleman told us the other day, as an indication of the need of a silver bill, that potatoes at a certain place were at a very high figure, and the reason, as he inferred, was that we had not a law such as this silver bill. I could have told the gentleman that the law of supply and demand has a great deal to do with that question. The potato-bugs sit on the fence in the West and deliver their opinion as to what the price of potatoes shall be. The question of the supply of silver has nothing to do with the price of potatoes, except as it inflates the currency.

Why, Mr. Speaker, imagine the farmers of Illinois sitting down when the potato harvest comes and saying, "Well, now there is so much silver in the country, we must sell our potatoes at such a price per bushel." Imagine them holding a convention and fixing the price of their potatoes according to the price of silver. The law of supply and demand applies to everything—wheat, silver, gold, horses, cattle, everything. If gold were as plentiful as the paving-stones of the street it would be just as cheap as those paving-stones.

The law of supply and demand as to silver is entirely violated by this bill, because the question is not whether silver is needed, whether the people are suffering for it, but simply whether speculators who have it in hand, who want to sell it, who want to make money, shall have the right to turn their bullion at eighty-five cents on the dollar, more or less, into money worth one hundred cents on the dollar for debt-paying purposes?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] may be allowed to finish his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia.) If there be no objection the gentleman will be permitted to proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BOWMAN. I will endeavor to be very brief. Now, Mr. Speaker, money has been heretofore supplied according to the demands, according to the needs of the Government. In the war a vast volume of currency was needed to carry on the great operations of the Government and the great manufacturing and mercantile enterprises occasioned thereby. Now a less volume is needed. Throw into the market, where it must pass as legal tender, more silver or paper money than the needs of trade require, and it must be deteriorated. The history of the war and of subsequent years proves this. When more greenbacks than were needed were thrown into the market the value of greenbacks went down. Throw into the market more silver than is needed and can properly be absorbed, and you have a depreciated currency—a currency which drives all good currency out of the market.

No man can doubt that under such a law as this silver money will be a deteriorated and debased currency. The value of money varies with the demand for it, as well as from other causes, in other words with its supply. Gold is the great standard of value throughout the world. In the first place, you start with a silver dollar to-day that is not worth by fifteen cents so much as gold. Intrinsically, it is an inferior and debased coin. Now, I am not going to discuss the question whether the legal-tender quality will carry that silver to par, because there is not a man in this Hall, be he a greenbacker or otherwise, who believes that silver will come to par with gold. Some of the gentlemen who advocate this bill have had the frankness to say that they do not care if gold is driven out of the country. They are willing to have this country made the great "dump" of the refuse silver of the world. The discount on silver is substantially in proportion to the demand among the people for it. Supply more silver than the people want and it goes down; supply less than the people want and it goes up.

But gentlemen tell us that silver has intrinsic value to keep it up; that in this it differs from paper. It has not such intrinsic value. The so-called standard silver dollars are worth only eighty-five cents; and I say it is dishonest, it is a wrong and a fraud, it is a crime, to compel a man to take eighty-five cents for a debt of one hundred cents. It is a crime for Congress to thrust its hand between creditor and debtor and say to the debtor that he may with eighty-five cents make payment of a debt of one hundred cents.

The result of this measure must be that silver will drive all the gold coin out of the country, or at least out of circulation. One would say this was a self-evident proposition; but the question has been so much debated and the arguments of the supporters of the bill have been such that it seems necessary to prove even that proposition. When you buy an apple of an apple-woman on the street she gives you the old sixpence that no one else will take. You have in your pocket a greasy, tattered, deteriorated greenback and you shove it off at the first opportunity. You have some old silver which you are afraid you may not be able to deposit in the bank and you pay with this debased currency the first debt you can. Your gold will be hoarded in an old stocking, or put in some other place of safety. Inevitably, the bad, the debased, the clipped, the dishonest money drives out the good money. The poorer money always drives out the better. And the result will be that we shall have here a silver currency without limit and uncontrolled by the Government in regard to its amount as the sole currency of the country.

I shall not detain the House, Mr. Speaker, by speaking of the second proposition in regard to making all this money a legal tender. The silver currency will be a legal tender, no matter how inflated to the extreme, emptied from all the countries in the world, from mints running to their fullest capacity, and with the great steam-engines of Nevada grinding up their thousands of tons of ores. Let silver go down and down and down; no matter how disastrous this experiment, we must take it for our debts, for our lands, for our houses, for our cattle, and for our goods. No matter how disastrous the experiment is, no matter how great the deterioration is, we must take it for all our debts. The poor man must take it for his labor, the rich man must take it for his goods, the importer must take it for goods for which he paid gold. I say that this is not a question to be argued by our greenback friends as the guardians of the poor of this country as they assume to be, but by all of us. They have no pre-emption rights to style themselves the only friends of the laboring classes. We who desire an honest currency, who desire that every man should be paid for his labor or his goods in honest money for an honest day's work or an honest quantity of goods, have just as much right to speak for the laborers of this country and the poor men of this country as our greenback friends who assume the monopoly of the protection of the poor and laboring classes, and by their self-styled protection would drive those laboring classes into a worse misery than they have yet felt, into a repetition of the suffering and the misery of the last five years.

We are just coming out of this long and weary path which has been so hard to follow. Our feet are bruised, and wounded by the thorns. Do we want to go over it again? Do we want to drive the people into this long road of suffering from which we are emerging? I tell our greenback friends, and I honestly believe it, that they are trying to lead on the people of this country not only into a repetition of the sufferings of the last five years, but into worse agony and worse suffering. You are destroying the fruits of this time of trouble. Of late we have been paying the penalty for the overissue of greenbacks. We are emerging into prosperity, and you would repeat the disastrous experiment which we have gone through.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I only want to say a word about this issue of silver certificates. If you are determined to increase the paper money, why not do it honestly, with a check upon it? Why not say that the Government, in its discretion or by a law of Congress, to a certain amount fixed by Congress, may buy silver bullion and put it in its vaults, and issue greenbacks to the amount of the silver in the vaults? There you have a fairer proposition. The Government and Congress can decide as to the need of inflation. Why not do that? Why not say that bullion may be deposited by the Government in the vaults and greenbacks issued in place thereof? And why do you take that power out of the hands of the Government and say that private individuals may decide that question; that private individuals may deposit the bullion and private individuals may make the money on the speculation, and according to the will of those speculators currency may be inflated or be contracted?

I believe that the last section of the bill is vicious and inexcusable. I know it follows the general law of legal tender. But you are looking now toward a great and unlimited inflation of silver dollars if your theories are correct; that is, silver dollars will remain everywhere throughout the country and be in universal use if this bill passes, all the gold dollars being driven out. And you provide that no matter how mutilated that money is, no matter how it is clipped, no matter how holes are punched through it, no matter how you are unable to identify it, if an expert can swear and prove that it is really a United State silver dollar you have got to take it at its weight as legal tender in payment of your debt. A man comes to you to pay you for your house or your horse and offers you a collection of old and battered silver coins, some of them with holes in them, some flattened out, others mutilated and all abraded, and he says: "I want you to take that coin." You reply: "I don't want to take any such money. That does not look like a good dollar; it is mutilated, it is abraded. I am not sure even that it is genuine, because I cannot try the chemical tests upon it." His reply is: "You must take it if I can prove that, mutilated as it is, it is good silver; if I can prove it is a United States silver dollar you must accept it." Men will be obliged to go about with scales on their backs to weigh the silver presented to them in payment of debts if this silver is to be the universal and permanent medium of exchange, as it is claimed it is to be.

If this money is going to be poured upon us like the dews of heaven, (no, I will not say that, because it comes from another region,) the last section is a vicious section. I submit to this House for all these reasons whether this law is a law which ought to be considered for a moment by a reasonable man. I ask gentlemen upon the other side of the House honestly whether they have answered these questions; whether, in their dissertations on the history of the country, upon the depression of business for the last five years, in their sermons about Rome and France and Germany, they have answered any of these questions about this bill or discussed it in a practical manner? Why do you not tell us how much silver will probably be sent into the country and what this expansion may be? Why do you not inform us as to the practical results of the bill?

Mr. WARNER. If the gentleman will yield to me I will answer him now.

Mr. BOWMAN. I will yield in a moment. I have only a word or two to say. I say why do you not discuss this bill, take it up section by section, as I have endeavored to do, and tell us what the practical result will be? Why not discuss this free-coinage clause, this power given to private individuals of regulating the contraction or expansion of the currency? Why not discuss the question about legal-tenders and the making of a limitless amount of silver legal tender for our debts, yours and mine, and debts which affect all other laboring-men?

Mr. WARNER. Whenever the gentleman will yield to me I will explain that point.

Mr. BOWMAN. Why not tell us about the issue of silver certificates, whether the result of this bill will be an issue of silver or an issue of paper money under the name of silver certificates, which might just as well be called greenbacks, and thus we shall have a greenback-inflation currency? Why not tell us whether it is not really an expansion of the paper money of the country and not of coin really and practically? Why not tell us about the last section, whether, if this money is to be issued in great quantities, we shall be obliged to take it for all our debts in a mutilated state, and as to the convenience or evils of that proceeding?

When we have before us a bill so important as this, a bill vital in one way or another to the interests of this country, why cannot we have the bill itself discussed, and not listen all the time to these essays upon labor and the needs of the laboring-men and the demands of business, unless the connection between the bill and these questions is made good.

Now, sir, I will stop with only one question. The gentlemen of the greenback persuasion have told us that the silver bill is a panacea for all our woes; that if it passes business will revive, the laboring-men will be happy; that it is the great remedy for all our troubles. Will they not show us how? Why do they not show us that if one hundred million more dollars, issued by Government according to the greenbackers' idea, are printed the laboring-man is going to get some of them? Why do they not show us how they are going to benefit the laboring-men?

Mr. WARNER. By preventing a further fall in prices.

Mr. BOWMAN. How does this bill accomplish this? They did not tell us; they did not dare to tell us in the greenback campaign last autumn in Massachusetts how this was to be effected. We asked the question how, if you issue millions of paper dollars and millions of silver dollars, they are going to get out among the people and enable them to get rich, and our opponents never answered that question on the platform, but they have answered it in Congress. Within three or four days past our greenback friends have said in substance that an issue of silver dollars will not help the people; that inflation will not help the people or give them more money unless the money reaches the people; but they do not tell us on the floor how this money is going to reach the people or how to solve the problem. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DE LA MATYR] tell us how he would solve it? Why, the answer is that they will issue these millions of dollars of greenbacks and spend these millions of dollars for building up all the old, worn-out canals, and burst-up railroads in the West.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. The gentleman really ought not to be so unfair as to repeat that.

Mr. BOWMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw that bill?

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I presented it merely for another man, and I would do the same thing again.

Mr. BOWMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the bill?

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I presented the bill, but I do not indorse it.

Mr. BOWMAN. Now I would ask, does the gentleman withdraw the other bills introduced by his greenback colleagues?

Mr. DE LA MATYR. That bill is the only one I do not indorse.

Mr. BOWMAN. I would ask in what earthly way or by what miracle you can get the money into the hands of the people except by spending it?

Mr. DE LA MATYR. When I get the floor, as I hope to do, I will answer that question.

Mr. WHITE. Let the county commissioners pay it out.

Mr. BOWMAN. That question has never been answered on this floor, it has never been answered on the stump, how any silver, paper, or other currency of the Government could get out to the people unless you spend it.

Mr. JONES. We could spend it to pay the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. BOWMAN. To pay the current expenses of the Government, the gentleman says. We pay those now; we pay the expenses of the laboring-man, merchant, and the mill-owner, and of all men who contribute to the needs of the Government. Last year and the year before, and the year before that, every year since 1875 and the hard times, we have paid the current expenses with the money which we have, and yet it does not accomplish your purpose. That is not an answer, but it is the only answer which has been given.

Mr. WHITE. We have enough money for that now.

Mr. BOWMAN. We have enough currency now to pay all our expenses. Is there an employé in any of the Departments or in all the United States that is suffering because there is not money enough to pay him? Does not the money we now have go among the people, and has it not gone for five years?

Mr. JONES. Why not pay off our bonds with it?

Mr. BOWMAN. Because we do not believe in raising money by taxation or by increasing our revenues to pay off our bonds faster than is reasonable. We are paying them now just as fast as we can decently and comfortably, and the debt is being reduced every year.

Let the people take notice of this matter, and let them say if they want to adopt this doctrine of the greenbackers. The only way that any man on this floor or any man on any stump has shown how the people can be benefitted by the issue of greenbacks or silver by the Government is to adopt a great system of internal improvements, to dig out canals, harbors, and rivers, to build breakwaters, to revive old bankrupt railroads, to build other railroads across the continent; to spend the money of the United States for internal improvements, and thus increase the debt. I challenge the greenbackers on this floor to show a single way in which the people will be benefited by this inflation except by the United States spending the money and increasing its debt. I have refrained from saying anything as to whether this bill should be supported if it provided for an honest silver dollar, equivalent in value to the gold dollar. The bill must be treated and discussed as it stands.

In conclusion I have only to say that I know and believe that the country or the laboring people themselves will not be blinded by all this dust and fog and talk about the rights and sufferings of the laboring people which have been thrown around this question. The question of the sufferings of the people has nothing to do with this bill. It will stand or fall on its naked merits as a scheme of inflation, either of silver or of paper. Under all this sophistry, under all this hair-splitting argument, under all this philosophizing which we have listened to for days here, is the simple naked question whether we wish to give to a body of uncontrolled and uncontrollable men outside of the Government, having no possible interest in it, caring nothing for the people, caring nothing for business, caring nothing for laborer or capitalist—whether we shall place in their hands alone the power of saying how much silver shall be issued or how much the currency of the country shall be inflated.

Mr. BUCKNER obtained the floor.

Mr. DUNNELL. If the gentleman from Missouri will yield, I will move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to printing the petition in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that after the expiration of the morning business to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table meanwhile.

CORRECTION OF A MISSTATEMENT.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I send to the Secretary a newspaper containing matter marked, which I ask him to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter will be reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

The President to-day appointed Major Theodore L. Poole, of this city, as pension agent at Canandaigua. The office is a very lucrative one, worth from $10,000 to $15,000 a year. The agency is the largest in the United States. The appointment was secured by ROSCOE CONKLING. It was generally believed that Major Moses Summers, editor of the Syracuse Standard, would be appointed agent. The Hon. FRANK HISCOCK, M. C., had secured the promise of the President to appoint Mr. Summers. Summers's petition was signed by every republican Congressman from New York, with two exceptions. His appointment was considered certain. All at once Senator CONKLING appeared on the scene. The present agent at Canandaigua, S. Drury, who has held the position for fifteen years, is a relative of CONKLING, and the Senator did not propose to lose his hold upon the office. How he succeeded is a mystery, but Major Poole, the new appointee, is a strong Conkling man, and his appointment was asked by Mr. HISCOCK. Summers's name, which had been sent to the President, was withdrawn for the reason that Mr. HISCOCK did not dare to oppose Mr. CONKLING. Summers was a liberal republican, and was very active in securing petitions for General Merritt's confirmation. The triumph of Conkling is regarded with significance in this region. Major Poole was United States assessor and county clerk of Onondaga County. The Hiscock republicans are very much disturbed over his appointment. It is declared to be a bold stroke for reconciliation and harmony among the republicans of this part of the State.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Secretary omitted to read that this matter is extracted from the New York Times, where it seems to have appeared as a dispatch or communication dated Syracuse, New York, May 2. From the paper in which it originally appeared it has found its way into the Buffalo Express, a journal widely read, and edited with so much intelligence and reverence for truth and justice that its proprietor and editor would not have allowed these statements to find a place in his columns had their lack of foundation been known.

I wish to say that until the name of Mr. Poole came here from the President I did not know that Mr. Poole was an applicant for the place or that any one had suggested him in that regard.

Another of these statements is that Mr. Drury, of Canandaigua, is a relative of mine. No relative is he whatever, except as all children of Adam and Eve are relatives of each other. Mr. Leander M. Drury is and has long been a pension agent, distinguished for the faithfulness with which he has discharged the duties of his office. So blameless and meritorious has his administration been, that for long years he has been left untouched.

I will only add that every statement found in this paragraph, so far as it refers to me, is utterly without foundation. I have had nothing to do with superseding Mr. Drury or with selecting his successor.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business the Chair will declare the morning hour at an end, and the unfinished business is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

Mr. BECK. The Secretary reached in the reading on Saturday the appropriations for the Life Saving Service on page 31 of the bill.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following clause from lines 754 to 757 inclusive:

That the second and third sections of the act entitled "An act to organize the life-saving service," approved June 18, 1878, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. BECK. Those sections the bill repeals because the second section provides:

That the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the establishment of life-saving and life-boat stations are hereby made available for the payment of the expenses of the establishment of the stations herein authorized.

And section 3 declares:

That all moneys received from the sale of old stations and equipments and other material condemned by a board of survey as unserviceable may be expended in rebuilding or removing and equipping stations.

We determined to strike those sections out, so that each item of appropriation could come before Congress instead of allowing unexpended balances resulting from the sales of property to be applied to the service.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the clause making appropriations for the office of the assistant treasurer at New York, line 831, to reduce the appropriation for the salary of minor-coins clerk from $2,400 to $2,200; and, in line 853, to reduce the total amount of the appropriation for the office of the assistant treasurer at New York from $151,470 to $151,270.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following clause in the appropriations for the office of the Director of the Mint, in lines 983, 984, and 985:

For purchasing books, periodicals, and pamphlets containing information relative to monetary questions, $200.

Mr. BECK. That is a small item for the purchase of books, &c., by the Director of the Mint which the House agreed to give him in accordance with a letter which I hold in my hand. I said I would call attention to everything new in the bill. It is a very small item.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and in the appropriations for the mint at Denver, Colorado, the following items were read:

For wages of workmen, $10,000.

For fuel, lights, acids, chemicals, crucibles, repairs, and other necessaries, $6,000.

Mr. BECK. There are a few increases there relating to the Denver mint, which were put in by the House, for the pay of workmen, in consequence of a letter from the Director of the Mint and indorsed by the Secretary of the Treasury saying they were all essential and necessary. I will not cumber the RECORD by the letters, and simply call attention to the fact that these increases were made on the request of the Director of the Mint indorsed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Director of the Mint came personally before us, as well.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Mint at New Orleans, Louisiana," in line 1078, to increase the appropriation "for wages of workmen and adjusters" from $57,000 to $75,000.

Mr. BECK. That is a decided increase, and therefore I will ask that the following letters from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint be read. They are short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letters will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 23, 1879.

SIR: Referring to my letter of yesterday's date relating to estimates of appropriations for the Mint service, I have the honor to submit a further increase to meet the wants of the service, as follows:

For wages of workmen at the mint at New Orleans for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, $75,000, instead of $57,000 as estimated in the last Book of Estimates.

The necessity for this appropriation is shown in the inclosed copy of a letter from the Director of the Mint of the 22d instant.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. H. G. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1879.

SIR: Referring to the letters of this office of the 19th and 29th ultimo, in regard to the appropriation needed for the efficient working of certain mints and assay offices and their supervision and general management by this bureau, I desire to call attention to the necessity of an appropriation for wages of workmen at the mint of the United States at New Orleans for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, of $75,000, instead of $57,000 as estimated for by this office.

I would state that the mint at New Orleans is now coining standard silver dollars, has a large storage capacity, and is in a locality where the demand for that coin can be readily and cheaply supplied.

The original estimate of the appropriations required for the support of that mint for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, as submitted to this office by the superintendent, estimated that the sum of $89,145.75 would be required for wages of workmen and was reduced by this office in submitting the estimates to $57,000, the same as appropriated for the current fiscal year.

The original estimate for wages of workingmen will not permit the mint to be in active operation but a part of the year, and will not be sufficient to meet the requirements of the public service.

From a personal examination into the workings and condition of the mint at New Orleans recently made by me, I am clearly of the opinion that it will be necessary to have the increased appropriation for wages of workmen asked for, in order to keep that mint fully and actively employed.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

HORATIO C. BURCHARD, Director.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is adopted.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following clause from lines 1119 to 1123, inclusive:

Territory of Dakota:

For salaries of governor, chief-justice, and three associate judges, at $2,600 each; and secretary, at $1,800, $14,800.

Mr. BECK. There is an increase of one associate judge in the Territory of Dakota over the existing appropriation because of an act approved March 3, 1879, which provided:

That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota shall consist of a chief-justice and three associate justices.

Therefore one having been added we had to make provision for his salary. That accounts for the increase.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the proviso to the clause making appropriations for the office of the Surgeon-General, in line 1298, after the word "twenty" to insert "enlisted men for service in this bureau;" so as to read:

Provided, That the Secretary of War, if the public necessity so require, may detail not exceeding twenty enlisted men for service in this bureau.

Mr. BECK. That is a mere omission of the House or the printer, one or the other, and we added those words to complete the sense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following items in the appropriations for the War Department buildings:

For eight charwomen, to be employed in the offices of the Secretary of War, in the new State, War, and Navy Department building, at $180 per annum each, $1,440.

For four watchmen, two firemen, and one laborer in the part of the Adjutant-General's Office to be located on the first and second floors of the old Navy Department building; in all, $4,980.

For contingent expenses of Adjutant-General's Office, in old Navy Department building, including fuel, light, heating apparatus, matting, cleaning, labor, and incidental items, of care of two floors of Navy Department building, to be occupied by Adjutant-General's Office, $2,000.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to call attention to the fact that from line 1373 to 1387 these are new provisions. I have the letter of the Secretary in my hand stating the reasons for them. The Department is moving into the new Department building, and the old Navy Department building has to be cared for, and it is now being applied to the use of the Adjutant-General's Office.

Mr. CONKLING. What page is that?

Mr. BECK. Line 1373 to line 1387. This increase is rendered necessary by the new buildings and by the new use that the old Navy Department building is put to. I need not read the letter, because the House considered the matter, and it is well understood.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1547, after the word "census," to insert "the total expenditure for rent not to exceed $25,000;" and in line 1548, after the word "paid," to strike out "for from" and insert "out of;" so as to make the clause read:

For rent of buildings for the use of the Pension Office and office of the United States pension agent, and for the Bureau of Education, and for the Geological Survey, $24,700. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to rent such buildings as may be necessary, from time to time, for the purpose of the census, the total expenditure for rent not to exceed $25,000, to be paid out of the amount authorized to be expended by section 20 of the act approved March 3, 1879, in reference to the Federal census.

Mr. BECK. Believing that the appropriation as it came from the House was very general in its character, we called General Walker, Superintendent of the Census, before us, and after explaining the difficulty he had about determining very definitely what rent he would have to pay he consented, and, indeed, advised, the insertion of this amendment that it should not exceed $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "General Land Office," in line 1572, to reduce the appropriation "for salary of chief clerk" from $2,250 to $2,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust that amendment will not be agreed to. The chief clerk of the General Land Office is the acting commissioner of the General Land Office during the absence of the Commissioner. For the next fiscal year this absence will undoubtedly occur for a long period of time owing to the fact that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is one of a commission to codify the laws and to make certain examinations provided for in an act passed at the last session.

It was my fortune to examine this question very carefully at the last session, and the $250 was added then to cover the extraordinary labors of the chief clerk necessary during the absence of the Commissioner. Both Houses agreed to it at the last session, and I trust the committee will allow the clause to stand as it is in the House bill. I think no harm will result from it, and I will say that I see the chief clerk of the Patent Office remains at $2,250, although there is a deputy commissioner of Patents.

Mr. BECK. I think not.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, I trust my friend from Kentucky having charge of this bill will not press this amendment. This officer has very heavy duties

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Iowa will withdraw any amendment he may have to offer until the committee get through with their amendments. We do not regard anything as concluded until the bill is through. There are several amendments of this sort that may be proposed.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not propose an amendment; I only ask the Senate in Committee of the Whole not to concur in an amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. I trust the Senator will waive the point.

Mr. BECK. The salary of the chief clerk of the General Land Office is now $2,000 for the current year, and it never was above $2,000; the chief clerk of the Commissioner of Pensions gets the same. The salary of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Statistics is $2,000. All the chief clerks in all the bureaus of the War Department are put at $2,000; in all the bureaus of the Navy Department they are $1,800; in the Land Office $2,000, Pension Office $2,000; Indian Office $2,000. In the offices of the First, Second, and Third Assistant Postmasters-General the chief clerks get $2,000 each; in the Money-Order Office the chief clerk $2,000, and so on. While there are some who are receiving larger salaries, all these gentlemen are here and many of them with special letters insisting that we shall increase their salaries up to the highest salary that anybody else gets in any other Department. The committee determined wherever the House had stricken down a salary below the appropriation for the present fiscal year, to restore it, and wherever they had increased it beyond the present fiscal year unless there was some very special reason given for it, to restore it to what it is now; and the very moment we add to the salary of the chief clerk of the Commissioner of the General Land Office we shall have to add $250 and perhaps $500 in some instances to the chief clerks in the other bureaus to which I have called attention; so that the granting of this one increase is equivalent to increasing the salaries of from fifteen to twenty-five chief clerks, perhaps more than that number, certainly that many, because the chief clerk of the Commissioner of Pensions will come with a claim just as strong; the chief clerks of the Assistant Postmasters-General are here with a recommendation of the Postmaster-General, and so of many others. We did not see where we should stop if this increase was to begin. We thought perhaps a general revision might be had hereafter; but as this bill was introduced into the House before the committee of that House was organized, and it has substantially come up to the appropriations for the current fiscal year, we concluded, wherever they varied from them, to endeavor to bring them back to that basis.

Besides, the increase of force in the General Land Office exceeds the increase in all the other Departments of the Government put together in this bill. Out of one hundred clerks increase in all the Departments in Washington, there are fifty-six in the General Land Office. We have been advised, both by letters from the Commissioner of the General Land Office and by the Book of Estimates, that they are very much behind in that office, and we have been extremely liberal to them. That, in fact, with the exception of the Patent Office, where special reasons were also given, is almost the only case where we felt that we were compelled to increase the force. I will not take time to read the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Book of Estimates, but I will say that we have granted him all that he desired, and have even allowed him—the only case in which we have done it—to use a part of the moneys appropriated now at once, because of the great wants of that office. Thus it will be seen that it was not from any desire to cut down this officer or any desire to curtail the force that this amendment was proposed, but simply to prevent the Senate and House from being required to go into a general increase of salaries at this time, for if you start this one you must encounter them all. We hope the Senate will sustain us.

Mr. WITHERS. While the Senator is up, in order to save time, I will ask if I understood him correctly that the salary now paid the chief clerk of the Pension Office, and also of the General Land Office, is $2,000?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir. The clerk of this committee has very carefully gone over the bill of last year, and has found the salaries to be: chief clerk to Commissioner of General Land-Office, $2,000; chief clerk to Commissioner of Pensions, $2,000.

Mr. WITHERS. I know the fact that this officer has been required to perform very laborious duties and has been constantly at work, and well deserves as large a salary as the chief clerk of any Department, but I was under the impression that he received now $2,250. If he receives only $2,000, of course the argument against the adoption of the amendment of the committee is weakened thereby.

Mr. BECK. That is what he receives now.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I do not urge this except on exceptional grounds. The Commissioner of Pensions has a chief clerk who receives $2,000, and in this very bill I think provision is made for a deputy commissioner of pensions, so as to relieve the chief clerk of the Commissioner of Pensions from acting as Commissioner in the absence of the Commissioner.

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, if there was a deputy commissioner of the General Land Office who could discharge the duties of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the absence of the Commissioner, it might be that the chief clerk of the General Land Office would be upon the same footing with the other chief clerks of the various bureaus; but it happens this year that the Commissioner of the General Land Office by direction of law is a member of a commission which will require most of his time probably during the next fiscal year. In his absence the law says that the chief clerk of the General Land Office shall act as commissioner; and therefore it was that the last Congress provided for an increase in his compensation; it was agreed to in both Houses; that is to say, it was agreed to by the conference committee, regarding it as an exceptional case; and the House in presenting this bill now grants the same sum, $250 additional pay.

It seems to me that this is clearly an exceptional case, and one that the committee can very fairly adopt without making it a precedent for the increase of the salaries of all the chief clerks in all the various bureaus. It is well known that the Commissioner of the General Land Office exercises very large powers and great discretion in matters relating to the public lands. He is often obliged to decide cases between private individuals involving hundreds of thousands of dollars. You ask this chief clerk to perform such duties at a salary of $2,000. I know him personally to be a very competent man for the place, and, therefore, I hope the Senator in charge of this bill will waive the amendment and allow the bill to stand as it came from the House.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to call the attention of the Senator who reported this bill to the fact that the chief clerk of the Patent Office receives $2,250.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the Senator that the chief clerk of the Patent Office has always received at least $2,250, and until within the last few years received $2,500. The principal officers in the Patent Office have been reduced very much in the last few years, and their salaries were always higher than those of clerks in other bureaus; and they have complained very much of the reduction that has been made and have been before us again to be restored to the salaries they used to receive. The Patent Office is an exceptional case.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask my honorable friend from Kentucky if this is not an exceptional case, when the chief clerk of the General Land Office is required to perform the duties of the Commissioner for $2,250, when the Commissioner himself receives a salary of $4,000? Is not that an exceptional case?

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky further to the fact that this bill allows a book-keeper—not a chief clerk, but a book-keeper—in the office of the Auditor of Railroad Accounts $2,400. I desire to call his attention further to the fact that the chief clerk in the office of the Assistant Attorney-General in the Interior Department receives under this bill $2,250; that the chief clerk in the Navy Department receives $2,500; that the chief clerk in the War Department receives $2,750, and so on. Perhaps it is not the best way to even this thing up to commence by increasing anybody's compensation. In fact I have seen a great many appropriations for salaries in this bill which I would prefer to have equalized by reducing them.

But I desire to say in addition to what the Senator from Iowa has said that this office I think is equally as important, and more so in my judgment than that of the chief clerk of any other Department of this Government; and if there be any very good reason for keeping the salaries of these other chief clerks at the rate they are now fixed by this bill there are a great many reasons for raising the salary of this officer.

As has been stated by the Senator from Iowa, the Commissioner of the General Land Office will be withdrawn from his place during the coming year for the purpose of performing other duties devolved on him by a law of the last session of Congress, and the chief clerk then becomes the Commissioner of the General Land Office ex officio and upon him devolve the very great responsibilities of that place. Whatever might be desirable as a rule—and I hope the Senator from Kentucky, when he comes to consider again the appropriation bill, will see whether some of these salaries ought not to be equalized—whatever the rule ought to be, certainly for this year the salary of the chief clerk of the General Land Office ought, for that very reason alone, to be increased. I therefore hope that the appropriation of the House bill which is stricken out by the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be allowed to stand at the original sum of $2,250.

Mr. BECK. The chief clerks of all the Departments of the Government, the Treasury, War, Navy, and Interior, receive $2,500 and some additional compensation as superintendents of the buildings as well; but the chief clerks of the bureaus, of which the General Land Office is one in the Interior Department, are put at $2,000 each. The chief clerk of the Bureau of Statistics gets $2,000; and in the several bureaus of the Navy Department the chief clerks get $1,800 each; in the Pension Office, the Land Office, the Indian Office, First, Second, and Third Assistant Postmasters-General's Office, and in the Foreign-Mail Office, and in the Money-Order Office, the chief clerks receive $2,000 each. The distinction is, that wherever a man is the chief clerk of a Department instead of a bureau, he shall receive $2,500.

The labor of sitting as Commissioner may or may not be onerous; it is certainly honorable, and I suppose most of the gentlemen would readily do it. Whether it would add to their clerical work I do not know. But we are charged with giving the Auditor of Railroad Accounts $2,400.

Mr. PLUMB. Not the Auditor, but the book-keeper of the Auditor.

Mr. BECK. This Congress passed an act approved on the 19th of June, 1878, creating that office, and it said:

> To assist the said Auditor to perform the duties of said office, the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint one book-keeper at an annual salary of $2,400.

And other offices, fixing their salaries for us, so that we could not avoid appropriating the sums fixed by law. Whether they fixed them too high or too low, the Committee on Appropriations were obliged to abide by the act of Congress passed on the 19th day of June last.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Kentucky if the appropriations named in this bill and in the appropriation bills of the last few years have been for the amounts prescribed by law for the payment of the different officers named?

Mr. BECK. None have been above the amount prescribed by law, as far as I know, and we have endeavored to cut down a good many. We have endeavored to cut down this very Auditor, in spite of the law. We have sometimes endeavored to do that so as not to give a chance to the other Departments to come and say "why put him above us." The House has taken that responsibility at times, and the Senate has agreed to it very often; but I believe there is no instance where we have exceeded the law in payments, and there is no instance in this bill, except one or two exceptional cases, where we have not endeavored to maintain at this extra session the existing salaries of the officers, and the chief clerk of the General Land Office was one that we felt compelled to ask the Senate to allow the salary to remain as it is. I have nothing to say against the merits of the man. I have explained the only reason for our action.

Mr. PLUMB. If the law controls in reference to the salary for the book-keeper of the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, why did it not also control in reference to the salary of the Auditor himself? I do not see why if they bring all the Auditors together they do not bring all the chief clerks of bureaus together either by raising or diminishing them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CARPENTER in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The question being put, it was declared that the negative appeared to prevail.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is the amendment?

Mr. BECK. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again.

The amendment was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to this amendment striking out "two hundred and fifty" after "two thousand."

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for a division.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As a division is called for, I will say a word. The Committee on Appropriations endeavored to follow out the existing law and to make no advance in salaries. As has been well said by the Senator from Kentucky, this one instance involves probably between twenty-five and thirty other chief clerks. If the Senate is prepared to go over the bill and advance the salary of that number of chief clerks, then it ought to vote to agree with the House. If it wants the salaries where they are now and where they have been, then it ought to vote "ay" with the Committee on Appropriations, so as to leave the salaries just as they stand to-day. There are, as I have observed, probably twenty-five of these chief clerks of bureaus; and one-half of that number urged the Committee on Appropriations to put up their salary. I do not know that there is a head of a Department, except the Post-Office, where a bureau chief clerk's salary is $2,000, who has asked that it be increased; but the clerks themselves have made the request and have urged it, while the heads of Departments are willing it shall remain just where it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, will the Senate agree to this amendment?

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. BECK. Let us have the yeas and nays, because this vote will be an instruction to us on a good many other items.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations of this body will make the amount conform to existing law, and as such I am inclined, unless a better reason is offered than has been, to vote for it. It is true that in passing this bill, which becomes a law, we may change the salary of an officer; but it is the most unsafe way of establishing a salary that a legislative body could by possibility adopt. If we undertake to frame bills proposing to harmonize and equalize salaries according to the labor performed, the members of the two bodies would be entirely at sea. There is less opportunity on an appropriation bill to bring together the minds of members of the two bodies on such a matter than on any other bill; and it is, I think, the most unsafe mode of amending the law that establishes salaries to do it on appropriation bills. For instance, it is said that the chief clerks of the Departments get more than those of bureaus; and that is all proper and right. But it seems that in one case the chief clerk of one of the bureaus is getting more than others; and this is a proposition to increase the salary because of an increase of labor. That is unsafe; for as soon as this advance is made, every other chief clerk will ask for the same thing, and friends of the officer, those who desire to put him on an equality with others, (and that will be the great argument,) will say "You have raised the salary of A; now raise this one, because he does as much as the other, and it is right that they should be upon an equality as to compensation." That is a strong argument, and one that Senators generally are not disposed to resist. Therefore, if we want to adjust this whole question properly and arrive at a correct result, so as to give to each officer that to which he is entitled according to the labor he performs, we had better have that question separated from the appropriation bills, and let the appropriation bill appropriate the amount required by law until that law is changed by a proper examination on the part of members of the two Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the question of agreeing to this amendment the yeas and nays are called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—31.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to move——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me? I agreed at half past one o'clock not to ask any further consideration of the bill at present, but to allow the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] to proceed with the argument he designs to submit.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would suggest to my friend from Minnesota that it would be better to get through with the business part of this bill before we commence the political discussion, and if he would postpone his remarks, which will doubtless be followed by others, it would conduce to the business of the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I am entirely willing to postpone my remarks till two o'clock if there be no objection on the part of any other Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say this: the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] has also notified me that he desires to speak to-day as soon as the Senator from Minnesota is through, and if the Senator from Minnesota is postponed until two o'clock, perhaps both cannot get through to-day, and we may lose two days instead of one. Therefore, in order to save time, both gentlemen can speak to-day if one commences now, while half an hour may make it impossible for more than one to speak to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY. They are neither of them very lengthy, and I think they can both get through to-day if we postpone the debate until two o'clock.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Texas objects very much to postponing the beginning of the debate till two o'clock, and being required to speak to-day after the Senator from Minnesota concludes——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the people of this country are deeply interested in two questions.

First. Why this extra session, and who is responsible for it?

Second. What are the purposes and objects of the party that has forced it upon the country?

Having been chairman of the committee of conference which disagreed on this bill at the last session, I have had some opportunities to learn the circumstances and conditions which brought us here, and may therefore be pardoned for attempting to answer these questions.

To the first, I reply that this session was not rendered necessary by any public emergency which could not have been easily avoided. There was nothing in the condition of the country that required it; no public interest could be subserved by it. We were at peace with all the world. Resumption had become an assured success, and under the stimulus of restored confidence business had begun to exhibit the most encouraging indications of revival; our trade, domestic and foreign, was rapidly increasing; our manufactures were showing renewed activity; our agricultural interests were becoming hopeful and confident. In short, under the wise and courageous financial policy, inaugurated and maintained by the republican party, despondency and depression were rapidly giving way to hopefulness and enterprise. Nothing seemed to be needed for a complete restoration of prosperity but exemption from political disturbance.

Nor was there any necessity for the failure of appropriations at the last session. When the final disagreeing report of the conference committee was made, it was stated that every item of appropriations had been or could readily be agreed to, and that the bill could become a law without any difficulty, but for the political legislation that had been inserted by the House. The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who was the democratic member of the conference, fully confirmed that statement, and will now confirm it. The report made to the House stated the same fact. Every Senator knows that the only points of disagreement, by reason of which the bills failed, were the political riders insisted upon by the House of Representatives. This extra session, with all its political turmoil, its sectional antagonism, its cost to the Treasury, and its still greater cost to the business interests of the country, is therefore wholly chargeable to the willful and indefensible attempt of the democratic party to secure a partisan advantage by unconstitutional and revolutionary means, namely—first, the attempt of the democratic majority of the last House of Representatives to usurp the constitutional rights and privileges of the Senate; second, the determination of the democratic party, as shown by its acts and boldly proclaimed by its leaders, to subvert the constitutional equality and independence of the executive branch of the Government.

DEMOCRATIC USURPATIONS.

The Constitution confers upon the two Houses absolute equality in all matters of legislation; and our oaths require that every measure which receives our vote shall have the approval of our judgment. No Senator or member can, without violating his oath, vote for a measure which he believes to be wrong as the means of securing another which he believes to be right.

The democratic House of Representatives of the last Congress said to the Senate, "You shall agree to measures which your judgment condemns as wrong, and hence which your oath forbids, or we will stop the machinery of Government. You shall surrender the right of Congress to protect the polls from violence at a national election, or we will disband the Army. You shall surrender the power of Congress to protect the ballot-box from fraud, and thereby renounce the right of the nation to guard from pollution the very sources of its existence, or, in the name of State rights, we will once more raise our hands against its life."

To such a demand the Senate could of course make but one reply. It declined to surrender, and the bills failed. It is urged that political legislation has frequently been inserted in appropriation bills, and by republicans themselves. Very true; but that does not touch the point at issue. Nobody disputes the right of either House to attach legislation to appropriation bills, and to ask the other House to consent to it. When both Houses agree to such legislation, and it is not attached to appropriation bills for the purpose of coercing the Executive, it may be irregular, and the practice may be vicious, but it is not coercive nor revolutionary. But when one House says to the other, "You shall agree to this measure, or the operations of Government shall stop," as was said by the last House to the Senate, it becomes in the highest degree unpatriotic and reprehensible. And when both Houses combine, as in the present Congress, to coerce the President, it becomes revolutionary, and if persisted in must be destructive to our form of government. I am confident that the annals of American legislation furnish no precedents for the democratic programme announced at the beginning of this session and thus far carried out.

It has been said that Congress attempted to coerce President Johnson by attaching political legislation to appropriation bills. I reply that the republicans then had a two-thirds majority in both Houses, and being able to constitutionally pass any bill over the President's veto, the idea of compelling him to approve a measure by withholding supplies for the Government could not have occurred to anybody. Congress was indifferent whether he signed or vetoed the bills sent to him, for in either case they would become law by the two-thirds majority required by the Constitution. Hence it was impossible that legislation should then have been attached to appropriation bills for the purpose of coercion. No, Mr. President, the persistent attempt of the last House of Representatives to override the powers and privileges of the Senate, carried out to the extreme of forcing an extra session, is wholly indefensible and deserves, as it will receive, the indignant rebuke of the American people.

ATTEMPTED COERCION OF THE EXECUTIVE.

But what of the determination to coerce the President? Is it true that the democratic party brought about this session for the purpose and with the intent to subvert the equality and independence of the Executive, and thereby to destroy the evenly balanced powers of the Government, as the fathers adjusted them by the Constitution? No proposition is susceptible of more conclusive proof. Six weeks ago nobody doubted it, and so far as I am advised no democrat denied it. The programme of coercion was proclaimed everywhere by the leaders of that party. On the floor of the Senate, in the House of Representatives, and by the entire press of the country the intention to force the repeal of obnoxious laws, by means and methods unknown to the Constitution, were boldly avowed. Since then, however, the debate has disclosed the enormity of their designs; the spring elections have indicated the rising storm of popular indignation which threatens to overwhelm them, and hence the recent attempt to create an impression that no such unconstitutional proceedings were ever contemplated.

That I may do no injustice to any one I will frankly admit that this unpatriotic, unconstitutional, and dangerous programme did not originally have the approval of the wiser and better men of the democratic party. They foresaw its probable effect upon their political future, and its injurious results to the country, and if they could, they would gladly have restrained the radical and restless elements of their organization. To their credit, be it said, that the reports of their prolonged party caucus aver that they did make the attempt, but unfortunately they were in a hopeless and helpless minority, as they always are when a party policy is to be decreed. Their wiser and more patriotic counsels, after being denounced as weak and timid were overborne by the rash and revolutionary elements which constitute an overwhelming majority of the party. It is to be regretted that when thus overruled they did not unite with us in defense of the Constitution as it is, and of the best interests of the country, instead of yielding to the clamor of their unpatriotic partisans. Had they done so, they would have saved their party from the unhappy and disagreeable position from which they are now vainly trying to extricate it. But it was decreed by the elements which rule with absolute sway the counsels of the democracy, that in the proposed assault upon the rights and privileges of the Executive there should be no stragglers from the ranks. King Caucus had issued his imperial ukase, and the entire party fell into line. If there were grumblers and croakers in the ranks, or those who questioned the expediency of the assault, the country certainly did not hear from them.

PROCLAMATION OF WAR ON THE PRESIDENT.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] one of the most intelligent, frank, and fearless of the democratic leaders, was the Senator selected to make the proclamation of war upon the Executive. With that unflinching courage which nearly always characterizes him, and that honesty and candor so impolitic and dangerous in a democratic leader, he announced the purpose and the programme of his party. After stating that at the extra session separate bills would be passed by both Houses repealing the laws which authorize the national authorities to protect the polls at national elections, and which prescribe a test oath for certain jurors, he proceeded as follows:

> When these three laws are submitted to the President for his approval, as they will be, and are approved by him, as they ought to be, the next Congress will in my opinion be ready to pass every appropriation bill just as it is now, adjourn, and go home without attempting before next December to perfect any further legislation. If, however, the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power vested in him, should see fit to veto the bills thus presented to him, which I repeat will simply be, to keep soldiers from the polls, to allow proper jurors to serve who will try cases honestly, and allow the States to control their own elections, then I have no doubt those same amendments will be again made part of the appropriation bills, and it will be for the President to determine whether he will block the wheels of Government and refuse to accept necessary appropriations rather than allow the representatives of the people to repeal odious laws which they regard as subversive of their rights and privileges. We have the undoubted right to repeal them in any form and on any bills we choose. Most of them were imposed upon the country as parts of appropriation bills. Whether that course is right or wrong, it will be adopted, and I have no doubt adhered to, no matter what happens with the appropriation bills.

Of course everybody understood this to be a declaration of the purpose of his party to "block the wheels of Government," unless the President would approve of the partisan political measures to be presented to him. It said distinctly to the Executive, "You shall agree to our political legislation, whether you like it or not, or we will disband the Army, close the Departments, and stop all the operations of Government." I am very sure that every Senator, on both sides of this Chamber, so understood it at the time. Several Senators at once took the floor and denounced it as revolutionary, but they failed to elicit from the Senator from Kentucky any qualification of the programme, or from any Senator on that side of the Chamber a repudiation of the proposed scheme of coercion.

UKASE BY THE CZAR OF THE CAUCUS.

So far from repudiating it, the honorable Senator from Ohio, the leader of the democratic party, and the Czar of the caucus, [Mr. THURMAN,] at once came to the front, and in an able speech insisted that the House of Representatives have the right to say, "as our forefathers in England had said to the Lords and to the King, We will only grant supplies on condition that grievances are redressed."

The honorable Senator evidently did not speak of the right of the House to insist upon a "redress of grievances" merely as against the Senate, for he said:

> Perhaps no greater question, in the form we are now brought to consider it, was ever considered by the American Congress in time of peace; for it involves not merely the merits or demerits of the laws which the House bill proposes to repeal, but involves the rights, the privileges, the powers, the duties of the two branches of Congress and of the President of the United States.

The coming "struggle," as he understood and expressed it, was to be between Congress and the Executive; and the question to be decided was whether the House of Representatives, having made itself the sole judge as to what constitutes a "grievance," could clutch the nation by the throat and demand "redress," as the condition of its right to live. Profoundly impressed, as he well might be, with the gravity of the issue thus foreshadowed, he proceeded:

> Mr. President, I should approach this question, if I were in the best possible condition to speak and to argue it, with very grave diffidence, and certainly with the utmost anxiety, for no one can think of it as long and as carefully as I have thought of it without seeing that we are at the beginning perhaps of a struggle that may last as long in this country as a similar struggle lasted in what we are accustomed to call the mother land. There the struggle lasted for two centuries before it was ultimately decided. It is not likely to last so long here, but it may last until every man in this Chamber is in his grave. It is the question whether or no the House of Representatives has a right to say, "We will grant supplies only upon condition that grievances are redressed."

Evidently the honorable Senator was not talking of a coming struggle between the House and the Senate, for he said it "might last two centuries," when he knew that in twelve hours the Senate would pass under control of the same party that then ruled the House. Nor could he have understood that the programme of his party contemplated those regular, orderly and peaceable methods prescribed by the Constitution for securing the repeal of an obnoxious law, because such methods could not create a prolonged contest between Congress and the Executive. He well knew that if the democratic party had merely determined to pass their bills, present them to the President for his approval or rejection, and then submit, as in duty bound, to the exercise of his constitutional power, there was nothing in the question to awaken his "anxiety" or lead to the apprehension of any serious difficulty. He knew that the Constitution so clearly prescribed the method of settling all questions between co-ordinate branches of the Government, that a protracted struggle such as he spoke of would be impossible, unless somebody proposed to inaugurate proceedings in violation of that instrument. He certainly could not doubt the constitutional right of the President to veto any bill which his conscience, or his judgment, should not approve. Pray tell me, then, from what source he expected trouble and what it was that overwhelmed him with "anxiety," and inspired that "very grave diffidence" so unusual with him?

Ah! sir, he knew the President could not approve the bills that would be sent to him, and he knew also that in the event of his failure so to do the democratic party had resolved to coerce him into submission to its decrees. He well knew the turbulent and revolutionary tendencies of his party, the reckless elements that control it, and the determination it had reached to overthrow the equality and independence of the Executive, as a means of securing its partisan ends, and hence he foresaw the struggle which filled him with "anxiety," and which he thought might "last until every man in this Chamber is in his grave."

If any man was fully advised as to the intentions, purposes, objects, and caucus decrees of his party, that man was the honorable Senator from Ohio, the Vice-President pro tempore of the Senate and chairman of the democratic caucus. His announcement of its revolutionary programme may therefore be taken as conclusive, without any further evidence.

I have quoted the Senator from Ohio, not because his declarations were stronger, or more conclusive on this point than those of his associates on that side of the Chamber, but because he is understood to be the oracle, through whom alone can be authoritatively revealed the hidden things of that secret democratic conclave, which is higher than Senates, and mightier than Congresses, which has already usurped the power of both Houses, and now seeks to subvert the Constitution itself.

OTHER EVIDENCES OF COERCION.

Other evidence on this point is abundant, if any more were needed. The very fact that partisan political legislation was inserted in the appropriation bills, under the existing circumstances, and after the threats of coercion that had been made, was of itself a menace, and was so understood by the President and by everybody else.

During the discussion of these measures in the closing hours of the last Congress I said to a leading democratic member of the House of Representatives: "I cannot understand why your House is determined to defeat these bills and force an extra session. There will be no election at which the laws you seek to repeal can apply until after the next regular session, when you will have ample opportunity to make your issue with the President. Then, why not strike out this political legislation, let the bill pass, and make your fight in December?" His reply was, in substance: "If we pass these bills the Government will be provided with money until the 30th of June, 1880, and can then manage to get along in some way without appropriations until after the elections in November; but if these bills fail, the supplies will stop on the 30th of June, 1879." The Government might possibly get along without money four months but it cannot for sixteen months.

In this frank and truthful answer will be found the cause of this extra session, and the animus and purpose of the party that forced it upon the country. They were afraid that four months' starvation of the Government would not coerce the President into submission to their designs, and therefore they determined to take it by the throat at once and demand a surrender on pain of sixteen months' starvation.

What did they care for the honor, the peace, or the business interests of the country when these stood in the way of a supposed party advantage? A partisan object was to be gained, and gain it they would at all hazards and at any cost.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he will state the name of that member of the House of Representatives?

Mr. WINDOM. I will give the Senator the name privately; I do not care to mention it here.

Mr. MORGAN. If it was a private conversation I do not inquire into it.

Mr. WINDOM. It was in a committee-room, and was not private.

Mr. MORGAN. It was either a private conversation or we are entitled to the name, I think.

Mr. WINDOM. That substantially was said by the chairman of the House committee of conference, [Mr. ATKINS,] if the Senator wants to know the name. I may not quote his exact words, but I do quote the exact substance of what he said to me on that occasion. I could not at the time understand why it was that as no election would be held until after the next session, we could not pass the bills and have this controversy at the regular session; and hence this explanation.

ASSAULT UPON THE ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. President, what are the laws which provoke such furious indignation? One of them protects the ballot-box from violence, the other guards it against fraud; one would secure a peaceful ballot, the other would keep it pure. Why is it, then, that you have massed all your forces against these defenses of a free and honest ballot? Why this frantic assault upon the election laws? Is there no other "grievance" to be redressed, no other mischief to be undone? After twenty years of republican rule, can you find nothing to do on your accession to power but tear down the safeguards erected against fraud and violence at the polls? You have told the people how their industries are languishing for want of your care; how they are oppressed by wicked tariffs, by vicious financial legislation, by republican extravagance and corruption, by burdensome and unjust taxation, by grasping monopolies, and by a thousand other things which you promised should be cured as soon as you came into power in Congress. You have been in session six weeks, with power to do as you please in both Houses. Why is it that you have wholly forgotten the distress of the people, which once so moved your gushing sympathies? Why is it that now you do not so much as touch their burdens with one of your little fingers? You have made the most desperate efforts to banish peace and purity from the polls, but you have done and said absolutely nothing about taxation, tariffs, finances, or monopolies. You have even forgotten the stale charge of republican extravagance, and have made no effort to curtail expenditures, nor to reduce taxation. No one on either side, except the honorable Senator from Illinois—the independent party—has uttered one word in behalf of our depressed industries; and even he has failed to make a single practical suggestion on that subject. Your war upon the Executive is not to wrest from that department some concession for the relief of a suffering people, but to compel him to join your raid against peace and purity at the polls. You have done nothing, and you propose nothing, in behalf of commerce, agriculture, manufactures, or any of the great industrial interests of the country, which you have said were languishing for your tender care. You act, and talk, as if the beginning and the end of your mission, is to tear down and destroy forever the only national defenses of the ballot-box.

Occasionally we hear from your camp the clamor of a greenbacker, like the voice of one crying in the wilderness, imploring you to redeem your pledges to aid him in defeating resumption, but his appeals are lost in the din of your assault upon the election laws. Why is all this? Who has asked the repeal of those laws? Surely not the men who want an honest ballot, a fair count, and a true return, for the existing laws promote all these. No petitioner has asked such repeal. No congressional, State, or national convention has demanded it. And yet you ignore all the great issues on which you were elected, and propose to revolutionize the Government itself, in order to compass this one supreme object of your desires.

An anxious and indignant people may well ask, as they are now asking, What does all this mean? What is the underlying purpose that inspires and directs this movement? I will answer these questions as briefly as possible, and in as plain language as I can command.

THE NEW REBELLION AGAINST NATIONALITY.

That purpose was, and is, to denationalize this Nation, to convert it into a mere confederacy of States, and under the new name of "Home Rule," to crown the old secession doctrine of "State sovereignty" with supreme power over the destinies of the Republic. In other words, it is an attempt to do by legislation, what four years of bloody rebellion failed to do by the sword, namely: to destroy our nationality. Or, to state it still more concisely, it is an effort to recover the "lost cause."

I do not forget the fact, that to the vicious elements which infest our great cities at the North, which make up the bands of ruffians who terrorize the South, and which dominate the political counsels of the democratic party, the "right" of free mobs, and free frauds at the polls, is as dear as is the principle of State sovereignty to the better portions of that organization.

This raid upon the election laws is, therefore, peculiarly adapted to command the sympathy and support of the entire party. It commends itself to the State-rights element, because it stabs the national authority at its most vital point. It inspires the zeal of its ignorant and vicious elements, because it promises to remove all the barriers against fraud and violence at the polls. The purpose of the movement, therefore, is twofold: first, the assertion of "State rights," in the baldest and most dangerous form; and, second, the overthrow of all the defenses to a free and honest ballot.

The hope of advantage to the party, by uncovering the ballot-box to ruffianism and dishonesty, doubtless has some influence; but beyond all this, underlying, inspiring, and directing the assault upon the election laws, was and is the one absorbing, controlling, inflexible purpose to destroy the nationality of this Republic, and to substitute, in its stead, the fatal heresy of State supremacy and national dependence, which so recently ripened into secession, rebellion, and blood.

Around this one central, supreme purpose, as about the principal figure in a painting, are grouped as mere instrumentalities, subordinate means to a great end, all the leading measures of the democratic party. However that organization may disagree about "hard money" or "soft money," "high tariff" or "low tariff," "subsidy" or "anti-subsidy," on this one vital point they never differ. Upon all other questions the democratic church tolerates the widest latitude of opinion. The incendiary communist and the aristocratic conservative, the wildest inflationist and the very prince of bloated bondholders, all find a home in her ample folds; but on this essential tenet of party faith, he "who doubts is damned." North and South, East and West, in peace and in war, in victory and in defeat, the faithful democratic believer worships at the shrine of "State sovereignty." Facts and arguments are powerless to convince him of his error. Treason and rebellion against his country have failed to shake his adhesion to this supreme article of his creed. The only exception he ever tolerates is when the National Government "enters a State," as he calls it, with an appropriation, but without the old flag.

STEPS TAKEN FOR ITS ACCOMPLISHMENT.

Keeping in mind this central and ever dominant purpose, let us glance at some of the steps taken for its accomplishment. As "all roads lead toward Rome," so it will be seen that all the lines of democratic policy converge toward this one object.

This hasty review will not permit me to go back to the ante bellum times, when the National Government was regarded by the democracy as a sort of bloodhound, to be securely kenneled within the District of Columbia, or chained in forts and arsenals, but on no account to be permitted to "enter a sovereign State," unless turned loose to hunt down some fugitive from slavery. Nor can I dwell upon the four years of war when, as everybody knows, the democratic party at the South, with the full sympathy, if not the approval and co-operation, of a large portion of that party at the North, fought in vain to overthrow nationality, and to establish upon its ruins the sovereign and supreme right of any State to dissolve the Union at its own will and pleasure. I might draw many valuable lessons from this painful period of our history, but a reference to it is so distasteful to our political opponents, and withal so shocking to their nerves, that from my tenderness of heart I will refrain, at least for the present.

If there is one thing which more than another will freeze the blood of northern democrats, and make it is the ghost of those ghastly years, when the fatal heresy of "State rights" produced its natural and inevitable results. They call that period the "dead past," possibly because of the harvest of death then garnered by their policy. They are anxious to forget that part of their own record, and still more anxious that other people should forget it. No wonder. Had we such a record we would pray for forgetfulness also.

Each particular hair to stand on end,

DEMOCRACY DURING RECONSTRUCTION.

Passing from the bloody efforts of the democracy to assert State supremacy by rebellion, I come next to the period of reconstruction. When the war closed, it was believed, that if anything had been settled, it was our right to be a nation, and if anything had perished forever in the fiery blasts of civil strife, it was the pernicious doctrine of State supremacy and national impotency. It was the latter theory of government for which the rebellion was inaugurated and maintained. In its defeat it was called the "lost cause;" but I assert, without fear of contradiction, that from the surrender at Appomattox until this hour, no leading southern democrat has ceased to expect the substantial recovery of that "cause," and no prominent northern democrat has failed to exert his influence for its accomplishment.

Time will allow only a few representative illustrations from the uniform testimony of their acts and speeches on this point during that period.

When the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery was pending in the House of Representatives in 1864, and before the close of the war, the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] then a member of the House, sprang to the rescue and, throwing the shield of State rights over that accursed institution, defied the power of the nation to touch it.

But—

Said he—

neither three-fourths of the States, nor all the States save one, can abolish slavery in that dissenting State, because it lies within the domain reserved to each State for itself and upon it the other States cannot enter.

Whether the honorable Senator still believes that slavery could not be abolished without the consent of the States interested, and therefore has not been abolished at all, I do not know; but it is certain that he struck the key-note of democratic faith on that subject. For several years the issue between the two parties was on that very point. It continued to be the issue, until the verdict of the people compelled our opponents to acquiesce in their constitutionality, reserving the right, however, to construe them as they pleased.

The next step was to deny the constitutionality of the reconstruction acts which were passed in conformity with the amendments. These, too, were declared to be void, because a usurpation of "State rights." The democratic national convention of 1868 declared:

We regard the reconstruction acts (so called) of Congress as usurpations, and unconstitutional and void.

These words were inserted in the platform by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON,] who in a subsequent speech was reported to have said:

That was my plank in the platform. I wanted nothing else, for when the great democratic party had pledged themselves to that, when they had declared that these acts were unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void, I was willing to wait in patience until that party would be triumphant and apply the remedy in their own good time.

The meaning of these words which committed the party to all the gentleman wanted, and the "remedy" for which he waited, had been indicated by himself, a month or two before the convention, when at an alumni supper he is reported to have given the following toast:

Our fallen heroes: I do not believe they have fallen in vain. The cause for which Jackson and Stuart fell cannot be in vain, but in some form will yet triumph. I propose the "lost cause" for which our heroes fell.

When the gentleman declared that "the great democratic party had pledged themselves" so fully to his policy that he "wanted nothing else," he evidently meant that they had pledged themselves to the restoration of the "cause for which Jackson and Stuart fell." and the triumph, for which he waited, was the triumph of "State rights." He did not misconstrue the purpose of his party. It stands pledged to-day to the same thing, and this struggle is an effort to redeem its pledge.

Another mode of asserting the doctrine of State rights, very popular for several years with the democracy, was well expressed in a speech which the newspapers, a few years ago, credited to the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] who so vigorously asserted his "State-rights" Unionism day before yesterday. I regret the Senator from Georgia is not in his seat, because he gave us such a vivid view of his Unionism during the war, even his prayerful Unionism when a member of the confederate congress, that I should like to know whether the speech credited to him at that time is true or not. It was published in the papers at the time, and I have not any doubt of its truth. I say I have no doubt of its truth; I mean I took it as an ordinary newspaper report of a speech, and it is so like the honorable Senator, so full of eloquence, that it bears the marks of its paternity. His fiery eloquence was reported as follows:

When liberty shall return, when the law shall be again respected and good men shall be again our rulers, we must gather all the journals and constitutions and enactments of every character of the conventions and assemblies thus forced upon us by force and fraud and usurpation, and, catching a fire from heaven, burn them up forever! And right here, my countrymen, I want you to understand that I am a candidate but for one office on earth. [Several voices—"name it and you shall have it."] When the glorious day shall come, and the free women and the free men and the proud youth of Georgia shall gather together to fire the miserable, hideous record of infamy, let the office be mine to kindle the flames!

Mr. President, this may be termed the incendiary method of asserting State rights. It was akin to that proposed by the democratic candidate for Vice-President, (F. P. Blair,) who in 1868 declared:

There is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President-elect to declare these acts—null and void, compel the Army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to reorganize their own governments and elect Senators and Representatives.

The reconstruction acts—

The party made this revolutionary policy its own within a few days after its utterance by nominating and voting for its author to fill the second place in the Government. But none of these methods proved successful. The constitutional theories of the Senator from Ohio, the party platform of 1868 drawn by a mourner for the "lost cause," the incendiary policy of the Senator from Georgia, and the revolutionary programme of Frank P. Blair, all had their day of ascendency in the democratic party, but were all in their turn rebuked and crushed out by the people.

HOW THE "LOST CAUSE" WAS TO BE RECOVERED, WITH NEW SECURITIES.

It was reserved for the ex-vice-president of the confederacy, in a speech before the Georgia Legislature, February 22, 1866, to announce the successful programme for the recovery of "all that had been lost in the civil war, with new securities." He said:

We are not without an encouraging example on this line in the history of the mother country. * * * The truest friends of liberty in England once, in 1642 abandoned the forums of reason and appealed, as we did, to the sword as the surest means, in their judgment, of advancing their cause. * * * But the end was the reduction of the people of England to a worse state of oppression than they had been in for centuries. They retraced their steps. * * * The *House of Commons and the House of Lords were henceforth the theaters of their operations. * * * The result was that in less than thirty years all their ancient rights and privileges which had been lost in the civil wars, with new securities, were re-established.*

* * * * * * * *

May we not indulge hope, even in the alternative before us now, from this great example of restoration, if we but do as the friends of liberty there did.

The triumph of Statehood and the humiliation of Nationality were to be decided by a transfer of the "theater of operations" from the bloody fields of treason and rebellion to the House of Representatives and the Senate. But how this was to be accomplished was a troublesome question. The friends of nationality and of the constitutional rights and privileges of the States were in a majority, and so long as their will could find expression at the polls the national defenses would be complete and impregnable. They would defend by their ballots what they had won by their bullets. Something must be done to prevent this expression at the polls. Congress must be captured at all hazards, and to this end the South must be terrorized and the North must be cheated.

The new movement for a change of the "theater of operations" took the name of "Home Rule," the old name, "State rights," having become so blood-stained and crime-blackened as to be no longer available. Under that banner was begun, and ever since has been maintained, a system of cruelty, fraud, terrorism, violence, and murder, without a parallel in any civilized nation on the face of the earth. Its object and purpose were to prevent the expression of republican sentiments at the South, and to render an honest election impossible at the North. The crimes of this movement are not sectional. They lie at the door of the democratic party. Southern democrats inaugurated intimidation and violence as a means of carrying elections and of solidifying the South, but their northern allies have always been prompt to encourage, excuse, and profit by these methods. On the other hand, northern democrats are entitled to the distinction of having inaugurated free frauds at the polls on a grander scale than, prior to 1868, had been dreamed of by their southern friends.

SUCCESS OF THE PROGRAMME.

Thus far the policy suggested by Mr. STEPHENS has certainly been a success. Free speech has been suppressed. Republican majorities have been silenced throughout the South. The ballot no longer expresses the freeman's will, but the will of the "rifle club," the "white-liner," and the "kuklux." The results seem to have been all that could have been desired, and more than could have been expected, by the ex-vice-president of the Confederacy. Already the "theater of operations" has been transferred to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States! Already the burdens and the degradations of slavery have been re-established, but without the responsibilities which that system imposed! Already the enfranchisement of the negro has been perverted into an increased power to his oppressor, while the lash and the auction-block have been exchanged for the rifle and the gallows! Already colored citizens are flying from the terrors of democracy, as bondmen once fled from the miseries of slavery! Already the men who fought to destroy the nation, in order that they might establish upon its ruins the doctrines of State rights and secession, control both Houses of Congress, and the entire democratic party, under the banner of "Home Rule," is once more assaulting in solid column the last defenses of nationality, the ballot-box!

Unable to restrain its impetuosity within constitutional bounds, the democratic majority has already forced upon the country this extra session, for the avowed purpose of coercing the Executive into the approval of measures, designed to paralyze the right arm of the nation and render it powerless to defend its own existence. Have not the "ancient rights and privileges" which were "lost by civil war" been already "re-established with new securities?" If not, pray what more do you want? Speak freely, for the democratic party, like King Herod, is so pleased with your dance of death that it stands ready to swear:

Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom.

The "new securities" now demanded are, that Congress shall renounce all right to exercise the powers granted by the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, namely, to "regulate" the "times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives," &c.; that the National Government shall surrender its constitutional right and powers to protect its own citizens at its own elections, and by such surrender proclaim its absolute dependence upon the will of the States—its sovereign masters—for the right to exist.

It is to accomplish this that you have said to the President, "Surrender to our demands or the Government shall starve." For this we are in extra session. For this you invoke sectionalism and party strife. For this you ignore all the great material interest you have promised to promote. Never, since you sought to destroy by fire and sword, have you so boldly proclaimed your purpose to subvert the nationality of this Republic, as you do by the issue thus tendered.

THE ISSUE ACCEPTED.

In the name of the American people, we accept that issue and welcome the contest. They believe that the great lesson taught by the rebellion was, that ours is a nation, existing not at the mercy of corporations known as sovereign States, but by the imperial will and pleasure of the sovereign people of the United States, who ordained and established its Constitution. They have not so soon forgotten that lesson. The Constitution which they revere, and will maintain and defend, gives to the United States the same right to defend itself at the ballot-box, as on the battle-field. They know that the doctrine of secession itself was not more fatal to nationality than is your doctrine, that Congress cannot and shall not, under any circumstances, provide for the defense of a free and a pure ballot; for they know that a government which is impotent to protect its own purity is powerless to protect its own life. In their righteous indignation, they will grind to powder the party that seeks to break down those defenses in order that it may pollute the sources of political power. Consider a little more specifically the recent proofs of this purpose.

DON'T LIKE THE ARMY.

No sooner was that party installed in the other House than it declared war upon the Army of the United States. Its very uniform was an emblem of national power and authority which was intolerably offensive to the votaries of State rights. It had also once made itself extremely inconvenient, not to say disagreeable, to the ruling element of that majority, and hence it must be crippled and weakened, or else be reorganized in the interest and under the control of those whom it had so grievously offended. In pursuance of this purpose, the democratic House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress demanded as a condition of appropriations to support the Army, such reductions and restrictions as would have practically destroyed its efficiency and rendered it powerless even to protect the exposed frontier. Failing in that demand by reason of the opposition of the Senate, they adjourned without making any provisions for its support, though they knew an Indian war was then in existence and that general Indian hostilities were threatened and anticipated.

The Forty-fifth Congress renewed the assault, but in a somewhat different form. It sought, the first, to render the Army powerless to protect any citizen, under any circumstances, except those which were wholly impracticable. The posse comitatus clause was the result of that effort, under which, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] has shown, if Indians come into any of the border States, such as Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, Oregon, or California, to rob, steal, and murder, the Army dare not aid the civil authorities to resist and punish them. When urged to do so by a number of citizens of Nebraska, General Sherman replied:

I recognize the great importance of protecting and encouraging the growing and most valuable cattle interest in Nebraska; but, with the most profound respect for yourself and for Congress, do not see how soldiers can do impossibilities with both hands and feet tied. Should Indians or white desperadoes come into Nebraska from the Indian country north, you make it a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment for two years if the soldiers help your sheriff. Now our officers do not usually have $10,000 handy about them, nor do I feel disposed to advise them to spend a couple of years in your penitentiary by trying to help your sheriff to arrest and punish these horse and cattle thieves.

ASSAULT UPON A PEACEFUL BALLOT.

At the last session, grown more bold by the near approach of power in the Senate, the House of Representatives openly declared the purpose of the party to subordinate the Nation to the State, and to reduce the former to the condition of absolute dependence upon the latter; to banish every vestige of national authority from national elections, and destroy every congressional barrier which had been erected to protect the peace and the purity of the ballot. The majority in the present Congress has thus far faithfully adhered to that purpose. For proof of this let me briefly review your action on the Army bill and on the one now pending.

In searching the Revised Statutes for some assertion of hated nationality, or some obnoxious safeguard for a free and peaceful ballot, the democratic eye fell upon section 5528, which seemed to embrace both of these intolerable characteristics; a section which was passed by a republican Congress, but voted for by the democrats in both Houses and approved by Abraham Lincoln; a provision not enlarging the uses of the Army, but limiting and restricting such uses as had been authorized under the statute signed by George Washington. Let me read it:

Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years.

"To keep the peace at the polls!" What a crime! And yet no punishment provided. Why, sir, this clause might authorize the nation, in some hour of extreme necessity, to defend its own life at the ballot-box! It might be used to prevent the repeater from voting as early and as often as he pleases, or even to wrest from the ruffian his most cherished prerogative of employing the persuasive influence of slung-shot, bludgeon, or shot-gun upon his political opponents! A provision so obnoxious to the State-rights democracy, so menacing to the cherished privilege of free mobs at elections, and so fraught with danger to the success of the party, could not be tolerated for a moment. True, it had been on the statute-book for fourteen years, and nobody could name an instance in which it had been used to interfere with the rights of any voter, or in which the Army had been near the polls since the close of the war, yet in its presence the democracy, North and South, grew livid with rage. It must be repealed at once, and at any cost. It could not even wait the regular session, nor the orderly and lawful methods of repeal prescribed by the Constitution. Rather than risk a peril so great, the country must endure an extra session, the constitutional powers of the Executive must be overthrown, the Constitution itself must be defied, revolution must be inaugurated, the Army must be disbanded and the frontier exposed to the merciless savage! Any cost must be incurred, any peril must be braved, rather than endure an hour longer this menace to democracy, which glared from the pages of the statutes, through the terrible words "to keep the peace at the polls!"

If these words could be stricken from the section it would become a crime punishable by $5,000 fine and "five years' imprisonment at hard labor" for any person in the service of the United States (whether civil, military, or naval) to employ armed force (whether soldiers or citizens) to restrain or repress an armed mob at an election. The gravamen of this new "crime" you propose to create is twofold: first, being "in the service of the United States," and, second, "keeping the peace at the polls."

NOT FEAR OF SOLDIERS BUT HATRED OF NATIONALITY.

The speeches of gentlemen on the other side were mainly directed to the dangers of military interference, but knowing that resistance to "free mobs," by the civil authorities of the United States, was equally distasteful, and that the Army was thrust into the foreground because it was supposed a popular prejudice could thereby be aroused, I moved to strike from the penal section the word "civil," so as to exclude civil officers and citizens from the extreme penalties imposed for the "crime" of resisting ruffianism and violence at elections. This was defeated by the unanimous vote of the democratic majority, thus demonstating the fact that, after all, it was not because they wished to exclude soldiers from the polls, but because they were determined to banish the national authority in whatever form it might present itself.

A CRIME TO KEEP THE PEACE, BUT NOT TO BREAK IT.

By a unanimous party vote against the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] you declared that your purpose in creating this new and hitherto unheard of "crime," was not to punish armed men for coming to the polls, but only to punish them for coming there "to keep the peace" and to aid in securing an honest ballot. That amendment reads as follows:

At the end of section 6 to add the following words: "And any military, naval, or civil officer, or any other person, who shall, except for the purposes herein named, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction, be punished with a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court."

Thinking that you might have voted down this proposition, because you believed the presence of persons at the polls, "armed with deadly weapons," does not of itself constitute a crime, provided always, that they do not come with the wicked and felonious intent to "keep the peace," and desiring that your action should not be misunderstood, I offered the following amendment, to be added at the end of section 6:

And any person who shall, with intent to hinder, obstruct, or prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where an election for Representatives in Congress is being held, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or with imprisonment not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

By this amendment a case was presented which could not be misunderstood or explained away. It plainly proposed that persons who, "armed with deadly weapons," shall come to the polls for the avowed purpose, and with the intent to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage, shall be punished by the same pains and penalties, which you had provided for armed citizens, who shall come there for the purpose and with intent to keep the peace. You said this should not be done. It was intended by this amendment to prevent the ruffians and cutthroats of New York, Cincinnati, and other great cities, and the rifle clubs, kuklux, and red shirts of the South from taking possession of the polls, and by terrorism and murder excluding peaceable citizens therefrom. To my utter amazement, your unanimous vote rejecting that amendment declared "they shall not be hindered in their work of intimidation and violence by any act of ours. The penalties of our laws shall be aimed at the men who 'keep the peace,' not at those who break it. In our criminal code it shall be a felony to protect the ballot-box, but not to desecrate it by violence and blood."

I will do the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] whom I do not now see in his seat, the justice to say that he seemed to appreciate the record he was about to make, and that he put his own vote and, so far as he could, the vote of his party, upon the broad and statesman-like ground, that the amendment was offered by a republican, and therefore could not be supported, however meritorious it might be. That was probably the first time such a reason was ever urged in the Senate of the United States, as it is doubtless the first time in the history of this or any other parliamentary government, that an army bill appropriating $25,000,000 was passed by the committee, and the Senate, without amendment and in pursuance of a decree from an irresponsible party conclave, that no amendment should be permitted. I venture no unkind criticism upon the caucus committee, under whose direction this thing seems to have been done. A half century ago the poet said:

> There must be government in all society.
> Bees have their queen, and stag herds have their leader;
> Rome had her consuls, Athens had her archons,
> And we, sir, have our managing committee.

Having done what it could to tear down and destroy all the defenses which have been erected to secure a free and peaceful ballot, the "managing committee" continued its search through the Revised Statutes, for any remaining assertions of national power, or legislative protection for a pure ballot and an honest count.

ATTACK UPON THE DEFENSES OF A PURE BALLOT.

The indignation and alarm produced by the discovery of section 5528, to which I have just referred, was greatly intensified by the threatening details of section 2011 and the several succeeding sections of the act providing for the protection of the elective franchise. These sections have been so often quoted in this debate that everybody is familiar with their provisions. They merely authorize the United States courts, upon the application of citizens, to appoint, in cities or towns having upward of twenty thousand inhabitants, "two citizens, residents of the city or town, or of the election district or polling precinct, in the county or parish, who shall be of different political parties, who shall be able to read and write the English language, and who shall be known and designated as supervisors of election." These non-partisan supervisors have power to scrutinize the register, to challenge votes, and require evidence of legality, to be present during the election, to supervise the counting of votes, and to see that the election is fairly and honestly conducted and the returns truly made. The act also empowers the United States marshal and his deputies to—

Keep the peace and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, * * * and to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein. And when any arrest is made under the provisions of this title the person so arrested shall forthwith be brought before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States, for examination of the offenses alleged against him. * * * But no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or any of them, or of the supervisors of elections or either of them.

There are other details, all designed and intended to protect the honest citizen in an honest vote, but I believe this brief abstract embraces the most offensive features of the act sought to be repealed by the pending bill. It was for the purpose of compelling the Senate to repeal these provisions that the last House of Representatives refused to make appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial service of the Government. And it is to coerce the President into an approval of such repeal that we are now in extra session. Rather than permit the civil officers and the courts of the United States to aid in securing an honest registration, a fair election, and a true return, the decree has gone forth that the entire machinery of Government shall be stopped.

True, there are no terrible soldiers lurking in these sections to shock the nerves of our friends, but there is the same intolerable and hateful assertion of nationality through the civil authorities. True there is not a very adequate provision for resisting armed ruffianism and preserving the peace, but there is the not less offensive menace to the ballot-box stuffer, the repeater, and the tissue-ballot manipulator. This is no more to be tolerated than is the peril to American liberty by the presence of one-fourteenth part of a soldier among a thousand people. To tell the plain truth, in plain Anglo-Saxon, it is a well-known fact that without these faithful adjuncts to democracy, in the cities of New York and Cincinnati, that party cannot hope to carry the States of Ohio and New York, and without those States there will be no possibility of grasping executive power.

Right here will be found the grand secret of this entire assault upon the election laws. It is far more important, from the partisan stand-point, to uncover the ballot-box in the great cities of the North than to exclude soldiers from the polls at the South. In fact, the South cares nothing for the repeal of these laws, except in the recognition of State rights and the surrender of nationality, which such an act implies. That is, however, the most cherished object of her desires. She has a way of her own to carry elections. Having the liberty to vote as often as they please themselves, and to shoot down those who may differ from them, the democracy of the South find but little difficulty in solidifying that section. And yet they are not happy, because a solid South will avail nothing unless a portion of the North can be captured. That will be impossible, so long as these laws stand in the way, grimly guarding the purity of the ballot.

DEMOCRATIC EULOGY UPON THE ELECTION-LAWS.

Mr. President, to show you the beneficent effect of these laws, and also what was thought of them, before the caucus decree went forth to clear away all obstacles to party success in 1880, I will read an extract from a report made to the House of Representatives by a democratic committee composed of Hon. S. S. Cox, chairman, Hon. A. V. Rice, and Hon. A. M. Waddell. That committee was appointed for the express purpose of investigating the operation of these laws in the city of New York, and elsewhere, at the presidential election of 1876. Speaking of the election in New York, they say:

Whatever may be said about the United States law as to elections or their supervision by United States authority; whatever may be said as to the right of a State to regulate in all ways such elections, this must be said, that the administration of the law by Commissioners Davenport—

He is the horrible ogre that we have heard so much about—

*Muirhead, and Allen, the United States functionaries, and their subordinates, was eminently just and wise and conducive to a fair public expression in a presidential year of unusual excitement and great temptation. * * * It was intended to provide not only against fraudulent votes, but that no person really entitled to a vote should be refused. The political organizations concurred with Mr. Davenport in this arrangement. It proved a decided success*, and the result was, what all who have any knowledge of this New York election have concurred in confirming, that there was comparatively no fraud, and the attempts made to repress it were welcomed by both parties and carried out in good faith.

* * * * * * *

A PATTERN FOR IMITATION.

The committee would commend to other portions of the country and to other cities this remarkable system, developed through the agency of both local and Federal authorities acting in harmony for an honest purpose. In no portion of the world, and in no era of time, where there has been an expression of the popular will through the forms of law, has there ever been a more complete and thorough illustration of republican institutions.

That is what the democratic committee thought of it two years ago. They proceed:

Whatever may have been the previous habit or conduct of elections in those cities, or howsoever they may conduct themselves in the future, this election of 1876 will stand as a monument of what good faith, honest endeavor, legal forms, and just authority may do for the protection of the electoral franchise.

From the moment the supervisors are appointed, from the moment that the lists are purged, from the moment that the applications are examined, to the very last return of the popular expression, this election shows the calm mastery of prudence.

A CURIOUS COINCIDENCE.

This report was made only two years ago, and yet, strange to say, the raid upon this "remarkable system," which had worked such a wonderful transformation in New York, began in the House of Representatives about the same time. Can it be that this assault upon that "system" found its inspiration in that report? Is it possible that the fiery indignation, exhibited against those laws, was kindled by the revelation that they had been the means of rendering an election moderately honest, in a city which only a short time before had cast 60,000 fraudulent democratic votes? Was the report of the honest results achieved, by that system, a shrewd device on the part of the democratic committee, designed to array the party against it? I cannot answer these questions, but the coincidence is certainly remarkable. The political philosopher who may desire to trace the relation between cause and effect, in this coincidence, will be aided by the following brief extract from said report:

The committee beg to state, with some degree of pride, and to repel all statements to the contrary, that the first report only showed four thousand cases of attempts at fraudulent registration during the first two days of the registration, and some seven or eight thousand in all.

"Only some seven or eight thousand attempts at fraudulent registration." Seven or eight thousand democrats deprived of the ancient privilege of casting a fraudulent vote! What a profligate waste of strength! What a field of usefulness closed! What possibilities of party success thrown away! Of the sixty thousand heroes who, in 1872, braved the terrors of the penitentiary to cast a fraudulent democratic vote, this peeled and scattered remnant of "only seven or eight thousand" survived in 1876! Persecuted, hounded, and panic-stricken, by the usurpations of these hired minions of a government, which thus ignores and tramples upon the sacred and inalienable right of free frauds at the polls, those poor fellows have no longer the courage to even make the "attempt at fraudulent registration!"

SYMPATHY FOR THE PERSECUTED.

Contemplating their sorrow and degradation, and painting in the vivid coloring of his own inimitable imagination the usurpations which have humbled and broken their proud spirits, the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] gave vent to the gushing emotions of his party in this strain of fervid eloquence:

What a spectacle is here presented!

* * * * * * *

Have the people consented to such an unspeakable degradation as this? Have they in fact become slaves in spirit, and willing to receive the yoke of their overseers? Sir, I do not believe it.

* * * * * * *

Here at last we behold the citadel of free government stormed and taken. The enemy is placed by these provisions inside of that sacred bulwark of freedom for whose erection and defense the best blood of the world has streamed in torrents on the battle-field and under the dripping ax of the executioner.

* * * * * * *

I call upon my countrymen to awaken, for the hour of mortal peril to their institutions is here. What has happened in New York has happened elsewhere, and may happen everywhere. Shall the laws which make such scenes possible remain in force?

I can assure the honorable Senator that his countrymen are wide awake, and that they most fully appreciate this "mortal peril to their institutions." They have firmly resolved that "what has happened in New York" shall "happen everywhere," until scoundrelism shall be banished from the polls and an honest ballot shall express the will of an honest people throughout the length and breadth of this land.

A BILL TO PROHIBIT KEEPING THE PEACE AT THE POLLS.

Failing in the first effort to compel the President to surrender the right and power of the nation to defend itself at the polls, the assault has been renewed in another form. The Army appropriation bill has been laid aside to await his action on the political bill recently sent to him, which by a freak of imagination you have entitled "A bill to prevent military interference at elections." I have seen a statement that when it was first proposed in the caucus it was truthfully entitled "A bill to prohibit keeping the peace at the polls."

It might have been very properly entitled "A bill to surrender the national right of self-protection and to compel the President to violate his oath of office." He has sworn that he "will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States." The Constitution says "he shall take care that the laws are faithfully executed." That bill says it shall be unlawful to execute the laws by the only force at his command, "at any place where a general or special election is being held in a State."

Therefore, on one day of the year, and that the most important of all, so far as the safety of the Republic is concerned, the Executive shall surrender his constitutional powers and violate his oath of office, and the nation shall be absolutely dependent upon the States for the right to live. On that day, when the Government goes to the people for the renewal of its powers, it shall be impotent to maintain the peace or the purity of the ballot. A local sentiment hostile to the Union, or a spirit of mob violence irrepressible by any other means, may deny to the citizen the free expression of his will; but you have decreed that the Government shall be powerless to defend itself, until lawless violence has had its day of riot and blood.

Since this Congress convened, we have had many bold declarations of the purpose to establish State supremacy and national subordination, but never until now has it been asserted as the creed of a great party, that on election day the powers of the nation shall be absolutely suspended, and that trailing its flag in the dust, it shall humbly sue a sovereign State for the right to be. The spirit of secession could ask no more. Indeed, it never asked so much. It demanded "to be let alone" while the State should retire from the Union. This new rebellion against nationality demands that the Republic shall have the right to be, only by the gracious will and pleasure of its sovereign master, the State.

THE INSTRUMENT OF REBELLION DEAD, BUT THE GUILTY CAUSE STILL LIVES.

The honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] in his speech last Saturday, confirms all I have said as to the similarity between the issue of to-day and that of 1861. He said:

It is true that the war was the result of a collision of ideas and interests between the extreme nationalists and the extreme federalists. They brought about the war; but the slavery question entering it sectionalized it, and therefore the North became consolidated on one side, and the South, or a portion of the States of the South, consolidated on the other. After the war arose the Union became involved, and therefore it is that those who fought on the side of the Federal Government fought for the Union and are entitled to all the benefits that result from that relation, and no man will always give them to them more cheerfully than myself. The war being the result of this collision of extremes, the consolidationists, the centralizationists, the monarchists, (for that is what they mean,) had the advantage in that they had possession of the Union, possession of its power, possession of its Army, and possession of its Navy—an advantage which they acquired by secession folly. The collision coming on in this form, secession was crushed out in the conflict, utterly crushed out. I want the country to understand that.

By the term "federalists" he of course means the State-rights democracy, and by "nationalists" the republican party. These two "ideas and interests," he says, "brought on the war."

What next? "The slavery question entering into it sectionalized it." Then what? "After the war arose the Union became involved." Yes, slightly, I should say!

Now, what is the exact case as he states it? State rights and nationality were the causes of the war, and the real antagonists; slavery was a mere incident. Secession was the instrument employed by "State rights" in the contest. What was the result of the war? "Secession was crushed out, utterly crushed out." He is particularly anxious for the "country to understand that." But what has become of "State rights," the guilty principal that employed this "secession folly," as he calls it? He evidently does not think that was "crushed out;" for, when speaking of the reconstruction measures, he said:

And after that you left us, and left us as you thought bound with your cords and whips. It was then that the Samson, State sovereignty, stretched himself and burst them all.

He does not even admit that "slavery" was crushed out, though I presume he would be glad to have the country "understand that" also.

After all, then, the war only destroyed the incident (slavery) and the instrument, (secession,) but the guilty cause of all our woes, the Samson of "State rights," still lives in all his vigor and is ready to employ any other incidents or instruments that may happen to answer his purpose in the next conflict with nationality.

I thank the Senator for his frank statement, and beg to assure him that the country will understand this assault upon nationality, by undermining and destroying the freedom and purity of the ballot, quite as well as they did when "secession folly" was the instrument to accomplish the same end by bayonets and bullets.

SECESSION TO AVOID WAR AND ACCOMMODATE NORTHERN CONSCIENCE.

The honorable Senator from Georgia gave a reason for secession which I think will strike the North with surprise. He says:

The southern people did not secede from hostility to the Union. * * * They believed they could do it in peace; and I say here there were thousands upon thousands, yea, hundreds of thousands of the best men of the South who believed that the only way to avoid a war was to secede. They believed the northern conscience wanted to get rid of the responsibility of slavery; they believed they had a right to protect their slave property, and they thought they would accomodate the northern conscience by leaving the Union and preserving that property. They believed they could do it in peace, and if they had believed that a war would result they never would have seceded.

Oh, no, they "had no hostility to the Union!" They loved it all the time! They were only caressing it with fire and sword. The Senator from Georgia himself, while a member of the confederate senate, prayed for the Union. I am sure he did, for he said so. And who knows but his prayers for it would have outweighed his votes and speeches against it had not that dreadful "Z. CHANDLER" written a bloody letter to the governor of Michigan and thereby broken up the "peace conference" which Virginia had called for the purpose of taking all the border States out with her. They "did not secede from hostility to the Union!" Oh, no; they did it as "the only way to avoid a war" and to "accommodate the northern conscience!" What a peace-loving and accommodating people they were, indeed! It was only those terrible republicans who wanted to break up the Union and bring on a war. All the secession lambs desired was peace. "If they had believed that a war would result they never would have seceded!" No, never! Of course not. Horace Greeley told them to secede. You know they had great faith in Horace Greeley, about that time. They would never have fired upon an unarmed vessel carrying food to the starving garrison at Fort Sumter if they had not believed that was the "only way to avoid a war."

They established the "dead-line" at Andersonville and the prison pens at Richmond to "accommodate the northern conscience," I suppose. How terribly these peace-loving philanthropists have been misrepresented at the North!

AN UNFORTUNATE COMPLIMENT.

But the climax of the Senator's comic satire was reached, when, turning to his associates with a mock-serious air, he exclaimed:

No, my good northern democratic brethren, you saved the country at last; you saved the Union in the hour of its peril; not the republican party! You who had showed devotion to your flag saved the Union, and now it is for you to go before your people and tell them that the solid North must never become a fact against the solid South. If so, disunion will be accomplished. It is you that we look to.

This was quite too much for the good "northern democratic brethren!" Never before had it been suspected by any human being that they had "saved the Union!" Never before had such an intimation been made by anybody. They were taken completely by surprise. I watched with interest their changing emotions at this long-withheld recognition of modest merit. When the discovery was first announced, by the honorable Senator from Georgia, a sweet smile of satisfaction played upon their radiant countenances, and a blush, soft and rich as that which paints the maiden's cheek when she listens to her first tale of love, stole over their war-browned faces. But gradually, as memory began to assert her sway, that smile and that blush changed into a grim disgust at the Senator from Georgia for calling up that dread war record. By naming it the "dead past," "smoldering ashes of civil strife," &c., they had almost persuaded the republicans to say nothing about it; when, lo! the Senator from Georgia must go stalking over those graves, and raking through those "smoldering ashes," to find a compliment for them. It was too bad. It was pitiful. True, it was sweet to feel, even for one moment, that somebody thought they had "saved the Union;" but, oh, how bitter to remember that the cruel historian had not perished with the rebellion!

They knew that thousands of brave and patriotic democrats had left the party to join the Union Army, and thereby won the everlasting gratitude of their country, (and no one shall award it more generously than myself,) but they could not forget, and they knew the people would not forget, how the vast moral and material forces of that party, as a political organization, arrayed themselves against every effort of the Government to save its life. They could not forget that the party had refused to vote men or money to defend the Union; that it had declared every blow struck at the rebellion was a wound inflicted upon the Constitution; that it was unconstitutional to volunteer or to draft; unconstitutional to issue bonds or greenbacks; unconstitutional to confiscate the slaves of rebels, or to arm them in defense of the Union; unconstitutional to levy taxes for support of the Army; unconstitutional to invade a sovereign State to resist the armies advancing upon our Capitol; unconstitutional to feed or reenforce our soldiers starving in a beleagured garrison; unconstitutional to free the slave when a hundred thousand black men were fighting in our armies; unconstitutional to suspend the writ of habeas corpus to prevent traitors, in their own ranks, from stirring up sedition and violence at the North; unconstitutional to do anything, in fact, but aid the rebellion. They could not forget, and they knew the country would not, how as a party they denounced our soldiers as "hirelings" and President Lincoln as a traitor; how they discouraged enlistments and resisted drafts; how they denied the ballot to soldiers at the front; how they concealed deserters, and served as spies and guides for the enemy; how they conspired with foreign enemies to recognize the confederacy and overthrow the Republic; how they libeled the nation's credit and thereby increased the public debt; how they sought to withdraw the Army from the front by exciting resistance and mob violence in the North; how they burned colored orphan asylums, and plotted to introduce yellow fever into northern cities; and how when Sherman was thundering at the gates of Atlanta, and victory was within our grasp, they met in national convention and declared that the war had been a failure, and demanded an immediate cessation of hostilities!

Pardon me, gentlemen, these unbidden specters of the "dead past" were evoked by the Senator from Georgia, not by myself.

As the "good northern democratic brethren" listened to his eulogies, and cruel memory paraded these and many other like efforts to "save the Union," they became both sad and indignant.

A PERILOUS MISSION.

But when to all this he added, "it is for you to go before your people and tell them that the solid North must not become a fact against the solid South; if so, disunion will be accomplished," it was indeed too much, and my heartfelt sympathies went out toward the "northern brethren."

What a mission has been assigned to you! The five and a half millions of white people of the South are to be allowed to solidify that section by trampling upon the constitutional rights of four and a half millions of colored citizens, and yet if the North, stirred by its old love of liberty and hatred of injustice, cruelty, and oppression, shall become "solid" for the redress of such unparalleled outrages upon American citizenship, "disunion will be accomplished." And your mission is to "go before your people" and once more try to divide the North in order to "save the Union!"

Pardon this digression. I have been led into it by the remarkable serio-comic performances of the Senator from Georgia.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL TO KEEP THE PEACE AT THE POLLS!

Mr. President, this assault by the State-right forces upon the defenses of the ballot-box is justified by the assailants on two grounds: first, that said defenses are unconstitutional, (as usual;) and second, that they infringe the rights and endanger the liberties of the people.

Unconstitutional to defend the life of the nation at the polls, as we have seen it was on the battle-field! Unconstitutional, you have said, to punish armed men who come to the polls for the avowed purpose of terrorism and violence, but not unconstitutional to punish them for keeping the peace!

A similar theory was entertained in 1861, when the democracy insisted that the States had a perfect right to raise armies to destroy the Union, but that our soldiers could not "enter a sovereign State" to defend the Union. I see before me to-day gentlemen, constituting a majority of the democratic party in this Senate, who maintained that doctrine at the peril of their lives. And I see other democratic Senators who did what they could to enforce it at the North.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the same men who fought for, or sympathized with, this political theory should signalize their first advent to congressional power by laying aside every other issue, and ignoring every other interest, for the purpose of establishing a principle so dear to their hearts.

It was said that one of our leading generals spent several days studying international law to ascertain whether it would be a violation of State rights to order the Army upon the "sacred soil of Virginia" to resist her sons who were then marching upon the capital. Surely we are not far from the political heresies of 1861, when a majority of this Senate will vote that the nation has not the constitutional power to defend the peace and purity of the ballot at an election for Representatives in Congress. What was the defense of the Capitol, compared with the defense of the very citadel of political power against armed enemies who are marching upon it for the avowed purpose of desecration and violence? This Capitol, if captured, could have been retaken; if burned, it could have been rebuilt; but if the Nation shall deliberately surrender the ballot to violence and fraud, who shall rescue it from ruffianism or cleanse it from pollution?

Mr. President, I will not seriously discuss the constitutionality of these laws. The power to enact them is granted as plainly as words can express it. The fourth section of the first article of the Constitution says:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

If Congress cannot prescribe the "manner," that is, the mode or method of conducting such elections, nobody can, for the Constitution gives to Congress all the original power to "make" regulations which the States possess, and in addition the power to supervise and "alter" any regulations which the States may have prescribed. In this matter the framers of the Constitution meant to leave no doubt of their intention to give the nation power to protect itself at such elections. They foresaw that the time might come—as it did come in our day—when a hostile State, or an unfriendly local sentiment would seek to overthrow the National Government, and they well knew that the ballot is the most vital point, and election day the most critical moment of its existence.

These laws have stood on the statute-books for many years, during which they have excited the most violent opposition, but no effort has been made to test their validity in the courts. Numerous criminal prosecutions have been made under them, and in every instance their validity has been sustained. This very movement affords the strongest possible evidence that their assailants do not believe them unconstitutional, otherwise they would seek "redress of grievances" in the courts rather than by the extreme methods they have adopted. The claim of unconstitutionality may therefore be set down as a mere cover to some other reason which it is not deemed prudent to state.

DEMOCRATIC MASQUERADE!

What shall be said of the pretense that this movement is inspired by zeal for the rights and liberties of the people? The democratic party masquerading in the character of Guardian and Protector of human rights and defender of liberty! What a burlesque! To complete the cast and make the play entirely harmonious, I would suggest Satan as an angel of light! Judas Iscariot as a Christian! Benedict Arnold as a patriot! and Sitting Bull as a peacemaker! The Senator from Georgia, as confederate Senator praying for the Union, should by no means be omitted!

Seriously, Mr. President, this masquerade of the democracy would make the world laugh if it did not know that behind the mask is the hideous record of its bloody rebellion for the perpetuation of slavery and a relentless purpose to trample upon every right, human and divine, that stands in the way of party triumph.

Why, sir, at this very moment, while in front of the curtains democratic players are lashing themselves into a fury of mock-heroic enthusiasm in behalf of a free ballot and the liberties of the people; behind the scenes a race is fleeing from democratic persecutions and outrages as from a pestilence. While the actors on the stage are protesting their devotion to human rights, ten thousand American citizens, refugees from democratic oppression and tyranny, appeal to us from the prairies of the West for food, clothing, and shelter, while thousands more, hungry, ragged, and wretched, line the banks of the Mississippi River, piteously begging the steamboats to take them from the terrors of democracy.

Here, in front of the footlights, democracy holds up its hands with well-feigned horror at the thought of United States soldiers at an election; while behind the curtains, its retainers are organizing and drilling the democratic ex-confederate rifle clubs to take possession of the polls. The shocking "bayonet in the air," of which we have heard so much, loses all its horrors when it bears the soothing inscription, "C. S. A."

DEMOCRACY NOT NOTED FOR PROTECTING THE BALLOT ANYWHERE.

Gentlemen, do not deceive yourselves. You cannot deceive the people. They know your record. They are looking straight through your disguise at your real purpose. They respect your courage too much to believe, for one moment, that you apprehend any danger to their liberties from our little Army, composed of American citizens like ourselves, and not large enough to guard the frontier from the incursions of the savage. They know also that your assumed anxiety about the interference of United States marshals at elections is but the thin cloak, which poorly conceals a purpose to banish from every State the last symbol of national power and authority, and to open the ballot-box to the rifle club and the repeater. They know that your pretended jealousy, of the rights of the States to prescribe regulations insuring the purity of the ballot, is not supported by the efforts of democratic State Legislatures in that direction. I have never heard of your party inaugurating or carrying through any measure, in any State, for the protection of the ballot-box.

Nay, more, I have been unable to discover a single instance in any State where that party has not resisted all such measures when inaugurated by republicans. If there be one case on record which breaks the monotony of this uniform resistance to registry laws and other practical measures for the protection of the polls, I should be glad to find it. Such an instance, if discovered, would aid to eradicate an ugly suspicion which has taken possession of the public mind on this point. Of course I speak of the party, and not of individuals.

Mr. President, if I have said anything that can be construed as sectional I beg to assure gentlemen from the South that it was not so intended.

I see that it was understood not to be so intended. My friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] smiles. I have spoken of the spirit of modern democracy, its record and its purposes, and not of a section. For the evils which the country has suffered during the last twenty years from that political organization I am sure history will hold your northern allies quite as guilty as yourselves. Centuries hence, as now, it will be said that you made allegiance to the State paramount to your duty to the Republic, while they made allegiance to party paramount to both State and nation; that you fought for State rights and secession as a principle, while they aided and abetted your efforts only as partisans; that you fought at the front, while many of them conspired at the rear.

I am inclined to think that the calm, cool judgment of the future will give you the preference, though the record of neither will ever be cited to inspire with patriotic enthusiasm the young men of coming republics.

SOME REASONS FOR NORTHERN ANXIETY AND INDIGNATION.

Southern Senators will pardon me for briefly stating some of the circumstances and conditions which create anxiety, indignation, and alarm at the North, and threaten to make that section as "solid" as their own.

The eleven States that seceded have a population of about ten millions, of which five and a half millions are white, and four and a half millions are colored. By a system of terrorism and violence, maintained by the democratic party at the South, those five and a half millions absolutely control the elections and send to Congress seventy-three Representatives. Those Representatives control the caucuses of the democratic party and through that agency the House itself.

The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has summarized the condition in the Senate, as follows:

> Twenty Senators sit here who fought in the army of the rebellion, and three more Senators sit here who held high civil command in the confederacy. * * * Forty-two Senators rule the Senate; twenty-three Senators rule the caucus; a majority rules the Senate; a caucus rules the majority, and the twenty-three Senators rule the caucus.

Therefore, the five and a half millions of white people, in those States, rule the thirty-eight millions of the other twenty-seven States. In other words, by trampling upon the rights of colored citizens, the vote of one white man, in the ex-confederate States, has more power in shaping the policy and dictating the legislation of this Government than the votes of seven citizens of the North.

The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has also shown that of the taxes paid for the support of the Government only $13,627,192.89, or about 6 per cent. of the total, was collected from those eleven States, while $221,204,268.88, or 94 per cent., comes from the other twenty-seven States.

It has been urged that in so far as relates to the customs this does not represent the exact proportion paid by the respective States. I have taken some pains to ascertain whether or not this statement is verified by other facts, and I find that the statistics of internal revenue of domestic exports and foreign imports, and also of internal commerce, substantially confirm it.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WINDOM. If I have misstated the Senator in anything; otherwise I should prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to ask how much of the $221,000,000 paid, as the Senator says, by twenty-seven States was paid by one State? One hundred and eight million dollars was paid, according to his theory of payment, by one of the twenty-seven, the State of New York.

Mr. WINDOM. I understand perfectly; that argument has been made several times before. I was about to say that the statistics of internal revenue of domestic exports and imports and also of the internal commerce of the country go far to sustain this statement. Now, let us look at it for a moment. The internal revenue paid by these eleven States is only 11 per cent. of the whole amount collected. This certainly is not subject to the criticism which the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] who has just spoken, would urge against the inference drawn from the relative amounts paid on customs dues. The domestic exports of the States north of the Potomac River amounted last year to $528,161,832, of which the exports south of the Potomac were $169,118,532, or about 32 per cent. But the imports at points north of the Potomac were $415,211,310, while the imports south of the Potomac were only $17,974,209, or about 4 per cent. of the imports of the North. It so happens that the South has the advantage of the best exportable product—cotton—the most valuable in proportion to weight. Now, she could command at her ports the ships to carry $169,118,532 worth of her raw material; but with the great advantage this afforded for cheap inward freights she could import only $17,974,209 worth of foreign goods. To put it in another form, she exported 24 per cent. of the local exports and imported only 4 per cent. of the total foreign imports.

Of the shipping employed in our foreign trade 18 per cent. was entered at ports south of the Potomac, and yet with 18 per cent. of the tonnage, they imported only 4 per cent. of the foreign goods.

This proves conclusively, I think, that although sending away, by reason of the cotton crop, a large amount, yet there was not that proportion, nor anywhere near it, of tax paid upon imports that there was in other sections of the country on the basis of actual consumption. If the actual consumption had been there when these vessels were returning home empty, after carrying abroad $169,000,000 of goods they would have brought more than $17,000,000 of foreign merchandise.

The statistics of internal commerce tell a like story. The internal commerce of the United States is at least sixteen times greater than the foreign commerce, and of this fully 90 per cent. is carried by rail. The value of this commerce cannot be computed, as there are no reliable statistics on the subject, but we know the number of vehicles required to transport it—all, or very nearly all of the same size—the freight cars. According to Poore's Railroad Manual, a standard authority, the number of freight cars employed in the Southern States is 28,808, and in the Northern States 364,696; indicating that the South has only 8 per cent. of the total internal commerce of the country.

Why, Mr. President, I think the New York Central Railroad alone has almost as many cars as all the railroads in those eleven States; and if the traffic of the New York Central, or the Pennsylvania Central, were turned over one of those roads, as some one has said, there would be nothing left but two streaks of rust and a right of way.

From these statistics it will appear that of the taxes for support of the Government about 89 per cent. are collected at the North and 11 per cent. at the South. Of imports, 96 per cent. come to northern ports and 4 per cent. to southern; and of internal commerce about 92 per cent. is in the Northern States and 8 per cent. in the South.

Does it surprise you, gentlemen, that the thirty-eight million people who pay 89 per cent. of the taxes, import 96 per cent. of the foreign goods, and conduct 92 per cent. of the internal commerce of the country, are not quite satisfied to be ruled by the five and one-half millions who pay only 11 per cent. of the taxes, import only 4 per cent. of the foreign goods, and conduct only 8 per cent. of our internal commerce?

Do you imagine that they will quietly consent that four and one-half millions of American citizens, who have always been loyal and true to our flag, shall be reduced to the condition of serfdom or be driven in terror and wretchedness from their native States, in order that the said five and one-half millions shall, through lawless violence, control the destinies of the Republic which they so recently sought to destroy?

Do you think they will agree that one ex-confederate soldier, by trampling upon the constitutional rights of American citizens, shall wield as much political power as seven Union soldiers who obey the Constitution and the law?

Do you wonder that the people are alarmed and indignant when they see that at the very first moment of political power thus acquired you forget everything else, ignore every other interest of the country, and madly assail the defenses of an honest and peaceful ballot in order that you may reassert the supremacy of statehood over nationality? Are northern democrats quite sure that the people who sacrificed so much of blood and treasure to vindicate their nationality on the battle-field are now ready to surrender it in Congress or at the ballot-box?

Gentlemen, I warn you by the memories of the past and by your hopes of the future to beware how you trifle with the patriotism of the American people! You told the South once before that the people of the North would follow your counsels and surrender to the spirit of secession, but when the trial came you found that you had sadly deceived your friends as well as yourselves. Just, generous, and peaceful in their natures, they demonstrated to you how irresistible is their patriotic wrath when the Republic is assailed.

You tell the South now that you can divert and alarm the people by your painted lightning and sheet-iron thunder about military interference at the polls, and thereby induce them to sanction your abandonment of the ballot-box to plunder and pillage and your surrender of the right and power of the nation to defend its own life at the polls, but I warn them and you that the spirit you have already evoked is the same which overwhelmed you in defeat and shame in 1864, and if you persist in your present course it will overwhelm you again.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I propose, as briefly as I can, to present some of the views which influence me to support the pending bill, and ask the indulgence of the Senate while I do so.

The President rests his veto of the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army on two grounds: first, that the clause in that bill repealing the authority to use troops "to keep the peace at the polls" is unnecessary, because no such authority exists in the law as it now stands; and second, because, he says:

The intent and effect of the sixth section of this bill—

Meaning the Army bill—is to prohibit all the civil officers of the United States, under penalty of fine and imprisonment, from employing any adequate civil force for this purpose at the place where enforcement—

Meaning the election laws proposed to be repealed by the pending bill—is most necessary, namely, at the places where the congressional elections are held. Among the most valuable enactments to which I have referred are those which protect the supervisors of Federal elections in the discharge of their duties at the polls.

The reasoning employed by the President is equally applicable to the bill now before the Senate, and hence should be met by those who favor its passage. The first point is easily disposed of, without traveling outside of the message for material with which to refute it. I read from the message on this point, where the sections of the statutes on the subject are set out at length:

SEC. 2002. No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls.

SEC. 5528. Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years.

After reciting at length sections 2003, 5529, 5530, 5531, and 5532 of the Revised Statutes, the President says:

The foregoing enactments would seem to be sufficient to prevent military interference with the elections. But the last Congress, to remove all apprehension of such interference, added to this body of law section 15 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878, which is as follows:

"SEC. 15. From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States, as a posse comitatus or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress; and no money appropriated by this act shall be used to pay any of the expenses incurred in the employment of any troops in violation of this section, and any person willfully violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

The President continues:

From this brief review of the subject it sufficiently appears that under existing laws there can be no military interference with elections.

Bearing in mind that the clause of the Army bill being objected to by the President was intended, on this point, simply to repeal so much of existing law as authorized the use of the Army "to keep the peace at the polls," under which the elections throughout the South, and notably in Louisiana and South Carolina, have been dominated by the military, notwithstanding the denunciation of pains and penalties against various methods of interference contained in the sections of the statute he recites, this conclusion from the premises laid down must give the country a very poor opinion either of the President's candor or of his ability to appreciate the force of the very plain English in which the statutes are written.

The President is fully aware that the authority given in sections 2002 and 5528 to use the Army "to keep the peace at the polls" is the pretext under which the Army has been used ostensibly "to keep the peace at the polls," but really to control elections and defeat the popular will, and that it is this pretext we sought to take away by the bill he has disapproved. He also knows well that in the history of the world no single instance has occurred where popular liberty has been overthrown by the use of the Army, that it has not been done in the name of peace and social order, and with the avowal of a purpose to preserve and protect, while the real design has been to destroy, and that it was to avert this danger and to save the country a recurrence of its past bitter experience under the operation of this authority in the hands of the Executive that we were seeking to pass the Army bill. Unless we are to believe, which I will not, that the President in his message has evaded the issue presented by the Army bill, and descended to the arts of the demagogue in an uncandid play upon words, we must believe that his concluding observation, after a review of the statutes on the subject, just read, means that all laws authorizing the use of the Army "to keep the peace at the polls" have been repealed, and this view of his meaning is confirmed by the following sentence in the same clause of the message:

It may, therefore, be confidently stated that there is no necessity for the enactment of section 6 of the bill before me to prevent military interference in elections.

Section 15 of the act of June 18, 1878, being the last one read, is relied on in the message as making it perfectly clear that he is right in asserting the absence of any necessity for the proposed legislation. This section declares that it shall be unlawful hereafter to use the Army, as a posse comitatus or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases as may be "expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress."

Now, in the first two sections of the Revised Statutes recited at length in the message, to wit, sections 2002 and 5528, the use of the Army "to keep the peace at the polls" is expressly authorized. These two sections being within the exception made by section 15, instead of being repealed are reaffirmed and re-enacted by it. No doubt existed before the passage of section 15 of the authority of the President to surround election polls with soldiers, so far as an act of Congress could give it; but if any had existed it would have been removed by the enactment of that section. The reasons given by the President for asserting that the law authorizing the use of troops "to keep the peace at the polls" has been repealed are most convincing that it has not been repealed, but is yet in full force and vigor, if any doubt had existed about it. I have adverted to this point not with the purpose of discussing the constitutional power of Congress to authorize the use of troops "to keep the peace at the polls," for the contrary has been so clearly shown in this debate as to leave no ground for further controversy, but to expose the weakness and transparency of the effort, if such it was, to deceive the country into the belief that the democratic party has made a great noise over an immaterial and irrelevant issue.

This specimen of presidential logic is a fair sample of that which characterizes the remainder of the message in the reasons given for the disapproval of the repeal of a portion of the existing laws touching elections.

I will now, Mr. President, endeavor to show, and think I can do so, that these laws ought to be repealed because destructive of freedom and fairness in elections, and because they invade and overthrow the right of the States to prescribe the qualifications of voters.

Citizens of the United States are not voters except as made so by State laws, the jurisdiction over the matter of suffrage residing exclusively in the States. The rights and qualifications of voters are prescribed by each State for itself, subject only to the condition imposed by the Fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States—that there shall be no exclusion from the right to vote "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

Section 2 of article 1 of the Constitution provides that—

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

This section is an adoption by the Federal Government of qualifications for electors for members of Congress of the precise qualifications prescribed by the State governments for electors for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

The State Legislatures prescribe also the qualifications of voters for presidential electors, as will be seen by reference to section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution, which provides that—

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

Representatives in Congress and electors for President being the only officers representing the State in Federal affairs required to be elected by popular ballot, it follows conclusively that the rights and qualifications of all voters, whether in State or national elections, are to be ascertained and determined by the laws of the respective States. If any additional authority for this conclusion were required, it would only be necessary to refer to the decisions of the Supreme Court in the well-known Slaughter-house cases, and in Miner vs. Heppersitt, United States vs. Reese, and United States vs. Cruikshank, in Wallace and Otto's Reports, in which the whole subject is thoroughly discussed and authoritatively determined.

Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, having himself a decided leaning to strong government, using almost the exact language of Mr. Hamilton, the great federalist, commenting on section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution, uses this strong language:

Nor can it be said with correctness that Congress can in any way alter the rights or qualifications of voters.

This right to vote is the basis and foundation of our governments, State and national, and its exercise gives vitality and energy to both. It is only when the people go to the polls to vote that they exercise that supreme sovereignty which our institutions recognize as inherent in them. The reservation to themselves by the States, in the formation of the Federal Constitution, of the right to determine who shall and who shall not exercise this sovereign power, whether in State or national elections, is absolute, and the rights and qualifications of voters are beyond the reach of Federal legislation. What the qualifications of voters are, and what are the rights which attach to citizens in virtue of their being voters, can therefore be found only in the constitutions and laws of the several States. The constitutions and laws of all the States declare that all elections shall be free, and that no citizen entitled under the law to vote shall be deprived of that right unless upon conviction of an infamous crime by due course of law, and judgment passed upon him. The States of Alabama, California, Colorado, Delaware, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas have in their constitutions provisions exempting voters "in all cases except treason, felony, or breach of the peace from arrest during their attendance at elections, and in going to and returning therefrom." In the constitutions of many of these States voters are also on election day exempt from military duty, and from service as witnesses or jurors, or working on roads.

The remaining States whose constitutions do not contain similar provisions, almost invariably have laws on their statute-books of equivalent import. These constitutional and legislative provisions of the different States fix absolutely, beyond the power of Congress to interfere with or abridge them, the rights of all voters at all elections to absolute personal liberty, to entire immunity from arrest, except for "treason, felony, or breach of the peace." The care and solicitude with which these personal rights are defined and guarded in all the States attest with overwhelming force the concurring assent of the American mind to their paramount importance in the plan of free government. The day on which the ballot is to be cast has been dedicated by American constitutional law to the amplest and fullest personal freedom of those who on that day exercise their prerogative as the anointed sovereigns of the land. This right of the citizen attaches to and inheres in him in his quality as a voter, is a part of his privilege and prerogative as a voter, and is one of his qualifications as a voter. None but freemen can cast free ballots; and free ballots are the only foundation for a free government. The importance of preserving these guarantees of a great franchise, of a sovereign right, against encroachment, or even a menace of invasion, cannot be overestimated. The whole fabric of our Government rests upon an absolutely free ballot; for only that can signify the consent of the governed. An assault upon that is a stab in the vitals of the Republic. Bad, lawless men, some by force and intimidation, others with equal effectiveness by fraud in its various shapes, do corrupt and pervert the ballot, just as they evade and defraud every law to be found in the statute-book. That this is to some extent the case both North and South, and not more in one section than in the other, is doubtless true; but in both sections it is exceptional, and an inevitable result of the imperfection of human wisdom in framing and executing laws, and an evil the proportions of which time and experience and advancing civilization may be relied on confidently to reduce to a minimum. But when the blow comes from the Government against the reserved and guaranteed rights of the citizen, and through them upon the great bulwark of popular liberty, a free ballot, time brings no change except for the worse, and ultimate destruction of free government is the certain result.

No man can arise from a perusal of the election laws we now seek to repeal except with the conviction fastened upon his mind that in their enactment the exclusive constitutional jurisdiction of the States over the question of suffrage has been most rudely invaded, and the sacredly guaranteed rights of the voter to personal liberty and a free ballot grossly violated. Supervisors, marshals, and their general and special deputies are made supreme at the registration and election precincts. The State authorities appointed by State laws to hold the elections are, in the very seat of power of the States, placed under the supervision and control of these Federal officials, who are strangers to the laws of the State. The qualifications of voters and their rights at the polls—subjects peculiarly within the States' exclusive jurisdiction, which must be passed on by the States' officers as voters present themselves at the polls—are to be adjudged under the direction and to suit the views of these representatives of the Federal Government, which has no jurisdiction over the subject, or the States' officers may be arrested and carried in disgrace to prison, or before a commissioner for bail. A great number of new offenses which may be committed, many of them unwittingly, by men not meaning to do wrong, are created and vaguely defined, and discretion given these officers, who are usually rancorous partisans, to arrest the offenders "instantly;" and to arrest a voter on election day means to silence his vote.

They may challenge when they entertain a "doubt" of the right of the person offering to vote, and may construe his offer into an offense and arrest him. With unlimited power to challenge voters and to arrest on the spot, without affidavit or warrant, enormous penalties by fine and imprisonment denounced against all who oppose or hinder or interfere with their operations directly or indirectly, or even fail to assist them when called on, these officials are, in virtue of the authority granted them, masters of the people, and may dominate them on the day of election as completely as if they were the source of all authority. The whole power of the Government is delegated to these officers, who are appointed to swarm around the places of election and watch, Argus-eyed, for what they may be pleased to construe into an offense by unsuspecting people assembled to cast their ballots. Who can feel safe at the polls with such absolute authority over him in the hands of a set of irresponsible deputy marshals?

The ingenuity of man cannot devise a system which, in the hands of unscrupulous partisans, is better calculated to drive voters from the polls and destroy the freedom of elections. But one other agency is needed to complete the utter overthrow of a free ballot, so far as the law can do it, and that is fully supplied in the authority to use the Army "to keep the peace at the polls." The spirit which pervades these laws is hostile to the States, hostile to the people, and hostile to free elections. The operations of John I. Davenport, chief supervisor in the city of New York, just before the elections in November last, and again on the day of election, when nearly four thousand voters were arrested and an aggregate of ten thousand are estimated to have been deterred from casting their ballots, illustrate fairly their true character when practically enforced by a bold and earnest partisan. I will read sections 2022 and 5522 of the Revised Statutes as samples of the various provisions on this subject, which exhibit fairly the general tenor and spirit of the whole:

SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and, for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

SEC. 5522. Every person, whether with or without any authority, power, or process, or pretended authority, power, or process, of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation, or otherwise, interferes with or prevents the supervisors of election, or either of them, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or either of them, or which he or they, or either of them, may be authorized to perform by any law of the United States, in the execution of process or otherwise, or who by any of the means before mentioned hinders or prevents the free attendance and presence at such places of registration or at such polls of election, or full and free access and egress to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or to and from any room, where any such registration or election or canvass of votes, or of making any returns or certificates thereof, may be had, or who molests, interferes with, removes, or ejects from any such place of registration or poll of election, or of canvassing votes cast thereat, or of making returns or certificates thereof, any supervisor of election, the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them; or who threatens, or attempts, or offers so to do, or refuses or neglects to aid and assist any supervisor of election, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties, when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the costs of the prosecution.

I invoke the attention of the Senate and the country to these enactments, and ask a candid judgment if my portrayal of their enormity, and of the grossness of their violation of the constitutional rights of the States over the matter of suffrage, and of the privilege of voters to be exempt from arrest on election day, is not under rather than over stated.

If State elections are being held on the same day, as is almost universally done with congressional elections, these, too, are controlled and supervised by Federal officials. The whole election machinery is taken possession of, wrested from the control to which it constitutionally belongs, and placed in the hands of supervisors and a marshal's posse comitatus. No distinction is made between offenses, whether mala in se or mala prohibita, whether disdemeanor or felony; but for "any offense," or for any act which may be adjudged an offense by an ignorant, partisan deputy marshal, the citizen is to be instantly arrested, "whether before or after voting," and whether a private citizen or an officer of the State, whose offense may consist in trying to discharge his duty under the laws of his State.

Rights reserved to the States, and expressly recognized under the Federal Constitution as theirs and their peoples', and sacredly guarded in the constitution and laws of all the States, are trampled under foot, and a day consecrated to the largest and fullest personal freedom of the voter, because the only day when his sovereign attributes are in proper person exercised, is made a day of terror, of intimidation, and of personal humiliation.

I maintain, Mr. President, that this indefinite multiplication of new offenses unknown before the passage of these acts, and their vague definition; the great discretion granted the officers in determining what acts or omissions constitute offenses under the law; the authority to arrest "instantly with or without warrant;" the vast undefined, yea, absolute, powers given the officers; the abrupt and violent severance of the citizen from the protecting authority of the State whose laws are nullified; the spirit of hostility breathed through every line of these laws to the authority of the State and contempt for the rights of the citizen, violative of the admitted powers of the State over the matter of suffrage, are so threatening, so reasonably well calculated to intimidate and browbeat the voter, backed as all these menaces are by the whole power of the Government, as to be destructive of that personal liberty so fully guaranteed him on the day of the election and that free agency so necessary to a fair and free ballot.

And again, while I am fully aware that the meaning attached to the phrase "treason, felony, and breach of the peace," as used in the Constitution in defining the privilege of members of Congress to be exempt from arrest, is held by the weight of authority to include all indictable offenses, leaving their privilege potent only against arrest on civil process, it is at the same time unquestionably true that the reasons for this construction had their origin in the common parliamentary law of England, which has been adopted here, and that this law pertains only to parliamentary bodies, and is without signification elsewhere.

Many reasons exist for a stricter construction of the privilege of a superior body of men, such as the British Parliament or American Congress are supposed to be, than for that of the great mass of voters; and an interpretation which attached naturally to the words in parliamentary law would not be accepted in a constitution made for the great body of the people. Extreme jealousy is manifested in all the State constitutions of any obstructions to a perfectly free ballot in the hands of every voter; and it is much more reasonable to suppose that their framers, knowing that the great bulk of violations of the penal laws are petty offenses, usually called misdemeanors, many of them—in fact, a large majority—involving no moral turpitude, only mala prohibita, excepted the most heinous class of offenses, such as treason, felony, and breach of the peace, which social order and the public good require instantly dealt with, and exempted voters from arrest on election day for all others, rather than presume that they intended to import from English parliamentary law an occult meaning into the words of exemption totally different from their usual and common signification, which had grown into them under conditions entirely foreign and utterly unlike those under which they were being used. And it is equally reasonable to suppose that in the solicitude to preserve the elective franchise as nearly as possible to every voter against the power of the Government to deprive him of it, they intended the privilege should prevail against all except the offenses most rarely committed and least likely to be multiplied by new laws and by rules of construction. One of the sections of the statute requires voters arrested on election day "for any offense" against the laws of the United States. There are many offenses which are neither treason, felony, nor breach of the peace, but misdemeanors unaccompanied by any breach of the peace, for which, under the plain import and common and manifest signification of the language of the privilege, voters are exempt from arrest on the day of election, and in going to and returning from the polls. No lawyer bearing in mind the maxim "expressio unius, exclusio alterius," would give any other construction, nor would any sensible man not a lawyer construe the phrase in any other way than as an exemption from arrest except for the specifically designated classes of offenses. The laws now sought to be repealed make manifest the importance of giving that exemption from arrest its usual and popular signification; for it is not the privilege of a select body of parliamentary experts, learned in the subtleties and niceties of the law which is being dealt with, but that of the masses of the people, and should be construed as they can and do understand it. I read from Story's Commentaries on the Constitution the fifteenth rule of interpretation, which is very pertinent to the subject, as follows:

> In the first place, then, every word employed in the Constitution is to be expounded in its plain, obvious, and common-sense meaning, unless the context furnishes some ground to control, qualify, or enlarge it. Constitutions are not designed for metaphysical or logical subtleties, for niceties of expression, for critical propriety, for elaborate shades of meaning, or for the exercise of philosophical acuteness or judicial research. They are instruments of a practical nature, founded on the common business of human life, adapted to common wants, designed for common use, and fitted for common understandings. The people make them; the people adopt them; the people must be supposed to read them, with the help of common sense; and cannot be presumed to admit in them any recondite meaning, or any extraordinary gloss.

It has been too much the custom to fritter away by construction plain provisions of constitutional and statutory law, and if there is a point at which this thing should cease assuredly it is when the very foundations of free government are assailed through this sapping and mining process. A clause of the Constitution which defines the highest and most valuable right of the American citizen should not receive a construction which removes it from the apprehension and understanding of the general public and locks its treasures in the breasts of a few legal experts. No rule of interpretation productive of such a result is approved by the authorities or by the common sense of the country. Constitutions and laws should receive a reasonable interpretation, keeping in view the objects and purposes sought to be attained; and with these in view there can be no doubt but that the election laws are grossly subversive of that large degree of personal freedom sought to be secured the voter on election day by the organic laws of the country, through his privilege to be free from arrest except for "treason, felony, or breach of the peace."

But again, Mr. President, I inquire whence the power to pass these laws is derived? The National Government is a government of delegated powers, and when it exercises authority rightfully in any given case it must be in virtue of an express grant in the Constitution, or one that may be reasonably implied from another that is expressed. The power to preserve order, prevent crime, keep the peace, and punish violations of law is an inherent, inalienable natural right in every organized community. This is known as the police power of the State, over which the court in United States vs. Cruikshank say:

> Sovereignty rests alone with the States. It is no more—

Say the court—

> the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

Among these police powers is that coupled with the duty of protecting the rights of the citizen, prominent in which are the rights to assemble for lawful political purposes, such as to exercise the elective franchise, petition for redress of grievances, &c. Voters are citizens of the State; they receive the right—or, rather, privilege—of voting from the Constitution and laws of the State; it is the highest duty of the State to protect citizens in the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges secured them under State laws; for the discharge of which duty the States have by common consent and admission sovereign power. It would seem from these premises that the jurisdiction of the State over all matters pertaining to securing "free elections," which are the professed object of the national legislation on the subject, is exhaustive and exclusive, and unquestionably is so unless modified by some provision of the Federal Constitution.

The President in his veto message, and the leaders of the republican party in their speeches in the two Houses of Congress in this debate, designate the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution and section 4 of article 1 of the original instrument as the sole sources from which the power is derived to the National Government to legislate on elections. I will have but little to say about the fifteenth amendment, as that has been the subject of authoritative analysis by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the extent of the grant of power made by it accurately defined. That amendment is in these words:

> 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.
> 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

In the Reese case it was decided by the court, in an elaborate opinion delivered by the Chief-Justice, that the right of Congress to legislate upon the subject of voting at all at State elections rests upon this amendment and can be exercised by providing a punishment only when the wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at such elections is because of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that this amendment does not authorize legislation by Congress imposing punishment generally on persons who, by force, bribery, or fraud, hinder another from voting. The court uses this significant language:

> But when we go beyond the third section and read the fourth [meaning third and fourth sections of act of May 31, 1870,] we find there no words of limitation, or reference even, that can be construed as manifesting any intention to confine its provisions to the terms of the fifteenth amendment. That section has for its object the punishment of all persons who, by force, bribery, &c., hinder, delay, &c., any person from qualifying and voting. In view of all these facts we feel compelled to say that in our opinion the language of the third and fourth sections does not confirm their operation to unlawful discriminations on account of race, &c. If Congress had the power to provide generally for the punishment of those who unlawfully interfere to prevent the exercise of the elective franchise without regard to such discrimination, [alluding to the restriction in the amendment,] the language of these sections would be broad enough.

The language of the amendment gives to Congress exactly the same measure of power in State elections as in elections for members of Congress, and, as interpreted by the court, no power is granted over either except to provide punishment in the single instance of the denial of the right to vote "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The right may be denied for any other reason, and the power of Congress does not attach. So far from being a grant, there is a negation of the power claimed for Congress under which the legislation touching elections is sought to be justified.

I will now consider section 4 of article 1, which is chiefly, and I might almost say entirely, relied on to sustain the power of Congress to legislate touching elections. It reads as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

I do not propose, Mr. President, to enter into a detailed discussion of this section, but simply in a general way to indicate the reasons for my dissent from the view that it grants to Congress the great powers claimed under it.

In accordance with a well-recognized rule of construction, we must give to this section a meaning consistent with its terms, such as will put it in harmony with other clauses of the Constitution bearing on the same subject, if possible to do so, and with the general theory of the instrument. The section contains two clauses apparently in conflict, and these must be so construed, if it can be done, as that both may stand and be operative. The first clause is mandatory upon the Legislature of each State to prescribe the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives; and the last gives to Congress the power to "by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators." The first clause addresses the Legislatures of the States in imperative language, and the last speaks to Congress in language which gives permission, and therefore implies in some degree discretion. The first is a grant to the State Legislatures, and they are commanded to accept and execute it. It is primary to the State Legislatures, while that to Congress is secondary. The secondary power is not to repeal, but to "alter," which means in some way to change, but not supersede or destroy, the "regulations" of the Legislature. The other words, "at any time make," mean create, call into existence something where nothing before existed; that is, regulations, where none had been made by the State Legislatures. It seems to have been intended, if the State Legislatures failed or refused to act, to authorize Congress to "make" regulations; but if the State did act, to give like authority to "alter," if the action should be such as to defeat or greatly embarrass the object sought to be attained, to wit, the election of members of the House of Representatives. This was the view of such men as Adams, Jay, Hamilton, and Madison, who bore so conspicuous a part in framing the Constitution, and, later, of Judge Story. They believed that every government should have within its own Constitution and control the power of preserving itself from dissolution, such as would occur if the States should refuse to provide for the election of members of the House of Representatives, or should execute this section in a way to defeat its purpose.

The following extracts from one of the numbers of The Federalist, prepared by Mr. Hamilton, represent his own as well as the views of the other great men I have named, as shown by their writings, and by their recorded utterances in the convention which framed and the State conventions which adopted the Constitution, almost in the same language. He says, discussing section 4 of article 1:

It will not be alleged that an election law could have been framed and inserted in the Constitution which would have been applicable to every probable change in the situation of the country; and it will, therefore, not be denied that a discretionary power over elections ought to exist somewhere. It will, I presume, be as readily conceded that there were only three ways in which this power could have been reasonably organized: that it must either have been lodged wholly in the National Legislature, or wholly in the State Legislatures, or primarily in the latter and ultimately in the former. The last mode has with reason been preferred by the convention. They have submitted the regulation of elections for the Federal Government, in the first instance, to the local administrations, which in ordinary cases, and when no improper views prevail, may be both more covenient and more satisfactory; but they have reserved to the national authority a right to interpose whenever extraordinary circumstances might render that interposition necessary to its safety.

He next discloses the extraordinary circumstances referred to, as follows:

Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the National Government, in the hands of the State Legislatures, would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy. They could at any moment annihilate it, by neglecting to provide for the choice of persons to administer its affairs. It is to little purpose to say that a neglect or omission of this kind would not be likely to take place. The constitutional possibility of the thing, without an equivalent for the risk, is an unanswerable objection.

Again he makes it more plain by stating the whole ground upon which the section rests, as follows: [The italics are his.]

I am greatly mistaken, notwithstanding, if there be any article in the whole plan more completely defensible than this. Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

These great men did not dream that the National Government would, under this section, do more than that which the States should fail or refuse to do toward providing for the election of Representatives, or that an assertion of power would be attempted when the States were in good faith providing by law for regular elections. Their writings and recorded utterances abundantly show that they regarded the grant of power to the National Government in this section as simply an alternative one, to be called into existence only by a failure of the due execution of the mandate to the States to prescribe by law the times, places, and manner of holding elections.

Read by the light of contemporaneous exposition and the significant non-assertion of power over this subject by Congress for eighty years, except by the act of 1842 to provide for elections by districts, both words, make and alter, used to convey all the power possessed by Congress, refer to the same object and purpose, which is, to give the National Government the self-preserving principle. It means that Congress may "make" regulations only when the States refuse or fail by law to do so, and may "alter" such regulations only when those made by the States are destructive of the purpose of the Constitution, and imperil a continuance of the Government, and, per consequence, that the alteration may be made of such regulations to the extent that they endanger the safety of the Government, and no further. As long as the grant to the States is executed in good faith, and reasonable times, places, and manner of holding elections are prescribed by State laws, the entire grant of power in section 4 is exhausted, and the secondary or ultimate power of the National Government does not attach.

But, Mr. President, there are other provisions of the Constitution in pari materia with the section I am discussing, to be allowed their proper influence in this connection. I allude, among others, to those read and commented on in the beginning of my remarks, which secure to the States the right and power to prescribe the qualifications of voters. Fortunately there is no controversy as to the meaning of those; and I maintain that the power claimed for Congress under section 4 of article 1 to regulate the time, places, and manner of holding elections, and asserted in the enactment of the existing laws on the subject of elections, is a practical overthrow of the established power and right of the States to prescribe the qualifications of voters, and that in a proper construction of it the power ascribed to Congress will stop short of a collision with the admitted exclusive right of the States over the matter of suffrage. The proposition cannot be controverted, that the authority which stands at the polls with power to challenge voters and decide upon their right to vote, and enforce the decision, and to arrest for alleged violations of the criminal laws, controls the matter of suffrage. If the State authorities exercise this power, the State controls; and if the Federal authorities exercise it, then not the State, but the National Government determines the qualifications of voters. There can be but one ruling power at the polls, and that must be either wholly State or wholly Federal. There is, and in the nature of things can be, no middle ground. The State appoints her own officers to execute her laws, and Federal officials are appointed to execute Federal laws; and while both must yield obedience to the laws, State and national, neither has any concern with the enforcement of the laws of the other jurisdiction, except when called on as any other citizen may be. State officers are, as officers, strangers to the Federal laws; and Federal officials are strangers, as such, to State laws. The State cannot impose duties on Federal officers, nor can the Federal Government impose duties on State officers. When the two officers, State and Federal, meet on official duty at the polls, each brings with him for enforcement the law of the jurisdiction he represents, and one or the other officer, with his jurisdiction, must go to the wall, leaving the other supreme.

Section 5522 of the Revised Statutes, just read, which directs the supervisors, marshals, special and general deputies, &c., to disregard State officers, State process, and State authority, is logical, if officers armed with the powers with which they are invested are to attend the polls or the registration precincts at all. The Federal officials will of course always prevail in a contest with State officers, because representing the supreme authority. Their judgment, and not that of the State officers, on the qualifications of challenged voters, will admit to or exclude from the polls in case of disagreement between them. Davenport stationed deputy marshals at the polls in New York at the last election, with instructions to arrest parties when they presented themselves to vote, and hundreds were arrested—yea, thousands—and denied the right to vote. They were afterward, almost without exception, ascertained to have all the qualifications prescribed by the State of New York for voters. Whatever power State officers exercise over the conduct of elections, we thus see, is, under existing laws, purely permissive, by the consent and grace of Federal marshals and their deputies, and the chief and subordinate supervisors, which they may give or withhold at pleasure. What becomes of the right and power of the States, admitted by all and denied by none, to prescribe the qualifications of voters in all elections, State and national? It practically is utterly overthrown. Can that be a proper construction of article 4, section 1, merely intended to fix the mode of regulating the exercise of the right of suffrage, which overthrows and nullifies other clauses of the Constitution intended to define and vest and guard the great right itself? The incident is, under such interpretation, made to absorb and swallow up the principal. Such a construction is an outrage upon every recognized rule of interpretation, and is as thoroughly destructive of the reserved rights of the States over the question of suffrage as if the clauses securing them had been stricken from the Constitution.

If it be said that the power still remains with the States to prescribe the qualifications of voters by law, and although Federal officials construe the law, it is a fair presumption that they will construe it properly and justly, I would say, in reply, that however just, correct, and beneficent might be the administration by Federal officials of laws passed by the States prescribing the qualifications of voters and providing for the exercise of the elective franchise, if the principle of their power to do this is yielded, if their right to run the elective machinery is granted, the national authority over the whole subject becomes practically supreme, and that of the States a nullity. In order to appreciate the full force of the argument, it must be borne constantly in mind that the power to "regulate" elections as claimed for Congress, under which the existing laws are justified, embraces the whole subject, and gives full authority to take charge of everything pertaining to elections, to appoint Federal officers to hold elections, make returns, and do everything to be done from the posting of election notices, through all the successive stages of the proceeding, to the final act of deciding who is elected, and delivering the certificate of election to the successful candidate. The power is claimed to be exhaustive if it exists at all. Chief-Justice Marshall, in the great case of McCulloch against Maryland, reported in 4 Wheaton, in an opinion affirming the constitutionality of a national bank, and denying the power of the State of Maryland to tax the operations of one of its branches, lays down, among others, the following propositions as being of universal application:

First. That a power to create implies a power to preserve.
Second. That a power to destroy, if wielded by a different hand, is hostile to and incompatible with these powers to create and preserve.

Having decided that Congress possesses the constitutional power to charter or create the bank, the Chief-Justice proceeded to argue that the power claimed by the State of Maryland to tax one of the branches of the bank involved the power to destroy, and that the power to destroy may defeat or render useless the constitutional power to create, and that there is a plain repugnance in conferring on one government the power to control the constitutional measures of another, and concluded by denying the right claimed by the State of Maryland. It is said in the opinion of the Chief-Justice that the propositions laid down were not controverted by any one of the splendid array of counsel in the case, only their applicability to that case denied, and they are adopted by Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, as axiomatic truths. Precisely the same principle involved in the first proposition of Judge Marshall is broadly asserted in the opinion of the present court in United States vs. Reese, in these words:

Rights and immunities created by or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States can be protected by Congress. The form and manner of the protection may be such as Congress, in the legitimate exercise of its legislative discretion, shall provide.

These propositions apply equally to a reserved as to a granted power. Let us apply these principles to the question under discussion. The States are admitted on all sides to be possessed of the exclusive power to prescribe the qualifications of all voters at all elections, State and national—that is, to create the conditions and qualifications under which the right of suffrage may be exercised. The possession of this power carries with it the power to preserve the qualifications thus created and as part and parcel of it, for the power would be nugatory without it to secure to their voters the enjoyment of the elective franchise on the conditions and qualifications they have prescribed. This the State cannot do except through her own laws creating elective machinery and her own officers to execute them, because she cannot by her laws command or control Federal officers. The Constitution and laws of the United States are supreme wherever they operate. State laws incompatible with them are nullities. Now, if the National Government legislates with reference to the manner of holding elections, or the methods and process through which State laws provide for the exercise and enjoyment of the elective franchise and sends supervisors and marshals, their deputies, &c., to superintend the elections and exercise authority in challenging and arresting voters, and empowered to disregard or in any way interfere with the laws and process and authority of the State in the manner of holding elections and ascertaining the qualifications of those who present themselves as voters, it may defeat or render useless, not only the acknowledged power of the States to prescribe the qualifications of voters, but the power which goes with it to preserve and secure to the voter the enjoyment of the elective franchise under the conditions prescribed. That the State of Maryland might use the taxing power in a way to destroy or render useless the bank charter, which the court held that Congress had the power to grant, was the ground on which her right to levy the tax was denied wholly by the court, and for the same reason the National Government, if its right to interfere at all in elections is admitted, may use the power to destroy or render useless the rights of the State over the question of suffrage, clearly has no such power.

The second proposition of Chief-Justice Marshall, "that a power to destroy, if wielded by a different hand, is hostile to and incompatible with these powers to create and preserve," is precisely illustrated by the relative attitudes of the State and Federal Governments as to the powers claimed for Congress under section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution to interfere in elections. The State holds the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters, and with it the power to preserve to the people the right to exercise the elective franchise under such conditions and qualifications as her laws may prescribe. The President claims for Congress "a different hand," another power, to-wit: that of regulating the methods and machinery of elections, which can be used to destroy the power held by the State; and this, in the language of the Chief-Justice, "is hostile to and incompatible with these powers to create and preserve" the qualifications of voters, and to secure their enjoyment of the elective franchise, held by the State. In other words, the States possess the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters, and a power is claimed for Congress which may be so used, and has been so used in the existing election laws, as to defeat the power held by the States, a claim which, under the opinion of the court in McCulloch vs. Maryland, is utterly inadmissible. These two incompatible powers cannot coexist. One or the other must fall; and, as there is a universal concurrence of authority, from the fathers down to the latest decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases referred to in another part of my remarks, that the power of the State is existing and absolute over the suffrage question, it follows inexorably that the power claimed for Congress does not and can not exist. If the States have, as all admit them to have, the exclusive power to prescribe the qualifications of voters, then they are necessarily supreme in all the methods and machinery required for the exercise of the elective franchise, because it is only through such supremacy that their power can be enforced, and Congress has no power, and can exercise none whatever, over the subject without destroying this constitutional right of the States. He who admits the power of the States to prescribe the qualifications of voters as an absolute constitutional power, is driven by established legal principles and the highest judicial and political authorities, to admit that, inherent in that power, as a part of it, is the power to execute itself and preserve itself from inanition by protecting voters in the enjoyment of the right to vote on the conditions and qualifications prescribed, and that this can only be done through laws passed by the States and officers appointed and commanded by the States. Anything short of this is destructive of the power of the States to prescribe the qualifications of voters, and leaves the power, which all admit to be theirs, a barren ideality and a mere brutum fulmen. To admit that the States have the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters and at the same time claim power for Congress to regulate the machinery of elections, and have supervisors, marshals, or soldiers at the polls to interfere with the enjoyment of the voting franchise as prescribed by the States, to oversee the processes of the States, is to assert the existence, in the language of Judge Marshall, of two "incompatible powers" which cannot exist together. If one exists the other cannot exist. There can be no mixed State and Federal machinery, any more than oil and water can be mingled; for in the State and Federal jurisdictions each is supreme in its proper sphere, and the two constitute one harmonious whole, because the orbits within which they move and operate are distinct and separate. But this harmony is destroyed the moment the powers of either invade the precincts of the other. The powers of the two cannot live together in the same circle of operation, because the admitted supremacy of the National authority extinguishes and annihilates that of the States. If the National Government intervenes through marshals and supervisors and other officials to exercise power in holding elections and determining the qualifications of voters, then and there the authority of the State is blighted and withered under the deadly shadow of the superior national power, and, in the language of Judge Story, becomes a "nullity," and her constitutional right and power over the matter of suffrage is lost and gone.

Hence I maintain that the power of the State over the subject is exclusive so far as the manner of and machinery for holding elections is concerned, and therefore that the powers conferred upon Congress in section 4 of article 1 cannot authorize the existing laws touching elections.

I insist, then, Mr. President, that the construction of section 4 of article 1 claimed for it by the Executive and other distinguished gentlemen of the republican party cannot be adopted without overthrowing other clauses of the Constitution never before questioned, which vest control over the matter of suffrage in the States, and is violative of that established rule of interpretation which requires all the parts of the Constitution so construed that none shall be rejected and all shall be operative where it can be done. I submit, it is equally clear that the construction I claim for it, being consistent with its own terms and with that indicated for it by the framers of the Constitution, as well as that pointed out by other clauses of the instrument in pari materia, giving force and operation as it does to all parts of the Constitution, and coming in collision with none, is the correct one.

It will be seen, Mr. President, that my argument does not controvert the power of Congress to fix the time for elections, to provide for elections by districts, and to provide for voting by ballot rather than viva voce, nor to enact such penal laws as will enforce upon the election officers of the State the observance of such national legislation as defines the rights of persons secured by the amendment to the Constitution. None of these interfere with the exclusive rights of the States to prescribe the qualifications of voters and protect its just powers to control and direct the machinery of elections. If Congress should attempt, however, to exercise either of those powers in a way which would directly or indirectly interfere with the great right of the States to prescribe the qualifications of voters and preserve to the people the enjoyment of the elective franchise on the conditions prescribed, then such exercise of power, though for the purposes named, would, I insist, upon the principles and authorities referred to, be clearly unconstitutional.

The test and touchstone of the powers of Congress over this subject is to be found in ascertaining whether or not its exercise in the particular mode may defeat or impair the powers of the State over that great reserved right, and if it does, it must be unauthorized and void.

To summarize the argument, the States are, by general admission on all sides, invested with exclusive power to prescribe the qualifications of voters. This power carries with it the power to protect their citizens in the enjoyment of the elective franchise on the qualifications and under the conditions prescribed; and in order to do this, the machinery for holding elections, and the officers for running this machinery, must be prescribed by State laws, without interference from Federal officials, because the State cannot command Federal officers and can command her own, and because if Federal officers intervene in these matters, being under the national jurisdiction and charged with the enforcement of national laws, which have superior authority to State laws, the authority of the State may be nullified, and is nullified in the existing election laws, and thereby the constitutional power of the States may be overthrown, and is overthrown in the laws sought to be repealed.

In the convention which framed the Constitution, in the contest over its adoption by the States, and over the amendments thereto, as well as in the administration of the Government ever since, there has been an unceasing struggle—a struggle underlying the formation of every political party which has existed in the country—between those who would build up a splendid central government at the expense of the States and of local government on one side, and those who on the other were jealous of the monarchical and aristocratic tendencies of a consolidated government, and desired to strengthen and increase the powers of the States and extend the benefits of local rule. This contest has always been earnest, and too frequently fierce and bitter; and, in consequence, we find throughout the Constitution that it was the aim of its framers to give each to the States and National Government a self-preserving and self-protecting power, not dependent upon the action or within the control of the other. All the great rights secured to each were thus guarded. Section 4 of article 1, which we are now considering, was defended by Madison, Hamilton, Jay, and others on the ground that it was necessary to enable the National Government to preserve itself from dissolution, which might result from the non-action or contrivance of the States. On the other hand, for the protection of the States, articles 9 and 10 of amendments to the Constitution provide respectively that the enumeration of rights in the Constitution shall not be construed to disparage others retained by the people, and that powers not delegated to the United States nor prohibited to the States, are reserved respectively to the States, or the people. These provisions are adverted to simply as illustrations of the spirit which pervades the whole instrument.

It was regarded by the framers of the Constitution as absolutely necessary, both to the stability and the harmonious operation of the Government, that the States on one side and the National Government on the other should each be invested with the inherent power to protect the rights and authority granted to them respectively against the aggression of the other; and accordingly we find, so far as human sagacity could foresee and provide, that it has been done, and no important power vested in either has been left to the tender mercies and keeping of the other. It would have been strange indeed if, with this feeling of distrust and jealousy between the States and the National Government at fever heat, the great cardinal right, the corner-stone of the governments, State and National, and the most precious of the rights of the States so carefully and fully reserved, the control of the question of suffrage had been left where the National Government could grasp or control it.

The President and his party associates in this Chamber see a supreme necessity for Federal supervision of elections, in order to protect the interests and freedom of voters and the purity of the ballot-box. They are able to see no virtue in State officials, in local laws, and the methods of home rule, and insist upon United States officers for that purpose. Why officers of the United States? There is no State in the Union that has not stringent laws for the protection of the freedom and purity of the ballot and abundant provision for their enforcement. Every State in the Union is able to take care of her peace and of the elective franchise, and they all do have a free ballot and preserve order in State elections.

Why will not the same appliances produce the same result in elections for members of Congress? The voters are the same who vote in State elections; the police and election officers are the same. The governors of the States all have the power to call out the militia of the State if needed to preserve order and protect every citizen in his right to cast a free ballot. If fraud or intimidation or force, notwithstanding all these safeguards, does have influence in elections, there is yet another remedy, which is thorough—a constitutional provision intended and adopted for the purpose of placing the ultimate control, so far as honest and fair elections and a due observance of law, national as well as State, in choosing Representatives in Congress, are concerned, absolutely in the hands of one branch of the national authority, and which most effectually accomplishes that purpose. The House of Representatives judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, and under the Constitution is empowered to investigate all or any of their elections, to send for persons and papers, and ferret out the fraud, if any has been committed, or the force and intimidation, if any has been used, or any other illegality in the election, and upon a full hearing of all the evidence to give the seat to him who is honestly elected by the popular vote. It is here, in this undisputed power of the House, that the National Government is supreme in its supervisory power over elections, and can enforce perfect obedience to law. This, together with the admitted jurisdiction of the Federal courts to indict and punish all State officers who refuse or fail to obey Federal laws when applicable in holding elections, secures supremacy to the National Government over the whole subject, save and except in prescribing the qualifications of voters and the manner of holding elections.

What more can be desired for the amplest protection of the national interests in the freedom of voters and the purity of elections? Two supervisors, stripped of all power as they should be to use any authority, are still permitted to be at each polling precinct, even if this bill should pass, to watch and scrutinize the election, the count of the ballots, and the entire process of the election from the opening to closing of the polls, and with the same privileges at registration precincts to observe the registration of voters, so as to be able to testify if anything goes wrong. Cannot State officers be relied upon as well as United States officers? Why pay three or four hundred thousand dollars per annum to United States officers for doing that which the States all have provided to have done, and which it is their business, not that of the National Government, to attend to and pay for? Are the States and people unworthy of trust and confidence? If they are, then our Government is already a failure, and the sooner the fact is recognized the better.

But, Mr. President, if the constitutional power to do so was clear and without question, the danger to free institutions in an assumption by Congress of control over elections ought forever to forbid it. As long as the subject remains under control of the States we have nothing to fear. There have been, and will doubtless be again, irregularities and fraud in elections held under State control; but these are of infrequent occurrence, and are inevitable in any free country and under any system, State or national.

The advocates of this exercise of power by the General Government admit that the Constitution confides this subject primarily to the States, and only claim for the National Government the right in extraordinary exigencies. Those most blinded by party prejudice and passion can see that to admit the exercise of this power in towns and cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward involves an admission of the power to exercise it throughout the country; not only that, but to take the elections out of the hands of State officers and appoint Federal officers to hold them, and make returns, if Congress shall so determine, and that a determination to do so would be only a question of time and party exigency. Nor would the change stop there; for whatever of power rests in Congress over elections for members of the House, to the same extent exists in that body over elections for Senators, with the single exception of the places where the elections are to be held. When the necessities of party should require, there would be no scruple in the way of intervening in senatorial elections, and measures looking to the control of these would surely follow. When we remember that the first office in the Republic, the Presidency itself, has been the subject of political prostitution, and been once captured by party legerdemain, despite the expressed will of a majority of the American people, we are not permitted to hope that any other will escape this malign influence when the opportunity for its exercise is given.

All can see that if the General Government shall ever assume and execute such powers as these, and have every election precinct throughout the Republic dominated by supervisors, marshals, and their deputies, and, if desired, with soldiers in addition, all appointed and controlled and commanded by the Administration in power, and the State Legislatures when Senators are to be elected operated upon by similar influences, that congressional elections will be nothing more than a method of registering the will of the Administration, which by this means will perpetuate itself in power and secure a subservient Congress. The President besides being Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and the dispenser of one hundred thousand appointments to other offices, appoints the judges and is himself the executive branch of the Government, and only needs the control of Congress in order to be the focal point of all the powers of government. Such concentration of power is the very essence of despotism, and sooner or later it would come. Of course the danger is not immediate, not visible, but the more sure because not felt or seen. The people must be educated to the processes through which a republican government changes its character and goes into imperialism by slow and easy stages, so as not to be roused to the danger until it is too late to retrieve the loss of their liberties. The Amerian people have been under able tuition in these methods for the last fifteen years, and have proved, unfortunately, apt scholars.

That "history repeats itself" is a very common truism, and history teems with illustrations of the practical wisdom of the sentiment that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." When such a mild-mannered and estimable gentleman as the present Executive can be wrought up to the pitch of defending the use of troops at the polls, and can be induced to violate all the precedents and traditions of the office he holds by vetoing a repeal of an existing law which, after trial, has been found inexpedient as well as unconstitutional, something no President has ever done before, it is not difficult to imagine what an able, bold, unscrupulous, and ambitious man in the executive office will do in the years to come, with the opportunities being prepared for him in the gradual departure from the old landmarks of our Government. The highest wisdom and soundest philosophy, approved by the most authentic teachings of history, warn us that the liberties of a people are safe only in their own keeping, and that a power capable of being used for their overthrow should never be permitted to exist in any human hands. With the power of the States to control the question of suffrage guarded against invasion and secured to them beyond any contingency, the Government will rest on the solid foundation of the intelligence and virtue of the people and direct accountability to them, and popular liberty will be impregnable to assault from any source; but, taken from the States and transferred to the control of the National Government, or, rather, the National Executive, the very shield and sword of free government will have been surrendered, and the people, defenseless, will become the prey of spoilers and the playthings and instruments of personal ambition.

It is charged that violence, intimidation, and fraud in the South necessitate the safeguards provided by the laws we are seeking to repeal, and the halls of Congress have been reverberating for a month past with eloquent denunciations of the disloyalty which it is alleged is at the bottom of these disorders. An examination of the facts will show this charge to be without a particle of foundation, utterly groundless, and a mere pretext. We only seek to repeal so much of the existing election law as creates chief supervisors, &c., and provides for marshals and special deputies, and gives them the great powers alluded to through which the election laws of the States may be nullified, and this portion of the law is operative only in towns and cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward; so that, apart from the assertion of the great principle involved, only the towns and cities of that size will be the practical beneficiaries of the proposed change. The law as it affects towns and cities of less than twenty thousand inhabitants, and the rural districts, is not sought to be changed in any substantial respect. I have before me a tabulated statement of the towns and cities in the United States whose population exceeds twenty thousand, with their populations according to the census of 1870. There are in all seventy-five; and sixty-seven of them, with an aggregate population of 5,661,749, are in the States which adhered to the Government during the civil war, leaving only eight, with an aggregate population of 411,326, in the eleven States of the South which seceded. Mobile in the State of Alabama, Atlanta and Savannah in Georgia, New Orleans in Louisiana, Charleston in South Carolina, Nashville and Memphis in Tennessee, and Richmond in Virginia, are the eight southern cities. Neither Arkansas, Florida, Mississippi, North Carolina, nor Texas in 1870 had a city of twenty thousand inhabitants. The number of towns and cities of that population in the South is, of course, greater now than in 1870, and the same is true of the other States, and I presume the relative proportion is the same.

The population of the South is sparse and chiefly rural, while that of the more densely settled States north congregates in cities, as the figures show. The Attorney-General's report shows that in 1876 the whole amount expended to pay for services of deputy marshals and supervisors in and about the elections was $275,296.60, and of that amount only $44,774.60 was paid for services rendered in the South, while $230,522 was paid for services in six of the Northern States. In 1878, out of an aggregate expenditure for the same purposes of $202,091.09, only $24,639 was expended in the South, while the remaining $177,652 was expended in the same six Northern States. These are stubborn facts, which no amount of florid declamation and fiery sensationalism can conceal. They speak trumpet-tongued of the hollowness and falsity of the pretext on which opposition is made to the passage of this bill. If there is sectionalism at all in repealing the laws concerning elections, and I deny that there is any, it is in favor of the North, where the towns and cities are which are to be benefited.

This, Mr. President, is where the shoe pinches! In the closely contested States of the North, where a few votes decide and give victory and power to one political party or the other, the republican party are unwilling to surrender the vast advantage which an army of ten thousand supervisors and marshals, and their general and special deputies, each an active republican canvasser, gives them. Hence their desperate fight. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] said in his speech a few days ago: "This is a struggle for power; it is a fight for empire;" and he never spoke truer words, as the facts in his own great State show. In the elections of 1876, John I. Davenport, the chief supervisor of elections in the city of New York, had under his command, under authority of the law we are trying to repeal, one thousand and seventy supervisors, besides commissioners, and twenty-five hundred deputy marshals. In the election of 1878, he had under him twelve hundred and twenty-five supervisors, besides commissioners, and thirteen hundred and fifty deputy marshals. This great body of republican partisans, appointed by authority of the Administration at Washington, paid out of the national Treasury, armed with autocratic power, superior to the laws and authorities of the State, with power to arrest "instantly," without warrant, whoever they or either of them may adjudge guilty of an offense, heavy fines and long terms of imprisonment denounced against all who "hinder or obstruct" them in doing what they may decide to be their duty, each with his pockets and hands full of republican ballots, crowding around the polls on election day, terrorizing, threatening, and arresting honest citizens on the very day set apart by the Constitution and laws for the enjoyment of the largest personal liberty, is painfully suggestive of "a fight for empire." If the dust of one of the fathers who, the honorable Senator tells us in such eloquent phrase, came to this continent and founded "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people," could have been reanimated, and he could have witnessed the last November election in New York City, I think he would, in all probability, have concluded that the "fight" had been won, that the era of the "empire" had dawned, and that the days of the people's government he had helped to found had been numbered among the things of the past.

The honorable Senator "builded better than he knew" when he said, "This is a fight for empire." It is a fight by the republican party for the destruction of the rights and powers of the States, for the destruction of local government and home rule, and a transfer of power from the homes of the people, where it is under their control and exercised under their eye, to a grand consolidated government in this capital, where it is beyond their reach, out of their sight, not subject to their influence or command, and is grasped by lobbies and rings and corporations and monopolies and classes, by capital and associated wealth, and turned from its legitimate purpose to the spoliation and robbery and enslavement of the great mass of the people to whom it belongs. The corruptions, the extravagance, and the usurpations of largely irresponsible power, inevitable attendants of centralized government, lead as naturally to imperialism as the germinating seed in a generous soil leads to the full-grown plant. It is this tendency to consolidation, to imperialism, to the "empire," which the democratic party has ever combated, and is in this contest combating, by contending for a strict adherence to the Constitution in all its parts, by guarding the reserved powers of the States as well as the grant of power to the National Government, and taking care of local powers and the personal rights of the citizens when invaded by Federal authority.

Upon the issue thus joined we appeal with confidence to the country to hold up the hands of the democratic party, which in this "fight for empire" is aligned on the side of the people, is maintaining the spirit and genius of American constitutional government as inspired by the founders of the Republic, and is standing like a lion in the path of those who are assailing the fundamental guarantees of popular liberty. I for one have no fears of the result. Sectional prejudice and partisan zeal may for a brief period becloud the judgment of the people; but their sober second thought will, as it has ever done in great national crises, come speedily to the rescue, and, with impartial judgment, give victory to the right and "honor to whom honor is due."

Mr. BECK. I believe it is hardly worth while to attempt to go on with the bill further to-day, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator move for an executive session?

Mr. BECK. I will withdraw my motion if any Senator desires an executive session.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 12, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. COX. I rise to a question connected with the publication of the RECORD. I see that a petition presented on Saturday last by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCOID] is published in the RECORD in extenso. I think the petition is an insult to Congress and ought never to have been received—hardly even by its deposit in the box. I do not propose to quote from the petition; but every member can see what it is—a bitter attack upon and gross misrepresentation of members of this Congress. I know, Mr. Speaker, that I objected to the petition being read; and it could not have been printed except by unanimous consent, unless it was read. I think that this sort of practice ought to be stopped in time.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD will be corrected.

Mr. SAPP. What petition does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. COX. One that got into the RECORD without authority.

The SPEAKER. The petition referred to is one presented by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCOID.]

Mr. SAPP. I do not remember the circumstances myself; but I think, before any action is taken on this matter, my colleague [Mr. MCCOID] ought to be present and have an opportunity to be heard in relation to it. I believe my colleague understood that although the petition was not allowed to be read, it might be published in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states that he objected to its introduction.

Mr. COX. Several of us objected.

Mr. SAPP. My colleague withdrew the request to have it read, and consent was given to the printing.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That was my understanding.

Mr. COX. I made objection all the time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It was not so understood on this side.

The SPEAKER. If objection was made to its being read, of course it could not go into the RECORD.

Mr. SAPP. My understanding was that there was unanimous consent that it might be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states to the contrary. The present occupant of the chair was not then in the chair.

Mr. SAPP. I see that my colleague is coming in, and he can speak for himself in the matter.

Mr. COX. The reading was begun and I objected; leave was asked to put it in the RECORD, and I then objected. There was some confusion, and perhaps gentlemen on the other side did not hear the objection.

Mr. MCCOID. I think there was no objection. I believe that the RECORD states the matter correctly. The gentleman from New York was on the floor to introduce something of his own, and his attention was engaged at the time with a resolution which he submitted and had referred. The petition was in the hands of the Clerk at the time that the gentleman introduced his resolution. Consent was given to the printing of the petition.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] states as a fact that he objected, the Chair must recognize that, because the petition could only get in by unanimous consent.

Mr. MCCOID. Mr. Speaker, one word. I will read the statement of the matter as given in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent. The effect of the reading would be to get the petition again in the RECORD.

Mr. SAPP. The RECORD shows that unanimous consent was given to the printing of the petition, the Speaker pro tempore stating that he heard no objection.

Mr. COX. I want to correct the RECORD in that respect.

Mr. MCCOID. I am not going to read the petition at all, but simply what took place in connection with it:

Mr. MCCOID. I ask unanimous consent to have read at the Clerk's desk a petition.

Mr. DUNNELL. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A petition to the Senate and House of the Forty-sixth Congress, Washington, District of Columbia.

"Your petitioners, citizens and constituents"——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a petition and can come in by being deposited in the petition-box.

Mr. MCCOID. No, sir; it is not intended for reference; it is a petition directed to the House. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Several MEMBERS. What is it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to printing the petition in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

The petition is as follows:

That is a correct statement, Mr. Speaker, of what occurred. I will say upon the merits of the petition that it is not one that could go to a committee to be acted upon. It is not designed for reference. It is a petition directed immediately to the House for its action. A reference of it would simply deny to the people the right of petition—would silence their voice upon a question on which they ought to be heard by the House. It was not a petition for a bill—not a petition for action upon any subject by a committee. It was a petition to this House asking us to transact the business for which we were called here and go home, without disturbing the country by vexatious questions that ought not to be agitated during this extra session of Congress. The petition ought to have been read and printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to suggest that but limited debate is in order.

Mr. COX. I would like to answer what has fallen from the gentleman from Iowa. This petition is one that never ought to have been received here. It is an insult to the House. It accuses us of violence, extravagance, revolutionary conduct, &c., in language which I will not quote—which would never have been allowed to be printed in the RECORD, had the petition been read or its purport understood. To refuse the reading and printing of a petition does not interfere with the right of petition as fixed by the rules. Petitions, by the rules, come in through the box. It is only by the grace of the House, by its unanimity, that petitions can be printed in the RECORD if not read. And although it may be recorded here that no objection was heard, yet I am confirmed by several gentlemen around me that objection was made, not by me alone but by several gentlemen, audibly made. It may not have been heard on the other side of the House, but it was made, and the right of each member to protest against insults should be regarded.

Mr. SAPP. Why did not the Speaker hear the objection when it was made?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker was not in the chair at the time.

Mr. MCCOID. It is the first time in the history of the country that I understand the House could be insulted by the people petitioning it.

Mr. COX. That depends upon what sort of insult it is.

Mr. MCCOID. It would be an insult to the people of the country to have a petition of this character put into the box and smothered.

Mr. COX. It is the first time the House was ever so insulted.

Mr. MCCOID. Why your own State of New York has by its Legislature used language equivalent to that in a memorial to this House.

A MEMBER. No; in a joint resolution.

Mr. MCCOID. The resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, if the gentleman will refer to the RECORD, is more insulting than this petition. Why was not the gentleman then so sensitive?

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to a point of order. Is this discussion in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states on his responsibility as a member that he objected to the reception and printing in the RECORD of the petition. The Chair so understands, and the RECORD should be corrected.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it so happened that I was presiding at the time as Speaker pro tempore. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD states the facts correctly, as I understand them. I read from the RECORD:

Mr. MCCOID. I ask unanimous consent to have read at the Clerk's desk a petition.

Mr. DUNNELL. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A petition to the Senate and House of the Forty-sixth Congress, Washington, District of Columbia.

"Your petitioners, citizens and constituents"——

Mr. COX. I object to the reading of that petition and putting it upon the record in that way.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not propose to read it. I am only reading from the RECORD to show what occurred:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a petition and can come in by being deposited in the petition-box.

Mr. MCCOID. No, sir; it is not intended for reference; it is a petition directed to the House. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Several MEMBERS. What is it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to printing the petition in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

It was submitted whether there was objection or not. The Chair at that time heard none. I do not doubt the statement of the gentleman from New York that he did make objection, although the Chair did not hear it. The correction certainly ought to be made as proposed.

Mr. SAPP. I ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. Was not the reading of the petition asked for?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes; and objected to.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from New York rose in my hearing and distinctly objected to the reception and printing of the petition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not hear the remark of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. I was present on last Saturday and heard the gentleman from New York distinctly object to the reception and printing of this petition. Several objections were made to the introduction of the petition. The gentleman from New York made objection and he insisted upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no official knowledge of the presentation of this petition upon the Journal. The RECORD will be accordingly corrected.

Mr. CONGER. How will it be corrected?

The SPEAKER. By inserting the objection and by striking the petition from the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. Then I desire to have read what is proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the reading of what the Chair orders to be taken out of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question of correction to the House.

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; the Chair will submit the question to the House whether the paper shall be read or not.

Mr. MCCOOK. Before that is done, I desire to call the Speaker's attention to a remark which occurred in the Forty-fifth Congress in which my colleague who has just objected to the printing of this petition and myself had some little controversy, and the Speaker said distinctly and explicitly that he had no power over the correction of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Under such construction the RECORD could be filled with errors and there would be no remedy on the part of the House.

Mr. MCCOOK. Certainly not.

Mr. CONGER. You can correct the Journal, but not the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is constantly corrected.

Mr. CONGER. By consent of members.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to submit the question to the House whether on the demand of the gentleman from Michigan this paper shall be read.

Mr. CONGER. And on this I wish to make some remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Rule 141.

The Clerk read as follows:

141. When the reading of a paper is called for and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask whether that is a debatable question?

The SPEAKER. The order of business is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. I ask whether a motion to strike from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a part of it is not debatable?

The SPEAKER. The order of business is not debatable; and the Chair is now willing to submit the question to the House whether this petition, as demanded by the gentleman from Michigan, shall be read.

Mr. HAWK. For the information of members, may not this petition be read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes that members have generally read it.

Mr. HAWK. I do not know what it is we are called upon to vote on. I desire to have it read.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the ruling of the Chair distinctly——

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the order of business is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair state what he understands by the order of business? I do not know what rule there is about the order of business.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. This paper is not before the House, for its approval or disapproval; it is not presented here for any action of the House. Therefore, it is not such a paper as any gentleman has any right to call for the reading of; unless by unanimous consent, it cannot be read. The Chair has already stated that this petition is improperly printed in the RECORD, objection having been made on Saturday. Now the request to have it printed is again renewed. One objection is sufficient to prevent that; and I submit to the Chair that it is not a question that can be submitted to the House as to whether the paper shall be printed in the RECORD or not; for the reason that one objection is sufficient to prevent its being printed. It is not a part of any gentleman's speech; it is not a part of any proceedings of the House; it is not a question on which we are called upon to vote; and it is not such a paper that the reading of it if called for can be allowed except by unanimous consent. And I object to submitting the question to the House whether this shall be read or not.

The SPEAKER. Here is a question as to the correctness of the RECORD, and it is proposed to correct it; the allegation being that there has been placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD something that does not appear in the Journal, and the printing of which was not permitted by the House. Now, the Chair has no other remedy than to submit the question of correction to the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is this a proposition to correct the Journal or the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. It is to correct the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is that a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always allowed the RECORD to be corrected when a member stated it did not properly record the proceedings.

Mr. SPRINGER. A gentleman may rise to a question of privilege, and correct any statement in the RECORD which does him injustice. He may also do so where a speech has been printed by unanimous consent when it could only be printed by unanimous consent, and where personal allusion has been made in such a speech.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that this paper could only have been printed by unanimous consent, and that is the reason why he entertains the proposition to correct the RECORD, for the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] both state there were objections made to the introduction and printing of the paper in the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it go out and that is the end of it. If any gentleman now calls for the reading of the paper for the purpose of putting it into the RECORD one objection is sufficient to keep it out.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has permitted the gentleman from Illinois to discuss this question, and I desire now to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear anything on the point of order.

Mr. WAIT. Will the Chair state what it is we are called upon to vote on? What is it that is proposed to be stricken from the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut will wait a moment till the gentleman from Michigan gets through.

Mr. CONGER. The Speaker has proposed to submit to the House the question whether this paper shall be read.

The SPEAKER. Under rule 141, which has been read.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair proposes to submit the question whether the paper shall now be read. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] says that is not a proper question to submit to the House, and makes a point of order on that. It is to that point of order I speak, and not to the ruling of the Chair. The RECORD, which is all that comes to the members and all that goes to the country of what is in the Journal and of the additional things which are done here—the RECORD shows that this paper, it was proposed on Saturday, should be read by the Clerk; that there were objections to its reading, and that the gentleman presenting it asked that it be printed in the RECORD; that the then Speaker of this House asked if there were objections, and the then Speaker pro tempore declared publicly that there were no objections, and it was printed.

Now, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] rise in their places this morning and contradict the RECORD. The Speaker pro tempore of this House rises in his place and reads the RECORD, and says that that is a true account of the proceeding, just exactly as it occurred; that he did ask for objections; that no objections were heard; that he did state, there being no objection, the paper should be printed in the RECORD.

Now, sir, I leave that question of veracity between the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman who occupied the chair, [Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia,] and between the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and the then Speaker pro tempore of the House; it is not for me to settle that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I beg leave to correct the gentleman. I did not pretend to say that there was any question of veracity between the gentleman on my left and myself. There was no question of veracity at all. The gentlemen say that they heard objections made. I said that if they made objection I was unaware that they made it. The objection did not reach the ear of the Chair, and in justice to myself I must say that it did not reach the ear of any of the officials at the desk, or the reporter who was taking down the proceedings, but we all know that objections are made which do not reach the Chair in the confusion attending adjournment. On the contrary I have no doubt that objection was made, but it did not reach the ear of the Speaker pro tempore or the reporter who was reporting at the time.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I merely alluded to that to say that if we are to take the opinions of members, of what takes place, against the RECORD, against the decision of the Speaker, against the report of the reporters who are so careful as to put down all, even the slightest interruption which may be made in a speech, and every remark, then there is no limit beyond which the RECORD may not be corrected. But, sir, you will find upon page 212 of the Manual the following proposition:

It is not a privileged question to correct a report in the Globe.

Or as now in the RECORD; and then follows in brackets:

[It is usual, however, for the Speaker to entertain, by unanimous consent, such questions immediately after the reading of the Journal is concluded.]

Now, if that be any authority, it is not a privileged question to correct this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never said it was other than a personal or representative privilege.

Mr. CONGER. Not being a privileged question, it can only be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It is rather late to object now, after the matter has been discussed for half an hour.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, no! it is never too late to do right. I have heard that said frequently. I have heard the present occupant of the chair in the earlier and better days of the Republic make the same remark. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has great hopes of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. Unanimous consent is required, and I stood ready the moment unanimous consent was asked to object, and I informed the Chair; and if the Chair will put the question now whether there be unanimous consent and unanimous consent be given, then I think the Chair was justified in having the RECORD corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not hold that it requires unanimous consent. It is a right of individual members of this House to be correctly reported.

Mr. CONGER. Ah! to be correctly reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] states that he did object, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD does not contain his objection. The Chair thinks he has the right to have the words "I object" inserted.

Mr. CONGER. If that be all, I have no objection; but the proposition is to strike from the record of Congress a part of its proceedings; and if the majority may strike out one part of the proceedings from the RECORD, they may strike out any part they choose. Why, sir, they may prevent the people of the United States from knowing what kind of proceedings are carried on in this House, and that everybody on this side of the House would consider a sad calamity to the people of the country. The attempt, Mr. Speaker, is to strike from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a part of the printed record of the proceedings of this House; and if the Chair will submit that to the majority, you take from the Chair, who is made properly the guardian of our record, the responsibility and give it to a majority of the members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Notwithstanding the reading of the Manual quoted, the Chair has during his term—and he learned the practice from his predecessors—submitted motions for the correction of the RECORD; and the Chair thinks that even the gentleman from Michigan has needed such correction very often.

Mr. CONGER. The correction has generally been administered directly by the Chair. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertained the motion of the gentleman from New York. The reporters of the RECORD who take down the proceedings are officers of this House, and their reports are under the review of the House, of course, just as the Journal is under the review of the House. The Chair has never yet during his experience heard it questioned that a member had a right to correct the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD where it did not correctly report him. The Chair will submit the question of the correction of the RECORD to the House.

Mr. CONGER. Would not that correction properly be in to-day's RECORD, and not be erasing or striking out a part of yesterday's RECORD?

The SPEAKER. It is well known that a small number of copies of the daily RECORD, three or five or some other number, is each morning furnished to every member. When the proceedings published in the RECORD are stereotyped for binding and circulation in that form, the errors which are contained in the daily RECORD and which have been corrected are omitted from the bound volumes of the RECORD. It is the province of the House to correct the record of its proceedings and debates, and it ought to have the right to do that.

Mr. CONGER. Then what question does the Chair propose to submit to the House?

The SPEAKER. First, whether the RECORD shall be corrected as proposed.

Mr. CONGER. To-day's RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the question and will submit it to the House.

Mr. COX. I ask the House to permit my objection and that of my friend from Texas and the objections of others to be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. There is no objection to that from anybody that I know of.

Mr. COX. The gentleman always tries to get the last word. I want to say something about this matter myself. If my objection is recorded, what is the consequence? It enables me to assert my right to keep out of the RECORD anything that may be unknown or that may be disrespectful or insulting to the House. And as a consequence of my objection and the insertion of that objection in the RECORD this petition is not before the House, it is not in the RECORD, and the reporter is bound to leave it out of the stereotyped copy of the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. That is a very different proposition. The Chair will decide whether an objection made afterward is to be taken as if made on Saturday, and is to operate to disfigure and destroy the recorded actions of this House.

The SPEAKER. The remark of the gentleman might lead the House to suppose that a motion to strike out from the RECORD was something new. That has been constantly done. The Chair recollects very distinctly when a Representative from the State of Ohio, Mr. Mungen, had printed in the RECORD, or the Globe as it was then, a speech which contained reflections upon a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, and the House deliberately, and by a nearly unanimous vote, if the Chair recollects aright, struck out from that speech the offensive statements in regard to that Senator.

Mr. CONGER. Probably because no one objected.

Mr. COX. Yes they did.

Mr. CONGER. If the RECORD is to be corrected at all, it is to be corrected by a solemn act of this House expunging from it certain portions, as was done in the case of the resolution in regard to General Jackson, and as has been done in two or three other cases by expunging resolutions from the records of the House. Now, if it is to follow by the construction of the Speaker that this petition is to be stricken from the copies of the RECORD which are to be bound in volumes, then I demand that it be read so that we may know what is to be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there is no objection to the correction of the RECORD in the manner as stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. CONGER. I object if the consequences follow——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make a conditional objection.

Mr. CONGER. Then I object to it entirely.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House.

Mr. REED. I recollect that there was an instance where the actual result of a vote in the House was changed by a correction of the Journal, which erred in not recording the vote of a member from the State of Maine. That was done some time ago, and I think the correction in that way was made, not by striking out what occurred upon the day when the mistake was made, but by making the next record so as to contain the true proceedings, and thereby affecting and changing the result as improperly recorded. So it seems to me that in this case the proper course to be pursued by the House is not to strike out what actually occurred, what was recorded in the record of the proceedings, but the record of to-day's proceedings should be so made up as to show the corrected condition of the proceedings. It is in that way that the correction should be made, and not by striking out any of the record of the proceedings of a preceding day. I believe that the word of a member should be taken when he states how he voted, for instance, the record to the contrary notwithstanding. The correction should be made in the proceedings of to-day. The daily RECORD of our proceedings ought not to be corrected by striking out anything of a preceding day's RECORD. I think I am correct in that.

Mr. REAGAN. The question before the House is not a question of expunging a portion of the proceedings of the House. If a thing is not legally or properly done, or if it is improperly done, it is not done at all. The objection shows that it was not done according to the rules of procedure in this House. Therefore the proposition is not to strike out anything that was done, but simply to correct the RECORD to show what actually was or was not done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read a decision made by the House exactly in point.

The Clerk read as follows:

WEDNESDAY, July 8, 1846.

The Journal of yesterday having been read,

Mr. Tibbatts moved "to correct the same by omitting all proceedings in relation to the call of the House, moved by Mr. Dromgoole, following the decision of the Speaker upon the resolution offered by Mr. McKay, requiring absentees to render excuses for their absence whenever they shall next appear in the House."

And, after debate,

The previous question was moved by Mr. Barclay Martin, and seconded; and the main question was ordered and stated, namely, Shall the Journal be corrected as proposed by Mr. Tibbatts? when

Mr. Brockenbrough raised the question of order, that the Journal of yesterday was made up in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, and was true in point of fact, and being true, could not be altered unless shown to be untrue.

The Speaker overruled the point of order on the ground that the Constitution does not specify the manner in which the Journal shall be kept, and the House has the control thereof, and may judge what are and what are not proceedings.

From this decision of the Speaker, Mr. Brockenbrough appealed.

And the question being put, Shall the decision stand as the judgment of the House?

It was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the Chair stated as a precedent that in a former Congress a majority of the House of Representatives had ordered a portion of a member's speech to be stricken from the RECORD. Lest the Chair's recognition of the action at this time may be taken as a precedent, I desire to recall to the recollection of the honorable Speaker an incident in the Forty-fifth Congress in reference to the investigation of charges against John W. Polk. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] had made a speech, and had certain papers read as part of his speech. It was moved upon the other side of the House that a certain portion of his speech be stricken from the RECORD. The Chair distinctly stated at that time, unless my memory is very much at fault, that it was not within the power of the House to take from the RECORD a portion of a member's speech without his consent; and as the gentleman who made the speech objected, the Chair ruled that the House had no power over the matter. I state this now; and if I am wrong I want to be corrected. As I recollect the circumstances, the case would seem to be in conflict with the precedent stated by the Speaker a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. The Chair proposes to submit this question to the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not state this case in antagonism to the proposition of the Chair at the present time, but only to put one precedent against the other.

The SPEAKER. If not offensive the language ought to remain in a member's speech. The Chair proposes to submit the question to the House because he believes the House has control over its RECORD and its Journal.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, the case in point and the one cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] are not analogous. In the case referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts a speech had been made and it went properly into the RECORD. But the question here is, did this petition get properly into the RECORD? It certainly did not if any member objected. It is true the Speaker pro tempore says he declared he heard no objection; and I know that is so, for I heard him say it. But I know that at the same time I heard the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] and some others object. I noticed the objection at the time; but the Speaker pro tempore did not hear it. Now, has the gentleman from New York the right to come in now and ask that his objection be entered in the RECORD? If so, of course it excludes the petition.

In regard to the petition itself, I wish to say that I think we are making a very great fuss about a little thing. I see nothing in the petition to justify it.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair had his own volition about the matter, he would allow the petition to stay where it is and go for what it is worth. But the Chair is governed by the rules of the House, and therefore he prefers, as he thinks properly, to submit the question to the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to state, in all frankness, that if the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Texas are allowed (and he thinks they ought to be allowed) to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the fact that they did object, then the petition goes out necessarily, because it could not be there in the face of the objection without a palpable contradiction on the face of the RECORD.

Mr. ROBESON. I wish to ask the Chair for his opinion on a question which may be of importance in the future. When the Chair asks for objections, is an objection which is not heard by the Chair, and which he declares he does not hear, an objection?

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair has uniformly taken the word of a member in matters of this kind. When a member has stated that he objected, even though the objection was not heard, the Chair has recognized it upon the single statement of such member.

Mr. ROBESON. But that is not the point. Of course the Chair must take the word of a member, but the question is, in legislative proceedings, where the Chair is to be the ultimate judge and the action of the House is to be taken upon that judgment, when the Chair says, "I hear no objection," and the objection is not then presented and pressed, is it to be considered as actually made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question in the future when, as the gentleman suggests, it may arise. But the Chair will state (and gentlemen on all sides of the House will confirm his statement) that whenever a member has risen and stated that he did object, although not heard, the Chair has uniformly recognized the objection, and in view of that objection has often arrested and traversed the proceedings.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Let me state to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] that these proceedings took place during the last few moments preceding the adjournment of the House; three-fourths of the members were on their feet or clapping their hands to call pages, &c. Consequently there was so much confusion that it was impossible for the Chair or for members of the House generally to hear the objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask whether the question to be submitted to the House is whether the objection made by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Texas is to be inserted in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. As there is some contradiction in reference to a question of fact, and as the present occupant of the chair was absent, he proposes to submit the question to the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I want to understand the form in which it is to be submitted. I think that what I have just stated is the proper question and the only question to be submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentlemen who said they objected are to be allowed to have the RECORD corrected, then of course the objection will appear, and necessarily the petition is excluded from any subsequent publication of the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. So I understand. Then the question to be submitted is, whether the objection made by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Texas shall be entered on the record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits the question whether the gentleman——

Mr. ROBESON. One question, Mr. Speaker, first, as to the operation of this.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. ROBESON. The record is as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to printing the petition in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

Does that come out?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the whole proceeding should go out of the RECORD. Otherwise it would not contain sense.

Mr. ROBESON. But the Speaker pro tempore did actually say it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the petition be read which the Chair decides shall go out of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided anything in regard to it. The Chair has stated the practice and the effect.

Mr. COX. I object to the reading of any petition. I object to doing indirectly what cannot be done directly.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the reading of that petition before I vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question before the gentleman makes his speech.

Mr. CONGER. Before I vote I wish to have that petition read.

Mr. COX. I wish to mention as a matter of fact——

Mr. McLANE. I desire before the question is submitted to call the attention of the House to the fact that objection was heard at the desk, and this petition is not on the Journal of the House because the clerks heard the objection and excluded it therefrom. And if the clerks heard the objection and excluded this petition from the Journal, I do not suppose there is any gentleman upon this floor who will question the right of the House to strike it from the RECORD. It is not only a question of correcting the RECORD, for the correction of the RECORD by the insertion of the words "I object" necessarily excludes the petition. As the fact is that the objection was heard at the desk, and as the petition is not on the Journal, how can the gentleman resist the right of a member to have his objection entered, and how can he resist the logical consequence of that action?

The SPEAKER. It does not necessarily exclude it from the attention of the House or one of its committees, because it could go to the petition-box and be referred in the ordinary way under the rule.

Mr. COX. Of course it will not be excluded from the petition-box.

The SPEAKER. It is only excluded from the RECORD because objected to.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make a remark. If that be so; if the gentleman from Maryland is correct, then if I objected to a report here——

Mr. McLANE. I have not yielded the floor

Mr. CONGER. One word. I wish the gentleman to answer me. If I objected to a bill requiring unanimous consent, if it comes before the House, if it passes the House and is sent to the Senate, and if a law is enacted in consequence and it is signed by the President, if I was absent the next morning and for several mornings afterward, and when I return rise in my place and say "I did object to the introduction of that proposition, although the RECORD did not show it," then, as a natural consequence, all that was done, all that followed, is of no account, if my action be admitted; then the law falls, the action of the House, the action of the Senate, the action of the President, if he signed the bill, and in effect I nullify a law that has been passed. That is the inevitable result, if the gentleman from Maryland is correct.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, I was about continuing to make this appeal——

Mr. CONGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought he had taken his seat.

Mr. McLANE. Not at all. I wish to make this appeal to the House. If that objection had been heard the petition would have gone to the table. I ask this House, then, if it had gone by mistake on the Journal of yesterday, the objection not having been heard, could it not be stricken from the Journal when the correction of the Journal took place? It would be stricken out on the correction of the Journal of the previous day's proceedings; and when the objection of the gentleman from New York is entered upon the Journal, then necessarily the petition is excluded; and although one or two copies of the Journal may have been printed for the convenience of members or of the officers of the House, that would not interfere with the correction of the official Journal which is bound and preserved in the archives of the Government.

Mr. REED. Permit me to state to the gentleman from Maryland that this is not a question of the correction of the Journal, but a question of the correction of the RECORD. Now, the RECORD states exactly what occurred. There is no trouble about it.

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman will understand I am arguing from analogy. I said if the Journal had been corrected this morning by the entry of objection of the gentleman from New York, then nobody would have protested against it.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman allow me one minute?

Mr. McLANE. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS. In reply to the gentleman from Maine, I will say that the RECORD is exactly correct as far as it goes. But the gentleman from New York, the gentleman from Texas, and some others did say "I object" after the Speaker pro tempore said "The Chair hears no objection." Now, the proposition of the gentleman from New York is simply to have that statement inserted after the Speaker pro tempore said "The Chair hears no objection."

Mr. REED. But the gentleman asks, in addition, to have stricken out the declaration of the Speaker pro tempore that he heard no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not understand it that way.

Mr. REED. That is the trouble. If the gentleman only wanted to have inserted the words "I object," to be followed by the legal consequence of keeping that petition from the consideration of the House, that is one proposition; but he does more than that, he seeks to have kept out from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what actually took place.

The SPEAKER. The petition was not read, as the Chair is advised.

Mr. REED. The petition was not read in full, but it was partly read, and is entirely printed.

Mr. McLANE. This is not a question of expunging something by order of the House; it is that nothing shall be done but what is strictly in accordance with the law of the House, which is that a petition to which objection is taken shall not appear either on the Journal or on the RECORD. In this respect the Journal and the RECORD are in perfect analogy. The power the House has over its Journal it certainly has over its RECORD, and, as the Speaker has stated, that power it has uniformly exercised. Now, when I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the objection had been heard at the desk, and that the petition was not upon the Journal, I think nobody would desire to force it on the RECORD. It is no invasion of the right of petition; it is preposterous to suppose that because we do not receive a petition, it being objected to, and our rules allowing the objection, it is an invasion of the right of petition. For one, there is no matter that I do not recognize the right of the people to petition for. A decently and respectfully expressed petition, no matter on what topic, whether it criticises the conduct of this House in proper terms, or whether it criticises the conduct of any other legislative body of this country, would be by me received, supposing it was a petition in fact, supposing it was an exercise of that right which is the right of the people under the Constitution. But if the paper treated the House with contempt and disrespect no man would receive it.

I am not arguing the question of the merits of this paper; I am not called upon to say whether it is insulting or not. I make no such point. The only point I make, and I make it in all candor, is whether that petition under our rule should be on the Journal, or on the RECORD; and it is not parliamentary, it is not fair for gentlemen on the other side to attempt to put it there against the rule. The point is perfectly distinct. The paper has no right to be on the Journal if objected to at the time of presentation; it has no right to be on the RECORD, if objected to. It was objected to. When the RECORD is corrected by the objection of the gentleman from New York being entered upon it, the paper will not appear. I hope the House will give the gentleman from New York the privilege of having his objection entered, and then the law of the House will exclude the petition, and not the vote of the House.

Mr. McCOID. I wish to ask a question for the purpose of getting at the facts in this matter. I ask the gentlemen who say they made the objection, whether their address to the Speaker was recognized and the objection made after the question was put by the Speaker, "Is there objection to printing the petition in the RECORD?" I ask if the members who now state that they objected, rose in their seats, obtained the attention of the Chair, were recognized, and then objected?

The SPEAKER. If they had been recognized the statement by the Chair that he heard no objection would of course not be there.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask did the gentleman from Iowa not hear me object? Did he not sit down in confusion on hearing me object?

Mr. McCOID. No, sir. And more than that the gentleman from New York himself was on the floor asking unanimous consent and he was not likely to make an objection to another gentleman asking unanimous consent.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York that while the gentleman from Iowa was making his request I stood near him. After the statement by the Chair he turned round supposing there was no objection and started away, and I supposed as others did that the petition would be printed.

Mr. COX. Do you impugn my statement?

Mr. HUMPHREY. No, sir.

Mr. COX. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to say that he thinks a member should have the right to have that which is wrong in the RECORD as to himself corrected, and it is hardly competent for the House to prevent his being properly placed before his constituents, the House, and the country.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The gentleman from New York asks if I deny his statement. I was simply stating what I thought would convince him that the gentleman from Iowa was acting in good faith.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never reflected on the gentleman.

Mr. COX. Nor I either. Have I not the right to have the RECORD corrected?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Why, then, do you discriminate between one member and another?

Mr. DUNNELL. The proposition on which we have to vote is that the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Texas shall be allowed to have entered on the RECORD their objection. The Chair has informed the House that as a result of that this petition and other matter will be stricken out. Now, is it not proper and right for us to know how much of the RECORD it is proposed to strike out and have that read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question. And in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, as showing the correctness of the Chair's position that a member has the right to have the RECORD corrected, the Chair will state he recollects that that gentleman himself asked to have the RECORD of a former Congress, or a former session of same Congress, corrected.

Mr. REED. Not by striking out a portion of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The only way it could be done would be by a correction of the former publication.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Do I understand the Chair to refer to my asking for a correction?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I did not ask for any correction.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did upon the vote on the Potter bill. He asked a correction in this very same way.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Ah, that occurred in this way: my attention was called to the fact that I was recorded as voting in a certain way, and I stated that I did not vote in that way.

The SPEAKER. It is a protection to every member of the House, without regard to which side of the House he belongs, to have the right to correct the RECORD, and the question is upon allowing the gentleman from New York to insert his objection.

Mr. CONGER. I must ask for the yeas and nays on that proposition. If you adopt this course in this case you may strike out the whole record.

The SPEAKER. It is not a question as to striking out the record, but it is a question as to whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and other gentlemen who objected shall be correctly reported.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was put upon ordering the yeas and nays; and on a division there were—ayes 17, noes 95.

So (one-fifth of the members present not voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were not ordered and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair congratulates the minority of the House upon the result because the individual right to correct Journal and RECORD is a great protection to the minority.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum voted. If the Chair is in such haste to congratulate us I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will order tellers. The question is upon ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] shall have the right to insert the words that he used at the time, "I object."

Mr. REED. It does not strike out anything I understand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a vote on this question does not strike anything out.

Mr. REED. Then there would be a further question upon striking out.

The SPEAKER. No, there will not. The Chair will then direct the RECORD to be corrected.

Mr. REED. If any portion of the RECORD is to be stricken out I would like the Chair to indicate what portion of the RECORD would be stricken out in consequence of this vote.

The SPEAKER. The petition.

Mr. REED. Nothing but the petition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, upon reflection, thinks that the words that follow would remain in as a part of the RECORD, because the RECORD will show that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCOID] did ask to present a petition and the then occupant of the chair asked if there was objection, and it now appears there was objection.

Mr. REED. Then will the statement of the then occupant of the chair, that he heard no objection, go out?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks on careful reflection that it would not, but that it would simply be the petition that would go out, that the fact that the gentleman stated that he desired to present the petition would be of record.

Mr. CONGER. Then the statement of the Speaker pro tempore that he did hear objection would have to be inserted in place of the statement that he did not hear objection.

Mr. STEPHENS. Allow me one moment. I think the RECORD ought to stand just as it is, simply inserting the objection that the Chair did not hear, and then of course the petition goes out.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is made that no quorum voted.

Mr. CONGER. If the decision of the Chair is that the correction will appear in the RECORD containing to-day's proceedings I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to mislead any one; nor does he want to mislead the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] although he thinks he is well enlightened on the subject. The Chair wants to say that the effect of the insertion of the words "I object" would necessarily take out the petition.

Mr. CONGER. Would that alter the decision of the then occupant of the chair where he said "I hear no objection?"

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with that.

Mr. CONGER and Mr. COX were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 14, noes 111.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw the call for a further division, although I am opposed to such a change of the RECORD of yesterday.

Mr. COX. The gentleman may want to use the power of correction himself.

The SPEAKER. It is a protection to all sides and all members.

So the motion of Mr. COX was agreed to.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VETO OF ELECTION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

After careful consideration of the bill entitled "An act to prohibit military interference at elections," I return it to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with the following objections to its approval:

In the communication sent to the House of Representatives on the 29th of last month, returning to the House without my approval the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," I endeavored to show by quotations from the statutes of the United States now in force, and by a brief statement of facts in regard to recent elections in the several States, that no additional legislation was necessary to prevent interference with the elections by the military or naval forces of the United States. The fact was presented in that communication that at the time of the passage of the act of June 18, 1878, in relation to the employment of the Army as a posse comitatus or otherwise, it was maintained by its friends that it would establish a vital and fundamental principle which would secure to the people protection against a standing army. The fact was also referred to that, since the passage of this act, congressional, State, and municipal elections have been held throughout the Union, and that in no instance has complaint been made of the presence of United States soldiers at the polls.

Holding as I do the opinion that any military interference whatever at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and would tend to destroy the freedom of elections, and sincerely desiring to concur with Congress in all of its measures, it is with very great regret that I am forced to the conclusion that the bill before me is not only unnecessary to prevent such interference, but is a dangerous departure from long-settled and important constitutional principles.

The true rule as to the employment of military force at the elections is not doubtful. No intimidation or coercion should be allowed to control or influence citizens in the exercise of their right to vote, whether it appears in the shape of combinations of evil-disposed persons, or of armed bodies of the militia of a State, or of the military force of the United States.

The elections should be free from all forcible interference, and, as far as practicable, from all apprehension of such interference. No soldiers, either of the Union or of the State militia, should be present at the polls to take the place or to perform the duties of the ordinary civil police force. There has been and will be no violation of this rule under orders from me during this administration. But there should be no denial of the right of the National Government to employ its military force on any day and at any place in case such employment is necessary to enforce the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The bill before me is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful to bring to, or employ at any place where a general or special election is being held in a State, any part of the Army or Navy of the United States, unless such force be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to enforce section 4, article 4, of the Constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, on application of the Legislature or executive of the State where such force is to be used; and so much of all laws as is inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed.

It will be observed that the bill exempts from the general prohibition against the employment of military force at the polls two specified cases. These exceptions recognize and concede the soundness of the principle that military force may properly and constitutionally be used at the place of elections, when such use is necessary to enforce the Constitution and the laws. But the excepted cases leave the prohibition so extensive and far-reaching that its adoption will seriously impair the efficiency of the executive department of the Government.

The first act expressly authorizing the use of military power to execute the laws was passed almost as early as the organization of the Government under the Constitution, and was approved by President Washington May 2, 1792. It is as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, the same being notified to the President of the United States by an associate justice or the district judge, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed. And if the militia of a State where such combination may happen shall refuse, or be insufficient to suppress the same, it shall be lawful for the President, if the Legislature of the United States be not in session, to call forth and employ such numbers of the militia of any other State or States most convenient thereto as may be necessary; and the use of militia, so to be called forth, may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the ensuing session.

In 1795 this provision was substantially re-enacted in a law which repealed the act of 1792. In 1807 the following act became the law by the approval of President Jefferson:

That in all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval force of the United States as shall be judged necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect.

By this act it will be seen that the scope of the law of 1795 was extended so as to authorize the National Government to use not only the militia but the Army and Navy of the United States in "causing the laws to be duly executed."

The important provision of the acts of 1792, 1795, and 1807, modified in its terms from time to time to adapt it to the existing emergency, remained in force until, by an act approved by President Lincoln, July 29, 1861, it was re-enacted substantially in the same language in which it is now found in the Revised Statutes, viz:

SEC. 5298. Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed.

This ancient and fundamental law has been in force from the foundation of the Government. It is now proposed to abrogate it on certain days and at certain places. In my judgment no fact has been produced which tends to show that it ought to be repealed or suspended for a single hour at any place in any of the States or Territories of the Union. All the teachings of experience in the course of our history are in favor of sustaining its efficiency unimpaired. On every occasion when the supremacy of the Constitution has been resisted, and the perpetuity of our institutions imperiled, the principle of this statute, enacted by the fathers, has enabled the Government of the Union to maintain its authority and to preserve the integrity of the nation.

At the most critical periods of our history, my predecessors in the executive office have relied on this great principle. It was on this principle that President Washington suppressed the whisky rebellion in Pennsylvania in 1794.

In 1806, on the same principle, President Jefferson broke up the Burr conspiracy by issuing "orders for the employment of such force either of the regulars or of the militia, and by such proceedings of the civil authorities, * * * as might enable them to suppress effectually the further progress of the enterprise." And it was under the same authority that President Jackson crushed nullification in South Carolina, and that President Lincoln issued his call for troops to save the Union in 1861. On numerous other occasions of less significance, under probably every Administration, and certainly under the present, this power has been usefully exerted to enforce the laws, without objection by any party in the country, and almost without attracting public attention.

The great elementary constitutional principle which was the foundation of the original statute of 1792, and which has been its essence in the various forms it has assumed since its first adoption, is that the Government of the United States possesses under the Constitution, in full measure, the power of self-protection by its own agencies, altogether independent of State authority, and, if need be, against the hostility of State governments. It should remain embodied in our statutes unimpaired, as it has been from the very origin of the Government. It should be regarded as hardly less valuable or less sacred than a provision of the Constitution itself.

There are many other important statutes containing provisions that are liable to be suspended or annulled at the times and places of holding elections, if the bill before me should become a law. I do not undertake to furnish a list of them. Many of them—perhaps the most of them—have been set forth in the debates on this measure. They relate to extradition, to crimes against the election laws, to quarantine regulations, to neutrality, to Indian reservations, to the civil rights of citizens, and to other subjects. In regard to them all, it may be safely said that the meaning and effect of this bill is to take from the General Government an important part of its power to enforce the laws.

Another grave objection to the bill is its discrimination in favor of the State and against the national authority. The presence or employment of the Army or Navy of the United States is lawful under the terms of this bill at the place where an election is being held in a State to uphold the authority of a State government then and there in need of such military intervention, but unlawful to uphold the authority of the Government of the United States then and there in need of such military intervention. Under this bill the presence or employment of the Army or Navy of the United States would be lawful, and might be necessary to maintain the conduct of a State election against the domestic violence that would overthrow it, but would be unlawful to maintain the conduct of a national election against the same local violence that would overthrow it. This discrimination has never been attempted in any previous legislation by Congress, and is no more compatible with sound principles of the Constitution or the necessary maxims and methods of our system of goverment on occasions of elections than at other times. In the early legislation of 1792 and of 1795, by which the militia of the States was the only military power resorted to for the execution of the constitutional powers in support of State or national authority, both functions of the Government were put upon the same footing. By the act of 1807 the employment of the Army and Navy was authorized for the performance of both constitutional duties in the same terms.

In all later statutes on the same subject-matter the same measure of authority to the Government has been accorded for the performance of both these duties. No precedent has been found in any previous legislation, and no sufficient reason has been given for the discrimination in favor of the State and against the national authority which this bill contains.

Under the sweeping terms of the bill the National Government is effectually shut out from the exercise of the right and from the discharge of the imperative duty to use its whole executive power whenever and wherever required for the enforcement of its laws at the places and times when and where its elections are held. The employment of its organized armed forces for any such purpose would be an offense against the law unless called for by, and therefore upon permission of, the authorities of the State in which the occasion arises. What is this but the substitution of the discretion of the State governments for the discretion of the Government of the United States as to the performance of its own duties? In my judgment this is an abandonment of its obligations by the National Government; a subordination of national authority and an intrusion of State supervision over national duties which amounts, in spirit and tendency, to State supremacy.

Though I believe that the existing statutes are abundantly adequate to completely prevent military interference with the elections in the sense in which the phrase is used in the title of this bill and is employed by the people of this country, I shall find no difficulty in concurring in any additional legislation limited to that object which does not interfere with the indispensable exercise of the powers of the Government under the Constitution and laws.

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

Mr. TALBOTT. My colleague from Maryland, Mr. HENRY, is paired with Mr. VAN AERNAM, of New York. Mr. HENRY, if present, would vote "no."

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. My colleague, Mr. BALLOU, is paired with Mr. MCMAHON, of Ohio.

The result of the vote as above recorded was then announced amid cheers on the democratic side and counter cheers on the republican side of the House.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-eight minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 13, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draught of a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late surgeon-general of the Army," approved March 15, 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant, copies of affidavits, reports, and other papers upon which a pension certificate was issued to Thornton Smith on the 18th day of April, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter addressed to him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in relation to an increase of the appropriation for salaries and expenses of collectors of internal-revenue for the next fiscal year, with a view to the more effectual suppression of the illicit distillation of spirits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what committee shall this communication be referred—Finance or Appropriations?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let it go to the Committee on Finance, and then the Committee on Finance can refer it to the Committee on Appropriations if they think proper.

The communication and the accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of Annie Wittenmyer, Mary T. Burt, and others, officers and members of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union, remonstrating against the repeal of the amended internal-revenue act in relation to spirituous liquors, approved March 1, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Clark Barlow and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the extension of the patent of John C. Birdsell for a combined clover hulling and thrashing machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the river Au Sable, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of the passage of a law by Congress appropriating condemned cannon to aid in the construction of the Saratoga national monument; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Friedrich Oechsle, late a private in Company A, Sixty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteers, praying for the passage of a law granting him a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL presented the petition of Mrs. Emma M. Moore, widow of Senior Captain Edwin W. Moore, of the late Texan navy, praying for the passage of a law granting her arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONAS. I present resolutions of the constitutional convention of the State of Louisiana, and ask that they be read at length and referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be reported.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, and read, as follows:

Whereas the Mississippi River is a great national highway running through and bordering on ten States, and with its tributaries draining one-half of the national territory, the use and navigation of which mighty stream is common to all citizens of the country; and

Whereas the alluvial lands bordering on and forming the lower Mississippi basin are among the richest and most fertile in the world, producing corn, cotton, sugar, and rice, but are subject to the overflow and ravages of the great river, to protect them against which, and to the end of utilizing and cultivating them with any degree of certainty or profit, a continuous and uniform levee system is absolutely necessary. Now, considering that the great outlay and expense incident to the construction and maintenance of a complete system of levees puts it beyond the financial ability of the States immediately interested, and considering the national importance and character of the work and that the building of the levees will improve the navigation of the river: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the people of Louisiana in constitutional convention assembled, That while it is the duty of the General Government to keep this great national highway and artery open to the commerce of the Union, a like sense of duty, combined with the dictates of simple justice, should prompt the expenditure that will protect its lower banks from the annual overflow of its waters.

Be it resolved, &c., That we earnestly request the Congress of the United States by proper laws and by appropriations from the National Treasury to undertake the establishment of a complete system of levees for the Mississippi River and its tributaries below Cairo, in the State of Illinois, and that our honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State be, and are hereby, respectfully requested to urge the same on Congress with all the zeal in their power.

Be it further resolved, &c., That a copy of this memorial, duly attested, be forwarded by the president of this convention to each of our said Senators and Representatives, to be laid by them before Congress.

Adopted May 8, 1879.

WM. H. HARRIS, Secretary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) to transfer the arsenal property in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, to the trustees of the Holy Communion Church Institute for the use and accommodation of said school, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am instructed by the Joint Committee on the Library to report an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes. The proposed amendment is to add at the end of line 365:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase works of art, $5,000.

I move that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF PRE-EMPTION PAYMENTS.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1152) to extend the time for the payment of pre-emptions on certain public lands in the State of Minnesota and Territory of Dakota, to report it back without amendment, and with the recommendation that it be passed, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the title of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Not without first having the bill read, that we may know what it is. Let it be read at length for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I will say briefly in regard to the bill that the necessity for it grows out of the fact that that section of the country was devastated by grasshoppers, and the pre-emptors of public lands were thereby rendered unable pecuniarily to pay for their lands. The law in regard to pre-emptions is that if payment is not made in a certain time the person loses his right, and he not only loses his right to perfect that particular entry, but he loses the right to make any further entry. This measure therefore becomes a matter of necessity, and it in no way compromises the Government that the time should be extended to these persons to make their payments; that is, one year from next October. The Government loses nothing whatever; it simply postpones the time of payment.

Mr. KERNAN. Has the bill been before a committee of the Senate?

Mr. PLUMB. It has been reported this morning from the Committee on Public Lands. It passed the House unanimously at this session of Congress, and it is desirable that it should pass at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to know whether there is any request from the Department in connection with the bill. My experience has been that it is dangerous to undertake to change any general law by a special act, especially where there is money concerned that belongs rightfully to the Government, for it almost always turns out that it is injurious and wrong to the Government. I should like to know whether there is anything from the Department which recommends this change.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of Senators to the fact that a bill just reported cannot be considered except by unanimous consent, and this bill has been objected to.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not understand that objection is made to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from West Virginia to object.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not understand the Senator from West Virginia to object.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My inquiry is in the nature of an objection. But if the bill comes from the Department, or if there is anything in the way of a recommendation for its passage, I will not object.

Mr. McDONALD. I will state, then, to the Senator and to the Senate that this bill passed the House at the last session of Congress and failed to pass the Senate for want of time. It was considered by the Committee on Public Lands then and reported favorably. There was no report from the Department made to the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, because it is a House bill, but it came to us with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Public Lands of the House upon what we understood to be accurate information as to the necessity of this extension, as stated by the Senator from Kansas, who reported the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The appropriation bill ought to be proceeded with. This bill should be discussed more at length than is possible in the morning hour. The question I propounded has not been answered, whether there is anything from the Department recommending the bill.

Mr. McDONALD. There was nothing before the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia objects, and the bill will go upon the Calendar.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I appeal to the Senator from West Virginia to withdraw the objection, from the fact——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We can get the information from the Department by to-morrow morning, and the bill can be taken up then if Senators think proper. I want the appropriation bill to be proceeded with.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me to say that this bill is——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order. The Senator from West Virginia objects. Reports of committees are still in order.

EXCHANGE OF SUBSIDIARY COINS.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, and for other purposes, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information subject to objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance.

The Secretary read the proposed amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to its present consideration, and ask that it may be printed. I want to look at the amendments proposed before we act upon the measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri objects, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD. I am aware a single objection prevents the consideration of the bill at the present time and it must go to the Calendar; but the demand has been so universal from all parts of the country, to all members of the committee, and I apprehend to most Senators who hear me, that some relief should be given to the glut of the subsidiary silver coin in certain centers of trade, that I think relief ought to be found at once.

The proposition of the Finance Commitee of the Senate does not materially affect the great object of enabling the holders of subsidiary silver coin to the amount of $20 or any multiple thereof to take it to a depositary of the United States or a sub-treasury and have it exchanged for legal-tender notes. The result of this measure would be to relieve the glut in cases where it exists, and to assist in the free circulation of subsidiary silver coin. So far there seemed to be an agreement on all sides; it is but the assent of the Senate to the proposition of the House in the terms in which it reached us.

In the third section of the bill, however, there is a proposition that came to us to make the subsidiary silver coins a legal tender to the amount of $20. That is four times the amount that subsidiary coin has been made a legal tender in our Government since the debasement of our subsidiary coinage in 1854. The full legal tender of debased silver coin in England is $10, in France less than $5, and in Germany less than $5. In this country under existing law it is $5. The amendment of the Senate committee proposes to double that, but not to quadruple it. The present legal tender of the copper coins and the token coinage of the country is but twenty-five cents; and of the subsidiary coins of silver as I have said $5. We propose to double that sum but not to quadruple it.

I of course cannot do more than suggest to my honorable friend from Missouri that the measure is a simple one of business usefulness to the country. It does not in any degree do more than facilitate the distribution of our currency; it does not affect its volume either by contraction or expansion; it simply is part of that sensible machinery which a government lends its people for their own practical affairs.

I hope, therefore, that a measure which has received, I may say without impropriety, the unanimous consent of the Senate Committee on Finance, may not be delayed in its consideration and passage by the Senate. Of course if my friend or any other Senator desires to examine the bill it is his right, perhaps his duty, to have it go over. It is a matter, however, very clear to the committee and as it was a matter so affecting the business convenience and demand of the country at the present time, I thought it right that I should ask for its present consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say one word. This very important measure as represented by the distinguished Senator from Delaware, was sent to his committee on the 24th day of April. That committee, with all its capabilities and all its modes of investigation, has retained it about twenty days. It has taken that committee twenty days to determine upon these amendments and to decide that they are necessary. I think that the Senate should be allowed one day to consider the action of the committee. As it took that committee twenty-odd days with this immense pressure upon the country all the time, and they could turn deaf ears to it, I think the Senate ought to be able to give one day's time to it. Therefore I object to the present consideration of the bill in order that we may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs leave to remind Senators that this whole debate is out of order.

Mr. BAYARD. I am not addressing myself to the merits of the bill. I will merely remark that the absence of the Secretary of the Treasury for ten days prevented the consideration of the bill for that time; and I have never been able quite to understand that the deliberations of a committee were in an inverse ratio to the propriety of their report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GROVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 588) to repeal paragraph 6, section 2238 of the Revised Statutes, and to substitute another therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HEREFORD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 589) to authorize the payment of customs duties in legal-tender notes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 590) establishing a mail-route from Chapman, Merrick County, to Aurora, Hamilton County, in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. GROOME asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 591) granting a pension to Nicholas H. Kelley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 592) for the relief of Redmond Tully; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 593) to repeal the provision authorizing the advancement of an officer of the Navy thirty numbers in rank for extraordinary heroism; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 594) for the relief of Thomas Langdon, of Dunbee, Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LANDS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. VEST submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That, if not incompatible with the public interest, the President be requested to inform the Senate if any lands in the Indian Territory were purchased from Indian tribes in such Territory by the treaties of 1866, and, if so, how many acres; and whether the United States has parted with its title to any portion of such lands. And that the President be further requested to inform the Senate if any portion of such lands were purchased for the purpose of locating Indians and freedmen thereon; and whether any of such lands are at this date unoccupied by Indian tribes or freedmen, and, if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to use such unoccupied lands for the settlement of Indians and freedmen, and, if the Government has such intention, what Indians and freedmen are to be located on such lands.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to that resolution, Mr. President. Let it lie over. I want to see it in print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa objects to the present consideration of the resolution, and it will go upon the Calendar and be printed.

COMMITTEE ON REMOVAL OF NORTHERN CHEYENNES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE,] which he expressed a desire to have taken up this morning at the close of the morning business. The resolution will be reported.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed "to examine into the circumstances connected with the removal of the Northern Cheyennes from the Sioux reservation to the Indian Territory, their treatment while in the Territory, their escape therefrom, and all the circumstances connected therewith, and also to examine into the facts attending their arrest or capture after such escape, their confinement, disarmament, escape, subsequent slaughter, and recapture," be continued, with power to sit during the recess, and with all the powers conferred by the original resolution appointing said committee.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the resolution just read recites the resolution adopted at the last session of Congress appointing a special committee to make the investigation referred to. It has not been in the power of the committee then appointed to make the investigation because Congress has been continuously in session. This resolution is intended to continue that committee in force, or rather to permit the action of the committee as it was originally created. The committee have taken no steps at all to make the investigation because they have had no time to do so, and the resolution is intended to continue the committee in order that the work may be done as contemplated. I hope that the Senate will adopt the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no other morning business the Chair will declare the morning hour at an end and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Kansas has appealed to me to make some proposition.

Mr. PLUMB. I move, in line 1571, at page 64, to strike out the word "four" and insert "five," so that the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office will thereby be increased from $4,000 to $5,000. This amendment, or one for a similar purpose, was submitted by me and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, so that I take it it is in order. I anticipate to some extent the objections of the Senator having charge of the bill, and the general objection that perhaps will lie to this method of increasing the salaries of public officers; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate briefly to the proposition.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me a moment, I did not understand what his amendment was; but the general understanding I hope will be observed and continued that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations shall be gone through with unless an amendment is proposed to some amendment of the committee, and then the bill will be open to all amendments of Senators. If the Senator from Kansas will agree to that, I shall be much obliged to him.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1581, to reduce the total amount appropriated for compensation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the clerks and employés in his office from $277,070 to $276,820.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 1615.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to give notice that after the committee's amendments are concluded I shall move in line 1615 to strike out the word "six" and insert "eight."

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Pension Office," in line 1667, to reduce the appropriation for compensation of chief clerk from $2,250 to $2,000; and, in line 1679, to reduce the total amount of the appropriation for the office from $475,000 to $474,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the portion of the bill from lines 1685 to 1696, inclusive, is a new provision and is inserted at the request of the Commissioner of Pensions. If any statement is desired I can read it from his last report and also from a letter addressed to the committee requesting us to agree with the House in that provision. I will not read either unless some gentleman desires.

The clause was read, as follows:

Sections 4771, 4772, and 4773 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing for biennial examinations of pensioners, are hereby repealed: Provided, That the Commissioner of Pensions shall have the same power as heretofore to order special examinations whenever in his judgment the same may be necessary, and to increase or reduce a pension according to right and justice. But in no case shall a pension be withdrawn or reduced except upon notice to the pensioner, and a hearing upon sworn testimony, except as to the certificate of the examining surgeon.

The next amendment was to strike out the following clause from line 1696 to line 1708:

In order to provide for the speedy payment of the arrearages of pensions, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue immediately, in payment thereof as they may be adjusted, the $10,000,000 in legal-tender currency now in the United States Treasury, kept as a special fund for the redemption of fractional currency under section 1 of joint resolution No. 17 of the Congress of the United States, approved July 22, 1876. And fractional currency presented for redemption shall be redeemed in any moneys in the Treasury at the time the same is presented.

Mr. BOOTH. I desire to call the attention of the Senate for one moment to the amendment of the committee, and ask that it be not concurred in.

On the 22d of July, 1876, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to exchange subsidiary silver coin for $10,000,000 of legal-tender notes, and to hold the $10,000,000 as a fund for the redemption of fractional currency as it should be presented. That was nearly three years ago, and the last debt statement of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that of that $10,000,000, $8,446,338 are in the Treasury. Forty-one million dollars and over of subsidiary silver coin have been put in circulation, and there is now in the Treasury, at the mints, and the offices of the assistant treasurers over $6,000,000 of subsidiary coin; yet there has been redeemed only $25,000,000 of fractional currency, and in excess of that redemption there has been put in circulation $16,000,000 of subsidiary silver coin.

In the month of April less than $13,000 of fractional currency was redeemed; and while the books of the Treasury show that there is about $15,000,000 nominally outstanding, yet the insignificant sums coming in for redemption show that a large proportion of that has been lost and destroyed. So we are now holding in the Treasury of the United States over $8,000,000 of legal-tender notes and over $6,000,000 of subsidiary silver coin for the redemption of fractional currency that is only coming in at the rate of $12,000 a month. The interest of this sum held idle in the Treasury would more than pay the current presentation of fractional currency.

The House bill appropriates the sum thus held in legal-tender notes for the redemption of fractional currency to the payment of arrearages of pensions. The Secretary of the Treasury has reported to Congress that there will be a deficit in the current revenues of the year on account of this appropriation for the payment of arrearages of pension. I know of no reason why we should not use the money that is thus kept idle in the Treasury for the payment of that appropriation. Therefore I hope that the Senate will not concur in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, but will allow this money to be used as the House appropriated it, for the payment of the arrearages of pensions.

Mr. BECK. Will the Secretary please read the amendment offered by the Senator from California?

Mr. BOOTH. I have not yet offered any amendment. If the Senate should not concur in the committee's amendment I will then offer an amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I scarcely think when the present condition of the law is comprehended by the Senate, that they will restore that portion of the House bill which the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations has stricken out.

In 1875 an act was passed by Congress authorizing and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury—

As rapidly as practicable, to cause to be coined at the mints of the United States, silver coins of the denominations of ten, twenty-five, and fifty cents, of standard value, and to issue them in redemption of an equal number and amount of fractional currency of similar denominations, or, at his discretion, he may issue such silver coins through the mints, the sub-treasuries, public depositaries, and post-offices of the United States; and, upon such issue, he is hereby authorized and required to redeem an equal amount of such fractional currency, until the whole amount of such fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

There is the direction and authority for the exchange for purposes of redemption of the subsidiary silver coin of the United States, in order to replace the fractional currency or postal currency as it is called. On the 22d of July, 1876, in the "joint resolution for the issue of silver coin," it was provided:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such limits and regulations as will best secure a just and fair distribution of the same through the country, may issue the silver coin at any time in the Treasury to an amount not exceeding $10,000,000, in exchange for an equal amount of legal-tender notes; and the notes so received in exchange shall be kept as a special fund separate and apart from all other money in the Treasury, and be reissued only upon the retirement and destruction of a like sum of fractional currency received at the Treasury in payment of dues to the United States; and said fractional currency, when so substituted, shall be destroyed and held as part of the sinking fund, as provided in the act approved April 17, 1876.

Here, then, it is plain that when provision was made for the exchange of subsidiary coin for fractional or postal currency, it was followed up for the furtherance of the issue and circulation of silver coin by the act of 1876, which expressly set apart and pledged this equal amount of legal-tender notes, when received, as the redemption fund for the fractional currency.

I present to the Senate the consideration of the effect upon our public obligations if a pledge at any time distinctly made for the redemption of a credit fund of the Government can be repealed before that pledge has been kept.

There is an error in supposing that the sum of $10,000,000 remains in the Treasury of this fund. The redemption of the fractional currency has been slow and gradual, but an amount considerably less than $8,000,000 of this fund provided by the law of 1876 remains in the Treasury to answer the fractional currency when it shall be brought in. Pass this provision which has been stricken out by the Committee on Appropriations, and as the fractional currency is brought to the Treasury for redemption where is the fund that has been pledged for it? It will have been paid away; and the language of the act of 1876, which was a clear promise and pledge that it should be set apart and retained for the purpose of redemption, will have been wholly defeated.

Mr. BOOTH. I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the concluding part of the section that is proposed to be stricken out, on page 70. In regard to the pledge of this $10,000,000, is the pledge so sacred that we cannot interfere with it at all although we know every dollar of the fractional currency had been destroyed? Then it is simply equal to retiring forever that much legal-tender currency from circulation, for here is a much broader provision for the redemption of the fractional currency now outstanding in these concluding lines:

And fractional currency presented for redemption shall be redeemed in any moneys in the Treasury at the time the same is presented.

That certainly is broad enough to cover all questions of good faith.

Mr. BAYARD. No, I think it fails to reach the obligation assumed by the Treasury and by the Government when the law of 1876 was passed. When this money will come in we may not say. The amount of it that has been destroyed, we cannot tell. It is a mere matter of conjecture. It may be discovered in large sums and brought forth at any moment. If so discovered, it will be probably in a form that will render it desirable for an immediate exchange. It may have been injured by mildew, destroyed partially by the action of the elements; and where such has been the case, its capacity to be used as money has been taken from it, and that would require its immediate exchange by the Treasury. I say it is very strange that legislation should be proposed to do away with a pledge which is most unambiguous; I do not propose to give this action any appellation. I spoke on this subject to the Secretary of the Treasury at the time this bill first came to the Senate and I requested him to give me his views in regard to it, and perhaps they are better expressed in a letter which I received and I now send it to the desk and ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 15, 1879.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request, I have the honor to state to you the view of the Department of the proposed transfer of the special fund created by law for the redemption of fractional currency, and its application to the payment of the appropriation for arrears of pensions.

The fund arose in the following manner: The act of January 14, 1875, (18 Stat., 296,) authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, bonds of the 5 per cent. funded loan of 1881 to the extent necessary for the redemption of fractional currency. The fractional currency not being presented as rapidly as had been anticipated by the coinage of fractional silver, the act of July 22, 1876, (19 Stat., 215.) was passed permitting the issue of silver coin at any time in the Treasury, to an amount not exceeding $10,000,000, in exchange for an equal amount of legal-tender notes, and directing that the notes so received in exchange be kept as a special fund separate and apart from all other money in the Treasury, and be reissued only upon the retirement and destruction of a like sum of fractional currency received at the Treasury in payment of dues to the United States, &c.

The outstanding fractional currency January 14, 1875, amounted to		$41,508,737 48
Of this amount there has been redeemed from surplus revenue	$8,088,925 34
From proceeds of 5 per cent. bonds sold for the purpose	17,494,150 00
		25,583,075 34
Leaving outstanding April 1, 1879		15,925,662 14
For the redemption of which the Treasury now holds in legal-tenders		8,458,991 00
Leaving unprovided for		7,466,671 14

a fair estimate of the amount lost or destroyed, which the Treasury will not be called upon to redeem.

It is not probable that the reissue of this reserve as proposed will injuriously affect the resumption fund, but this reserve was one of the steps in the process of resumption, and if the legislative stipulation with the public to hold this as a special fund for a purpose, so carefully and precisely stated, is to be set aside for the purpose of meeting a deficiency in the revenue caused by excessive appropriations, any other fund such as those for the redemption of the gold, the silver, and the currency certificates may with equal propriety be impaired.

The time may again come, as in 1862, when a pledge of the revenues to pay the interest and principal of the public debt may be necessary to save the nation; yet if the precedents show that such stipulations may be set aside at the pleasure of Congress, a public, solemn stipulation, made by the representatives of the people, will have no more force or be entitled to no more credit than an ordinary act subject to repeal and modification at pleasure.

Again, the supposition that this action will provide for a deficiency in the revenues, without increasing the public debt, is an error. The effect is precisely as if so many bonds were issued. A fund has been created for the sale of bonds for the redemption of fractional currency; a part of that fund is diverted for the payment of arrears of pensions, therefore the payments on this account are from the proceeds of bonds, and consequently result in the increase of the national debt to that extent.

Is it not better that any deficiency in the revenue be honestly and openly met by the issue of bonds if necessary, rather than by an indirection to increase the debt at a sacrifice of the good faith of the nation?

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD,
United States Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. It will be observed that the legislation which is proposed to be stricken out by the Committee on Appropriations has at least been very inadvertently framed. There is no such sum remaining in the Treasury as $10,000,000 of legal-tenders to await the return of fractional notes. If it is desired to take the sum remaining there to-day, be it so; but it will be altered to-morrow, and to what extent no one can tell; no one can know how much of this fractional currency is to be returned for redemption; and I say it is not proper for Congress, having made this pledge, now to break it. There must be a sense of insecurity if succeeding Congresses can in this way tamper with arrangements which have been made for value with the citizen.

The public debt of the United States will be increased just to the amount of the paper promises which are issued now to pay this debt out of the fund which has been pledged specifically for the redemption of another debt. It is to redeem what is called fractional currency. We made a pledge to pay that when presented. The House proposition is to take the money pledged to pay this former debt, and issue it for a third debt. Of course the consequence is that the public debt is increased to that amount. The United States has issued its non-interest-bearing obligations to the extent of this $10,000,000.

As I said before, it is inaccurate as matter of fact to state the amount now at $10,000,000, because it is only about $8,000,000, and what may have been the difference between the time that letter was written and now no one here can tell. As I said, the part I especially object to is the fact that where you have made a business transaction with your people faith should not be kept.

I therefore trust that on every ground of economy, of propriety of legislation, the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations may be sustained, and the language which has been read by the Clerk may be stricken from the bill.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, this, I believe I am authorized to say, is the only provision on which the Committee on Appropriations seriously divided, except the political questions which it is well known we are divided about on party lines on this proposition. I, with some others, disagreed to the report of the committee, and we reserved the right to express our views in regard to it when the bill was being considered by the Senate. I now propose briefly to state why I desire the proposition of the House to prevail. First let me say, when the Senator from California rose I supposed he had an amendment to offer. I have written out an amendment in order to obviate one of the difficulties suggested by the Senator from Delaware. Instead of reading—

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue immediately, in payment thereof as they may be adjusted, the $10,000,000 in legal-tender currency now in the United States Treasury, kept as a special fund for the redemption of fractional currency, under section 1 of joint resolution No. 17 of the Congress of the United States, approved July 22, 1876—and so on, I propose that it shall be so amended as to read:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue in payment thereof, as they may be adjusted, that portion of the legal-tender currency now in the United States Treasury held as a special fund for the redemption of fractional currency.

Mr. BAYARD. Has the honorable Senator any idea or can he state what that portion is?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir, accurately. The Senator from Delaware said it is less than $8,000,000.

Mr. BAYARD. No, I said it was nearer eight than ten.

Mr. BECK. On the 1st day of May the amount held for the redemption of fractional currency in United States notes was $8,446,388.

Mr. BAYARD. If it would not interrupt my friend, I would say that that amount is diminishing day by day and week by week as the fractional currency is returned for redemption and destruction. Here was a clear pledge that when it was redeemed it should be destroyed and that the debt of the United States should not be increased by exchanging one form of its obligations for another; and now the proposition is that although this fund is held for redemption, the notes pledged to it are not to be there, and so the debt must be indirectly increased.

Mr. BECK. I have answered one question. There now remains $8,446,388 of legal-tender notes in the Treasury of the United States for the redemption of fractional currency. The question was, How much of that is outstanding? On the 1st day of May, as I said, the amount was $8,446,388. On the 15th day of April, if that is the date of the Secretary's letter which was read from the desk a few moments ago, it was $8,458,991, but to make that whole question perfectly plain I have a statement of the amount of fractional currency redeemed each month since the passage of the resolution of April, 1876. In the month of May, 1876, in round numbers there were $3,500,000 redeemed, in June, 1876, $2,912,000, and so on down to December, 1876, when it reached $1,060,000. In the year 1877, in January it was $923,000, dropping off month by month until December, 1877, when the amount redeemed was $278,000. In January, 1878, it was $292,000, $281,000 in February, and so on until you reach June, when it dropped down to $110,000. Then, at the beginning of the current fiscal year, for the first time it came down as low as $92,000 a month. It dropped steadily until December, 1878, when it was $42,000 per month. In the months of January, February, March, and April, 1879, it dropped to $30,000 in January, $41,000 in February, $60,000 in March, and $12,000 in April. The total amount of fractional currency redeemed up to this time is $25,595,743.63 since April, 1876, leaving but fifteen millions and a fraction unredeemed. That fraction I cannot give, but very nearly $15,000,000, of which it is believed by everybody conversant with the facts that at least $12,000,000, and perhaps $14,000,000, has been torn up, lost, destroyed, worn out in use, and never will be offered for redemption; nobody expects that more than two or three millions more will ever be presented. I have a table showing the monthly redemptions under the act of April 17, 1876, which is as follows. It was prepared by the clerk in the warrant and appropriation division of the Treasury Department, one of the most intelligent officials I know of:

WARRANT DIVISION, May 2, 1879.

The redemption has now dropped, as will be observed, to $12,000 per month, and $8,500,000 of legal-tenders in round numbers is now held in the Treasury of the United States to redeem what in all probability will never again reach $20,000 a month. If that money instead of being held in the Treasury was invested in 4 per cent. bonds, it would produce at 4 per cent. $340,000 a year, $28,500 per month. The interest at 4 per cent. on that fund belonging to the people and thus held from the public under pretense of redeeming fractional currency when it is known all that is outstanding cannot by possibility exceed three million, as twelve million everybody concedes is gone—the interest on the bonds thus held would more than pay all the monthly demand that can by any possibility be made upon it. And yet the Secretary of the Treasury by his letter just read has made the Senator from Delaware believe that we are acting in bad faith when we try to use this ten-million fund to pay our debts that can be used without costing the people of the country one cent, rather than issue ten million of bonds and pay 4 or 5 per cent. interest upon them and let this money lie idle—that we are guilty of bad faith, when it will be observed in this very clause we have said that the fractional currency presented for redemption shall be redeemed in any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated at the time it is presented. We thus provide for its redemption absolutely and only release a large fund, now say about eight and a half millions, that is useless, to prevent the issue of ten million more bonds which the Secretary desires us to pay interest upon when we have the money lying in the Treasury pledged for the purpose, the purpose for which it was placed there having been almost absolutely accomplished, for the redemption has run down from three and a half millions a month when it began down to $12,000 a month, less than half the interest, as I have shown, at 4 per cent., of the money that is held from the people for that purpose. That is one of the reasons why I object to the amendment of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

That is not all. This is part of a system to increase the bonded debt of the country whenever it is deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury. It may be for good purposes; it may aid resumption; but whenever we can use money of the people without adding to the interest-bearing debt of the country, surely we ought to do it. We ought never to issue bonds when we have other money on hand which costs us nothing. This $10,000,000, or the greater part of it, is there, and if paid out to pensioners will be scattered at once broadcast all over the country. The Senator from Delaware seems to agree with the Secretary that it is honorable to increase the bonded debt of the country for any purpose; and yet one of the pledges was that it shall not be increased. That was made part of the act of 1870 and was continued all through the subsequent acts, except that by implication, in order to aid resumption, the Secretary, it was assumed, can increase the bonded debt of the country to suit himself, just as much as he pleased. The debt statements show that he has in the last three years increased it permanently about $100,000,000, and temporarily he increased the bonded debt of the country on the 1st day of April last nearly $300,000,000 for ninety days. If the argument used now be correct, he could in no state of case increase the bonded debt of the country, and yet every dollar that the United States owed on the 1st of April, except $21,000,000, was bearing interest, when three years ago $310,000,000 of it was not bearing interest. That will be reduced again, of course, as the 6 per cent. bonds are put off, but it will still leave a permanent increase of $100,000,000. That increased debt of $100,000,000 has not been removed and is not sought to be removed by any proposition that I have heard of. It is only the interest-bearing that is a burden debt, the non-interest-bearing being only the use of our own credit, which is the capital of the people and costs nothing.

I do not propose to make a speech on this subject, but only to state the reasons why I shall vote for the House provision. Every effort seems to be made to reduce or contract the currency of the country and to prevent the people from getting hold of the money intended for their uses. I sent to the Comptroller of the Currency for information on this subject, and I find that on the 30th of April, 1877, we had twenty-seven millions and a fraction of one-dollar legal-tender notes outstanding; we had twenty-seven millions and a fraction of two-dollar notes outstanding. What have we now? On the 30th of April, 1879, less than $19,000,000 in one-dollar legal-tender notes outstanding; and on the sam day less than $19,000,000 of two-dollar legal-tender notes outstanding. There has been a contraction of over $16,000,000 of one and two dollar notes in the last two years; and it is these small notes that the people need more than any other. We never had until now five-thousand-dollar notes. We have two million and a fraction of them. We have two million and a fraction of ten-thousand-dollar notes. These might as well be bonds of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the honorable Senator whether it is not competent for any one by taking money to the Treasury of larger denominations to get the smaller notes in just such sums as he wants? Such I have always understood to be the fact. Any man can have large notes exchanged for notes of smaller denominations if he desires. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. BECK. I will present these statements, which are very short, so that Senators may see exactly to what extent there has been a diminution of about $16,000,000 in the smaller denominations of notes. The national banks have been prohibited from issuing any bills of a less denomination than $5, making the destruction of these small notes all work to the detriment of the people who need small change.

Mr. ALLISON. We have issued silver dollars.

Mr. BECK. The silver dollars would go out if they were in friendly hands; their circulation depends altogether on that. Why does not the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States pay out the silver dollars received for customs dues? Why does he not pay them to the bondholders for interest? Was there not a pledge of the Government in 1862—gentlemen speak about pledges—that all the coin received from customs should be first applied to the payment of the interest of the national debt; but whoever heard of a silver dollar received from customs duties being paid to a national bank or other bondholder. The pledge was that all coin received from customs was first to be applied for that purpose before it should be applied to any other, and next to the sinking fund; and I ask what has become of the sinking fund? But I will not go into that; I have given my views upon that subject before. If the silver dollar was in friendly hands it would be utilized and would supply the place of the small notes to a large extent; but the Secretary of the Treasury refuses to use the silver dollar received in payment of customs, refuses to apply to pay interest on the public debt with it as the law requires. I read in a speech of his made in this body that an officer who failed to comply with the law of 1862 ought to be impeached; but he has never paid a dollar, so far as I know or ever heard of, in silver coin received from customs dues in any way either to a national bank or to a bondholder in the payment of the interest on their bonds, but has taken the ground that he allows the creditor himself to tell what sort of money he wants, and as the creditor always prefers gold he pays him gold, making himself the trustee of the banker and the bondholder instead of the trustee of the people, paying their debts in the money that is most advantageous to them.

The fact remains, and what has become of this legal-tender money that we still have? I felt some curiosity to know, and I wrote to the Comptroller the other day. This is his answer:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, May 6, 1879.

SIR: In response to your request, I send you herewith statement of the Treasurer showing the amount of legal-tender notes outstanding by denominations on April 30, 1879.

This is the statement to which I referred.

I also inclose statement of the Treasurer of May 1, 1879, and an abstract of the reports of the national banks for January 1, 1879, the date of the last compilation of their reports.

From the statement of the Treasurer it will be seen that he reports the amount of United States notes in the Treasury on May 1, $70,444,823.

There is $70,000,000 of that legal-tender currency, of what denominations I do not know, out of the hands of the people and hoarded in the Treasury to-day.

The amount of legal-tender notes held by the banks on January 1, exclusive of United States certificates of deposit, was $70,561,233.

Tables are given in my report for 1878, pages 103, 104, and 106, which show that the amount of Treasury notes and bank-notes held by the State banks, trust companies, and savings banks was, at the dates given, $48,398,738. The amount held by private bankers is estimated at $28,000,000, which makes an aggregate of $76,398,738. If one half of this amount was in legal-tender notes, then the whole amount of such notes held by banks and bankers other than national banks was, say, $38,000,000, which would give the aggregate amount of legal-tender notes held in the Treasury and by all the banks and bankers of the country $179,006,000, leaving an aggregate of $167,675,000, held by other parties.

Very respectfully,

JNO. JAY KNOX, Comptroller.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK,
United States Senate.

It may be that a portion of what is held by State banks and other bankers may be circulated by them and reach the hands of the people from time to time. I do not know, but that held by national banks as reserves and that hoarded in the Treasury takes away nearly one-half of the outstanding legal-tender circulation of the country; and then what has been taken from the small denominations of notes—the issues of ones and twos, that have been diminished $16,000,000—adds to the contraction, so that we are substantially at the mercy to-day of the national banks for our smaller currency. Why should that money be all hoarded? Why should more bonds be issued? Will any gentleman say that any considerable amount more of our fractional currency is expected to come in when it is reduced now only by $12,000 a month, though it began at three and a half million dollars? Can any one suppose it is ever going to come in at a rate that will require the use of any such amount of money as is now held? Will there not be always money enough in the Treasury to pay it? I think it is a settled question.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me say to the Senator from Kentucky that I notice from the debt statement that there are $70,000,000 of legal-tender Treasury notes now in the Treasury.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. If that be true, $60,000,000 or more than $60,000,000 must be there for general purposes. Why should we undertake to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out those United States notes, which are a special fund, when he has $60,000,000 not so pledged that he can use? I do not see the necessity for it.

Mr. BECK. Why is the Committee on Finance all the time insisting that we cannot pay our debts, that we have to issue $18,000,000 more bonds in order to meet the arrears of pensions, that there are deficits of revenues when there are $70,000,000 in the Treasury that can be used for that purpose, if that is the fact?

The reports of the Secretary will show, I think, for the last five years that he has held in the Treasury from sixty-five to eighty million dollars all the time. Every monthly report shows in substance that state of fact. If he is now pressed for money and the complaint is that he is now pressed because he is making a transfer from 6 per cent. to 4 per cent. bonds and paying double interest for ninety days, making our interest run up to $102,000,000 or about that sum; if he is sorely pressed at the present time while that conversion is going on, and is demanding that more bonds shall be issued and more interest paid, can he complain when we propose to release eight and a half million now lying in the Treasury for no other purpose whatever than to meet perhaps $12,000 a month, instead of issuing bonds, and when we have made ample provision that as the fractional notes come in they shall be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, he opposes it. That is the question the House presents here, and I see no good reason why it should not be agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. But I do not still understand why, if there are $70,000,000 of legal-tender notes in the Treasury, we should compel him to use the $8,000,000 of that seventy million which are specially pledged.

Mr. BECK. We do only this. The pledge is redeemed, as the record shows, to the extent of twenty-five and a half million, and there are only fifteen million of fractional currency outstanding, less than three million of which, in all human probability, will ever come in, and when the amount presented for redemption is now reduced to $12,000 a month why should he not use for paying the debts of the United States that eight and a half million thus held, instead of issuing the bonds the gentlemen are clamoring for? If he has $70,000,000 lying there and will insist on keeping it there for safety, why should he have eight and a half millions more which he claims he is compelled to hold when he has no sort of use for it? We are simply increasing his available funds.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me a moment? If this $10,000,000 of promissory legal-tender notes should be reissued, that increases that character of debt so much; and must we not provide for its redemption in coin on demand under the resumption law?

Mr. BECK. It is not increasing, as I understand, the outstanding legal-tender notes at all in any shape. There is just that money withheld from use for a special fund, and we have stopped the destruction of them below a given point.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to add that we do redeem this in silver coin. Under the law of 1876 we gave out silver for this $10,000,000 in notes, and said the notes should be held. Now, by reissuing them do we not increase that amount which we are bound to redeem in specie? The notes are now to be paid out only for fractional currency.

Mr. BECK. But they have redeemed $25,500,000 of fractional currency and at the time that $10,000,000 was set apart instead of using that for redeeming the fractional currency the Secretary has used other means of the Government and is still holding eight and a half million of that when there is no use for it and nobody pretends that there is anything but a fraction of the small fractional currency left, and that is coming in, as I have shown, at the rate of only $12,000 a month; about one-half of what the interest on the sum thus held would produce if put out at the lowest rate of interest.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Kentucky. It has been said here that a pledge has been made by the Government of this eight and a half million or ten million. With whom was that pledge made? Has there been any pledge; or is this simply an act of Congress regulating the affairs of the currency and providing for the transaction of business?

Mr. BECK. The idea of a pledge has been held constantly before the country ever since 1862, and to everything that has been brought up, whenever the people sought relief or sought to get any benefit from their own money or get anything that would reduce the pressure on them, the reply has been, "There is a pledge of the Government given to the bondholder." In 1875, you added thirty cents to the tax on whisky, 40 per cent. to the tax on tobacco, adding 10 per cent. to tariff taxation to aid the revenue as was supposed or proposed, but really diminishing the revenue; all this was done because of the (so-called) pledge of the Government to the bondholder. Whenever there is a move made for relief in any form, then the cry of a pledge comes in. This was simply an assurance to the people, if any assurance was required, that the fractional currency would be promptly redeemed; but, as I think the Senator from Tennessee very properly remarks, it was only an adjustment of business; there were $40,000,000 fractional currency outstanding, which came in at the rate of two or three million at first; it dropped down to one million; now it is down to $12,000, showing that the amount outstanding is almost exhausted. Therefore, the keeping of an amount of money to redeem is no longer necessary.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs us that we shall have a deficit to meet the current debts and the excessive appropriations, as he calls them. We want to give him this money that he may pay so much of this debt with the money now in the Treasury not needed to be used for any other purpose. That money costs the people nothing, and that will add to the circulating medium in their hands; they need it, as you have so much reduced the small notes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to call the Senator's attention to another view of the provision of the House bill which the amendment proposes to strike out. The Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] presented it, and well presented it, as I understand it. If this can be called a pledge what breach of faith is there? While this bill appropriates the money in a manner different from what gentlemen seem to understand it to have been pledged for, yet the bill makes another provision, and an appropriate provision. The bill appropriates any money in the Treasury for the performance of the very duty that was devolved under the law upon what is called the pledged fund, so that as far as the pledge is concerned it is as well as it possibly can be, if this bill shall pass, for another pledge is made, or rather an appropriation of money is made, by which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to redeem all this fractional currency that may be presented.

Mr. BECK. To show what was then believed I will state that in 1876, to show what was the view of the Treasury Department, the Director of the Mint and the Comptroller of the Currency concurred in estimating the amount of fractional currency then lost and destroyed at $8,083,513. That was three years ago, when it was coming in very rapidly. The best estimate I can get from the best-informed men on the subject is that there are not less than $12,000,000 of it gone, which will never be presented for redemption.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to read from the Revised Statutes the pledge that accompanied the issue of the fractional currency notes:

They shall be exchangeable by the assistant treasurers and designated depositaries for United States notes in sums of not less than $3; and shall be receivable for postage and revenue stamps, and for all dues to the United States, except customs, in sums not over $5, and shall be redeemed on presentation at the Treasury of the United States in such sums and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

That was the pledge which accompanied the issue of the notes. The provision in the House bill restores the original pledge, no more and no less. Congress changed that pledge when they provided for another redemption, when they came to provide for the exchange of silver for this fractional currency. That was a matter of convenience; and for the purpose of preserving the equilibrium of small change, so to speak, Congress provided that as the silver went out the fractional currency should come in, and the operations should go together. Subsequently, when it was found that there was a larger demand for subsidiary coin than there had been for fractional currency, and that consequently there was a dearth of change, Congress provided by anticipation for the issuance of $10,000,000 of subsidiary coin in exchange for greenbacks, and then provided that the greenbacks should remain there for the purpose of redeeming the fractional currency as it should come in subsequently, thereby making a new pledge and a different pledge in regard to redemption.

It is not worth while considering whether or not the money may be necessary at some other time for the purpose of redeeming these notes. We have come back now by the House bill to the original pledge we made, to wit, that any money that might be in the Treasury of the United States at any time when anybody presented any fractional currency should be used for the purpose of its redemption. We are simply brought to the proposition in view of the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the condition of the finances, whether we will take the money we have on hand and which we are not needing for any purpose now and use it to pay current debts, use it for the purpose of paying appropriations we have made, or whether we will increase the bonded debt of the country?

I want to say now, once for all, that whenever during the time I shall hold a seat in this body the expenses of this Government shall go beyond its revenue I will vote to put on all the taxes that may be necessary for the purpose of meeting the expenses thus made, but I will never vote to do that which would be destruction and produce insolvency in a private individual, to wit, increase the public debt to meet current expenses. If there is to be a debt created for any purpose whatever, let it be a purpose which is equivalent to the debt itself, to wit, an emergency, an unusual thing. But any government, as any individual or any corporation, that does not get money enough out of its business, out of its current revenue, to meet its current expenses, is on the high road to insolvency. We have here about $8,000,000 in the Treasury that we are not needing for any purpose. At the last session of Congress we created extraordinary expenses in the shape of arrearages of pensions, and now I think it is only fair that we should take this money in the Treasury to meet those current expenses. If when that is exhausted we then have not money enough let us have courage to put taxes on the country for the purpose of meeting expenses which we had the courage to create.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I cannot see, and I have heard no reason given, why this eight or ten million, whatever the amount may be, should be kept in the Treasury, except the mere fact that it is regarded by some as a pledge of the Government to redeem a particular circulation. As was stated by the Senator from Kansas, who has just taken his seat, [Mr. PLUMB,] that pledge has been altered once before, and if this bill shall pass as it came from the House, it will be simply another alteration, but in no manner and to no extent impairing its force and its validity. It will be as perfect a pledge if this bill shall pass on the part of the Government to redeem the fractional currency, which is a Government debt, as any other pledge we have before given.

The Government is bound to redeem it; and here is a pledge of "any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" for the redemption of that fractional currency as it shall come in. Then, if there is no other reason why the law should be kept as it is, retaining eight or ten million of idle money in the Treasury, it seems to me that we ought to make some arrangement by which we can appropriate it in some proper manner. And what is that proper manner? This bill as it came from the House proposes to appropriate the money held there to the payment of the arrearages of pensions. That is a debt the Government owes. The Government owes the pensions. It passed a law during the last Congress allowing those arrearages of pensions, and they have to be paid. How do you propose to pay them? How do those Senators who are opposing this provision of the House bill propose to pay the arrearages of pensions? Out of what money do they propose to pay them? They propose to issue and sell the bonds of the Government to pay them, instead of using the ten millions now idle in the Treasury and which the Government has no opportunity to use now. Instead of using that money they prefer to sell bonds of the Government and convert this debt of the Government into an interest-bearing debt. Why not use the money that the Government has on hand?

Mr. President, it seems to me that that is not proper. Why do we propose to convert our circulation into an interest-bearing debt when we can avoid it? Why do you propose to sell bonds and make the people pay interest on the bonds when you have the money in hand to appropriate instead of selling bonds? It looks to me very extraordinary. There is no reason as yet given why this money should be kept in the Treasury except that it is a pledge, which amounts really, in my judgment, to nothing in view of the provisions of this bill.

Furthermore, we not only save the interest on the amount of this money, but you put that much in circulation when you pay it out for the arrearages of pensions. It then goes into circulation; it becomes part of the currency of the country when in circulation, answering the demands that now are so pressing upon the Congress of the United States. Let it go out in discharge of the obligations of the Government. The pensioners who are entitled to the arrearages of pension want their money. Under the law they are entitled to it. We are paying it because they have not got the money, and as I understand from the reading of the letter of the Secretary bonds have been issued to raise money to pay these very arrearages of pensions.

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, no. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I misunderstood the reading of the letter. I understood, however, that there is an appropriation for the purpose of meeting these arrearages of pensions as far as $25,000,000 will go and that is to be met by the issuing and sale of bonds. Now, instead of that, let us appropriate ten million, if we have it, or eight million if that is all, and meet these arrearages of pension and to that extent save the necessity of issuing and selling bonds that bear interest. We shall in that way legitimately put into circulation eight or ten million dollars that are needed for the business of the country. The great cry is that the circulation has been curtailed too much; and it has. The great complaint of the country is that the circulation is not large enough for the business of the country; and it is not. Instead of contributing as far, and in every way we can, even with small sums, if we may call this a small sum, to the circulation of the country and in discharge of the obligations of the Government, they propose to keep that locked up and issue bonds and raise the money on bonds on which we pay interest, while there is money idle in the Treasury. I think that is wrong. I think that is another violation of all those financial principles which ought to govern the affairs of the Government of the United States.

We need to economize. We ought to turn all our assets to advantage if we can; and if this is not turning that $10,000,000 to advantage I confess I do not understand anything of finance. I am opposed to the issuing of bonds unnecessarily. I am opposed to increasing the debt of the United States. The Senator from Delaware said if this was paid out it would increase the debt of the country. I should like to know how that is to increase the debt. Suppose the Government of the United States owes $10,000,000 to a party and pays him this $10,000,000, is that an increase of the debt? You pay out the currency that is now in the Treasury doing nothing and you take in a debt, you discharge a debt, and you throw the amount of the payment of the debt into circulation. Therefore you do not increase the debt at all, or while you do make this a debt you at the same time reduce an obligation corresponding in amount, and the debt is no larger. I prefer that course to making that amount of debt bear interest.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. The honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] considers that this proposition of the House will not result in an increase of the debt of the United States. Let us take the facts as they are and state them simply. In 1875 the Government owed some forty-odd million dollars, for which it had given its promises to pay in the shape of what was called fractional currency. That was a debt of the United States. In 1876, the price of silver making it convenient and possible, the Government proposed to pay that debt, to call in that fractional currency and pay it off in hard money. To that end the law of January, 1875, was passed, followed by the law of July, 1876, providing that any one who presented the fractional notes of the United States to the sub-treasuries and depositaries should have them paid, and that the notes so paid should be destroyed as a canceled, obliterated debt. It is plain, therefore, that every dollar of fractional currency that was so redeemed and paid diminished the debt of the United States pro tanto.

But in 1876, in order to facilitate the circulation of this silver coin through the country, Congress provided that any one holding legal-tender notes of the United States could have them paid in silver to the amount of $10,000,000, and that the $10,000,000 of legal-tender notes for which hard money had been issued in payment should be held as a fund in substitution for the silver to pay this outstanding fractional currency; and now we are told that having substituted this especial fund of $10,000,000, for which we paid silver, which silver was intended to pay the fractional notes, (and of course legal-tenders substituted for the silver constituted the fund to pay the fractional notes,) we can take that fund now and pay it off for another debt, leaving the fractional currency for which it was pledged unpaid, and we may do that without increasing the debt of the United States!

I do not deny the power of this Government to do as it pleases in regard to its creditors. I know that it cannot be sued; I know that judgment and execution cannot be awarded against it, and that the creditor has but one thing to rely upon, and that is the sense of good faith and honor. That is all. If they be wanting, there is no security.

The Senator from Kentucky said or implied that I had either needed or had found inducement from the present Secretary of the Treasury to make my present declaration on this subject. Sir, I never needed any inducement from the Secretary of the Treasury to express and vote for my ideas of what it was right and proper for the Government of the United States to do by its people.

There has been a great deal said, and a great deal too much said, in my judgment, in this debate about bondholders and the like. The man who holds the obligation of the United States, whether it be an interest-bearing obligation or its simple promise to pay on demand, stands equal before the law in my estimation. That he is a bondholder does not lessen his rights or my desire to protect them any more than if he were the poorest laboring-man whose whole fortune was the single one-dollar bill of his Government. I say he should be protected with the same care, no more and no less, that is to be awarded to his richer brother.

Mr. President, the amount of money that men may own in this country, the classes of rich and poor, have no place, or consideration as separate classes in our legislation. It is in my judgment a poor business and a very poor appeal to be holding a man up to opprobrium either because he has not or because he has more or less of money, whether it be in the shape of the obligations of his Government or not. If my poverty has prevented me from being one of these assailed bondholders, that is the only thing that has prevented me, and I may regret it; but that does not diminish in the least degree my obligation not to the bondholder but to the government whose promise he possesses.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the Senator mean to say that I made any such criticism upon him?

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, no; I did not refer to the Senator from Alabama, in this connection. I referred, however, to the remark of the Senator from Alabama that the proposition of the House did not increase the debt of the United States, and I thought I showed him (at least I stated to my own satisfaction the proof) that it inevitably did increase the debt of the United States just to the amount the Secretary shall issue these legal-tender notes, so called, of the United States, which are pledged to pay fractional currency still outstanding, and which in their turn are paid by the United States in silver coin. The obligation of the law of 1875 was to pay fractional currency in silver coin. To facilitate that you allowed the Treasury to pay $10,000,000 demand notes and you substituted those demand notes in lieu of what? In lieu of coin which you had taken to pay your debt, and you paid it, not to be reissued until the demand-notes still outstanding should be returned. That is the fact——

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President——

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will allow me to state the proposition. That is the fact, that every one of those $10,000,000 in legal-tender notes had been paid by the United States in silver. They stood to redeem an equal amount of the United States debt in the shape of fractional currency. Now, if you issue the legal-tender notes without having paid that fractional currency, you increase the debt of the United States just to that amount, because when the fractional currency, which is a debt, comes in, you must pay that debt. I will now listen to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to know how it is that the debt can be increased by putting in circulation this legal-tender currency. If you just threw it out helter-skelter, broadcast, then you might increase the debt, and would increase it; but when though you do not redeem the fractional currency with it you do redeem another debt with it, I should like to know how the debt of the Government is increased? The fractional currency is a debt and it is left outstanding, but another debt against the Government that is as much a debt as the fractional currency, is taken in, redeemed, and paid. Therefore while you do leave one of the debts of the Government standing to the same amount that you take in another debt, you do not increase the indebtedness of the Government a dime.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator has omitted a very important factor in this case. He seems to forget that to pay this $10,000,000 of fractional currency silver money belonging to the people of the United States was issued from the Treasury. What was that issued for? Its object was to redeem an outstanding debt in the shape of fractional currency, and to facilitate that they let it pay an outstanding debt in the shape of legal-tenders, and they then said, "Bring that legal-tender into the Treasury;" and so it stands as a fund in lieu of so much silver to pay the fractional currency as fast as it is presented. It has, therefore, that purpose and that end.

I am not now considering the fact that this fractional currency may, like most paper money of its character, have been destroyed, and may never, therefore, be presented. That is not the question. I do not assume to decide that now. A longer period of time must elapse before we can know that fact; it will not do to take a risk upon it; but it is perfectly clear that while that is outstanding, and while other money for which silver was paid stands to redeem it, you can not issue that other money without increasing your debt to that amount.

If I have not made the proposition perfectly clear, I will not trouble the Senate by restating it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to interfere with the Senator in his remarks, but here is a case where the Government, it seems, has $10,000,000 in its Treasury. It owes two debts, to illustrate: one is fractional currency. The pledge of the Government is that $10,000,000 were reserved for the purpose of redeeming that fractional currency and having it all there. Admit that in its strongest aspect. I do not care whether it is bought in specie or how it is bought, that has nothing to do with the point now before the Senate; it has no sort of bearing upon the issue now presented in this bill. No matter how you keep the money the Government has it, and that is all we are now discussing. But the Government, instead of paying the fractional currency with this $10,000,000, appropriates the $10,000,000 to pay arrears of pensions which the Government owes, and while it leaves one debt unpaid, it pays another debt to the same amount. I should like to know if there is any principle of arithmetic or any other mode of arriving at conclusions by which one can undertake to convince the Senate that that increases the debt to the amount of a dime.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I do not think there has been an argument brought forward here to support the proposition to reject the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations that would not justify the issue of a further amount of legal-tenders. It is in fact a question of further inflation and nothing else. Here are $10,000,000 of legal-tender notes that have been redeemed by the United States in silver money, with a pledge that that amount shall be kept for the redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency, and when that fractional currency shall have been received it is pledged to be charged over as so much to the sinking fund.

Therefore here is a double pledge: in the first place a pledge that we will keep this money for the purpose of the redemption of the fractional currency; and then, when that is redeemed, that it shall be charged over to the credit of the sinking fund.

Manifestly, the proposition here is to provide for a deficit, and it is proposed to take money that has been redeemed, permanently redeemed, to the extent of $10,000,000, and to reissue it.

For one I am disposed to accept the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, and for another reason. I cannot comprehend how any Senator who is in favor of maintaining resumption will put the burden upon the Secretary of the Treasury of an issue of eight or ten million dollars more of legal tender which he will be compelled under the resumption laws to redeem if it shall be presented.

Under all the circumstances it seems to me that the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is a proper one, and I trust that it will be adopted. Certainly no friend of the maintenance of resumption can afford to vote against the amendment as proposed.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont if it is not true that the arrears of pensions are being already paid out of the general funds that are received from the internal revenue and other sources?

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose they are.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understand it to be the case that these arrears are being paid as rapidly as the clerical force possible to be employed in the Pension Office will allow; and therefore the refusal to adopt the amendment of the committee will not in any way advance the payment more rapidly than it is now being made by the Pension Office. For this reason I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. That is right.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, I shall endeavor to be brief, although there is a good deal of ground that ought probably to be gone over.

The Senator from Kentucky who has charge of this bill, it will be noticed, is opposed to the amendment of the committee. In other words, he is opposed to striking out the provision which a majority of the committee has agreed to strike out, believing that to be a proper thing to do. That fact probably causes me to say a word that I would not otherwise feel it my duty to say.

This fund arose several years ago. In January, 1875, there was an act passed which caused the issue of bonds for the purpose of redeeming the fractional currency and authorized the purchase of silver for the same purpose. Then was the time that we ought to have talked about increasing the debt and not now. In my judgment, no matter which way the pending question is decided by the Senate, there will be no increase of the bonded debt on this account. The Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand, cannot legally increase the bonded debt. Therefore let this question be decided as it may, it has no bearing upon the increase of the bonded debt. I think it will be admitted by every Senator here that the question of increasing the bonded debt is not involved at all. It is a question, in my judgment, of good faith. It is a question whether we shall take any backward step as to resumption. For one, while, in fact, I do not approve of very many things that the Secretary of the Treasury has done, yet I am not willing to take a step backward, no matter how short or how smooth that step may appear to be. I believe that we are now on the eve of general prosperity, and I feel it my duty to sustain what has been accomplished and to move in the direction we are now going. I have no wish that now or hereafter it may be said of myself that I aided in taking away one of the steps toward resumption. I believe it is best to leave that question just as it is. I think we ought not to interfere with it. If we are to provide for the payment of the pension arrears faster than they can be paid out of the Treasury from the usual receipts, let us take some part of the $23,000,000 of silver now lying in the Treasury. There is a fund that can be taken and no existing law will be affected. I see no good reason why in an appropriation bill we should undertake to change an existing law which disposes of about eight and a half million dollars of money, which was placed in the Treasury for a purpose, when that purpose has not been accomplished. Why has it not been accomplished? On the 1st day of April, 1879, there were nearly $16,000,000 of fractional currency unredeemed, for which there were but eight and a half million dollars of greenbacks in round numbers in the Treasury pledged for that purpose. If every dollar of this eight and a half millions was consumed in redeeming the fractional currency there would still be about seven and a half million dollars unredeemed and unprovided for.

Again, it has been said that to take this from the special fund would increase the circulation because the money would be paid to pensioners. That is not quite the fact, in my judgment. I shall state what I understand to be the fact in that regard. The arrears of pensions are now being paid; a million and a quarter dollars were paid last month from the general fund. According to the estimate of the Treasury Department the pension arrears can be paid about as fast as the claims can be adjusted properly; in other words, at the rate of about $2,000,000 a month. The Secretary of the Treasury has not asked Congress to provide in any other way for the payment of the pensions. He believes, and so reports, that he can provide about $2,000,000 per month to pay the pensioners, out of the general fund of the Treasury, and that is as rapidly as the Pension Office can adjust the claims.

Therefore, looking at the question from any point of view, it appears to me that there is no good reason for disturbing the eight million and a half dollars now pledged to redeem nearly $16,000,000 of fractional currency. It is true, as was stated by a Senator, that a part of that fractional currency will never be presented for redemption, because it has been destroyed and otherwise lost to the Treasury. There will be $7,000,000 of fractional currency remaining to be redeemed after this eight million and odd dollars has been consumed in their redemption. I stated a moment ago that there are twenty-three million silver dollars in the Treasury. The amount in round numbers reported on the 1st of May was twenty-three million and a little over a half. If we are to have silver in circulation, why not take part of that sum instead of disturbing this fund which is set aside for a specific purpose?

Mr. MORGAN. Is the Secretary of the Treasury using that to pay off the pension arrearages now?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Not that I know of. The Secretary of the Treasury has not said to Congress, and no official has said to Congress, that he has not money to pay the pensioners as fast as the pension cases are adjusted. No Secretary, nobody with authority has said that there is not sufficient money in the Treasury to pay the pensioners as fast as the pension cases are adjusted. The pensions are paid regularly, I understand, as fast as they are adjusted, and the Secretary says that he can pay them at the rate of $2,000,000 a month; and that is about as fast as they can be adjusted.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. There is one proposition I wish to put to the Senator from West Virginia, if he will allow me. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] are both members of the Finance Committee. At the closing hours of the last session of Congress the Senator from Vermont, from the Committee on Finance, introduced this bill and called a yea-and-nay vote upon it:

That in order to provide for the prompt payment of the arrears of pensions due to pensioners, or becoming due, under the provisions of the act approved January 25, A. D. 1879, granting and authorizing payment of arrears of pensions, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, 4 per cent. bonds of the United States, not exceeding in the aggregate $18,000,000, of the character, description, and denominations, and with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, of the 4 per cent. bonds described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," or, in lieu thereof, or any portion thereof, to issue certificates of deposit of the denominations and character provided for in the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit in aid of the refunding of the public debt," approved February 26, 1879; and the proceeds of the sale of such bonds, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied exclusively, and is hereby appropriated, to the payment of claims for arrears of pensions arising under said act of January 25, A. D. 1879.

The House has met that with a provision to use $10,000,000 in legal-tender currency. I desire to know whether that bill was not pressed at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, and whether we had not a letter from him here saying that the arrears of pensions would cause a deficiency in the revenues, and whether the Committee on Finance did not report that bill asking for $18,000,000 in bonds because of the statement that it would create a deficiency?

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky if there has been any such intelligence as that from the Secretary of the Treasury during the present session of Congress?

Mr. BECK. It came in the form of a letter to Congress.

Mr. PADDOCK. Not at this session.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Nebraska and as to what my colleague has just said, I think Senators must have forgotten a communication made by the present Secretary of the Treasury to Mr. ATKINS, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, dated February 12, 1879, in which he says:

I understand that the Secretary of the Interior has transmitted to Congress an estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions of the amount necessary to pay the arrears of pensions under this act, as follows:

For the payment of arrears on pensions granted prior to the passage of the act	$34,000,000
For the payment of arrears that may be allowed during the current fiscal year	2,500,000
And for those that may be allowed during the next fiscal year	5,000,000
Making a total of	41,500,000

Then he goes on making a calculation for the receipts and expenditures of the fiscal year commencing the 1st of July, 1879. He says there will be a deficit of $27,062,419.71. The Secretary then says:

It would thus appear that the sinking fund must be entirely ignored and twenty-seven millions be provided for by additional legislation. This may be accomplished by the imposition of some new tax adequate for the purpose, or by authorizing the money to be borrowed upon 4 per cent. bonds, which, in the present state of the market, can be sold at par.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this language:

As new taxes cannot be immediately productive, it is recommended that authority be given to raise the amount necessary by the sale of 4 per cent. bonds described in the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Therefore I say that if my colleague will indulge me a moment longer I prefer to call out these eight or ten million dollars lying idle to increasing our taxation or to selling bonds, as recommended by the Secretary at the date I read a moment ago, namely, February 12, 1879.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My colleague has read a communication which was made three or four months ago to the last Congress. I submit that it has no bearing whatever on the present Congress, for nothing of the kind has been submitted to the present Congress. Further, I submit that it is well known to the Senator from Kentucky, because he recently got a statement from the Department, which he did me the honor to let me look over, that the revenues are increasing and that the Treasury is in a better condition now than it was at the time when that communication was made.

Again, we were then proceeding upon the assumption that it would take fifty or sixty million dollars to pay these arrears of pensions. I hope and I believe that that is not the case. It was stated here when the arrears of pensions bill passed that seventeen or eighteen million dollars would be the amount required at the outside. It is true that it now appears it will take more; but, to set the whole matter at rest, I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Treasury Department dated the 6th of May, and I ask that it be read and we shall see what they say as to the condition of the Treasury, and see if that is not a later date than the letter which my colleague read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 6, 1879.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry of this date I have the honor to state that up to date $1,250,000 has been paid on account of arrears of pensions, and that during the remainder of the fiscal year a similar amount will be paid. During the next fiscal year it is estimated that the balance of the appropriation for arrears of pensions will be paid at the rate of $2,000,000 per month, requiring eleven months of the year to complete the payment of the full amount.

Very respectfully,

H. F. FRENCH,
Assistant Secretary.

Hon. H. G. DAVIS,
United States Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It will be seen from this letter that there appears to be no apprehension upon the part of the Treasury Department that they will not have the money necessary to meet the demand, and they are supposed to know much better than we as to their ability to make provision to pay the pensions.

Mr. BECK. We limited the pensions act to $25,000,000 in order to keep from bankrupting the Treasury, and we kept men out of pensions because it was said that we had not money enough to pay them.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator from Kentucky if the House did not limit it to eight million and a half by the provision which he supports?

Mr. BECK. Oh, no.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Why, then, do they only ask to have eight million and a half devoted to this purpose?

Mr. BECK. It only proposes here to release eight million and a half in addition to the bonds and the money in the Treasury now lying idle.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The provision says nothing of the kind. It proposes $10,000,000, but in reality gives less than eight million and a half. What right has the Senator from Kentucky or any other Senator to say that the arrears of pensions were limited to $25,000,000? Did the Senator from Kentucky know the amount required? Did any Senator know the amount required? The Treasury Department, who are presumed to know and who ought to know the amount required from calculations, suppose the amount to be $25,000,000 or thereabouts, and now the Senator says we are limited to that amount. The Senator is mistaken. In the letter just read the Department say they can pay off the pensioners at the rate of $2,000,000 a month; and even since that letter was written the revennes are increasing to a decided extent; so that the Treasury Department believe they can pay them faster.

Mr. BECK. The last letter which we had relating to the arrears of pensions showed that the amount required would be largely in excess of $25,000,000, and the appropriation was kept down to $25,000,000 for fear we should not have money enough to pay the sum required. Here is the statement of the Department. The Treasury Department, "John Sherman, Secretary," made an estimate of the payment of the arrears of pensions, and this is the statement of the Department:

For the payment of arrears on pensions granted prior to the passage of the act, $34,000,000.
For the payment of arrears that may be allowed during the current fiscal year, $2,500,000.
And for those that may be allowed during the next fiscal year, $5,000,000.
Making a total of $41,500,000.

There were $34,000,000 already granted prior to the passage of the act, $2,500,000 were allowed during the current fiscal year, and five million more to be allowed during the next fiscal year, making $41,500,000; and provision was only made to pay $25,000,000 out of that $41,500,000 because of the condition of the Treasury.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The letter that I had read states that the Department can pay at the rate of $2,000,000 per month; and is not that as fast as anybody has calculated that the pension claims can be adjusted? If that be so, then this provision makes no difference whatever as to the amount of money to be put in circulation; it makes no difference whatever in the bonded debt. It is a question, in my judgment, whether we shall take a backward step in the direction of maintaining specie payments; and I for one am not willing to do that. I believe it is our duty now "to let well enough alone," and to let all the differents acts looking to this end stand, no matter how insignificant a particular act may appear. This fund of $8,000,000 or more, no matter what it is, we should not disturb. Why? If for no other reason in the world, we should not disturb it because there are $23,000,000 in silver now in the Treasury, which would go much further toward paying the pensioners and which it would be much better to put in circulation than to take a backward step in a different direction from that which we have already taken. The country, in my judgment, as I remarked a moment ago, is on the eve of prosperity, at least I hope it is, and that is the indication from a good many places. Money has been borrowed by the Government at a lower rate than was ever thought of heretofore.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In one minute I will yield to the honorable Senator.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe we had better "let well enough alone" and just stay where we are. I hope it will never be said of this side of the Chamber that for the sake of releasing $8,000,000 from the Treasury we took a backward step and tried to throw in the way of maintaining specie payments any obstacle whatever. This step would be a short one, but it would be in the wrong direction.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator tell me how this would be going backward?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is just what I wanted to ask the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly I will tell the Senator. There was an act passed first in 1875 and again in 1876 pledging this amount of money for a purpose, and that purpose was to redeem the fractional currency; and when this amount is used up in this way there will still be eight or ten million dollars of that fractional currency unprovided for. That is the way we shall go backward.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like the gentleman to tell the Senate what difficulty this provision would place in the way of resumption. How does the fact of letting this $10,000,000 remain in the Treasury, or appropriating it to the payment of a debt of the Government, affect the question of the resumption of specie payments, which is already accomplished?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have attempted to show that. I thought I had said that the act which this provision sets aside is one of the steps in the direction of specie payments.

Mr. HOUSTON. How does it affect the question of resumption?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator wants the floor I will give it to him.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to hear an answer to my question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator can tell better than I can I will give him the floor. I was endeavoring to explain to the Senator.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am perfectly willing to hear the gentleman; I am delighted to hear him talk; but I wanted, if I could, to draw his attention to the question which I put to him; that is all. I know that that was one of the steps taken toward resumption; but resumption is an accomplished fact, as I understand it; and how can the appropriation of this $10,000,000 to the payment of the arrearages of pensions interfere with the resumption of specie payments?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend says he knows it is one of the steps taken. Now, if he knows that it is one of the steps taken toward resumption, he is endeavoring to put something in the way of resumption. He says he knows that it was one of the steps in the direction of the resumption of specie payment.

Mr. HOUSTON. But that is accomplished.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator does not want to disturb that?

Mr. HOUSTON. The step taken is now wholly unnecessary; resumption is accomplished.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, we have got to observe all the steps, or we may fall. The Senator knows that if once the ice is broken in the direction that we have been going for some time, the whole system is broken down. We may repeal the first step now; to-morrow something else is proposed, and we do that; and so we keep on until we disturb the whole relation of the machinery that has been in operation.

I said in the beginning of my remarks that I intended to be brief; that there were a great many things that the Secretary of the Treasury had done that did not accord with my judgment or my votes, but the fact stares us in the face, and it is a fact, that resumption has come, and it is apparently working well. Do not let us now go back; let us keep forward. For the sake of taking eight and a half million dollars from the Treasury, do not let us disturb any of the machinery that has heretofore existed. If the Senator wants to pay the pensioners any faster than the Secretary says he can pay them, I will join him in providing that a part of the $23,000,000 or all of the $23,000,000 of silver now in the Treasury, if necessary, shall be distributed for that purpose. Such an appropriation would disturb no regulation of the Department, no law of the Government, no step such as the Senator says he knows was taken in the direction of resumption; it would be, as I believe, far better for the country, and certainly afford a larger amount for the purpose.

Mr. BECK. The Secretary has shown in the first page of his report that he received $257,000,000, and he expended $236,000,000, leaving a surplus revenue of $20,000,000; and he applied of that $20,000,000 $13,000,000 to the redemption of United States notes, $3,855,000 to the redemption of fractional currency, $73,950 to the redemption of 6 per cent. bonds for the sinking fund. What prevented him from using any money that came into the Treasury for the redemption of this fractional currency, whether he had that eight millions and a half dollars or not? Out of the current collection of taxes he could buy up the fractional-currency notes with the balance thus collected from taxes altogether, independent of that eight and a half millions, as shown by the Secretary in his own report.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is the report made in 1878.

Mr. BECK. It was made last December.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have twice remarked that I have not by my votes or by my opinions sustained the Secretary in all his acts. Therefore, what the Secretary has done or what he has not done is not for me to defend. I would perhaps agree with the Senator from Kentucky on many of these points, but this is one on which we happen to differ. I think it would be wrong to disturb upon any pretext whatever any of the machinery put in operation by the present Secretary; and where there are but $8,000,000 involved, and the Secretary tells us that he can pay the pensioners as fast as the clerical force can adjust their accounts, I ask why this backward step should be taken?

The Senator from Kentucky referred to the question of interest. That is an item; but the Senator from Kentucky could have said that the $23,000,000 of silver now in the Treasury is just as well adapted to be put out at interest, and it would yield three times as much as the amount he named, so that I do not think that has a special bearing on the question. The fact is the pensioners are being paid, and no additional legislation is needed for that purpose. As I remarked a moment ago, I regret that this side of the Chamber should put anything in the way of the maintenance of specie payments and the prosperity of the country.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask a question for information, and that is whether the Secretary expects to be able to pay the arrearages of pensions without the issuance of bonds? It was said in the discussion of the arrears of pensions act that there would be a necessity to issue bonds to meet the demand to be made on the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GORDON in the chair.) The Chair has recognized the Senator from Indiana. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I was asked a question by the Senator from Delaware which I wish to answer.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, as I shall vote for the measure as it came from the House to appropriate as much of this idle $10,000,000 now in the Treasury as may be necessary to pay the arrearages of pensions, it may not be improper for me to say in a few words why I shall do so. Senators have talked all around this question, but there is only one point to consider, and that is whether we shall add to the interest-bearing debt of this country by selling bonds to raise money for the payment of arrearages of pensions or whether we will take that which is now lying idle, doing no good, and put it in circulation.

That is all there is involved. The Senators who are opposed to this proposition as it came from the House are in favor of selling bonds and thereby largely increasing the burdens of the people. I am in no hurry to dismiss this statement. I prefer to dwell upon it; I repeat it; I wish to make the point clear, for the object of the whole discussion in opposition to this measure is to confuse the public mind. Our interest-bearing debt has grown so rapidly and to such an extent that but a few days ago I read a long article in the London Times calling attention to the remarkable fact that the American Government was so much enamored of interest that it was converting its non-interest-bearing circulation, its currency which costs the people nothing, and which they so much need, into bonds which are a galling burden to them. This would be a demented policy if it was not an intentionally wicked one. It would be a supreme folly if it was not a deliberate and monstrous crime. That policy asserts itself here now in opposition to the proposition before us.

There are $10,000,000 lying in the Treasury, doing no good, pledged to a purpose for which they will not be required or used. Shall we put that money in circulation and to that extent relieve the present needs of the country, or shall we still further pander to the greedy desires of capitalists and give them still further opportunities to invest their idle, inactive, and non-producing wealth in interest-bearing securities? Shall we increase the weight of an already heavy yoke on the necks of the laborers of this country? These are the questions which the toiling masses of this country will require each Senator to answer.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] talks about taking no step backward on the subject of specie resumption. Sir, I would take a thousand steps backward if I could restore the dead past and the unhappy present to life and prosperity; if I could blot out the miseries of the last five years. No step backward in the frightful career of crime, of widespread ruin and bankruptcy which this wretched policy of forced specie resumption has fastened upon the country!

I beg to say to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] that he made a concession a few moments ago to the Senator from West Virginia in which I do not concur. There is no resumption of specie payments in this country at this time. The Senator from West Virginia says that he would not disturb the machinery which has led to specie resumption. In the first place, we have not reached specie resumption. In the next place, I would long ago have broken to pieces all the machinery which he eulogizes, could I have done so. The machinery to which he alludes has operated to withdraw the benefits of a full circulation from the business of the country and give to the capitalists a chance to invest their money in a debt bearing interest and resting upon the bended shoulders of the labor of the country. The destruction of such a system or of such machinery would have been a blessing to the American people, any time during the last twelve years, so vast as to defy calculation, and even now it would be hailed as a deliverance from one of the most cruel forms of bondage.

But why do I say there is no specie resumption? Who can pay his debts in specie? What is the resumption of specie payments? Is the country doing business on specie? Not at all. What is called specie resumption is not so. There has taken place an equalization of currencies; and why? We could have had that at any time since the greenback was created by simply doing an act of justice and common honesty; by declaring that this Government would receive its own money at the custom-houses and everywhere else for its own dues. That would have put the greenback currency at any time since February, 1862, where it is now, and every Senator on this floor knows it. That is all that has been done now. The Secretary of the Treasury has brought about an equalization of currency by doing without law what ought to have been done many years ago by law. We have tried to pass a law here to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to receive the money of this Government without distinction for the Government dues. The measure has been defeated more than once. Yet at last the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to get a delusive semblance of specie payments, that is an equalization of currencies, has, contrary to law, announced that he will receive legal-tender notes for customs dues, and we have the strange spectacle now of a Secretary of the Treasury receiving money on account of Government dues which the Senator from Delaware and every other Senator who differs from me on this question will say he has no right to receive. They are correct. He is doing it without law. We tried to compel him by law to do it during the last Congress. He came before the Committee on Finance and combated the idea; but at last, as if lawlessness was more pleasurable to his official appetite than to obey a law, he proclaimed that he would receive the greenback currency for customs dues, and it now has this mark of honor. But he still holds the great question in his own hands; and instead of having a law upon this subject, we are to-day at his mercy. If he should issue a specie circular to-morrow requiring specie for customs, there is no law to keep him from it—he is running this matter at his own will—and we would be in worse confusion than ever in business circles. An equalization of currency has taken place; but to-morrow the Secretary can render it again unequal. To-morrow he can disturb all its relations and cause it to fluctuate as wildly as ever before.

Sir, we have heard much of late of the lofty credit of the Government because of the vast sale of bonds with interest coupons attached. We have heard the policy of the Secretary of the Treasury and his party vaunted to the skies because on one day recently, I believe, $150,000,000 of interest-bearing bonds were subscribed for and purchased by a few national banks in New York. Senators, mark my words. We who live a few years more will find the little finger of the money power which is now strong enough through the national banks to purchase bonds amounting to $150,000,000 in a single day—we will find its little finger heavier, stronger, and harder to bear than the whole Army and Navy put together, even if applied to improper purposes. It is a power which will crush the life out of the laboring people of this country more fatally even than those despotic agencies which we have been discussing so long upon this floor. Every sentiment of the money power and every throb of its hard heart is on the side of a consolidated and monarchical government, for in such a form of government it has heretofore found its greatest safety.

I see, therefore, with no pleasure one or two banks with money power enough to make a subscription for an almost indefinite amount of bonds and hold them as an interest-bearing security over the people. What else, however, does such a fact signify? You say money is plenty. In some places it is, and in other places where it ought to be it is not. Whenever money is concentrated in the hands of a few, so that they can control hundreds of millions, it shows that money is withdrawn from the active channels of trade and has become stagnant; like the waters of the Dead Sea, concentrated and useless. Instead of flowing in little rivulets and in larger streams, irrigating and fructifying and causing all the land to bloom with business prosperity, money is concentrated in the coffers of the few, and the destruction of the business interests of this country is the result.

If business were prosperous, who supposes money would be seeking investments in sums of $50,000,000 and $100,000,000 and $150,000,000, made too by perhaps a half dozen men, at 4 per cent.? When business is active and prosperous, money goes out and does its proper and legitimate duties, performing its rightful functions, bringing happiness to the people.

When it is cited as an evidence of prosperity that a few men have so much money that they can purchase these enormous sums of bonds and take them at low rates of interest, it is an evidence to my mind of a fallen and prostrate condition of the business, and no man can gainsay it. It is proof positive of too much money in the money centers and not enough in the hands of the people. It demonstrates beyond controversy or dispute that the channels of trade are empty while the coffers of retired capitalists are full.

We are on the eve of prosperity, says the Senator from West Virginia. We have been there a long time according to the false prophets whom we have had to listen to for so many years. They have said numberless times, "We are just on the eve of prosperity; the day is dawning; it will come directly; the great high-light of to-morrow is almost here, and with it is to come the radiant beams of prosperity;" but with each day has come more and more of bankruptcy and distress; and the last quarter in business circles has been more thickly strewn with business wrecks, ruined homes, suicides driven to desperation, than any other quarter within the last six years. We all know this, and yet we allow ourselves to be lulled into a sense of false security by the siren voice which continues to say, "We are just now going to be happy."

Man never is, but always to be, blest.

So far as coerced specie resumption is concerned, he never has been and never will be blessed in this country.

The Senator from West Virginia says that he is set in his way and will brook no change. He must go forward. I believe there is a proverb that a wise man sometimes takes warning and mends his ways, even at the expense of taking some backward steps; while there is another and a very different character who pushes on and is destroyed.

Mr. President, never by my vote, while I remain here as a Senator, will I increase the bonded debt of the United States unless some emergency like that which created the present one should overtake us, which may God forbid! But when in a time of peace the eager, hungry, persistent, Argus-eyed spirit of Mammon is found here upon all occasions striving to create opportunities to increase its purchases of the people's interest-bearing obligations, to add to the debt of the people and hold it at interest, I shall esteem it my highest duty to denounce it at all times and under all proper circumstances.

For these reasons I expect to vote for this and all kindred measures, and against every proposition that comes here proposing to increase the interest-bearing debt of the people whom I represent.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, only a word. I understood the Senator from Indiana to say that the last quarter showed more failures than the previous quarter. The Senator has mistaken the fact.

Mr. VOORHEES. No, I have not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator says he has not. Of course it is only a question of fact, but I have very recently seen a statement which showed that there were many less failures than there had been in any quarter for some time back. That is all I have to say. It is a question of fact, and it will be referred to by and by.

As to the increase of the bonded debt of the country, I have said, and I think I could show it if it were necessary to do so, that no matter which way this question is decided no increase of the bonded debt can take place. The Secretary is forbidden to increase the bonded debt; and he has not I believe violated in any instance that law. Of course he has paid double interest to a very large extent, but as to the increase of the bonded debt this amendment has no reference nor does it affect it in any way or manner whatever.

My friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] asked me a moment ago whether or not an increase of the bonded debt of the country would be made if this clause was not agreed to. I say now, so far as my information goes, the Secretary could not, if he would, unless permission be given to him to issue bonds, increase the bonded debt.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that I saw a circular from the Secretary of the Treasury just before the termination of the last session of Congrsss in which he expressed the opinion, or at least the apprehension, that there would be a deficit in the revenues of the country to the amount of $27,000,000. At the same session we had increased the liabilities of the Government by the act giving arrears of pensions, estimated variously from $34,000,000 to $50,000,000, I believe. The point I wish to inquire about is, how this apprehended deficiency in the Treasury is to be supplied with the increased burden imposed by the act granting an increase of pensions to the amount of from $34,000,000 to $50,000,000? I ask how that is to be met, and whether there is not some necessity for an issue of bonds to meet that demand? I have heard in this discussion from various gentlemen that an increase of the bonded debt was indispensably necessary to meet the arrears of pensions and other expenses of the Government. The query which I put to the Senator from West Virginia was to know the truth of these allegations, whether the Treasury can get along and pay the arrears of pensions and keep up the ordinary expenses of the Government without resorting to extraordinary means such as the issue of bonds?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As the Senator from Delaware puts the question to me I will answer him that all the information I can give him is contained in the letter read from the desk, in which the Department say that they have already paid a million and a quarter dollars of arrears of pensions and expect to be able to pay from the revenues of the Government at the rate of $2,000,000 a month; and that is about as fast as the claims can be adjusted. As to the right of the Secretary to increase the bonded debt, I repeat that this amendment has no bearing upon that question one way or the other.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from West Virginia asserted, as I understood, that the Secretary of the Treasury claimed that he had no right to increase the bonded debt now without an act of Congress. Am I right?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. For this purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. How is it as to resumption?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We are talking of this purpose.

Mr. BECK. For pensions or anything else. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report to the last Congress uses the language I shall read, and this is one of the points I endeavor to come back to always, and to which we ought to be limited; it is one of the reasons why he has increased the bonded debt of the country $300,000,000 and has increased it permanently $100,000,000 in defiance of all the laws except that in aid of resumption, which he asks Congress to give him authority to do. He says:

> The means and manner of doing this—
>
> That is to bring about resumption—> are left largely to the discretion of the Secretary, but, from the nature of the duty imposed, he must restore coin and bullion, when withdrawn in the process of redemption, either by the sale of bonds, or the use of the surplus revenue, or of the notes redeemed from time to time.
> The power to sell any of the bonds described in the refunding act continues after as well as before resumption. Though it may not be often used, it is essential to enable this Department to meet emergencies. By its exercise it is anticipated that the Treasury at any time can readily obtain coin to re-enforce the reserve already accumulated.

The meaning of this is, that as long as there are men in the world who will buy the interest-bearing bonds of the people of the United States the Secretary has the authority without appealing to Congress to sell as many of those bonds as he pleases and increase the national debt as he chooses in order to maintain what he calls resumption, if it bankrupts every man in America.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator whether or not this amendment in any way whatever affects the increase of the bonded debt?

Mr. BECK. Our object is to prevent the Secretary from increasing the bonded debt by issuing the $18,000,000 of bonds that the Finance Committee of this Senate sought to give him authority to issue, and to enable him to use money that costs the people nothing, that is in no sense a debt. The debt that affects the people is the debt that bears interest and which is a burden upon them. We want him to use the currency of their own, which is now in his hands and that he is keeping in the Treasury, for which he has no sort of use, instead of issuing the $18,000,000 or any other number of million of bonds that he calls for and that the Committee on Finance of the Senate at the last session seemed disposed to give him authority to issue. The House of Representatives, in view of the proposition of the Finance Committee of the Senate at the last session, have sought to prevent an increase of the interest-bearing debt by allowing the Secretary, in addition to all the funds he now has, to use as currency money which is lying in the Treasury, and which is of no use to anybody unless it can be employed for that purpose.

I have been advised since I made the few remarks I submitted before that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] was of opinion that I said something to the effect that he was following the Secretary of the Treasury and backing the Secretary. I never said so. If I said anything on such a matter, it was that the letter the Secretary had sent to the Senator from Delaware had induced him to believe that the Secretary was right, when in fact the Secretary, in my judgment, was endeavoring to mislead us by the statement that he was making. It never entered my mind to intimate that the Senator from Delaware was following the Secretary or endeavoring to do anything other than what he has always done in the Senate and everywhere, maintain equal justice to all men according to the best lights before him. I had no idea of saying any such thing; and I desire to make the statement now.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I notice that the Senator from Kentucky, the Senator from Indiana, and other Senators go all around this question and do not come to the amendment itself. I repeat my question to the Senator from Kentucky or the Senator from Indiana, whether this amendment in any way whatever affects the bonded debt, or whether if this amendment is acted on either way it affects the bonded debt of the country in any form?

Mr. BECK. I will answer in this way: If money is needed, as the Secretary has said it was over and over again, to pay the obligations of the country, and if this money is used, it makes it unnecessary to issue any more interest-bearing bonds to meet at least this much of the obligation. If obligations are imposed by law and have to be met, and if this money cannot be used, $8,500,000 being necessary to meet the obligations of the Government, $8,500,000 of interest-bearing debt is to be issued or $8,500,000 of additional taxes are to be imposed. To prevent either the imposition of taxes or the increase of the bonded debt we propose to give the Secretary authority to use this money. If he does not need it he will not use it. We authorize and empower him to use it and to use it for that purpose if he pleases. Perhaps I am wrong in placing that construction upon the provision. I would rather make it peremptory upon him to use it.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, you will observe that the language proposed to be stricken out does not merely authorize, but it authorizes and directs. The Secretary is authorized and directed to use this money immediately, whether he has other funds or not.

Mr. BECK. That suits me all the better.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to say one word upon this question. I should not say anything but for the remarks made just now by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.] The Senator from Indiana bases his support of this particular measure upon the idea that we have an option which compels us to do one of two things, namely, that we must either increase the bonded debt of the United States or we must issue more greenbacks to pay the arrearages of pensions. Now neither is necessary, and neither ought to be proposed, in my judgment.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. When the proposition was made here at the close of the last session to issue bonds for the purpose of raising money to pay the arrearages of pensions, I forgot how the Senator from Iowa voted.

Mr. ALLISON. I forget myself how I voted. I only know that I believed then, as I believe now, that there is an ample fund in the Treasury of the United States to pay these arrearages of pensions as there is to pay all other appropriations.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Iowa knows perfectly well that an effort was made, which came very near being successful, but a few months ago in this body, to authorize in express words the issuance of bonds bearing interest to pay this very sum that we are talking of.

Mr. ALLISON. Very likely; and when that alternative comes again it will be time enough for the Senator from Indiana, in my judgment, humble though it be, to indulge in his philippics about the bondholders and the national banks, &c. We have no such alternative. I have before me the last statement of the public debt, showing a balance in the Treasury of $145,000,000 of gold and silver coin, after paying off all the demand indebtedness of the United States, and $61,000,000 of greenbacks. There is a large sum in the Treasury of the United States. Now, then, I say that the Secretary of the Treasury can use any portion of that sum which is necessary to be used for the purpose of paying these arrearages of pensions, and I want to know why it is that we are required to put into an appropriation bill this insult to the soldiers of the Republic who are entitled to these arrearages of pensions, as though we were compelled to make a special provision for them. Is it not enough that their payment shall stand upon an equality with the payment of the other appropriations of this Government? Are we to thrust forward all the time that but for this special law we should not be required to make this appropriation? Their payment stands upon precisely the same principle as that of every other appropriation made by the Government.

Mr. VOORHEES. Why is it an insult?

Mr. ALLISON. We make a special provision here for the payment of the soldiers. Why not make a special provision here for the payment of our appropriations for rivers and harbors?

Mr. VOORHEES. I would not feel myself insulted if there was a special provision to pay me money coming to me; but I apprehended when I interposed that the Senator supposed the insult arose from the kind of money they were to be paid.

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all. I am not concerned about the kind of money we pay them.

Mr. VOORHEES. No, because we made them take it when it was only worth fifty cents on the dollar.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not disturbed on account of the money we pay them in. No thanks to the Senator from Indiana, the money we pay them in now is equal to gold coin, and I am in favor of paying them in that kind of money. But we might just as well put in a special stipulation here that these $8,000,000 shall be used to pay the expenditures on our rivers and harbors as to pay the arrears of pensions to our soldiers. The appropriation for arrears of pensions stands exactly as every other appropriation stands.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator will allow me to suggest that if we keep in this clause they will get their pay. Does not the letter read by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations show that they will not get their money otherwise until a year from next July?

Mr. HOUSTON. And if the amount is $34,000,000 they will not get it then, for it will require seventeen months to pay the whole.

Mr. ALLISON. I am amazed at the Senator from Alabama, who now seems so anxious to make this provision. Does he not know that there is now in the Treasury a vast sum of money, and that the Secretary of the Treasury is bound by law to use it, and according to the statement of the Senator from Kentucky as often as he uses it he can replenish the Treasury by the sale of bonds and we cannot help ourselves?

Mr. BOOTH. I understand the Senator from Iowa to say that there is $145,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States that is liable to be used on appropriations. May I be allowed to ask how much of this $145,000,000 the Secretary of the Treasury proposes to retain for the purposes of resumption, and what part of it is he willing to use without an especial direction from the Congress of the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. I undertake to say that the special direction given to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Congress of the United States is through appropriation bills, and it does not lie in his power to say, "I will retain one hundred millions or one hundred and fifty millions for resumption purposes and will not pay the necessary appropriations."

Mr. BOOTH. I undertake to say that he does mean so.

Mr. ALLISON. I want some gentleman to show me where he says so. How is it that the Secretary of the Treasury shall say there are required one hundred and fifty millions in the Treasury, or more than one hundred and twenty millions, for the purposes of resumption, when in point of fact there are not a million dollars of notes exchanged for coin daily under the resumption act?

Mr. TELLER. How does he say there will be a deficiency of $25,000,000? What does he mean if he does not mean that he cannot use this money for the purpose?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand the Secretary of the Treasury to come here (as he is bound to come here when such is the case) and tell us that there is a deficiency. Is it possible that we have been in session nearly two months and there is a deficiency in the Treasury requiring the action of Congress, and that our Secretary of the Treasury gives us no information on that subject?

Mr. TELLER. He did at the last session.

Mr. ALLISON. He did, it is true, on the 10th of February, when the tobacco bill was pending, and when other things were pending, when some men in this Chamber and out of it were proclaiming that we had passed an arrearages of pensions bill involving $50,000,000, send us a certain statement based upon an estimate of the Secretary of the Interior that it would require $50,000,000 to pay the arrearages of pensions. Who is there in this Chamber now who will say that it will require $30,000,000 to pay the arrearages?

Senators are talking about official reports. Here we have been in session since the 18th of March, and I have yet to see a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury requiring us to do this, that, or the other thing for the purpose of facilitating the payment of the arrears of pensions. Here are the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the organs of this Chamber, through whom the Secretary communicates with this Chamber: has either of them presented to us letters from the Secretary of the Treasury asking for more money, asking for more taxes, asking for a loan of money? Not at all. Therefore, I assume, as I have a right to assume from this fact, that there is an ample fund in the Treasury to pay all these pension arrears; but if I supposed otherwise, I should prefer myself to vote for this appropriation rather than to increase the interest-bearing bonds.

Mr. MAXEY. I would ask the Senator frow Iowa if there be, as he states, $145,000,000 in the Treasury subject to general appropriation, or general disbursement, and this clause proposed to be stricken out by the Appropriations Committee provides that any fractional currency presented shall be paid out of this general fund, what is the necessity for keeping the eight and a half million dollars, especially when you have $145,000,000 for all purposes?

Mr. ALLISON. That question answers itself. As we have agreed that a special fund shall be set aside, of course there can be no occasion for breaking our agreement in that regard until the necessity arises if it ever shall. I do not want to be misunderstood. I did not mean to say, as the Senator from California quotes me as saying, that there was $145,000,000 here that could be applied to general purposes. I do not say that in exact terms; but I say that the Secretary of the Treasury is bound to presume that Congress will supply him with necessary funds for resumption as well as for the payment of all appropriations that we make here; and I see in his own statements that there is ample provision made for both these purposes; and therefore it is that I am not willing, when no emergency exists, to violate the agreement so well stated by the Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that we shall not take out of this special fund the sum of $8,000,000 when we have a large fund that we can use without any special appropriation or consideration with reference to it. That is my objection to this provision. The whole matter is "a tempest in a teapot." It amounts to nothing. It will not materially interfere with resumption if we pass this clause, because of course if this eight and a half million goes out another eight and a half million will remain in the Treasury. There are $70,000,000 of legal-tenders in the Treasury now. Why do we propose that this particular eight and a half million shall go out? Of course if it goes out the other $61,000,000 or $62,000,000 will remain, and when they go out they are liable to come in again the next day, and so on, and if they do come in the next day, if the Secretary of the Treasury has no gold or silver to redeem them, he can sell bonds under the authority already given to him and thus redeem them. So we are operating in a circle all the time, and this, therefore, in my judgment, is not a material provision.

But I do not wish to violate an agreement made, not by a republican Congress, not made in those old days of legislation in the interest of the bondholders, as my friend from Indiana would say; and I call his attention to the fact that the bill here spoken of was passed by a democratic House of Representatives in 1876, tying, handicapping these $10,000,000 of greenbacks in the very height of the greenback excitement. Therefore there is no special reason why we should vent our spleen against this particular act of Congress when we have ample funds to pay these debts outside this special fund and when we have a large amount of greenbacks in the Treasury not handicapped as these are.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, the Senator who has just taken his seat [Mr. ALLISON] has stated that there is no authority for saying that if the arrearages of pensions are not in part paid in this way there is a necessity, or will be a necessity, for the issue of bonds. Why, sir, I read a moment ago the last communications that we have had from the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject, and we have no evidence that he has changed his mind, in which he says:

I understand that the Secretary of the Interior has transmitted to Congress an estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions—

The only man who can know, the only man authorized to speak; and in February last the Commissioner of Pensions had made this estimate—of the amount necessary to pay the arrears of pensions under this act, as follows:

For the payment of arrears on pensions granted prior to the passage of the act	$34,000,000
For the payment of arrears that may be allowed during the current fiscal year	2,500,000
And for those that may be allowed during the next fiscal year	5,000,000
Making a total of	41,500,000

In the bill of that session we only provided for paying these pensioners to the amount of $25,000,000, yet, as shown by the Commissioner of Pensions, at the close of the next fiscal year there will be $41,500,000 due these men, and we only made an appropriation, as I said, of $25,000,000, about $2,000,000 a month, because the money was not in the Treasury, as this letter of the Secretary says. Sir, what does he say? I will incorporate the whole of this letter of the Secretary in my remarks, so that it all can go together. After showing that there would be a deficit of $27,062,419.71 at the close of next year, he says this:

It would thus appear that the sinking fund must be entirely ignored and twenty-seven millions be provided for by additional legislation.

The Secretary of the Treasury says there must be additional legislation to meet it. He has never taken that back. He further says:

This may be accomplished by the imposition of some new tax adequate for the purpose, or by authorizing the money to be borrowed upon 4 per cent. bonds, which, in the present state of the market, can be sold at par.

As new taxes cannot be immediately productive, it is recommended that authority be given to raise the amount necessary by the sale of 4 per cent. bonds described in the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1879.

SIR: I am in receipt of the communication of your committee of the 7th instant, asking whether it is my intention to submit an estimate for the payment of arrears of pensions under the act of January 25, 1879.

I understand that the Secretary of the Interior has transmitted to Congress an estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions of the amount necessary to pay the arrears of pensions under this act, as follows:

For the payment of arrears on pensions granted prior to the passage of the act	$34,000,000
For the payment of arrears that may be allowed during the current fiscal year	2,500,000
And for those that may be allowed during the next fiscal year	5,000,000
Making a total of	41,500,000

In my last annual report I estimated the revenue for the next fiscal year as follows:

From customs	$133,000,000 00
From internal revenue	115,000,000 00
From miscellaneous sources	16,500,000 00
Total	264,500,000 00

Amount brought forward	$264,500,000 00
The expenditures, exclusive of the sinking-fund, were estimated at	236,334,912 68
Leaving a surplus of	28,165,087 32
The revenue from customs for the seven months of the present fiscal year ending January 31, 1879, was	$78,185,719 13
And for the corresponding period of last year	75,856,995 46
Showing an increase of	2,328,723 67

at which rate of increase the estimated amount for the next fiscal year may be realized.

The receipts from internal revenue for the same periods were as follows:

For 1879	$66,022,190 23
For 1878	64,744,708 78
Showing an increase of	1,277,481 45

This rate of increase will not give more than $112,500,000 for this year, and no increase may be expected for the following year, under present laws. If, however, the tax on tobacco is reduced as is proposed, the total receipts from internal revenue for the next fiscal year will not exceed $106,600,000 and may fall as low as $104,000,000.

The receipts from miscellaneous sources may be increased $2,000,000 during this year and a corresponding amount over the estimates for next year.

The expenditures for the first seven months of the current fiscal year were	$152,690,941 06
And for the same period last year	141,092,848 15
Showing an increase of	11,598,092 91
From which should be deducted the amount paid for the Halifax award	5,500,000 00
Leaving a net increase of	6,098,092 91
If to this be added the amount necessary for the payment of arrears of pensions	41,500,000 00
And the expenditures for the last fiscal year	236,964,326 80
The total estimated expenditures for the next fiscal year will be	284,562,419 71
The receipts, as estimated, will be—
From customs	$133,000,000 00
From internal revenue	106,000,000 00
From miscellaneous sources	18,500,000 00
Total	257,500,000 00
Leaving a deficiency of	27,062,419 71

This estimate is based upon the assumption that the expenditures for the balance of the fiscal year will not be increased by unusual deficiencies, and that the appropriations for the next fiscal year will not exceed in other respects the amounts appropriated for this fiscal year.

The saving of interest resulting from the refunding of the debt will not inure to the benefit of the Treasury for the present, as the double interest paid during the three months allowed by law and the necessary expenses will offset the decrease in the interest account.

It would thus appear that the sinking fund must be entirely ignored and twenty-seven millions be provided for by additional legislation.

This may be accomplished by the imposition of some new tax adequate for the purpose, or by authorizing the money to be borrowed upon 4 per cent. bonds, which, in the present state of the market, can be sold at par.

As new taxes cannot be immediately productive, it is recommended that authority be given to raise the amount necessary by the sale of 4 per cent. bonds described in the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

The Senator from Iowa said that we now have, as is shown by the last debt statement, $145,000,000 in the Treasury, and of course will have plenty of money without issuing bonds; but here is a more remarkable statement—when that bill was pending, when the Secretary of the Treasury made that report, signed that document, in the same month, February, 1879, he issued his debt statement, which I now hold in my hand, signed by him, which stated that there was a total of cash in the Treasury of $447,292,498.48, more than three times as much money in the Treasury when he sent that letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as there is to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. I have stated it on the 1st of May.

Mr. HEREFORD. And yet, in February, when he wrote us that letter, he stated that he had $447,000,00 in the Treasury. Now they say there is no necessity for this provision when they say there is only $145,000,000 and odd in the Treasury.

Here is the appropriation bill for the pensions arrears:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, namely: For the arrears of pensions due on claims in which the pensions were allowed prior to January 25, 1879, $25,000,000; the amounts paid out respectively for Army and Navy pensions to be accounted for separately to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

Nobody who has had claims allowed since that date can get a dollar.

Mr. ALLISON. Now will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEREFORD. In one moment. What becomes of the Senator's argument in the way of figures when he said "how will you need money to pay this when we have got $140,000,000 in the Treasury," when the Secretary at the same time that he said there must be an additional tax, or the money borrowed and bonds issued at 4 per cent., told us in the same month that there were four hundred and forty odd millions of money in the Treasury?

Mr. ALLISON. Now I want to ask the honorable Senator from West Virginia if there were $27,000,000 of a deficit when that letter was written and we now provide here for $8,000,000 of that deficit, how does he propose to provide for the residue?

Mr. HEREFORD. Out of the general fund, of course.

Mr. ALLISON. What general fund?

Mr. HEREFORD. Any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. ALLISON. So I supposed.

Mr. HEREFORD. We give this much additional. Here are eight or ten millions lying there idle, and we say rather than have an additional tax or bonds issued, as the Secretary proposes in his letter, which he has never taken back, let us put that eight or ten millions in circulation. We then save eight millions of bonds, unless the Secretary made a misrepresentation.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I know my colleague and my friend behind me [Mr. BECK] do not mean that this provision allows the Secretary to issue any bonds, and consequently I am a little concerned about my position on this question. I hope the Senators will not argue that this bill makes any provision whatever for the issuing of bonds. It cannot make one cent's difference in that respect.

Mr. HEREFORD. Nobody pretends that this clause, whether it remains in the bill or is stricken out, makes any difference as to the issuance of bonds to-day; but the point is this: the Secretary says if you do not do something, if there is not, in the language of the Secretary, some additional legislation, he cannot pay the pension arrearages. That is what he says.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now I ask my colleague when the Secretary of the Treasury said that?

Mr. HEREFORD. Here is what he said——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. When was it?

Mr. HEREFORD. On the 9th day of February, 1879.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In the last Congress.

Mr. HEREFORD. The Secretary has never taken that back. That is the last communication from the Secretary that we have—February 9, only three months ago.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But my colleague knows that that and all other things die with the Congress. It has not been renewed with this Congress.

Mr. HEREFORD. Ah! That letter has not died with the Congress; that information has not died with the Congress; those facts, if they were true, have not died with the Congress, and never will die. How can an adjournment of Congress affect a fact or statement such as that I have read?

But my friend from Iowa said a moment ago that that letter was sent in here when the tobacco bill was pending, intimating that it intended to accomplish an object and prevent us from decreasing the enormous tax upon tobacco. Does the Secretary send in false information here to control legislation? That is the logical inference to be drawn from the Senator's statement. But if the Secretary was right then, there is still greater necessity for doing what we propose here to-day than there was in February last, because the Secretary and others told us if you make this reduction upon tobacco you deplete the Treasury to the extent of $11,000,000. We did pass that bill reducing the tax on tobacco. Then, if he was right, we have depleted the Treasury $11,000,000, and hence there is greater reason why this bill as it passed the House should remain as it is on this subject. And, further, if we allow this provision to remain as it came from the House it will throw into circulation eight or ten millions more of money than we now have, and which is now lying idle. That would be reason enough for me to vote to retain the provision of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORDON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations striking out the clause which has been read.

Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BOOTH. I do not desire, Mr. President, to protract this discussion. In my mind the adoption of this provision of the bill as it came from the House will no more interfere with the resumption of specie payments than it will with the precession of the equinoxes. So long as United States legal-tenders can be converted into 4 per cent. certificates that are worth more than gold and silver there need be no apprehension in any mind, however morbid it may be on the subject, that the equivalency of legal-tenders and gold and silver will not be maintained.

Mr. President, how did these legal-tenders get into the Treasury of the United States? Not by any legerdemain, not by any hocus-pocus, but each one of them represents a United States 5 per cent. bond. The Secretary of the Treasury sold 5 per cent. bonds for silver bullion, coined the silver bullion into subsidiary coin, and exchanged the coin for legal-tenders. It is quite common, it is a familiar practice, to supply a defective argument by an assumption of superior morality and an implied charge of bad faith. Mr. President, there is a kind of virtue which is most suspected when it is most often proclaimed; but I have not heard that the Pharisees by reason of long prayers were rightfully entitled to the highest seats in the temple. I believe in that virtue which is so robust that it is not afraid to exhibit itself in the open air, and does not have occasion to make constant proclamation of its own superiority. It is assumed that the very value of this fractional currency depended upon this pledge, as it is called, a pledge which was not made until years and years after the fractional currency was issued.

I like reports from the Secretary of the Treasury; his facts are valuable, his comments are interesting, and his sermons, if I may borrow a word, are paradoxical. I beg to read one or two extracts from the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury to the honorable Senator from Delaware. First:

It is not probable that the reissue of this reserve, as proposed, will injuriously affect the resumption fund; but this reserve was one of the steps in the process of resumption, and if the legislative stipulation with the public to hold this as a special fund for a purpose, so carefully and precisely stated, is to be set aside for the purpose of meeting a deficiency in the revenue caused by excessive appropriations, any other fund, such as those for the redemption of the gold, the silver, and the currency certificates, may with equal propriety be impaired.

Now, I say that the measure by which these legal-tenders got into the Treasury was not and was never intended as a step toward resumption. No such thing was thought of; it is an after-thought, and in this letter it is a subterfuge. The only object of the enactment of that law was to give the subsidiary coin a quicker and easier circulation. There was a demand for it in excess of the fractional currency that was presented for redemption, and that it might get out of the Treasury this was passed as a temporary measure. There was no thought of making it a part of the plan of redemption, and the Secretary knows it.

Then at the close of this letter the Secretary says:

Is it not better that any deficiency in the revenue be honestly and openly met by the issue of bonds, if necessary, rather than by an indirection to increase the debt at a sacrifice of the good faith of the nation?

Mr. President, at the time that paragraph was written the text upon which it was a comment had passed the House of Representatives, and upon the action of one House of this Congress that paragraph embodies three distinct insults:

Is it not better that any deficiency in the revenue be honestly and openly met—

As if it was proposed to meet it dishonorably and covertly—

by the issue of bonds—

Nothing in the estimation of our Secretary is so honorable and so open and so desirable as the issue of bonds. Having gained for himself the credit of placing a part of the indebtedness of this nation in 4 per cent. bonds, he seems to have entered into a partnership with Wall street to impress on the people the idea that he is paying the national debt out of his own pocket, [laughter]— if necessary, rather than by an indirection to increase the debt at a sacrifice of the good faith of the nation.

"Indirection!" Mr. President, I say that the Secretary of the Treasury knows—no man knows better—that this eight million out of the ten million of a special reserve is not held for the purpose which he says it is. It is not held, and he does not intend to use it, for the purpose of redeeming fractional currency. The "indirection" in the whole transaction is that he desires to contract the currency to that amount, and makes use of this law as a pretext for doing it, and takes shelter behind the letter of the law to do that which the spirit of the law neither authorizes nor contemplates.

I was somewhat amused at the Senator from Iowa assuming that in this provision for the payment of arrearages of pensions we were insulting the soldiers. That is another paradox. I suppose we could remove the insult and they would accept our apology if we should refuse to pay. The Senator from West Virginia suggested that the silver in the Treasury should be used for this purpose! Suppose this eight million should be used for the payment of the pensioners' claims, why is not the silver in the Treasury available for the redemption of these legal-tenders when they are put in circulation?

I repeat what I have said before, that this money has been obtained for the Treasury by the sale of bonds; it is lying there as idle and dead capital, and we are called upon by the Secretary of the Treasury to meet this which he calls an excessive appropriation either by the imposition of additional taxes or by the sale of additional bonds. If this resumption policy of ours stands upon so nice a point that the issue of this $8,000,000 which belongs to us is to disturb it, for Heaven's sake let us abandon it and build up one on a more solid foundation that will not be disturbed by the very breath of the air.

Mr. WALLACE. I would not rise to say a single word on this subject but for the fact that the Appropriations Committee is in the gap; as one of the committee I am with the Senator from Kentucky against the amendment of the Appropriations Committee and I feel that we are simply performing our duty in standing by the bill as it came from the House.

All this talk about the pledge of the faith of the Government, when we come to look at the statutes, is the merest bosh, for we find that by the act of 1875 fractional currency was made redeemable in silver coin. There were no legal-tender notes put up as a pledge for its redemption. The Secretary obtained power then to insure resumption by the sale of bonds, and he has never been denied that power since; he has exercised it with a force and vim that has crushed the business interests of this country in a way in which they were never crushed before.

In the act of April 14, 1876, I find that the powers given in the act of 1875 are supplemented by additional authority for the redemption of the fractional currency, and the Secretary was directed to issue silver coin in redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency, but there is no word there about a pledge of the faith of the Government to the redemption of the fractional currency by putting up greenbacks in its room.

I then turn to the joint resolution of July 22, 1876, referred to in this clause of the pending bill, and I find this:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such limits and regulations as will best secure a just and fair distribution of the same through the country, may issue the silver coin at any time in the Treasury to an amount not exceeding $10,000,000, in exchange for an equal amount of legal-tender notes; and the notes so received in exchange shall be kept as a special fund separate and apart from all other money in the Treasury, and be reissued only upon the retirement and destruction of a like sum of fractional currency received at the Treasury in payment of dues to the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will not omit to read the remaining part of this section.

Mr. WALLACE. I will read it:

And said fractional currency, when so substituted, shall be destroyed and held as part of the sinking fund, as provided in the act approved April 17, 1876.

Certainly that was what was to be done with the fractional currency. Now, it is said that these $10,000,000 were put aside as a special fund for the redemption of the fractional currency then outstanding, and to be kept for that purpose as a pledge. I turn to the statement furnished by the Treasury officials to the Senator from Kentucky, and I find that $25,595,000 have been actually redeemed. Of this total of fractional currency there was redeemed previous to the 1st of August, 1876, which is eight days after the passage of the act of the 22d of July, 1876, $8,605,000, thus showing that there have been redeemed $16,990,000 of the fractional currency from eight days after the 22d of July, 1876, until the 1st of May, 1879, and the amount of legal-tenders in the Treasury, $10,000,000, placed there by this statute, is reduced but $1,600,000, there being yet remaining there $8,400,000 of these legal-tender notes. With what, then, were these $16,990,000 of fractional currency redeemed? It was not with the $10,000,000 of legal-tenders, for $8,400,000 are there yet, but on the contrary they were redeemed with the subsidiary silver coin then being minted and then in the Treasury, thus showing plainly and clearly that the idea that the $10,000,000 were there as a pledge is utterly baseless.

How was this a pledge or how break our faith when this fractional currency was already in circulation and in the hands of its holders years before the act of 1876 was passed? A pledge is something made or given at the time or before a man invests his money and takes the paper of the Government. These small notes were already in circulation. It is plain from this that it was simply proposed to hold the $10,000,000 with the grasp that the Treasury has always held legal-tenders to prevent them obtaining circulation throughout the country and to reduce the volume of the currency. It has redeemed $15,390,000 of the fractional currency with silver coin since the passage of the act of 1876, and but $1,600,000 of the legal-tender notes have been used for that purpose; and yet, says the Secretary, true there is coming in but $12,000 a month of this currency, but we ought still to keep the remainder of the $10,000,000 there! If he could redeem fifteen millions of this currency with silver coin he can redeem the remainder in the same way; and I apprehend the country will appreciate the truth of this proposition and estimate at its true value this effort to retain in his grasp $8,400,000 of legal-tenders.

We have made a pledge, an agreement that is a pledge of our faith; it is that we will promptly pay the arrearages of pensions to the soldiers. That is a pledge that is written in light in the history of pension legislation and in the history of the country, and we are bound to redeem it. The Secretary of the Treasury within the last three months recommends the enactment of a law under which he will have bonds sold to obtain money to pay this indebtedness, to fulfill this pledge, and the Finance Committee reports to the Senate a bill to sell the bonds of the Government to place an added interest-bearing debt on this people in order that he may keep his legal-tenders and pay the pensioners. It was not passed and ought not to be, for we have here $8,400,000 of the notes of the Government lying idle, with no purpose to serve, in the Treasury. This section of this bill simply enacts that they may be used for the payment of the pension arrearages in order that this debt may be paid at the earliest practicable day.

Why shall this not be done? It is said that it endangers resumption, and that the silver coin ought to be issued in exchange. I can tell Senators that the resumption that they boast of is not worth a rush if they take from the Treasury the legal-tender silver coin that is the real bulwark for the protection of the par of the legal-tender note of the country. It is the ability to use that silver coin in payment of the paper obligations of the Government that protects the gold that is in the Treasury, and the option that is in the control of the Secretary of the Treasury is the only safeguard of your boasted accomplished resumption. What is the character of this resumption? A resumption in which when you ask for coin you cannot get it; a resumption in which in the great mercantile city in the State which I represent here, when you go to the sub-treasury or a bank with the obligations of the Federal Government, indorsed payable in coin, you are told it cannot be paid here in gold coin. Such a thing occurred on the day of the so-called resumption to a banker in the State of Pennsylvania who went to the sub-treasury there with a warrant of the Government indorsed on its back "payable in coin" at that place and he was denied payment, referred to the assistant treasurer at New York. This is the resumption that we have. It is, as has been well said by the Senator from Indiana, simply an equalization of the currency, it is confidence in our solvency, no more no less.

Sir, I have no words of praise for this system. I believe that it is a vicious system; I believe that it is a system against which the peo ple of this country will speak when they have an opportunity to speak, in vigorous tones. They want a different system; one in which their interests, and not those of syndicates and bankers, are considered.

But, sir, my purpose in rising simply was to show that the pledge that is talked about in these statutes is no pledge at all; that on the contrary the Treasury itself has negatived its very terms, if it ever existed, and has actually paid out in redemption of fractional currency more than fifteen millions of silver coin in the room of these ten millions of legal-tender notes which during these years have been held idle for payment of this very currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall vote in favor of the recommendation of the committee to strike out this clause of the bill, without regard to the question that has been discussed of the propriety of such legislation if it were independent, but as being a vicious provision in an appropriation bill. It ought to go out in any case; it is no place in an appropriation bill to discuss and pass upon the financial questions that this clause involves.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CONKLING, (when Mr. CARPENTER's name was called.) The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] whose name is just called is absent from the Senate in consequence of indisposition. He is paired on all questions upon which they might differ with the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] and this being one of those questions, at his request I announce his pair.

Mr. MCDONALD, (when his name was called.) As stated by the Senator from New York, I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this amendment.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is absent, paired on all political questions with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hampton	Paddock,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOOTH. I propose to offer an amendment to the text of the clause: in line 1700, after the word "adjusted," I move to insert "that portion of."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will reserve his amendment until the amendments offered by the Committee on Appropriations have been disposed of. It will then be entertained.

Mr. BOOTH. It will take but a moment and we may as well perfect this clause. I will modify my amendment and move to strike out "$10,000,000 in."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is unanimous consent, the Chair will entertain the amendment.

Mr. BOOTH. The clause will then read "the legal-tender currency."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is objection, the rule will be observed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think there is any rule of the Senate that precludes a Senator from offering an amendment now, and the Chair cannot enforce understandings. I hope the Chair will not put it as a question of the legal order of the Senate because that would make a bad precedent. The Senator from California has the right to offer this amendment at this time, I submit, if he wishes to do so.

Mr. BOOTH. I suppose everybody will agree to it. It is only to perfect the text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that there was an agreement to the effect that the Senate should proceed with the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations; but if it is the pleasure of the Senate to entertain another amendment, that will be done.

Mr. BECK. The Chair is right.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from California will let his amendment lie.

Mr. BECK. While the Chair is right, the Senator from California is strictly correct under the agreement, which was, as I understand, that whenever an amendment proposed was to an amendment offered by the committee, that was to be passed upon at the time. Therefore the amendment offered by the Senator from California, being an amendment to an amendment of the committee, is in order.

Mr. EATON. Was there any suggestion of that character made on the floor of the Senate by anybody? If so, I did not hear it.

Mr. BECK. There was, and because of that the Senator from Iowa offered an amendment to an amendment of the committee.

Mr. EATON. I think we had better proceed orderly.

Mr. BECK. I am willing to agree to whatever is necessary to perfect the text of the bill; but I care nothing about it one way or the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Kentucky says that this is an amendment to the amendment of the committee, and would be therefore within what was supposed to be the understanding.

Mr. BECK. I think so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it were an amendment to the amendment of the committee, it would not need to depend upon any understanding, because it would be, on all rules, in order as a matter of course. But the amendment of the committee has been rejected; here there is no amendment of the committee now. You have got the text of the bill in this respect just as it came here.

I wish to say again, sir, that in my opinion the Senator from California has the right to offer, and that you are bound to receive, his amendment and submit it to the Senate if he chooses to offer it. There is a universal courtesy in favor of the committee, by which the Senate always goes through with the amendments of the committee, but that courtesy is one of which Senators themselves must judge as to whether on particular occasions they feel justified in departing from it; and it is only for the sake of preserving the legal order of the Senate that I make this suggestion. I do not care whether he offers it now or at any other time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that he simply wished to call the attention of the Senator from California to the understanding. Of course the Chair will entertain the amendment if he insists upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is quite right.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling of the Chair is that the Senator has a right under the general rules of the Senate to offer the amendment; and the Chair simply called the attention of the Senator from California to the agreement which had been made.

Mr. BOOTH. I do not offer any amendment at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will continue.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "United States Patent Office," in line 1726, after the word "interferences," to insert "$2,500;" so as to read:

Examiner in charge of interferences, $2,500.

And in line 1728, to increase the appropriation for compensation of trade-mark examiner and twenty-two principal examiners from $2,250 each to $2,400 each.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Kentucky be kind enough to tell me whether these amendments increase the salaries that the law has hitherto provided?

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that our committee restores them merely to the law as it exists now, the House having cut them down. They had received $2,500 as early as 1848; this was cut down three or four years ago, and upon the representation of the facts we thought they ought not to be cut down any more.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is satisfactory to me.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the same clause, line 1740, to increase the number of copyist clerks, at $900 each, from sixty to seventy-four.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, line 1746, to reduce the appropriation for compensation of ten attendants in model-room from $900 each to $800 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in same clause, line 1747, to increase the number of laborers from thirty to forty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, line 1749, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for compensation of the Commissioner of Patents and clerks and employés in his office from $395,550 to $417,450.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1765, to increase the appropriation "for contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the Patent Office" from $30,000 to $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the proviso to the clause making appropriations for contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the Patent Office, after the word "than," in line 1765, to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That not more than $20,000 of this sum may be used for employment of temporary clerks, at not more than the rate of $1,000 per annum for each clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1789, after the words "Commissioner of Patents," to strike out "whenever it can" and insert "and in the city of Washington, if it can there;" and in line 1791, after the word "the," to strike out "Commissioner" and insert "Secretary of the Interior;" so as to make the clause read:

For photolithographing, or otherwise producing copies of the weekly issues of drawings, to be attached to patents and copies, $35,000; the work of said photolithographing, or otherwise producing plates and copies, referred to in this and the two preceding paragraphs to be done under the supervision of the Commissioner of Patents, and in the city of Washington, if it can there be done at reasonable rates to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior; and the Commissioner of Patents, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to make contracts therefor.

Mr. BECK. I know there will be some discussion about this matter, and I will say that the committee had a great deal of trouble about it. Before any discussion is had, I should be glad to send to the Clerk's desk to be read a communication from the Secretary of the Interior upon the subject. The committee had a good deal of difficulty about the clause. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] addressed a communication to the Secretary, in the absence of the chairman. I desire to have this reply read, because this is a clause which will perhaps provoke some discussion, and I desire Senators shall have the communication of the Secretary before them before the discussion begins.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 10, 1879.

SIR: In response to the communication of yesterday upon the subject of photolithographing for the Patent Office, I transmit herewith a statement upon the subject, from which it appears that former experiments of having the work done outside this city have resulted in failure, annoyance, and loss to the Treasury.

Very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,
United States Senate.

Hon. C. SCHURZ,
Secretary of the Interior:

In response to your request of the 9th instant the following data is submitted, giving some of the reasons why the work of photolithographing the weekly issues of patents should be done in the city of Washington.

First. The drawings of the weekly issues of patents are numbered, dated, &c., prior to their date, in anticipation of issuance, to enable the office to receive and examine proofs of drawings and specifications, print copies, correct errors, print Official Gazette, &c., so that on the date of a patent the same are ready for sale and delivery.

Second. The drawings from which reproductions are made (as delivered to contractors) are passed cases only, therefore are pending applications and not patents. The rules of the office are imperative that no information relative thereto shall be given to unauthorized parties. Evidently if the work were performed outside of the city great facilities would be afforded for obtaining such information as would imperil the interests of inventors.

Third. The necessity of accessibility for reference at any moment and at all times is imperative for the reconsideration of examiners' actions and comparison with proofs of specifications.

Fourth. A serious objection is that correction of errors as suggested on rejected proofs of drawings cannot be made without comparison with the original drawings.

Fifth. These drawings should not leave the city as they are the only official record, until reproduced in existence, and if damaged or destroyed could not be replaced without great loss to inventors and the office.

Sixth. That in the limited time (namely, one and one-half days from delivery of drawings to contractor) for the receipt of proof-sheet it would be impossible to perform the work elsewhere.

Seventh. That the original drawings from which examinations for patents are made would have to be retained from their proper folios at least one month after the date of the patents for the reproduction of the quarto-page or library edition, thus rendering the issuing of defective patents possible.

Eighth. In order to issue the Official Gazette with even date of issue of patents, it is imperative that the proofs of drawings should be available within the specified time, as the Gazette is reproduced from said proof-sheets.

The experiment has been twice tried of having this class of work done in other places since September, 1876, and in both cases the delay in receipt of copies and retarding of the office work necessitated the annulling of the contracts. It caused endless annoyance and loss to inventors, attorneys, and the office, and a corresponding decrease in money receipts for copies by the office.

The photolithographic reproduction of drawings of weekly issue of patents has been performed in this city ever since 1869, with the exception of two years and three months when the negatives were made here. The office furnished a room free of cost, constructed sky-lights, &c., for the use of the contractors.

The American Photolithograph Company of New York was the first company outside of Washington that received a contract for this class of work. A brief synopsis of a memorandum relative thereto, dated September 18, 1876, is submitted:

"The greatest delay occurred in the retention of the drawings for the quarto-page edition, the contractors failing in time. In some instances the drawings were retained from the office folios for two or three months after the issuance of the patents, thus endangering the interests of inventors by the liability of the office granting defective patents."

Complaints naturally arose of the delay in the general work of the office by such retention, and especially in the withholding of patents from issue, many being held for weeks after their regular date of issue awaiting correct copies of the drawings, which had to be sent from New York.

The second attempt to let this work outside the city was in September, 1876, a contract having been made with Osgood & Co., of Boston, Massachusetts.

On the 17th of October, 1876, the following report was furnished relative to their work:

PATENT OFFICE, October 17, 1876.

SIR: We have the honor, respectfully, to report in regard to the current drawings under the Osgood contract.

Out of two hundred and fifty-one cases in issue of October 10, 1876, embracing about the same number of drawings, proofs of one hundred and twenty-nine sheets of drawings have been received. These proofs came in four lots. Of the first three lots making ninety drawings, but two were accepted by the proof-readers. Of the last lot of thirty-eight drawings, twenty-one are accepted and seventeen rejected.

The last lot of drawings above referred to was accompanied by the annexed letter from Osgood & Co. The drawings were thus evidently prepared with care after knowledge of former rejections.

Under the contract the office had a right to demand the full number of one hundred and fifty printed copies of the drawings before this date, though it is fair to say that this part of the contract has never been very rigidly insisted on. The advance proof, however, is imperatively required, and, averaging the time, has all been due four days, instead of which we have proof in but little more than half the cases, and only twenty-three cases are accepted, less than 10 per cent. of the whole issue. The work of October 17 should have been in hand five days ago, but was stopped owing to the unsatisfactory character of the drawings of October 10.

The work of Osgood & Co. is very inferior as will be seen by examination of the proofs submitted. There is a general tendency to rottenness or raggedness of lines. Some of the lines, it will be observed, thicken instead of reducing under the camera. Where the work is at all close there is a tendency to fill up, and shaded portions appear in blotches. The shading on cylindrical parts looks crowded. Many of the clearest lines are entirely broken.

As a whole the work is much inferior to any which has been received by the office under any former contract, and in a large proportion of cases the reproductions cannot be certified to as true copies of the originals.

Respectfully,

A. A. YEATMAN,
W. A. BARTLETT.

Hon. R. H. DUELL,
Commissioner of Patents.

On the 29th of November, 1876, their contract was annulled, as see:

PATENT OFFICE, November 29, 1876.

It is hereby ordered that the contract for photolithographic work between James R. Osgood & Co., of the first part, and the United States, by R. H. Duell, of the second part, dated the 8th day of September, 1876, be annulled and considered of no effect from and after this date, said party of the first part having failed to comply with the terms of the contract as to quality of work and time of its delivery.

R. H. DUELL, Commissioner.

Approved.

Z. CHANDLER.

In view of above, the Graphic Company being the next lowest bidders were addressed as follows:

NOVEMBER 29, 1876.

Managers the Graphic Company:

GENTLEMEN: The firm of Osgood & Co. having failed to comply with the terms of their agreement in regard to time for delivery of their work, their contract for printing current and one-quarter page work has been annulled.

If you can undertake to do the work at once on the usual conditions as set forth in office circular of August 15, your bid of August 31 will be accepted.

R. H. DUELL,
Commissioner.

The said company failing in time and quality of work, their contract was also annulled, as see:

DECEMBER 13, 1876.

Managers the Graphic Company:

GENTLEMEN: As you were before notified, the Secretary of the Interior has decided that the contract for current work must be relet, and advertisements to that effect have been issued.

I am informed that a large proportion of the cases on which you are at present at work are not satisfactory, and am directed to abrogate the agreement under which you are now working.

R. H. DUELL,
Commissioner.

The failure in time, &c., necessitated reletting the work, and bids having been received a contract was entered into with the resident contractor, who was to receive the work from January, 1877, with orders to complete the missing cases from and including the issue of October 10, 1876.

The following summary of time of receipt of work under non-resident contractors is submitted:

Osgood & Co., minimum time between receipt of first drawing and first proof	6 days.
Graphic Company, minimum time between receipt of first drawing and first proof	5 days.
Osgood & Co., maximum time	48 days.
Graphic Company, maximum time	62 days.

The class of work referred to should not be confounded with the reproduction and publication of the Official Gazette, as its only connection with said Gazette is the necessity of furnishing on time the proofs from which the plates for the Gazette are printed.

The work of the Official Gazette has always been done outside of Washington, as ample time is allowed for its reproduction, proof-sheets not being called for.

In conclusion, I beg leave to state that in every attempt to perform this class of work in other cities the result has been endless annoyance and loss of money to inventors and the office. It also has given just cause of complaint, and must be in all respects considered a most vexatious, expensive experiment. The absolute failure of three companies of good standing and evident facilities to perform the work demonstrates the utter inexpediency of sending from this city this class of work, which demands the utmost promptness and attention in its execution.

Very respectfully,

F. A. SEELY,
Chief Clerk.

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE,
May 10, 1879.

Respectfully forwarded to the Honorable Secretary of the Interior.

H. E. PAINE,
Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that this amendment was based upon that communication and a personal statement made to us by General Paine, the Commissioner of Patents, fully indorsing and corroborating what is said in that paper. He believes it indispensable that he shall have the right to have this work done here in Washington, if he can, and we give him authority. However, if he cannot have it done here without being imposed upon, then to resort to the next best means to have it done in proper shape. I am free to say that where work can be done under bids and given to the lowest bidder, ordinarily, I think it ought to be done in that way; but the Secretary and the Commissioner seemed to make out such a strong case in the statement just read that the committee believed we ought to make the amendment that we have proposed. Several gentlemen, especially the Senator from Massachusetts, now absent, [Mr. DAWES,] called my attention to the fact that great complaint was made about it, and I thought before discussion was had the communication had better be read.

Mr. HOAR. I have no personal information in regard to this matter; but my colleague, who is absent, [Mr. DAWES,] left some papers with me and desired me to call the attention of the Senate to this subject.

As I understand it, this matter was very fully discussed, and the reasons which are set forth in the letter that has been read were before the committee of the last House, and they adhered to the law as found in the text of the present bill, and the present House have done the same thing.

I do not understand, whatever force may be given to the reasons which have been read at the Clerk's desk, why it was deemed necessary by the committee to take away at the request of the Commissioner of Patents his own discretion in the matter. If the reasons which are in the mind of the Commissioner of Patents cannot be removed, then of course he will make a contract for this work in Washington under the original bill; but if they are removed, then it seems to me he ought to have the right to make the contract wherever he chooses.

This amendment transfers the jurisdiction over the matter from the Commissioner of Patents to the Secretary of the Interior, who certainly has very little personal familiarity with the subject; and it requires the Secretary to make his contract in the city of Washington if the work can be done in the city of Washington at reasonable rates. It may turn out that there may be some other difficulty with the work done in Wasington besides the reasonableness of the rates or that all the evil which is set forth in the Commissioner's communication can be removed and guarded against. I do not see any connection at all between the letter which has just been read and the amendment recommended by the committee. The Commissioner says that in his judgment it is for the public interest to have this work done in Washington. Very well. The committee thereupon say that the discretion over that matter shall be removed from the Commissioner and transferred to the Secretary of the Interior. It certainly is not a very logical result from the proposition.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator from New York proceeds allow me to say that as these officers desired it to be done in the city of Washington and done at reasonable rates, the Committee on Appropriations thought they were adding an additional safeguard when they said it should be done to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior instead of the Commissioner of Patents, and then authorized the Commissioner of Patents, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to make the contract. As it was somewhat of a departure from the ordinary way of making contracts, we thought it was safer to have the sanction both of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Patents rather than leave it all to the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky if the committee's amendment does not remove from the discretion of the Commissioner of Patents the vital question whether the work can be done at reasonable rates in the city of Washington, and transfer that to the Secretary of the Interior, except so far as the law makes it absolute and not discretionary? That was my point.

Mr. BECK. Our idea was that as the contracts were to be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior by the Commissioner of Patents, it might be an additional safeguard to have the Secretary determine whether the rates are reasonable and then to allow the contract to be made by the Commissioner under his direction, instead of having it all done by the Commissioner of Patents without allowing the Secretary of the Interior to see it, he being the chief of that Department and the Commissioner of Patents being one of his bureau officers. In the conference at the last session both Houses, so far as they agreed on anything, concurred in the same language in substance that we now propose, except that it read thus:

And the Commissioner of Patents, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to make contracts therefor.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, this bill, if I am correctly informed, was reported to the House in the form that it is now substantially in this regard. In other words, the bill as introduced there required the work to be done in the city of Washington. Upon attention being called to the fact that there was but one party in this city who is prepared to do the work here, the House by an almost unanimous vote struck out the restriction that the work should be done in this city and sent the bill here in the form that it came to the Senate.

I wish to call the attention of the gentlemen of the committee to the propriety of retaining this clause of the bill as it passed the House, changing the word "whenever," in line 1789, to "wherever." Then it would leave the Secretary discretion enough to protect the Government, while he might invite persons elsewhere to compete for the work. The clause would then read: "the work to be done under the supervision of the Commissioner of Patents wherever it can be done at reasonable rates to the satisfaction of the Commissioner," or the Secretary, if you choose to make that change. That is the language of the House bill. If we leave it, changing the word "whenever," if that be not a misprint, to "wherever," leaving the work to be under the direction of the Commissioner of Patents wherever it can be done at reasonable rates to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, I think it will be in the proper shape.

My attention was called to this, I will frankly say, by a person living elsewhere, who had at a former period done some of this work. Of course I listened to the communications from the Secretary of the Interior and the head of the Patent Office, and they have great weight with me; but if you put this language in the form proposed by the committee, the Secretary will regard it as a legislative direction, I think, that he shall give the work to this one party in the city of Washington, for I understand, and the committee probably will confirm me, that there is but one party here who can do the work.

I think if we leave the House bill as it is with the simple change of the word "whenever" to "wherever," it will enable the Secretary to have the work done wherever it can be done to his satisfaction, and let parties in New York and Philadelphia and Boston (as I understand there are parties who do this work in all these places) have an opportunity to compete. Then the Secretary can at least say to the party here, "You must do it lower than you offer, or I will try to make more satisfactory arrangements with these other parties." Therefore I submit to the committee that it should be put in this form and not left to be construed as a legislative direction that the Secretary shall contract with only one party in the city of Washington.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, this matter of photolithographing is a very important matter indeed. These photolithographs are official; they are used in courts; they are really, when issued, official evidence; and it is very important that the work should be well done. When I assumed the control of the Interior Department I found a contract with some party at a distance, and great complaint was made not only of delays which were of daily and hourly occurrence, but of imperfect work.

This is a matter of profit to the Government. My impression is, without absolute recollection, that these things cost about half a cent apiece and are sold by the Department for about ten cents apiece; I speak in round sums without being accurate as to fractions. It is of absolutely vital importance that the work should not only be promptly done under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Patents or some man with authority to see that it is properly done under his eye, but that it should be so done as to be ready when wanted. I think the requirement that it shall be done at reasonable rates gives the Secretary absolute discretion to use his own judgment in having it done here or elsewhere; and I think that the amendments of the committee are eminently judicious and proper for the interest of the Government as well as the bureau, and I hope the amendments will be adopted precisely as the committee have recommended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, in lines 1789 and 1791.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, in line 1850, to increase the appropriation for compensation of the First Assistant Postmaster-General from $3,500 to $4,000; and, in line 1865, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General from $70,140 to $70,640.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in line 1869, to reduce the item for compensation of the chief of the division of inspection and equipment from $2,250 to $2,000.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senate will not concur in this amendment. I think the committee have not considered the importance of this division as compared with the other divisions in the Department. I find that the chiefs of the other divisions of the Post-Office Department have a salary of $2,250, and the House have given the head of this division the same salary; but the committee of the Senate, it seems, propose to strike off $250, reducing the salary to $2,000. This is the most important division in the whole service of the Post-Office Department. It covers all the mail transportation, all the inspection of the service, the regulation of the forfeitures and breaches of contract. All certificates of service first have to pass through this division before payments are made upon contracts, so that the whole $18,000,000 that is paid out for the transportation of the mails comes under the supervision of this division.

In this connection I will send to the desk to be read a letter which will show substantially the work that is performed by this division and will better state it than I can, so that the Senate can see how important a division this is; and if any chief of division is to have a salary of $2,250 this one should. I notice that the division of dead letters, and the division of postage stamps, as well as the division of mail depredation have chiefs at $2,250, while this, which is as I stated the most important, is reduced to $2,000. I send to the desk a communication addressed to the Postmaster-General and which bears an indorsement by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who has charge of all the mail service of the Government.

Mr. BECK. Is that a letter which was sent to the committee?

Mr. FERRY. It is a copy of a letter addressed to the House of Representatives, or rather addressed to the Postmaster-General and sent to the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Inspection Division, Washington, D. C., February 20, 1878.

SIR: The duties assigned to the inspection division of this office by the Postmaster-General are:

1. The inspection of all evidence of performance of mail service by railroad, steamboat, and "star" routes; the adjustment of all fines and forfeitures against contractors and carriers of the United States mails for breaches of contract or delinquencies, and the preparation of orders fixing the amount of such fines and forfeitures.

2. The issue of certificates of inspection exhibiting the amount of fines and deductions to be charged to each contractor in each quarterly settlement.

3. The receipt and examination of complaints of irregularities in the mail service, and conducting correspondence relating thereto.

4. Conducting all correspondence relating to duty of postmasters in keeping record of performance of all mail service, and of reporting same to the inspection division, as required by the law and the regulations.

5. Any other duties that may be necessary to secure a faithful performance of all mail contracts.

It should be stated that no payments are made to mail contractors for carrying the mails until a certificate of inspection is issued exhibiting the amount of fines and forfeitures, if any, that should be charged to the account of party to be paid. These payments for transportation of the mails amount to over $18,000,000 per annum, as you are aware. The character and importance of the duties assigned to this division may readily be seen from the foregoing statement. It is certainly safe to affirm that a division of an Executive Department that has for its scope of duty the enforcement of the performance of all mail contracts and the administration of the law and regulations of the Department appertaining to the carrying of the mails in every part of the United States should not be ignored as being unimportant.

The purpose of this statement is to show the great and unjust inequality that exists in the salaries of officers classed as chiefs of division.

It will be seen that in this and other Executive Departments they receive salaries ranging from two to three thousand dollars per annum, varying according to the supposed importance or responsibility attached to the office.

The inspection division is composed of seventeen clerks, including the chief of the division, namely, eleven of class 3, two of class 2, and three of class 1. The acting chief of the division, who has occupied the position for five years past, is paid at the rate of $1,800 per annum, out of the appropriation for payment of clerks of class 4. Believing that Congress does not purpose the sanction of such unjust inequalities, I have the honor to submit the case for your consideration, and to pray that relief may be granted.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SAML. M. LAKE,
Acting Chief of Division.

The Honorable the POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

The within application is respectfully referred to Second Assistant Postmaster-General Brady for his opinion in regard thereto.

D. M. KEY, Postmaster-General.

FEBRUARY 23, 1878.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1878.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL:

The inclosed statement of Mr. S. M. Lake, chief of the division of inspection of this bureau, concerning the importance of the work performed by him and his division, is correct in every particular. And his unembellished statement is sufficient proof of the magnitude of his labors.

In addition, Mr. Lake has brought to his duties singular devotion, and has greatly systematized the work of his division.

His request is not unreasonable.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator from Michigan desire to be heard further?

Mr. FERRY. I have said substantially all that I intended to submit, unless it be necessary after the Senator from Kentucky has spoken for me to be heard further. I merely hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BECK. It will be observed that these communications just read were addressed to the last House of Representatives in February, 1879. The House of Representatives, after considering these communications, I assume sent the bill to the Senate, and the Senate agreed with the House in fixing the salary of the chief of division of inspection at $2,000 for the next fiscal year. That is now his salary. Both agreed in the closing days of the last Congress, with this communication before them, to adhere to $2,000. When the bill came before us from the House with $250 added at this session of Congress, desiring to adhere as closely as we could at this extra session to the salaries now being paid, the Senate Committee on Appropriations struck out the $250, leaving it at $2,000 as it now stands and as agreed to by both Houses in the closing hours of the last Congress even after these communications were made known.

In this same bureau of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General the chief clerk of the bureau receives now during the current year and receives by the bill we are now acting upon $2,000. When it was proposed to increase this particular chief of the division of inspection to $2,250 communications came to us from the chief clerk and from his friends urging us to put him up to $2,250, insisting that his duties were the most onerous in that bureau of the Post-Office Department; and we saw, as we see in a great many other cases, that if we increased the pay of this particular person $250 above what it is now, $250 above what both Houses agreed upon even with these communications before the House in the last Congress, we should be obliged to add on $250 or more to the chief clerk of this bureau, as we should to a great many other chief clerks; and therefore we were compelled, without regard to the special merits of any one particular man, either to overthrow all the existing condition of things and go into a general increase of salaries, which we did not think was advisable, or to insist that this particular officer should retain the salary he now has and not open the door for everybody to insist upon being put up equal to him. I do not say that we have always been right; I do not say that the former Appropriations Committees have always guarded everything and equalized all; but the very moment this suggestion was made we were met at once by the chief clerk of this Second Assistant Postmaster-General and his friends, demanding that his salary should be raised when an officer who was not his superior, and perhaps not his equal in point of rank, was increased $250.

It brings up the old question (because there are many meritorious men as there are very many good officers in the Departments) whether we shall go into a general increase of salaries or not. I do not see how we can refuse to put up the chief clerk's salary $250 if we put up the salary of this chief of the division $250, or how we can refuse it to a great many others from whom we have urgent communications. If the Senator from Michigan was to see them, he would be astonished to find how many meritorious officers have not been put up to what their chiefs regard that their merits require. We have increased one or two clerks in this Department. The Land Office made great complaint and we provided for them. So with the Patent Office. There has been no desire on the part of the committee to do anything except to provide so that the public service shall be faithfully maintained; but we did not believe it was a good time to go into a general increase of salaries, and if we once began it we did not see where to end because there are many applications equally urgent. There are five or six assistant attorneys-general whose salaries are unequal. They are very urgent about all being made equal to the highest. Nobody ever suggests to cut down. The leveling is never downward, but always upward.

At this extra session of Congress, with a very short time for investigation, and with a general sort of idea that we ought to get away soon, we did not feel disposed to make a full investigation to see what ought to be done. Therefore we thought the only safe plan was to maintain the existing salaries, as we have done in this case. No doubt this gentleman is a worthy man; but if because of his worth we increase his pay, I do not see where we are going to stop. That is the only objection I have.

Mr. FERRY. If I were pressing here an increase of salary for one head of division, leaving the others at less salary, there would be some consistency in the criticism made by the Senator from Kentucky who has charge of this bill. He states that last session the bill was passed fixing the salary of this chief of division at $2,000. The same bill gave the other chiefs of divisions $2,250. Now, I say in reply to the Senator from Kentucky that a later revision of the same question by the same House of Representatives, where the bill originated, has added $250. I should not open my mouth here in behalf of this one but for the fact that I find this committee on a late revision of this question giving to the heads of divisions who have far less duties to perform and less responsibility $250 more, thus discriminating against a division which has the larger responsibility. I am unable to determine upon what basis this committee have grounded their judgment.

Let me recall to the attention of the Senate the fact that this division is the most important division in the whole Post-Office Department. While there may be chief clerks of bureaus and other clerks in the Department who are desirous of having their salaries increased, yet attached to this head of division are grave responsibilities, and it requires a man capable of deciding. What does he decide? He decides all the cases of breaches of contract; he decides on the adjustment of fines and all penalties incident to breaches of contract; and in fact no payment is made for transportation of the mails, whether by railroad, steamboat, or star service, except after the examination and revision of this head of division and upon his certificate that all the penalties have been adjusted and that the parties are entitled to their pay under the contract. Now, I say that when a division has the control of $18,000,000 of money, the most important branch of the Post-Office Department and the man at the head of this division is asking simply that he be placed on the same basis with the other chiefs of divisions, the request is reasonable. Take the division of dead letters, which has no other duty to perform than to simply look through the dead letters and protect the rights of parties who have matters of importance within those letters. So also the head of the division of postage-stamps; the duties are simple compared with this, requiring no judicial mind to determine upon the interests involved.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I ask the Senator, who has been chairman of the Post-Office Committee for some time and who really does know a great deal of the workings of the Department, whether the persons he now names, the heads of the dead-letter and postage-stamp divisions, are not required to give bond, and a large one?

Mr. FERRY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And this other gentleman is not?

Mr. FERRY. That is true.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I ask the Senator whether this salary is not the same now as it always has been?

Mr. FERRY. That may be.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And now a dollar is worth much more than it was a few years ago when the Senator had charge of the Post-Office Committee, and this salary was not then raised, but is to be raised now.

Mr. FERRY. That may be; but the Senator who has just put in that question has until recently been a subordinate member of the Committee on Appropriations—I refer to it in no offensive sense—and he has recently been honored by the chairmanship of that committee. It would be very unjust to say that because he had heretofore held a subordinate place he should not be the head of that committee now. It is because on a later revision the Senator has been chosen by the democratic party in control of this body and placed at the head of that committee on account of his experience. Now I say because this salary of a smaller amount has been given to the head of this division, it is no reason why the Senate at this time, with better knowledge before it, should not do justice to this head of division.

I say to the Senator from West Virginia, the chairman of this committee—but by the bye he has not charge of this bill at the present time, though is watching it with his eagle eye and his accustomed attention—that the heads of other divisions, with less duties although they give bonds, have not the control of $18,000,000, this large mammoth amount. This is, as I stated, the most important division of the Post-Office Department, and the very fact which I state that under its chief comes the direction, the supervision, and in fact the payment of the $18,000,000—because payments cannot be made without his certificates having first been obtained that the parties are entitled to pay upon their contracts—shows the propriety of the action of the House. To compel such a man exercising a judicial position of this character, controlling so much of the public funds, to hold a place having less pay than other heads of divisions of equal grade with his, who perform only equal service at most, I think is unjust and is a discrimination which should not have the sanction of the judgment of the Senate. As the Senate has treated the Senator from West Virginia, I trust he will now join in treating this head of division and in putting him on an equality with his associate heads.

Mr. MAXEY. The statement made by the Senator from Michigan, who was so long the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, is so clear that I have but little to add.

It is true, as stated by the Senator from Kentucky, that the last House fixed this salary at $2,000. It is also true that on a rehearing they have increased the amount to $2,250, and the presumption is of law, and of common sense I may say, that they would not have added the $250 additional unless there had been good reasons for it. Now there is a reason which the Senator from Michigan, I believe, did not state.

The contracts for mail service have been largely increased and are constantly increasing; new mail-routes are constantly being established; new post-offices are being established. The frontier in my State, for example, within the last twelve months has been extended out about one hundred and fifty miles, and in that region post-offices and mail-routes are being established. This officer reaches in his duties into every neighborhood in the United States. There is not a neighborhood in the United States that is not deeply interested in having mail contracts carried out to the very letter; and it is for him to supervise and look into breaches of mail contracts. It is not the case of a clerk, as put by the Senator from Kentucky; but this is a chief of a division having under his control some seventeen clerks. He has the repsonsibility; he is responsible for the proper conduct and management of that division to which he belongs. To get a man of brains to take charge of such business as that you cannot expect with a small salary.

Besides, so far as the Post-Office Department is concerned, it is a Department of this Government in which the people of the United States are more deeply interested than they are and more directly affected by it than they are by any other Department of this Government; and it is not wise economy, it is not sound policy to derange the proper management of the Post-Office Department by having inefficient men anywhere in it; and so long as I am chairman of the Post-Office Committee I shall insist, because—I differ entirely with some gentlemen about that—I believe, as a business transaction, that sound economy demands that where you desire skilled labor you should get the best skilled labor you can and pay for it. That is my experience as a business man, and what is true of a business man in his own affairs is true of the management of governmental affairs.

We have at the head of this division a competent, qualified man, capable of taking charge of all its vast business throughout the United States, looking through these contracts, bringing the contractors to responsibility for their breaches. We need a man of capacity, a man of knowledge, and we cannot expect to get a man for a less sum than is given here; and the very fact that the House of Representatives on reconsideration saw proper to increase this amount is to my mind conclusive evidence that they believed the first amount was not sufficient.

Why should we strike that out? Has any good and sufficient reason been given for it? None whatever. Why should we depart from what was done by the House in this regard? Has the Senate any better light on this subject than the House? Not that I have heard. Has any reason been given? Not that I have heard. If you strike off this $250, why not strike off in like manner the $250 from the chief of every division in the Post-Office Department, and more especially of those divisions which have not the responsibility that this chief has? If you mean to do this, you should have carried it through. You have not carried it through. Therefore, your rule, in your own judgment, is not good.

Mr. BECK. It is not necessary to determine whether all that has been done heretofore has been done rightly or not. But the committee did not see any good reason why the salary of this particular officer should be increased above and beyond what was given to him during the current year and during the last year, or why he should be ahead of the chief clerk in this very same bureau. I find that for the first time the office of chief of this division was created last year. Up to that time all the duties, so far as I can observe, now performed by him were performed by an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk. I have the act of 1877 in my hand, and there is no chief of any such division in that appropriation bill, and no provision made for such a place; but being a gentleman who was somewhat able to take care of himself, he had an office created called "chief of the division of inspection;" and had his salary advanced from $1,800 to $2,000 last year for the first time, all these duties having before been performed, as far as I can observe by the law, by an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk. Having succeeded so well in getting $200 added last year, he sent to the Senate and House the letter which has been read asking them to advance him beyond that. That was refused, and he comes now to the House that had no Committee on Appropriations, for the bill was not reported by any committee to the House, and the bill was discussed for a week before the Committee on Appropriations was named by the Speaker, and gets somebody to advance him $250 more, leaving all the others standing as they were. Our committee, whether for good reason or not—the Senator from Texas thinks not, for he says there is neither common sense nor business in it, finding that an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk was advanced last year to $2,000 and a new office created for him, and that he comes again and gets $250 more added by a House that had no Committee on Appropriations at the time the bill was reported, leaving all the other stands just as they were and getting himself advanced $250 more—thought he ought to stand as the others stand. We thought it was not right to increase the salary of the one man, leaving all the others where they were before, until we can have better reason than we have yet had why a new division just made should be thus advanced. One year a new office is created and $200 more salary given, and then it alone is advanced $250, and the others all allowed to remain as they were before. It may be all right, but we did not feel as a committee that we had a right to agree to it.

Now, I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Michigan who knows all about this. Having examined the law of 1877 and being unable to find any provision for this chief of division, I ask him whether I am right in that assumption? If I am wrong in that, then a good deal of what I have said is not worth much.

Mr. FERRY. I take no issue with what the Senator has said. Is the Senator through?

Mr. BECK. I am through. I rose first to ask that question before the Senator from Texas began. I have been unable prior to last year to find any such division as this provided for.

Mr. FERRY. What the Senator has stated applies with great force to the credit of the occupant of this place. He says that he has held an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerkship, and has been fulfilling the duties of this very responsible office. Now, he states a general fact. You go through all the different divisions and bureaus of the various Departments of the Government and you will find subordinate officers acting in the place of superiors, filling higher positions at lower salaries, and in the end those men showing their qualifications for the place receive appointment by promotion to fill the headships of the bureaus and divisions. What has been stated by the Senator from Kentucky was stated in the letter of the clerk himself. He states that for five years he has been holding that position. He has by experience fitted himself for the place. He has shown his capacity, and we have the judgment of the House of Representatives and of his immediate superiors. We have the indorsement of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who has charge of mail transportation, the head of that service. He even adds that the clerk himself has modestly stated his capacity and his duties, and urges upon the attention of Congress the duty of giving him the salary which he asks.

It is no excuse and it is no answer to say that because a man has occupied at a lower salary a high position for which he is capable you should not give him a just salary for his services. I desire in this connection to put a question to the Senator from Kentucky. In considering the pay of this head of division, fulfilling duties that are far more responsible than those of the head of the dead-letter division, or those of the head of the postage-stamp division, or those of the head of the division of mail depredations, why should the committee judge that the heads of those divisions should have $2,250, while the man who controls and supervises the expenditure of an aggregate of $18,000,000 of money, the most important branch of the Post-Office Department, should not receive an equal salary with others who are filling places of less responsibility?

Mr. McDONALD. I hope that the amendment suggested by the Committee on Appropriations to this clause will not prevail. As has been stated by the Senator from Michigan this is in connection with the entire mail service, embracing the railway mail service as well as other descriptions, and is much the most responsible and laborious bureau of the Post-Office Department. The fact that this officer has discharged these duties at a less compensation than would be a fair and reasonable remuneration for his services and responsibilities is no reason why he should not be advanced to a rate something like reasonable. In fact this whole clause is under what this service requires, and I sent to the Committee on Appropriations, at the time the bill was under consideration there, amendments which I proposed to this clause of the bill for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the force necessary for its proper discharge. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General has repeatedly put before the proper committees of this body and the other House the necessity for an increase of force in this branch of the service, and I hope that this amendment will not prevail, and I shall offer at the proper time some other amendments to this same clause with a view of increasing the efficiency of this branch of this service.

Mr. BECK. I have only one word to say. We have increased the force of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General; we have increased the force of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and done everything we could to make the service efficient. The amiable Senator from Indiana, who I believe never objects to anybody who wants anything that seems reasonable, ought never to forget that those heads of divisions who are now receiving $2,250 were until a few years ago receiving $2,500. We cut them down $250 each, and this man who now wants to be put up to $2,250 worked for five years at $1,800 when money was not worth as much as it is now, and expressed no dissatisfaction. Then he had this position created for him, and he was put up to $2,000. Now he is not satisfied, and wants to keep going up higher. If we are going to stop at all increasing salaries, we have got to stop it right here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee, in line 1869.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 21.

Mr. BECK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and taken.

Mr. ANTHONY, (after having voted in the negative.) I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] Although I do not know how he would vote on this question, as most of his friends have voted contrary to me, I prefer to withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 13, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

Mr. PRICE. I ask that by unanimous consent the reading of so much of the Journal of yesterday as relates to the introduction of bills may be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The remainder of the Journal of yesterday was then read and approved.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. SHELLEY. I rise to a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend for a few moments, as the Chair understands that several members desire to make corrections of the RECORD, &c.

Mr. COFFROTH. I rise to a correction of the RECORD. My colleague, Mr. BELTZHOOVER, was paired with my other colleague, Mr. FISHER. On the vote last taken my colleague, Mr. BELTZHOOVER, would have voted "no" and my other colleague would have voted "ay."

The SPEAKER. The announcement was made yesterday, as the gentleman will see if he will examine the RECORD, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. FISHER, was paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. LAY.

Mr. COFFROTH. I have a telegram from Mr. BELTZHOOVER, in which he states that he was paired with Mr. FISHER.

The SPEAKER. By the RECORD the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. DICK, announced that his colleague, Mr. FISHER, was paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. LAY

Mr. BAYNE. My colleague, Mr. DICK, had been absent and paired with Mr. LAY. After Mr. DICK returned, finding that Mr. FISHER had gone home, I obtained the consent of Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, to substitute Mr. FISHER for Mr. DICK in the pair with Mr. LAY. That was satisfactory all around.

The SPEAKER. But it seems that Mr. BELTZHOOVER was away and understood that his pair with Mr. FISHER was binding. Therefore Mr. FISHER seems to have had two pairs.

Mr. DICK. With the consent of the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, I transferred my pair with Mr. LAY to my colleague Mr. FISHER.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. That is correct, and I would state also that Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina, was paired with my colleague, Mr. BLAND, and it was so stated yesterday.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Mr. RUSSELL is announced as paired with Mr. SPEER, of Georgia.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. That is Mr. RUSSELL of Massachusetts.

Mr. COFFROTH. Here is the telegram which I received from Mr. BELTZHOOVER, and which is dated Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania:

Necessity detains me to-day. Am paired with FISHER. Have it announced.

Mr. WAIT. I wish to state that I voted inadvertently yesterday. It did not occur to me at the moment that I was paired with Mr. ROSS, of New Jersey. I ask to withdraw my vote on the proposition to pass the Army appropriation bill, on the proposition to pass the income tax bill, and also on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] for the reasons stated asks leave to withdraw all his votes of yesterday.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR. I ask unanimous consent of the House to have my vote recorded on the bill restoring the income tax. I was unexpectedly called away from my seat yesterday, and did not return until after the vote on that proposition was taken.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR. On that proposition I vote "ay."

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote on the proposition to suspend the rules and pass the income-tax bill, and also on the proposition to suspend the rules and pass the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent, as it vacates a rule of the House.

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. On the income-tax bill I vote "ay," and on the Army appropriation bill I vote "no."

Mr. KILLINGER. I ask the same privilege.

Mr. BREWER. I think it would be better to call the roll over again.

Mr. CONGER. I did not hear what the proposition was.

The SPEAKER. The consent of the House has been given to two members to have their votes recorded upon propositions acted upon yesterday. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KILLINGER] should be accorded the same privilege that has been accorded to others. The gentleman asks leave to have his vote recorded on the income-tax bill and on the Army appropriation bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. KILLINGER. On the income-tax bill I vote "no," and on the Army appropriation bill I vote "ay."

The SPEAKER. This recording of votes requires unanimous consent, it being a vacation of the rule. On this occasion the Chair thinks it should be allowed to all members who desire it; but the Chair doubts the propriety of vacating such a rule as a general thing.

Mr. PHISTER. I must object to granting leave to any other members to have their votes recorded on propositions which were voted upon yesterday.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to state that I was paired on all political questions with my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. RYON. Relying upon that pair I was absent from the House yesterday. I find an announcement in the RECORD this morning upon the income-tax bill, by my colleague, Mr. WRIGHT, that Mr. RYON was paired with Mr. FISHER, of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Mr. FISHER seems to have been abundantly paired.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not understand that Mr. RYON was paired with Mr. FISHER. I desire to say that if I had been present and at liberty to vote on the income-tax proposition I should have voted "no."

The SPEAKER. The proper notice will be taken.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to record my vote in favor of the income-tax bill of yesterday, as I was unavoidably absent at the time.

Mr. PHISTER. I object.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. SHELLEY. I desire to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SHELLEY. Time enough to refute some charges which have been made against me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to know if the charges relate to the gentleman as a member of this House?

Mr. SHELLEY. They do.

Mr. Speaker, I regret the necessity of asking the attention of the House while I undertake to answer charges contained in an article which appeared in the New York Tribune of the 5th instant. I send the article to the Clerk and ask him to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

[By telegraph to the Tribune.]

A NOTABLE SOUTHERN DISTRICT—THE FACTS ABOUT THE WAY IN WHICH MR. SHELLEY GOT INTO CONGRESS, AND HOW HE KEEPS HIMSELF IN.

WASHINGTON, May 4.

The following statement, which will be brought to the attention of the House of Representatives in a day or two, will serve to emphasize and at the same time illustrate the strong determination of the white democracy of Alabama to have free elections and preserve the purity of the ballot-box.

In the fourth congressional district of Alabama the registered white vote is 6,800, and the registered colored vote is 23,000. At the congressional election in 1876 the republicans cast about 16,000 votes and the democrats 9,685 votes. Last July, Hon. Jeremiah Haralson, a colored republican who had served in Congress, announced himself as a republican candidate for Representative at the election ensuing in November. The democratic candidate, General C. M. SHELLEY, and his friends at once sought to drive Haralson from the field by intimidation. The leading democratic newspaper published at Selma, in an editorial addressed to him personally, said:

"Now, while we will not advise any one to shoot you we are free to say that if you continue in your present course we shall shed no tears over your demise. We understand that you were supplied by the radical executive committee with funds to return to this district and whoop 'em up in the style we have alluded to. If this is so you had better use your unexpended balance in getting away from this county and section."

Mr. Haralson's only offense was that of being the republican candidate for Congress in a district which, in a fair election, would have given an overwhelming republican majority. When the vote was canvassed it was declared that SHELLEY, democrat, had received 8,514 votes and Haralson 6,540. Haralson served a notice of contest, and began to make a list of his witnesses. At this point he met with unexpected trouble. No notary public or other officer authorized to administer oaths could be found for a long time who would take the depositions of the witnesses. The officers were all democrats, and urged that if they were to perform this duty their business would suffer. At length a circuit judge, a republican, was found who consented to act, and a large number of witnesses were summoned. As soon as they had appeared and the examination had been begun SHELLEY and his democratic friends procured indictments against all of them on charges trumped up for the occasion and they were arrested and thrown into jail, where they remained until the time within which their depositions could be of service in the election contest had expired, when they were released. Haralson's attorney was also indicted on a false charge and driven from the State. A mob of white democrats assailed Haralson and compelled him also to leave the State.

In Lowndes County, where there is a large republican majority, it is charged that the election officers in a number of precincts were bribed by SHELLEY to send in the election returns unsigned, which they did, and the returns were of course rejected by the county canvassers. In other precincts, where there were only ten or a dozen white voters and ten times as many colored voters, the polls were not opened at all. Mr. Haralson complains that although a large number of the inspectors of election were indicted in the United States court, the district attorney refused to allow him to examine the papers; but he avers that a number of these indicted officials were members of the grand jury which indicted his attorney and witnesses on false charges.

This case cannot be investigated by the Committee of Elections, because, as Mr. Haralson will claim, all his lawful means of establishing his right to a seat in the House have been overthrown and rendered nugatory by the action of General SHELLEY, the sitting member, and his friends; because it is impossible under existing law to take depositions in the case "by reason of the fixed and avowed purpose of the political and personal friends of General SHELLEY in the district to deny to the freedmen all civil and political rights, and to set at defiance all laws which provide any remedy for such conduct on their part:" and because of the charge of bribery against General SHELLEY, which, if proved, will disqualify him from holding his seat as a Representative. Mr. Haralson will therefore ask the House to investigate the matter.

Mr. SHELLEY, the sitting member, was a brigadier-general in the confederate army, and in the present Congress is a stanch supporter of the revolutionary schemes of the democrats, although, so far as he is himself concerned, he appears to have found it easy to evade and practically to annul the laws for the protection of the ballot-box.

Mr. SHELLEY. The charges made against me by this correspondent, Mr. Speaker, are very grave, and if true would entitle me to the condemnation of all fair-minded men, whether republicans or democrats. I therefore feel constrained to make this public denial and offer such evidence as I may have to refute them. The vote in that district is not correctly stated in the article. The white registered vote is about 8,000 and the colored vote about 22,000. While it is true that in 1876 there were about 16,000 republican votes cast, these were nearly equally divided between two republican candidates, both of whom were colored.

The vote in 1878 is correctly stated. I received almost the entire white vote, and in addition a number of colored votes. The smallness of the vote of Mr. Haralson was due to the fact that many of the negro voters failed and refused to vote in Dallas, Perry, and Hale Counties, having been advised to this course by Haralson and his friends. To support this statement I ask the Clerk to read the following affidavit.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF ALABAMA,
Dallas County:

Before me, the undersigned, commissioner of the circuit court of the United States for the middle district of Alabama, came personally Moody H. May, known to me, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he resides in Selma, in said county and State, and is a practicing attorney in said city; that in the month of November, 1878, a short time after the congressional election held in that month, he was in the city of Montgomery, Alabama, in attendance on the United States circuit court as a witness summoned before the grand jury of said county, and was at the time in the office of the United States marshal, when Hon. Jeremiah Haralson came in and a conversation was had between him and affiant. Affiant said to him, "Jerry, you thought you were playing a pretty sharp trick." He asked why. Affiant replied, "You would not let the negroes vote down in Dallas. I understand the negroes did not vote at Veto or Warrenton; that they were there all day and tried to get them to vote, but they would not do so." He said, "Yes," that he had sent word to them not to vote; that as far as he could he had done so; that his intention was to keep all the negroes in Dallas County from voting, and that he would have done so if he could have got word to them; that he thought he could beat General SHELLEY in the other counties in the district and leave Dallas out.

MOODY H. MAY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 8th day of May, A. D. 1879.
[SEAL.] HUGH S. D. MALLORY,
Commissioner of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Alabama.

Mr. SHELLEY. The same advice was given as to Hale and Perry, except at certain precincts. In addition to this it was well understood throughout the State that the policy of the republican party was to abstain from voting or taking any part in the congressional election. Reference to the vote in the several districts of the State will show that this policy was generally acted upon. I desire to state here that the election throughout this district was peaceable and fair; there was no interference with any voter, nor was there any disturbance or disorder in any part of the district on the day of election, or at any time before or after, growing out of the election.

It is charged by this correspondent that no notary public or other officer authorized to administer oaths could be found for a long time who would take the depositions of the witnesses which Mr. Haralson desired to examine in support of his contest. It is not stated to what officer or officers he applied or that he applied to any. The only person or persons to whom any application was made by him that I ever heard of were two republicans, one of whom declined, as I was informed, because he could not spare the time from his business. The other was Hon. George H. Craig, judge of the circuit court for the first judicial circuit of the State. Judge Craig is a republican, and although in bad health consented to take the testimony, stipulating only that Mr. Haralson should employ a clerk to do the writing as he was not able to do it, and at the time appointed did examine such witnesses as were brought before him. Their depositions, I presume, are now on file with the Committee of Elections.

Mr. KEIFER. I rise to a point of order. I desire to know whether it is competent for a member on this floor, under the guise of a personal explanation, to introduce evidence that is pending or should be pending before a committee of the House involving his right to a seat? I desire to know whether it is competent for him, under the claim that he is making a personal explanation, to try his case, whatever it may be, which is pending before a committee of the House? I desire to know if it is competent for a gentleman to introduce ex parte evidence, or any other evidence, relating to a case pending before the committee?

Mr. SHELLEY. These statements do not go to the merits of my contest and have nothing to do with it; they only relate to the charges of this article, which was intended to influence the Committee of Elections and decide upon the question whether further time should be allowed for taking testimony.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause a passage from the Manual to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the privilege of making a personal explanation is given, the member must confine his remarks to the matter upon which he has been criticised, and in regard to which he has asked consent to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself in his remarks in the manner indicated in the rule which has been read.

Mr. SHELLEY. I will do so. I desire the Clerk to read the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Middle District of Alabama:

Personally came before me, H. S. D. Mallory, a commissioner for the circuit court of the United States in said district, George H. Craig, who being by me duly sworn, on oath says, as follows: That he is now, and has been since November, 1874, judge of the first judicial circuit of the State of Alabama, which embraces among other counties the county of Dallas, which is in the fourth congressional district of the State of Alabama, and that he now resides and has resided for several years in the city of Selma, in said county; that in the latter part of December, 1878, Hon. Jeremiah Haralson applied to affiant to act for him as commissioner to take the testimony of his witnesses in the contest between him, the said Haralson, and Hon. CHARLES M. SHELLEY for a seat in the present Congress of the United States, under the statutes of the United States in such cases made and provided; that affiant consented to act as such commissioner, and so notified the said Haralson; that afterward, and in the month of January, 1879, according the best recollection of affiant, R. B. Thomas, esq., the attorney for the said Haralson in said contest, handed to affiant a notice of the examination of witnesses before affiant in said contest to be commenced on the 9th day of January, 1879; a true copy of said notice is hereto attached, marked "Exhibit A," and made a part of this affidavit; that said notice as shown by the indorsement thereon had been served on one of the attorneys for said SHELLEY, and that affiant issued subpœnas for the witnesses named in said notice to appear before him in accordance with said notice; that on the 9th day of January, 1879, the witnesses named in said notice appeared before affiant as commissioner as aforesaid, and by consent of parties the examination of said witnesses was adjourned until January 10, 1879; that on the 10th day of January, 1879, in pursuance of said adjournment, the examination of Houston L. Smith, one of the witnesses named in said notice, was commenced before affiant as such commissioner; that said examination was continued before affiant as such commissioner from day to day until the 29th day of January, 1879; that at the beginning of said examination affiant notified the said attorney of the said Haralson that affiant was in bad health and physically incapable of reducing to writing the testimony of said witnesses, and then notified said attorney that he must furnish him with a clerk to do the writing necessary in the examination of said witnesses; that said attorney replied that he would notify his client that affiant needed and demanded a clerk to do said writing, and requested him to furnish him with means to do so; therefore affiant stated to said attorney that he would go on with the examination in the mean time and write as long each day as he was physically able to do; that on the 25th day of January, 1879, after proceeding with the examination several hours, commissioner became physically unable to proceed further with said examination, and then announced to the counsel for the contestant that a clerk must be furnished to take down the questions propounded and the answers of the witnesses as commissioner was so disabled by rheumatism in his hand that he had with difficulty written the questions and answers thus far, and that contestant was apprised of the condition of commissioner before this examination began and had then and since repeatedly been requested to furnish some person to perform such labor, but had failed so to do; that counsel for contestant then stated to the commissioner that he could furnish no clerk, and the examination was thereupon continued until the 27th day of January, 1879, to allow the counsel for contestant further time to furnish such clerk; that in pursuance of said adjournment affiant met the attorney of said Haralson and the attorneys for said SHELLEY, whereupon the attorney for said Haralson stated that he had no means to employ such clerk and could therefore furnish none, and thereupon said examination was adjourned over until January 28, 1879, to allow contestant further time to make arrangements to employ such clerk; that on the 28th of January, 1879, said examination was further continued until the 29th day of January, 1879, to allow contestant further time to employ such clerk; that on the 29th day of January, 1879, the attorney of said contestant made known to the commissioner that he had not the means, and none had been furnished him by the contestant, with which to employ a person to act as clerk at said examination, and that there was no probability that any such clerk could be furnished, and thereupon affiant, for this reason and because he was physically unable to do the writing necessary in said examination, adjourned the said examination finally; that during said examination, so far as affiant knows or is informed, no one of the contestant's said witnesses was arrested or prevented in any manner from attending said examination by any one; that the only reasons why said examination was not continued were those stated above, to wit: the inability of affiant to do the necessary writing and because the said Haralson did not furnish him with a clerk to do the same; that the witnesses named in said notice were the only witnesses which he was requested to subpœna by the said Haralson, and the only ones which he did actually subpœna; that the attorney for said Haralson was present during said examination upon every day during the continuance of the same, except a few days when he was prevented, as said attorney informed affiant, by sickness and death in his family and on account of professional engagements, and that during said examination said attorney was not arrested or in any way molested by any one in the performance of his duties as attorney of the said Haralson before affiant as commissioner as aforesaid, except that the attorneys for contestee, SHELLEY, objected to nearly every question propounded to the witnesses, and the objections to each question so made were so lengthy that it consumed as much, or more, time to write them down than to write the questions and answers. The witness Smith's examination was discontinued or interrupted before by the severe illness of his child, and the examination of another witness begun, but for the reasons hereinbefore stated it was impossible for affiant to complete the examination of any of said witnesses. Affiant's inability to write for any length of time was caused by a severe attack of inflammatory rheumatism, from which he was then just recovering, and which had been so severe as to prevent him from presiding in the trial of the cases in the circuit court a part of the time during the fall court previous.

GEO. H. CRAIG.

Lewis, who, having been by me first duly sworn, deposes and says, that he is now, and has been for several years, a notary public in and for the county of Dallas and State of Alabama, residing in the city of Selma, and that Jeremiah Haralson, who was the republican candidate for Representative in the Congress of the United States of America for the fourth congressional district of the State of Alabama at the election held on or about the 5th day of November, 1878, never did, nor did any one else for him, apply to affiant to act as commissioner to take testimony for the said Haralson in his contest with Hon. CHARLES M. SHELLEY for a seat in the present Congress of the United States, and that affiant has never stated to or otherwise informed the said Haralson that he would not act as such commissioner.

[L. S.] HUGH S. D. MALLORY,
Commissioner of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Alabama.

In reference to the charge that the witnesses summoned by said Haralson to be examined in his behalf were indicted or arrested and thrown in jail and thus prevented from giving their depositions, or that his attorney was indicted and driven from the State pending the examination, I wish to offer the affidavit of the sheriff of Dallas County, which is a complete refutation of said charge:

THE STATE OF ALABAMA,
Dallas County:

Before me came personally George R. Mason, known to me, who being duly sworn, deposes and says that he resides in the city of Selma, Dallas County, Alabama, and that he is now, and has been since the —— day of March, 1877, the sheriff of Dallas County, Alabama, duly commissioned, qualified, and acting; that some time in the month of December or January last Hon. George H. Craig, judge of the circuit court of the first judicial circuit of the State of Alabama, placed in his hands as such sheriff several subpœnas for witnesses to be summoned before the said judge in behalf of Jeremiah Haralson in his contest with CHARLES M. SHELLEY for the seat in the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States from the fourth congressional district of Alabama; that affiant summoned all said witnesses except two, who lived a long distance from Selma, and the subpœnas for these two he sent by a third party to the neighborhood in which they lived to be served; but affiant does not think these two were served; affiant states further that all the witnesses so served were present and attended before the said judge in said examination, including the two last mentioned; that they were not in any manner by any one molested or interfered with or prevented from attending said examination or giving their said evidence; that no warrants of arrest were issued or served or executed on any of said witnesses, nor were any of them arrested previous to their examination, nor, so far as affiant is informed, at any time after their examination; that affiant did not at any time refuse or fail to serve any subpœna for any witness or witnesses for the said Haralson in said contest that he was requested to serve; that no persons indicted in any of the courts of Dallas County for any offense committed in the said congressional election were arrested by affiant or any one for him, or by any other person so far as affiant is informed, previous to the taking of any testimony by the said Haralson in said contest, nor until after the said Haralson discontinued the taking of testimony in the same; that so far as affiant is informed and believes no person was threatened with indictment or arrest or otherwise threatened on account of any testimony given or proposed to be given in behalf of the said Haralson in said contest. Affiant further states that no indictment was found against R. B. Thomas, who was the attorney of the said Haralson in said contest, nor was any warrant issued for him until long after the said Haralson ceased to take testimony in said contest, and that no threat was ever made, so far as affiant is informed and believes, against the said Thomas for any action in the matter of said contest.

G. R. MASON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this the 9th day of May, 1879.
[L. S.] HUGH S. D. MALLORY,
Commissioner of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Alabama.

It is not true that a mob of white democrats, or any one else, assailed Haralson and compelled him to leave the State. He remained there during the entire canvass, and for a month after the election, traveled where he pleased without being interfered with. He left the State voluntarily, unmolested and undisturbed, and to-day he can return to Alabama and be in no more danger from mob violence or any other violence than any other citizen of the United States. As to the charge of bribery of election officers in Lowndes County, I deny it most emphatically. I had no communication, directly or indirectly, with any of the inspectors of election in that county. I never offered them, or any one of them, money or other inducement to send up unsigned or irregular returns, or to prevent them from complying with the regulations of the law; nor did I ever authorize any other person for me or in my behalf to offer such inducement. The charge is simply false and libelous. It may be true that in some of the precincts of this county no polls were opened. By the laws of Alabama the appointment of inspectors of elections is made by the probate judge, clerk of the circuit court, and sheriff of the county, a majority of whom in the county of Lowndes were republicans, and doubtless appointed at each election precinct members of their own party who were deemed capable of conducting the election. The laws of Alabama do not compel any person to serve as inspectors or managers of election, and if those appointed decline or fail to open the polls at the proper time, any other than qualified electors may open the polls and hold the election. If, therefore, it be true as alleged, that elections were not held in many of the precincts of this county, it was the fault of the republican party, as any person who had the right to vote was authorized to open the polls, and neither the democratic party nor I can be held responsible for it, Mr. Speaker. I would not have trespassed upon the time of this House if I had had any other means of reaching the many readers of that widely circulated and influential journal, and I hope the editor will do me the justice to publish this statement.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not notice any correction of the allegations made in the paragraph which appeared in the paper. Are the statements in the paragraph correct?

Mr. SHELLEY. I have no connection with the paper, and know nothing about it.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I rise to several questions of personal explanation, and I will refer to the smallest and most unimportant first. It is a matter to which I would not have referred at all were it not that I am advised by my friends that I should make some reference to it, as a matter of justice to myself and to the party of which I am a member—the party which elected me a judge of the superior court of North Carolina. I do not do so, however, as a matter of justice to myself or on the ground that it is any matter of consequence to the people of this country, because I am very much inclined to think that if there is any matter of small importance to the country it is the biography of the ordinary member of Congress, like the gentlemen who have been assailing me, and myself.

It was stated upon this floor I believe first by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and I understand that it has been repeated since, that I was elected judge of the circuit court of North Carolina by the republican party of the State before I had ever received a law license; a statement which, however immaterial it may be regarded by those who made it, is a little defective, however immaterial the defect may be regarded by those who made it; and the defect consists in this: there is not a single word of truth in it, not a word. So much for that. It is well known to be false in the State of North Carolina and I should not have alluded to it at all but for the reasons I have given.

In the course of a speech which I made but did not deliver, for being a very ordinary member of Congress I printed it, I said what the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is well known that two democrats, one from Florida and the other from North Carolina, hold seats on this floor, not by the vote of the people but by the fraudulent mandate of returning boards, some of whom, strange to say, are in the penitentiary.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, a more rounded, complete, accurate, and perfect truth was never uttered by mortal man, and that is what is the matter. It is the truth that hurts, and that is the reason that during my absence for the last ten days assaults have been made upon me on this floor, and the gentleman, who is entitled to be so called by the courtesies of this House and who claims to represent the second congressional district of North Carolina on this floor during my absence, and after I had told him, having had occasion to meet him, precisely what I intended to say about him, and after that speech had appeared and I remained here a day after it appeared, came into this House looking very much as if he was big with a speech, but he wilted on seeing me here, and after I left he got up and among other things he made the following assertion, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now, sir, what I have to say in reply to that is simply this: if the gentleman intended to refer to any district in North Carolina as to the returning board being in the penitentiary, it is simply false and slanderous.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is an exhibition of what the Yankees call "plantation manners." I am used to that kind of thing. I was born on a plantation myself; and it is rather late in the day for me to be bullied by exhibitions of "plantation manners." Therefore, I shall hardly be deterred from telling the truth by way of sustaining and giving the reasons for the assertion contained in that speech. He knew I never said that any of them were in the penitentiary. He knew—he ought to have known—it is fair to assume that a man who gets all the way from North Carolina to Congress can read, at least by spelling out the hard words; [laughter;] and any man who will read that sentence will know, if he knows anything about the history of the country, that nothing was said about the returning boards of North Carolina. It had been previously asserted upon this floor, it had been asserted by the public press throughout the country, it was generally accepted throughout America that some of the returning boards of Florida had been sent to the penitentiary; and the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. DAVIDSON]—I do not know whether he is in his seat or not——

Mr. DAVIDSON, (rising.) Yes, sir.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I am glad of it. I was not in my seat when the gentleman got after me. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Florida has taken occasion to read that sentence and to put words in my mouth which I never uttered. He has taken occasion to try to make it appear that I said the State returning board of Florida was in the penitentiary. I said no such thing I said that some of the returning boards of that State were in the penitentiary. I said only what had been said before on this floor, what was said by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] in the presence of the gentleman from Florida, during the discussion of the prima facie case of Mr. HULL from that State. I ask the Clerk to read what the gentleman from Maine said on that occasion.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the county of Brevard, which never polled over 169 votes, in the last election the democratic candidate for Congress received 310 votes. There were cast for him at the polls 116 votes, but the canvassing board of the county deliberately, wickedly, and designedly added 194 votes, giving him altogether 310. Now, sir, there is no dispute about that. Everybody admits it, and the men who committed the fraud have been indicted, tried, convicted, and are to-day in the penitentiary for adding 194 votes to the vote of the democratic candidate for Congress. To-day, I say, they are in the penitentiary, paying the penalty for their crime against the purity of elections in Florida.

Mr. HULL in his answer admits that the vote of Brevard County was thrown out properly. In his answer he insists that the action of the State canvassing board in rejecting the returns of Madison and Brevard Counties was right.

So Mr. HULL himself admits that these men are in the penitentiary to-day rightfully, and that Brevard County was rejected by the State canvassing board rightfully, and all he claims is that Madison County should have been rejected also.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Florida has asserted that this statement was untrue. I have not taken occasion to ascertain whether these particular individuals who committed those frauds were members of those returning boards or not; I do not care. To study the frauds of the politics of Florida would be a little too much for ordinary human life. Therefore I have not troubled myself about it, and do not propose to do so. If the gentleman from Florida, who is familiar I suppose with the politics of that State, says as a matter of fact that none of his returning boards down there are in the penitentiary, and that what the gentleman from Maine asserted was untrue, then I will amend the statement in that particular and acknowledge that they are not in the penitentiary, but they ought to be, [laughter;] and by that I will stand.

I confess I was astonished that any of them should ever break into the penitentiary. I should just as soon have expected to find Brother Beecher or Brother Talmage, or Moody, or Sankey, or Colonel Ingersoll, or any other distinguished theologian in the penitentiary. [Laughter.] I thought that these thieves who steal elections, who steal counties and congressional districts and States, instead of being sent to the penitentiary were generally sent to the Legislature, or put into custom-houses occasionally—rewarded for their crimes. If these individuals down there who counted out the legally elected candidate in that district are not in the penitentiary, then I take it that they are now in the everglades of Florida awaiting that sure promotion which will reward them upon the accession of the democratic party to power. [Laughter.] They are certainly in the line of promotion.

Now in regard to these returning boards in North Carolina, I desire to explain what I said about them, and I do not want any mistake in regard to it. I know hundreds of the democrats in the second congressional district, and many of them are among the best men in that State. It is an unfortunate fact, which I very much regret, that most of the best men in the South are democrats, though there are many of course who are not. I do not want to be understood as saying that all of the men who constituted those returning boards ought to be in the penitentiary. Some of them acted innocently, some of them did not know any better, some of them were innocent parties to the fraud. But I say that the conspirators who reverse a popular verdict of more than two thousand, who deliberately change it, who counted in a man who was defeated by over 2,000 votes, are criminals and deserve a felon's doom.

Why, sir, I hold in my hand one of the tickets used in that district, to which I invite the attention of this House and the country. I want to show it as one of the curiosities of reconstruction. There it is. [Exhibiting a ticket.] Gentlemen will find a number of these tickets on my desk, as samples, which they can examine after I get through.

Under the statute of North Carolina tickets are required to be on white paper, without device. The ticket which I hold in my hand contains a faint impression made in printing it. In cutting the paper apart the machine which rolled over it made a little impression upon the paper about six or eight deep, scarcely perceptible to the eye, and they called that a device, and rejected the votes by hundreds. They actually rejected whole townships because some of the tickets had that little impression upon the paper.

Again, the man's name was O'Hara, and the apostrophe after the O was not fully made by the printing press in some places, and they rejected the tickets on that account. [Laughter on the republican side.] In other places there was a comma after the word a, and they rejected it because the comma was there. [Laughter.] This information I got from reliable democrats of that district, from men who were no parties to this fraud, but who denounced it, and who believed it to be as bold a swindle as I know it to be from the testimony.

The gentleman who gets up and asserts my allegations are not true knows that he was beaten by more than 2,000 votes. He knows that in the single county of Edgecombe they threw out 950 of the majority of the man who was elected. He knows that the township of Scotland Neck gave 200 or 300 majority against him. And I will do the democrats of that township where he lives the justice to say that many of them did not vote for him. [Laughter on the republican side.] He knows that in the counties of Lenoir, Cravens, and Edgecombe they threw out hundreds of votes upon most miserable pretenses and excuses; that the polls were not opened in time; that the law required them to be opened at sunrise and they were only opened half an hour afterward or an hour; that in one place the polls were moved ten or fifteen feet from the place where the law required them to be held—upon such miserable and paltry pretenses—and that the voters were not sworn by the right officers. And the man who committed the irregularity took advantage of it so as to reverse the popular verdict of thousands.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Oh, I know it hurts the gentleman. [Laughter on the republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois rises to a question of order, and will state it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, give him rope and let him go on.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that under the guise of a personal explanation the gentleman's speech is going on to discuss the merits of a contested-election case now before the Committee of Elections, and which is to be decided hereafter by this House. If the gentleman is allowed to proceed, then it will be in order for the sitting member here to make reply, and we will have precipitated upon the House a discussion as to who was elected in that district while the question is pending before the Committee of Elections and must hereafter be decided upon testimony to be adduced in the contest. I desire to make the same point that was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] a little while ago in reference to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHELLEY.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the same rule read as was read when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] was making a personal explanation a short time since. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand the rule, if the Chair pleases, very well, and it need not be read for my benefit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only causes it to be read for the information of the gentleman from North Carolina, as he had it read for the information of the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the privilege of making a personal explanation is given, the member must confine his remarks to the matter upon which he has been criticised and in regard to which he has asked consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is all I desire.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I notice that the gentleman from Illinois, or any other gentleman on this side, was not one-half so sensitive when the gentleman from the second congressional district of North Carolina was putting in his evidence before that committee under the guise of a personal explanation. Possibly the gentleman from Illinois did not hear him.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not; I was out of my seat when he made his explanation.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Of course if the gentleman had heard him he would have been the first man to jump up and stop him. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I should have objected to anything that was not a personal explanation. I am informed, however, that objection was made on the other side of the House. I did not make it; I was not in my seat.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. That reminds me that in the course of the personal explanation which he made he went on to introduce affidavits to show that the man who was elected and the man whose seat he holds and whose salary he draws was not eligible under the Constitution of the United States.

Now, sir, I desire to be distinctly understood that I do not care whether he is or not. I do not know. Whenever the question comes up I shall vote upon it as I believe to be right, and if he is not eligible I will not vote to retain him in his seat. It has got nothing to do with it; and it is a sorry sight to see a man defending a seat when he knows he was beaten by thousands of votes upon the excuse that the other man is not eligible. As a North Carolinian, and speaking for the people of that steady, moderate, conservative, noble old State, I desire in their name here to-day to repudiate and condemn that proceeding; and I protest in their name they are not responsible for it. It is owing to the frauds that were committed in that district by which a man sits here with no more right to a seat upon this floor than that distinguished democrat who represents the returning boards of Florida in the penitentiary at Albany, or somewhere else—no more right than that man has to a seat upon this floor. I say it is a foul blot and blur upon the escutcheon of that proud old State. And if anybody thinks I can be stopped from denouncing it by getting up here and cutting capers before the country, he is very much mistaken.

It may be said that I am prejudging the case; that we have got no right to denounce a fraud by which a party obtained a seat in this House because we may have to sit as judges on the election. I protest that we have a right; when we know as a matter of public notoriety, what every man in America ought to know, we have a right to see to it that the country shall know it; and so far as prejudging it is concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that it not only ought to be prejudged, but it ought to be precondemned and pre-executed.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman through?

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I do not think of anything else now. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN rose.

The SPEAKER. How long a time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know, twenty-five or thirty minutes, and perhaps not so much.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks thirty minutes for a personal explanation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I feel obliged to the House for the courtesy extended to me. I regret exceedingly that the utterances I made in this House a few days ago should have been confirmed this morning in every particular as a truth that shall go forth to the country. I was in hopes that the gentleman who has just spoken when he returned to Washington would have had manhood and patriotism enough in his soul to have gotten up here and said like a man that he did not intend what he said should apply to my State or myself. He has failed to do this to his own discredit. He facetiously alludes to me as being big with a speech. Mr. Speaker, I was never big with a speech. Nor was the gentleman ever big with a speech; but he is big with something more poisonous and more damnable than any speech can be. He is a nice man [laughter] to declare on this floor that I am not entitled to my seat, to stand up in his place and malign and slander; and if he could, would have damned his native State, his people.

There is not a gentleman upon that side of the House who, in the bottom of his heart, does not hate, despise, and scorn that contemptible creature who would crawl in the dust at the feet of his country's conquerors, as these men of the South who deserted their race, deserted their country, have done, and joined the rag-tag and bob-tail of creation and the loosed convicts from the penitentiaries of the North. There is not one of you who has any respect for the man who would ally himself with that class. They came down there and joined themselves with the lowest type of the scallawag tribe in the southern section to feed upon our bleeding land.

The gentleman charges that I knew he did not refer to North Carolina. The charge is false. I did not know any such thing. I had a talk with him on the 24th day of last April at his seat. His speech purports to have been delivered on the 17th. On the 26th it appeared, and on the 28th or 29th it was called to my attention. He remarked to me on the 24th that he was going to show me up, or something to that effect; I do not remember the expression. I stated to the gentleman then that my seat was contested and that occupying the position I did I would prefer he said nothing about me. I did not want to come in conflict with any gentleman from North Carolina; nor did I want my case prejudged by this House. But he said then that he had his speech written and he was going to deliver it, but I knew nothing of its tenor. It has never been delivered in this House, but maliciously he injected it (under the permission that had been extended to him and others) into the RECORD, to slander North Carolina, to slander Florida, and to slander all the good people of the South. For I unhesitatingly say that the good, honest, upright people of the South belong to the democratic party. [Laughter on the republican side of the House.] There are in the South, so far as my knowledge goes, but few respectable white men belonging to the republican party. [Laughter on the republican side of the House.] That gentleman has been denounced from every stump in North Carolina, and not a respectable man in the State, republican or democrat, would have voted for him but for his affiliation with the greenback party.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to a point of order. I insist that this discussion is not in order. [Cries from the republican side of the House of "Let him go on!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not in order.

Mr. STEVENSON. I raise the point of order and insist that the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina in regard to his colleague are not suitable to the dignity of a body of this kind.

The SPEAKER. The House will remember that it has given this permission, and not the Chair. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair thinks that personal explanations are becoming an abuse. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I do not understand that the rules of the House allow any member of this House when he receives unanimous consent to make a personal explanation to transcend the ordinary decorum which a body of this character requires. I do not understand that the rules will permit a member who gets permission of the House to refer to that which is personal, to allow him the right to discuss questions of legislation, or the right to discuss any question
